FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered, according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 521—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 23, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00

A New Volume.

THIS number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER commences a new volume, the TWENTY-FIRST. During the past four years, it has presented to the public the most extensive, accurate, and striking pictures that were ever produced in any periodical, completely illustrating the great civil war, in all of its phases and features. It will now preserve the same enterprise and activity in other fields, and give weekly a clear epitome of the movement and spirit of the times. No event worthy of illustration will escape its ubiquitous eye, and Portraits, Sketches of Scenery, of Works of Art and Machinery, and all the thousand things and doings which diversify, interest and enliven this active age, will find an appropriate place in its pages. Every number, as heretofore, will contain apart from a continued tale of thrilling interest, one or more original stories by American authors, as also Poetry, Incidents of Travel, Adventure, Anecdote, and a careful Epitome of Current Events. It will continue to be, as an Illustrated Family Newspaper, First in Peace, as it was First in War.

The commencement of a new volume offers a good opportunity for a renewal of subscriptions, as it is almost impossible to supply back numbers.

The Horrors of Andersonville.

THE trial of Wirz, who had charge of the slaughter-pen for Union prisoners at Andersonville, in Georgia, has brought out already a mass of testimony more than confirming the most extravagant stories of rebel cruelty that reached us during the war. That the great mortality of fifteen thousand deaths out of thirty thousand prisoners, in the short space of a single year, was due to exceptional causes, no one can deny. What these causes were, sufficiently appears from the evidence now coming forward. They were overcrowding, insufficient food and water, denial of shelter and clothing, imperfect hospital accommodations, deliberate vaccination with deadly virus, and general cruelty, manifested in the needless shooting of prisoners, in chaining, whipping and "bucking" them, and hunting them with bloodhounds. It is proved that men, some of them cripples, were shot because they asked to be permitted to go outside of the fetid den in which they were confined. Others were shot while struggling to obtain water outside of the stagnant pools, around which, with demoniac ingenuity, their pen was built, and which were covered with human excrement, while the approaches to them were through morasses of maggots a foot in depth. Forests were near, but the prisoners were not allowed to go to them to cut timber for building, or wood for fuel. Dysentery, gangrene and scurvy swept away their hundreds daily, and during the cold weather, when the dead carts came round in the morning, the rotten rags that hid imperfectly the nakedness of the wretched dead, adhered to the frozen ground, while the poor emaciated corpses were torn away to be deposited in the shallow trenches, wherein our soldiers were hidden from sight. An officer testifies, that of ninety men placed in his squad, but one was alive at the end of six months. Another swears—let there be no false delicacy in this awful matter—that he frequently saw miserable, starving wretches searching among the voidances of the sick for undigested scraps of food! A dozen men, some suffering from dysentery and loathsome diseases, were chained together, so that all were obliged to follow any one of the number, at any hour of the day or night, who was obliged to obey the demands of his distemper. The hospitals were mere dens, insufficient in size, and without beds or adequate attendance. The rebel surgeons sometimes, moved by that kindness of heart which is the rule in their profession, sought to smuggle some simple anti-scorbutic, an onion or a lemon, to their wretched patients, but it was at the risk of certain reprimand, and probable discharge if discovered. Two of these testify that from 75 to 80 per cent. of the deaths could have been averted with ordinary attention and treatment. That is to say, surgeons and physicians in the rebel service tell us, under oath, that of the 15,000 Union dead at Andersonville, at least 12,000 would have been restored to their country and their friends, if the common and ordinary requirements of humanity had been complied with. The pen swarmed with vermin. Sergeant Boston Corbitt, he, under whose avenging bullet the assassin Booth fell, avers that there were men, sick and disabled, who were literally devoured by vermin, and who might have recovered had it not been for the stings and annoyances, which drove them to madness.

THE LAST GREAT WALL STREET SENSATION—MR. EDWARD KETCHUM BEFORE JUDGE HOGAN, OF THE TOMBS POLICE COURT, ON A CRIMINAL CHARGE, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 4.

Dozens of witnesses testify to the use of bloodhounds to overtake escaped prisoners, some of whom were brought in, horribly mangled by the dogs, and who afterwards died. A soldier who asked Wirz for some food, alleging he had been too ill to go for his miserable ration, was struck over the head by the brute, and so injured that he became delirious, and shortly afterward died.

On the negro soldiers Wirz exhausted his malignity. They were cruelly flogged on the slightest pretext. The usual sanitation of Wirz, who, thank God, is no child of American origin, was, "You d—d Yankee sons of b——s," and, on more than one occasion, he is proved to have drawn his revolver and shot men who had in his mistrust by expostulated against their horrible treatment. Occasionally he diversified this congenial amusement by knocking them down with the butt of his revolver, and jumping on them, driving the heels of his boots into their ears and abdominal faces. It was no idle boast of his, that he was doing more towards "using up the Northern armies than a dozen regiments at the front."

The starving prisoners died by dozens per, and from the shallow graves of the dead, poisoned the air for miles around, and a gentleman who had been prison surgeon, endeavored to procure an injunction against its use as a public pest, and only desisted when informed that further proceedings on his part would bring on his head the displeasure of the Richmond Government.

The evidence, not yet half in, against Wirz, on every allegation, of outrage, cruelty, and murder, is so clear and abundant, that the vilest Copperhead and most outrageous rebel, can have no excuse or apology for him, except that he acted under the orders of the Confederate Government! His counsel, in fact, have adopted this plea, virtually admitting the charges in the indictment, against him. If acting as an instrument, he was a most facile and willing one. To the brutal orders of his superiors, he added all the incidents and accessories suggested by a vile and malignant mind. His name, whether or not he cheats the halter, will go down to posterity as a synonym for all that his loathesome and detestible in human nature. As silly made up in body as base in mind and detestable in character, he was the fitting tool of the most corrupt and selfish organization that ever set itself up against Government, good or bad, or, even, while whatever reason, appealed to the arbitration of arms.

The court before which this incarnation of fiendishness is arraigned, must decide how far he was carrying out the orders and motives, direct or implied, of his superiors, and how far he may deserve immunity on such a plea. The suborned or hired thief and assassin can hardly claim exculpation for his crimes by alleging that he was subsorned or hired. His pretensions in this respect are valuable only as they may be useful, in bringing to punishment others equally guilty with himself.

That the trial of Wirz and Richmond did inspire the conduct of Wirz, even if they did not specifically direct it, scarcely admits of doubt. That they were cognizant of it, and made no effort to change it, is certain. The men who sent their comrades on "detailed service" to fire and spread pestilence in our cities, throw railway trains from the track, and commit murder on our frontiers from neutral territory, are not heshitant to connive at the starvation and slow murder of our prisoners in their hands. Ould, the rebel commissioner for exchange of prisoners, was not wrong in boasting that he was securing a "splendid lot of material" in the exchanged rebel soldiers, in return for such as were of "no account to anybody." His boast was but an echo and paraphrase of that of Wirz, already quoted.

We repeat, as par pro heretofore, evidence to show that Northern prisoners were deliberately exterminated by the rebels. The fact appears from their own avowals and boasts. On the 30th of October, 1863, the Richmond Examiner unblushingly recommended that "the Yankee prisoners be put where the cold weather and scant fare will thin them out, in accordance with the laws of nature."

Henry S. Foote, a Senator in the rebel Congress, has left his testimony to the effect that "there was a systematic scheme on foot for subjecting the unfortunate captives (the Northern prisoners) to starvation." We quote from his letter, dated "Montreal, June 21, 1865 :"

> "Touching the Congressional report referred to I have this to say: A month or two anterior to the date of said report I learned from a Government officer of respectability, that the prisoners of war then confined in and about Richmond were suffering severely for want of provisions. He told me further that it was manifest to him that a systematic scheme was on foot for subjecting these unhappy men to starvation; that the Commissary-General, Mr. Northrop (a most wicked and heartless wretch), had addressed a communication to the Secretary of War, proposing to withhold most altogether from military prisoners then in our custody, and to give them nothing but bread and vegetables, and that Mr. Benjamin had endorsed the document containing the recommendation affirmatively. I learned further that by calling upon Major Ould, the Commissioner for exchange of prisoners, I would be able to obtain further information upon the subject. I called on Major Ould immediately, and obtained the desired information. Major Ould seemed to be much concerned at such barbarity for a moment, regarding indeed the fact as too horrible to credit, as concerning the state. I proceeded without delay to the hall of the House of Representatives, called the attention of that strangely constituted body to the subject, and insisted upon an immediate committee of investigation."

It is a disagreeable duty to us to enlarge on this subject. It is humiliating to humanity that men claiming to be civilized, are capable in this age and country, of barbarism like this. Yet the evidence is direct and conclusive. The fact is equally clear and confessed.

The prison pen at Andersonville was commanded by artillery mounted at various points around it, and it appears in evidence, that the commander of the artillery, a brother of Stoneman's cavalry raid into Georgia, to fire on the prisoners in cage the Union general should attempt to liberate them. A similar threat was made by Commissary-General Northrop in Richmond under the very eyes of the rebel executive. The Libby prison, in which the Union prisoners were confined, was mined, on the occasion of Dahlgren's raid, with the intent of blowing it up in event of the raid being successful. The minor villainies practiced by Wirz sink into insignificance by the side of schemes of such magnitude and atrocity.

FRANK LESLIE'S

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Circulation over 50,000.

This valuable Family Paper has now reached its Seventeenth Number, and a circulation of upwards of 50,000, showing in its unprecedented success, that it meets a great want, and supplies, and a thoroughly appreciation in the Family Circle.

Each Number contains a variety of short stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural Hints, Horticultural Directions, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures and Portraits.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER has a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience.

In addition to the above, the publication of THE CHIMNEY CORNER is the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the pictorial portion being made expressly for it by the most eminent artists.

Every number contains a striking portrait, with an able biographical sketch of some prominent person, the price in by its own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of the CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled :

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The artist has endeavored to group the most distinguished Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. This plate will be found to be the most pretended by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every Family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the people who have rendered our great country unity. The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York. It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Terms for the Chimney Corner :

PRICE 10 CENTS EACH NUMBER.

One copy, three months.....$1 00
One copy, six months.....2 50
One copy, one year.....5 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....15 00
Five copies, one year.....20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year.....7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the leaf only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

It doesn't follow that, because we have taken a perilous step, we ought to retrace it. She wasn't a wise old woman who crossed a bridge, and, on being told that it was labeled "dangerous," turned, and recrossed it in all haste.

Barnum's New American Museum,—BROADWAY, between Spring and Prince streets. In the full blaze of Broadway. Lecture Room. Lecture Room. Delicately Cool, Elegantly Designed, Luxuriously Seated, and Daily Filled with Delighted and Appreciative Audiences. Already on Exhibition over 100,000 Curiosities from all Nations, Ages and Climes. Summer until 10 o'clock, P. M., to amuse, instruct, and interest. Tallest Giantess and Giant; largest Fat Woman, and prettiest Circassian Girls ever seen. Bohemian Glass Blowers; Japanese Beauty Queen in exhibition. A Chemical Fountain born without arms; Professor Hutchings, Ventriloquist; Calculator, Wizard, Prestidigitateur, &c. MADAME MARIE MACARTE, the celebrated Artiste, in her highly Interesting Entertainments. Japanese Jugglers. Master Timothy, in Comic Dances. A Grand Spectacular Romance, entitled the CHILDREN OF CYPRUS. The most Gorgeous Scenic Display Ever presented to the public. Cosmorama, Stereoscopicon, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Educated Aquaria, Mammoth Turtle, &c.

Admission, 30 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

The Red Jacket Bitters are a combination of rare herbs and plants, with the purest and mildest of all liquors—Pure Old Bonden Whisky. Call for the RED JACKET BITTERS, and take no other.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 23, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE.—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

Soldiers for Office.

PLACE for the soldiers! Such is the order of the day. Soldiers for policemen; soldiers for Judges; soldiers for Congress; soldiers for Governors, and double stars for Presidents! So be it! The qualifications which enable a man to handle a division are not precisely of the sort most required in conducting a suit at law or editing a newspaper; but the people seem to think some recognition is due to our brave soldiers beyond what is expressed in the rank to which they have attained, and that their military gold may be gilded by bestowing on them the honors of peace. To make an Assemblyman of a Brigadier, or a Secretary of State of a Major-General, is rather a singular tribute to a man's capacity for constructing field works, or to his skill in "changing base." In fact, it is very like making him an LL.D., or a D.D., for his military services. The spirit of the thing is evident enough, and possibly commendable, but the sense of it is not so clear. As sublime optimists, however, we consent to accept the fact as the best thing to be, because it is.

A general is running for the governorship of Ohio on the Republican side, and a general is running on the Democratic side. Another general is running in New Jersey, with the suggestive name of Runyon—a capital name for a candidate for office, but hardly appropriate for a general. Another general is proposed for Secretary of State in New York, also with an unhappy name, whether we regard him as a warrior or a politician—Slocum. It is to the credit of these military gentlemen that none of them sought office. They must be considered as having been selected on account of their availability, by politicians who seek to capture votes through their military prestige. Soldiers possessing proper self respect will hesitate before permitting themselves to be made use of by professional politicians, for partizan ends. It is given to but few men to be great in council and the field; and a soldier justly secures to his reputation will be careful how he allows it to be dragged through the dirt of a political canvass. The proudest reflection of a soldier is that he has envied the name of one. It is a title that belongs wholly to himself, and ought not to be lent to a party, for any purpose whatever.

The indications nevertheless are, that we shall have candidates for almost every civil position, drawn from the ranks of the Union armies. We shall be safe from monarchism, whether he desires it or not, and as for colonels, they will be forced in thousands to lead voters instead of volunteers. These is one satisfactory reflection in all this. It is that our officers as a whole have an experimental knowledge of the spirit and purposes of the late rebellion, and will be careful that the grand results of the labors of the nation shall not be sacrificed to sickly sentimentality, or partizan interests. They will never be so far partizan as to cease to be patriots.

We notice, with regret, that attempts are making by a few unscrupulous politicians, in various parts of the country, to create a feeling of discontentment securities from State and local taxation a partisan question. It is sought to be represented that the Republican party, somehow, has advanced their money to save the life of the nation, are a privileged class, and a kind of Government aristocracy. Such representations can only come from the basest of demagogues, and are the first advances of a party of repudiators, of whom Jeff. Davis was the first apostle. The exemption from taxation was one of the conditions on which people took up the Government loans, and one of the inducements for them to do so. It is a part of the contract between the nation and the individual, which no power can set aside or abrogate. Besides, Congress has no more right, under the Constitution, to allow State taxes on National securities than it has to allow them to tax gold and silver coin, or legal tenders, or Government ships and cannon. The Government has the right to levy war and raise money without consulting local Legislatures. To deny them this right would be to make the Legislature of any State, or the Corporation of any City superior to the National Legislature.

The physical force of the rebellion is broken, but its spirit still lives, and our readers will find that the men who are clamoring about a bondholding aristocracy, and who insist on taxing Government securities, in violation of the compact between borrower and lender, were all of them Southern sympathizers, if not active in the rebel ranks.

A CHATTANOOGA correspondent of the Herald recounts his experience with the female natives of that region :

> "One of them, with whom I entered into conversation at the hotel, said: 'You wooden nutmeg Yankees don't understand the people if you think they are to be subjugated, and that they will submit to tyranny like a poodle pup, licking the hand that gives them. Our people have been taught from their cradle to regard honor before their very life, and we would sooner die than submit to the state of vassalage that ever, and in the blood. I, for one, would rejoice to see the last rebel in existence, and I am only sorry that I have not done more for the glorious Southern cause.' At this she pulled down her reticule a 'special pardon' for her husband, who had been a prisoner, and an oath of allegiance for his person, duly signed, but just returned from Washington city. Another little virago was equally remarkable: 'You fellers owed very proud of your victories, even by dirty Dutch and Irish hirelings, but remember that your success rests through our country in special trains. I hope one of them will run off the track and one of those guns, and spoil some of you to hell, where you ought to be,' and she threw a pail of cold water accompanied by much snuff. Another said she could smell a greasy mechanic from the North across a room, and asked me whether I was a blacksmith or brick mason. I told her I was neither. 'Well, then, I'll bet my life you're a tinker.' I owe out that commodity ti that you are a speculator, quack doctor or Government sympathizer.' I bade her good day, and retired to dream of the beauties of Southern society."

As an offset to this, we may take Madame Lo Verb's report of her reception in NEW YORK, as printed in the Mobile Tribune. It is dated from the Fifth Avenue Hotel :

> "I find New York full of Confederate officers, many just out of prison. They are most kindly treated here. At a supper supper given to me by Mrs. T——, there were five Confederate generals—Mirmadeau, and others among the number—and colonels, majors and captains in profusion.
>
> "The Generals were dined and supped by the very men they fought against. Every one expresses the highest admiration of the Confederate. I have not yet heard one word of bitterness against the South. Even Yankees have waited upon me, begging I would write a 'Souvenirs of the War.' They made me treat offers of $1,000 for a book. It is absolutely the doing so. I assure you I shall do full justice to the heroic southern girls. I often feel it a duty to let the world know that the annals of all times do not afford a parallel to the devotion of the women of the Southern soldiers. They were cursed in many of their dealers, but not by others. I am glad we are here to enjoy this delightful hotel and these pleasant days."

We have only to add the following paragraph from the London Times, and the collocation is complete :

> "To this very hour there remains a large loyal Northern party in the United States, which constantly asserts, in newspapers and private life, that the war was an unrighteous one—that it ought never to have been waged —that it prolonged the State Rights which the South fail bitterly to accede—that the Constitution has been violated by the Government which subdued it. A very large section of the party called Democratic, and which aspires to the next elections, and seems likely to do so, maintains these opinions."

GEN. SHERMAN lately attended a picnic near Mansfield, Ohio, his old home, where he thus "defined his position :"

> "When the rebels ventured their all in their efforts to destroy the Government, they staked their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honors to their cause—the Government of the United States never staked a farthing, when we conquered, we conquered, gained all they had—their property in slaves, their roads, their horses, their guns, their mules, their negroes, their cotton, their all, and even their lives were forfeited to the laws of nations, and to the issue, were theirs only by our forbearance and clemency. As a matter of course, when we on the ground we stand as to-day, conquered from the Indiana, the Shawnees, I believe. The State of Ohio must say. I believe, also, the French and English.
>
> "So, soldiers, when we marched through and conquered the country of these rebels, we became owners of all they had, and it was left to us to be liberal in your conscience for taking, while on our great march, the property of armed rebels. They forfeited their right to it; and I, being agent for the Government, to receive property, am bound to account for all the quartermasters couldn't take possession of, or didn't want."

A CALIFORNIA sculptor, named Meggars, has recently completed a colossal statue of President Lincoln. It is said to be a fine work, and stands on a pedestal ten feet in height, making a total of nineteen feet. The posture is described in a San Francisco paper as majestic and commanding; the left arm extended in front, and the hand grasping a scroll, supposed to be the Emancipation proclamation. The right hand is at the right side, thrown slightly back, as if the subject were speaking. Under the right foot writhes a serpent, and close by it is a broken manacle. An allegorical stamp of a tree, from which grow two clasped hands, stands just behind and to the right of the figure.

THE best managed railways in the world are those of Switzerland and Germany. The percentage of so-called accidents is much less in those than in any other country, and the civility, convenience, and comfort which the traveler experiences on them are equally exceptional. In going long journeys, the number of dinner is frequently an important one[illegible]. Dinner we do not mean the rapid gulping down of a few ill-assorted morsels of food, taken in a hurry and bysam of haste, while the conductor shouts[illegible] Aboard!" giving less time than a Christian could wish to have wherein to dispose of a simple plate of soup, but a deliberate, decent meal, clean and [illegible], such as a correspondent and dent of the Tribune describes as served on the road from Jerusalem to Hebron:

"About 4 o'clock, one of the helps of the train put his head through our car window, and asked if we would take dinner, handing us at the same time a card on which was printed in two languages, the following inducements to hunger. The express and mail trains not stopping long at Vesuvii, travelers who wish to breakfast or dine, are informed that they will find at the buffet hot meals in baskets for two and a half francs. These meals are composed of three dishes and a bottle of wine, bread and a dessert. Travelers have 20 minutes to take their seats after the cars. At the next station our man telegraphed on to Vesuvii the number of dinners ordered, and when we reached the place an hour later, a waiter placed in the car his cylinder-shaped basket in upon which—for we had no tables—about two feet high, and a foot in diameter. On the top of the basket, which was surrounded with a raised rim or at each or so in height, was a half bottle of wine set in a hole for about that purpose, a napkin, a great piece of bread and a snowy napkin. Now, one side of the basket opened like a door, and within it was numerous trays or shelves; on the topmost shelf was a good cutlet, on the next a pair of fried cats, on the third a plate of vegetables, and on the bottom a pile with cheese and fruit; the top served as a table. Now, apart from the comfort of eating at a table, and from what one may buy by express train, there were other incidental enjoyments in this long repast—at least since 10 minutes which there are to be mentioned: the novelty of it, the exquisite cleanliness of it, and the unique convenience of it in regard to the free and easy disposal of bones, fruit-pits, olive-stones and other refuse, by throwing them out of the window, as you must not do in town restaurants. At the end of the meal, the original man-of-all-work came and removed the service; we the our cigars and were happy."

THERE are 3,268 collieries in Great Britain and Ireland, which, in the year 1864, produced 92,787,873 tons, of which 8,800,420 tons were exported. The production of iron for the same year, was 3,816,182 tons; of copper, 13,250 tons were produced; of lead, 91,283 tons; of zinc, 4,640 tons; of gold, 2,887 ounces; and the tin mines, though stated to have been the long period of 1,000 years, produced more tin in 1864, than in any previous year—15,211 tons were raised, which yielded 10,-108 tons of marketable tin. The gross value of all these mineral products for the year, was $190,899,-185.

CLASSICAL allusions to Jeff Davis's unclassical exhibition at the time of his capture continue to multiply. The latest brought to light is from Euripides' play of "The Phœnician Women," written some 2,400 years ago, in which occurs the following passage, which will further illustrate the remarks that "history is nothing new," else, and that "history repeats itself." Bacchus, speaking of Pentheus, says:

"As a mark
He stands, ye females, to our shafts exposed.
Now, Bacchus, names thy part; nor distant thou
Avenge us on the foe. His sins are ripe.
Deprive him, with light madness strike his soul;
For never will he reason would he scorn
This female dress: strike him with madness then,
That he may suffer. Let no thought of sense
To show him in this womanish attire
Let fear be absent. For all those threats which late
He fiercely utter'd."

THE developments regarding the Andersonville prison now going on in Washington, give additional interest to the fact that the government has laid out a second cemetery there, for the victims of rebel cruelty. Fifty acres of woodland have been enclosed, within which 12,500 of the Union dead have been buried, each grave marked by a neat head-board, inscribed with the name, regiment, and date of death of its occupant. Imperfections in the records of each person prevent the identification of all the dead. The graves of such were simply marked "Union soldier, unknown."

THE Richmond Republic, noticing the arrival of Mr. Judah P. Benjamin, Davis's Secretary of War in Havana, thus compliments the Israelite: "No one ever called us, we presume, that Mr. Benjamin would effect a safe and even comfortable withdrawal from the ruins of the fallen edifice. He is one of those rare specimens of men who never forget in their solicitude for the public interests, the paramount claims of number one. It was predicted of the Secretary of Bedamin, that in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night divide the spoil.' This has been literally fulfilled by the late Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was the master mind of the devouring party, and if he did not 'divide the spoil at night,' he has been grievously baled.

THE Tribune, remarking on the absence of "first-class sensations" now-a-days, asks delicately: "Would not we do without hour-waste articles—the wonderful Herald maps, that looked like the anatomy of the man who died of delirium tremens, as published by Temperance societies—and cost $43,000,000?"

A FRUITLESS attempt was recently made to find the site of the steamer Scwabie, lately sunk in Lake Huron. The divers explored the bottom of the lake, from eight to ten miles from the land, and at depths of great as 60 feet, but they were surprised to find here trees of immense size lying promiscuously on the bottom, and to all appearance, in a perpetual condition.

AMONG the latest and most useful inventions of the day, is the Pocket Fire-Extinguishing Machine, of which our readers will find an advertisement in the appropriate column. Nothing can be neater, simpler, or more effective than this little work. which is so small that it can be carried in the pocket, and so cheap as to be within the financial reach of all. It is self-acting, self-acting, and passes over the latter, while all other machines require the fabric to be passed through them. It is specially adapted for quilting, braiding, and embroidery.

IT is said by those who quarrel with the results of emancipation, that the negroes collect in the towns and subsist on the national bounty. As a commentary on this allegation, a correspondent of the Times tells us that of the 942 persons receiving government rations in Chattanooga, 904 are whites and 38 negroes. Another correspondent of the same paper says Col. S. Thomas, Superintendent of Freedmen for Mississippi, has sent to Washington a report dated August 15, which thus sums up the business in that State. Where the blacks are a decided majority of the entire population, while the whites own all the property:

"The amount of rations issued to whites is about the same as that issued to freedmen. Less than 5,000 people are cutting wood for steamers on the Mississippi river, and more people were employed in that way last year; but they support themselves. The total number of rations for the month of August, 1865, was only 3,000 are receiving assistance from Government."

WE have lately quoted some extraordinary specimens of American rhetoric, in which tropes, images, illustrations and figures of speech, each more incongruous than the other, were jostled together in wildest confusion to the utter destruction of coherence and sense. We have only to add another example of Southern eloquence, from a speech of A. Henry, attorney at law, Nashville, Tenn., on the occasion of our "great national anniversary." Speaking of the duty of veneration which we owe to our fathers, this ardent son of the South admonishes us:

"We must fabricate in our hearts mausoleums to their memory, where we may repair annually in pilgrim mirgin of Seventy-six and, emptied of prejudice, and upon the altar of which we may kneel and immolate the enmity, and with tears from the battlements of Canada to the battlefields of Mexico, mingle the tears of the floating wails and lamentations of orphans and widows, of native land patriot, driving through our valleys, all blasting with the gout of oriental prostitution."

SOME idea of the magnitude of the crime of infanticide in Great Britain may be obtained from the statement of Dr. Lankester, that 2,000 births asserted in a public lecture, that in London alone there were 12,000 mothers who had murdered their children. The percentage in this world, it is supposed to be largely exceeded in the manufacturing towns of the north of England.

IS a map by "William Brassier, draughtsman," dated 1762, appear some data bearing on the recent question of the boundary between New York and Connecticut, erroneously supposed to have been Horicon. In this map it is designated Canaderioid, or Tail of the Lake, allusive probably to its relationship with Lake Champlain. The small pond then called "Cheondergo, or Three Rivers," improperly Ticonderoga, and says of another historical point on Lake Champlain: "Crown Point, named by the French, Fort St. Frederick, and built by them in 1731. The Indians give that spot the name of Pet-y-bough-ka-gwy, which signifies two points opposite each other."

GOVERNOR FLETCHER, of Missouri, lately made a speech at St. Louis, for the benefit of those preachers who refuse to take the oath, and describes his short method with them as follows:

"I have directed an enlargement of the Penitentiary cell rooms, with the intention of giving to every such crime kreefer in this State, by undertaking to decide for themselves the laws, a chance to be split upon and trampled under foot, and thereby become accessories before the fact of treasonable offenses consequent on their advice, shall be provided with suitable quarters, in case they escape the hanging they well deserve."

GEN. GRANT improves in speech-making as he gets more practice. At the dinner to Farragut he delivered himself very neatly as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen—I am glad to meet you. You all know I am a bad accustomed to making speeches; and I were, I could not find words to express to you my thanks for this hearty welcome."

GEN. SHERMAN says, in one of his letters on civil affairs:

"If you admit the negro to the struggle for any purpose, he has a right to stay in it for all; and when the fight is done, he has had drops the musket cannot be denied the ballot."

MANHATTAN ISLAND, on which New York is built, is 13½ miles long, less than three miles wide at its greatest width, and has an area of 14,000 acres. On this island, or rather on about one-half of it, live and do business nearly 1,000,000 of persons. The island is divided by survey into 141,486 lots, of which less than 70,000 are improved. There are 460 streets and places, of a total length of over 268 miles, 263 miles of water-pipes, over 100 miles of sewer, and the city is lighted by 15,000 gas lamps.

THE Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, for August, gives a very satisfactory exhibit of our finances. Total debt, $2,757,689,571; being a net increase of but $69,000 for the month. Legal tender notes have been retired to the amount of $1,087,000. The Treasury holds, in gold and silver, $45,560,000; in currency, $43,000,000.

THE official reports show a diminution in the number of deaths in this city during the year thus far, as compared with the number of last year, for the corresponding months. The returns show one singular fact: Out of every 100 children who die in this city, sixty-eight are the offspring of foreign-born parents! The resident population were pretty equally divided in 1860 (native, 429,962; foreign, 383,017); the war has told heaviest upon natives, so that now we may reckon the foreign to be about equal, under the ordinary divisions of the census.

A PARIS paper announces: "The American Gen. McClellan is at present in Dresden, visiting the museums of art. He is also occupied with military studies in Germany, and, especially to study the organization of the Prussian army."

THE ART OF GOVERNMENT.—"No one," says Plato, in his second Alcibiades, "ever pretends to make shoes without having served an apprenticeship to the business of shoe-making. Yet," says the great philosopher, "no man appears to despair of his talents in the art of governing without having applied his thoughts to that most difficult of all arts, till the instant in which he commences his nice and difficult operations."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are about to establish a line of ocean steamers to run between Baltimore and Liverpool. They have already contracted for two of the finest class for the route, but design to place but two of them, the Worcester and Baltimore, in the service at present.

—Large fields of cotton are growing in California over 100 miles from the sea-board. The first 100 bales of California cotton was picked this year. The first 100 acres of cane will yield for the first 100 bales of 300 pounds each. Over $100,000 is given by the State for the encouragement of agriculture in the raising of various products.

—Gen. Fisk reports from Nashville, Tenn.: "The freedmen on the Cumberland river are in a state of utter destitution. They literally hunger and thirst for bread. Many of the white citizens are themselves contributing liberally for the support of schools. At Clarksville, Montgomery county, Tennessee, the citizens neighbors have raised $50 per month to pay teachers.

—The city authorities of Bangor, Maine, have ordered the sidewalks of principal streets to be paved. streets large tanks, to be filled daily with pure water, and supplied with hose, for the relief of the thirsty people. They are of sufficient capacity, it is supposed, to hold 1,000 hogsheads.

—Gen. Schenck is canvassing Ohio with reference to the new U. S. Bankrupt Law. He believes that neither the whales nor blacks of the South are at present entitled to the benefits of the law, the former not being sufficiently loyal and the latter not sufficiently educated."

—A Texas letter says: "We want not only farmers, but mechanics of all kinds. We want rough labor, skilled labor, mental labor, brawny labor, horny labor, and machine labor. A genial climate and productive soil invite you. Texas now is the time to come and make yourself at home."

—Within the brief space of 100 days, or thereabouts, during which the new internal revenue agents have been brought to light amounting to nearly one million of money, viz:

Charles Winsor, Mercantile Bank	$275,000
Wm. H. Ferguson, Phœnix Saving's Bank	115,000
Smith J. Eastman, Produce Broker	500,000
Lloyd P. Addoms, Produce Broker	300,000
R. B. Mumford, Stock Broker	130,000
Edward B. Auburn, banker	4,500,000
Dakmons, cashier	100,000
Total	$5,920,000

—The Providence Journal says: "We have a letter which would be interesting, describing what the writer calls 'a sail on Neptune's briny element, where Adam holds sway as the commodore, and a whole crew New England's Rescot of Fashion,' meaning a trip to Newport on the Bay Queen, and a visit to the Beach.

—Daniel Andress, postmaster at Glencoe, Mo., who lately committed suicide, left a confession which has just been found. It says he murdered a returned Californian eight years ago, and robbed him of $10,000. He had also murdered two of his wives, and had contemplated the murder of his wife. Also, that he has robbed the mails for a number of years. Pecuniary embarrassment was the cause of his crimes.

—The colored people of St. Louis contemplate holding a convention soon for the purpose of considering what new rights they can and the Governor-in. Among other rights which they will demand is that of voting on the subject of negro suffrage. Petitions of suffrage will also be discussed.

—The Governor of Texas announces that Robert B. Lee has consented to accept the Presidency of Washington College.

—The Memphis Bulletin relates the case of a southern female refugee, who had only one faded calico dress but she managed to get along with it. A rebel gentleman had a collection taken up for her, and realized $15 for her benefit. She went forward to a dry-goods store, where she paid $13 for a nice color!

—The last session of the Maryland Legislature appropriated $1,000 to purchase a site for a cemetery on the Antietam battlefield, in which to place the remains of the dead who fell in the late sanguinary battle. Through the untiring energies of the trustees especially Mr. Wm. Wilson, of Washington county, Md., 10 acres of ground have been purchased near the battle-field, where the dead will rest in peace, and within sight of the house where the rebel Gen. Lee had his headquarters. The ground has been laid out and enclosed with a neat fence. The work of interring the remains in the cemetery is being pushed forward as there were 7,000 or 8,000 buried on the field. Thus far 2,630 bodies have been interred, 1,800 by name, regiment and State, and 830 by their respective States.

—The Charlottesville (Va.) Chronicle says that the town of Winchester, Virginia, was occupied by the Union and Confederate forces, successively, 70 times.

—In Flatsburg, recently, the census takers found 3 Pers Cemmons, aged 100, 101 and 102, living in domestic felicity with his wife, eleven years younger. They have been married 75 years.

—One of the female graduates from Oberlin this year was born a slave in Virginia, hired her time bought her freedom, and prepared for college in Providence, R. I.

—Maj-Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, now on duty at Boston, has consented to deliver the opening address before the annual meeting of the New York American Institute, at the approaching exhibition. The preparations made by the Institute for the coming display in the pending a fair of unusual interest and brilliancy. Machinery of the most novel and ingenious character will be in operation, and all kinds of curious, rare and notable inventions will be on the exhibition.

—During the late war our people have spent in aid of the soldiers of the republic no less than $313,274,348 45. Of this is raised by State appropriations, and $187,209,626 62 of the sum was contributed by States, counties and towns. The balance was given by societies and their families, while individuals and associations contributed the time and comfort of the soldiers about $35,000,000 more.

—As the fall elections will soon be coming on, it should be borne in mind that the 1st of a proclamation of the President, of March 10, issued in conformity to a law of Congress, approved July 2, 1862, citizens, duly enrolled, who went beyond the limits of the United States to avoid being drafted, were prevented from exercising the elective franchise. It will be the duty of the authorities to enforce this law in all cases of the coming election.

—Returns to the Agricultural Department, for August, from all parts of the country, though not entirely complete, show that the corn crop will be enormously large, and the harvest unusually early. In excess over past years more than compensates for deficiencies in the spring crop, and insures low prices and promises well. In some localities the rot has appeared. Should it extend, the corn crop, and ordinary promise an unprecedented yield. The cereal exportations will be large, and the balance of trade

—The census returns for 1860 represent 8,777 manufacturing establishments in Canada East, Canada West, Nova and Oregon in that year, with an invested capital of $19,353,000, employing 49,000 persons, paying $18,-485,626, employing 49,717 male and 67 female hands, and producing $39,000,000 worth of manufactured goods amounting in value to $71,225,989; $44,227,353 of which were the products of gold mining.

—The Toronto Globe publishes an abstract of the report of Mr. Torrance, the commissioner appointed to inquire into the conduct of the notorious Justice Conrad, the confidente of the St. Albus's robbers. Mr. Torrance exonerates Conrad and Lumsden of corrupt and improper motives. He, however, recommends that Conrad should be indicted for malfeasance of office.

—There are now in existence no less than fourteen hundred and fifty-seven oil companies, with a total capital of eighty-seven millions five hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars.

—The potato rot is more widely spread in Ohio this season than ever before. It is also said that the crop in Illinois will prove a failure in portions of Southern Illinois. The tops have been beaten down and killed by the rains, and the tubers are covered with white specks, which develope into the rot.

—The following is the valuation of Providence: Real estate, $20,479,100; personal estate, $11,684,800. Total, $30,564,100. The tax is $[illegible]534 12, or ninety-eight cents on a hundred dollars.

—Brigadier-General Marcellus M. Crocker, who has just died in Iowa, was a native of Kentucky, but early old. He entered the service in 1861 as colonel of the 13th Iowa Volunteers. He was wounded at Shiloh, at Corinth and Iuka. He commanded the 4th Brigade of the 4th Division of the Army of the Tennessee in the campaign against Vicksburg. He afterwards was in command of the district of Natchez.

Foreign.—A new degree, that of "Doctor of Literature," has been instituted by the Senate of the University of Paris, with the approval of the Government.

—The recently opened Exposition of Fine Arts applied to Industry, at the Palace in the Champs Elysées, Paris, is devoted to the exhibition of artistic works of art, but its object is to display and encourage the application of the fine arts to the embellishment of the common objects used in everyday life, and which are, for the most part, not usually considered to be particularly plain—furniture, decors, windows, glass, hangings, lace, &c., things that in no manner are to be confounded with those in other ways necessary or useful.

—The Great Eastern safely arrived at Sheerness on August 23. On the next day, the several boards of the Corporation of London, and the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs and Aldermen, met in state at Guildhall, and a deputation was received to take immediate and energetic action not to let the cruel disaster to the Great Eastern, and of the present cable, but to submerge another by its side."

—The present British Cabinet consists of 16 members, of whom 12 are of the Lord Brougham's age. Of 8 years of age, the youngest Earl De Grey, who is only 37 years of age, and the oldest of the 15 is 67 years of, about 60½ each. Earl De Grey is the only one under about 60½ each. Earl De Grey is the only one under 50 years of age. The next in age is the Duke of Argyll, who is 47. Earl Granville is exactly 50, and Lord Stanley is about 60 these are the youngest. Mr. Cardwell, 52; Mr. Gladstone, 56; and Mr. Gibson, 57 years of age. Of the 15 Cabinet Ministers, seven are—in fact six, or nearly half the Cabinet. These are the Duke of Somerset, 61; Earl Russell, 73; Lord Stanley of Alderley, 63; Sir Charles Wood and Lord Lansdowne, 65; and Lord De Grey, 37. Lord Clarendon is under 60 there are two, Earl Russell, 73, and Lord Chancellor Lord Cranworth, 76, who are above 70 years of age. The distribution of being an octogenarian.

—The Canadian public debt exceeds $75,000,000; more than $20,000,000 of which, during the war, has been incurred within the past 10 years. Political affairs in the provinces are represented as in a very unsatisfactory condition.

—A young woman in South Carolina, England, had a difficult labor, and was resolved on suicide by running from a precipice 600 feet into the sea. She was saved by the entanglement of her clothes while so disengage herself. Finally, after hanging all day, her body was found and taken to the nearest house. Humanity was adjusted.

—A French editor has given the following sensible description of the effect of an advertisement: The first time a man sees an advertisement he takes no notice of it; the second time he reads the name; the third time he looks at the price; the fourth time he asks it; the fifth time he buys it; and the sixth time he buys.

—A giant lately appeared in Nagpore, in Siam. He is seven feet four inches in height, and of enormous size. He was brought to the notice of the King of Siam, however, he is very ill-proportioned, having comparatively short legs and long arms. When first he saw the he was mobbed. An immense crowd, consisting of men, women and children, had assembled to see the monster, when for an incantation of the Evil One. But, luckily for him, somebody having discovered that he was afraid of fire, he seized the idea, announced that he was a god, and thereupon the kicks and superadmiration of the crowd were changed into adoration before him, and actually worshipped him as a divine being! When he was at dinner, a large fire was made around him to relieve his hunger, and literally adored him.

—The Paris Moniteur states that a swimmer, having made a bet that he could cross from Calais to Dover, that he would swim in the same for ten minutes holding his head out of the water. Before the time had expired, he gained his wager; a considerable crowd of boats and people followed in the river, filled with persons anxious to see the feat.

—Professor Aytoun, of Edinburgh, died on Friday night after a short illness. Mr. Aytoun was a member of the Scottish bar, and sheriff of the Orkneys, but was chiefly celebrated as a writer of prose and verse. His reputation as a poet will probably rest on his "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers," and "Bothwell," which passages in "Bothwell." In the "Bon Gaultier Ballads," which he wrote in conjunction with Sir Theodore Martin, and in "Firmilian," a burlesque on the spasmodic school of poetry. Professor Aytoun showed that he possessed as a humorist in verse. He also contributed numerous articles to Blackwood's Magazine and Fraser's, many of which he was erroneously supposed to be editor. He was professor of belles lettres in the University of Edinburgh, and was fifty-two years of age.

—The latter to the Prince of Wales has published a letter to the Queen, in which he says that the Edward Lumley's portrait of the Prince Consort. The Queen says: "It is not the true likeness, but just an inch more horizontally, the crown would have displayed the dignity of the head and the royal likeness." This rendered me an incalculable service, without prejudicing my claim to be the best artist in the world as a portrait fancy, decreed otherwise."

—The London papers tell of a "medium" who holds seances at Eton street, and on account of the noisy traffic in that mighty thoroughfare, the spirits communicate with the visitors by signs. Spectra is requested to rap up loud, 'one of the' bones.

—Among the latest novelties introduced in Paris are sixty new candelabras now being fixed on the Pont Neuf. They are all supplied with a new burner by which that place is lighted to 120. The number of the lamps on the Pont Neuf, the grand avenue of the Champs Elysée is lighted is likewise to be doubled.

—The London railway companies have resolved to give no excursion trains to Epsom on the Sunday, making an exception in favor of those

—A French peasant has been sentenced to three months imprisonment for obtaining money by pretending that he had extraordinary influence with the saints, and could secure him produce from injury by hail-storm, and obtain other benefits for his relatives.

—It is said that the largest diamond in the world is in the possession of the Rajah of Malan, in the Island of Borneo. It is the size of a hen's egg. The Governor of Batavia has offered him two large ingots of war, and a ship of 1,000 tons burden, and a sum of $150,000 for it, but the Rajah has said no.

DOUBLE MURDER AND SUICIDE AT SOUTH DEDHAM, MASS.—From Sketches by R. D. Wilkie.

THE DEDHAM TRAGEDY.

IN these days of tragedy, when crime stalks abroad with almost unbridled license, the ear is not so much astounded by the announcement of murder as in former days, when the details of slaughter were unfrequent to the ear. The Dedham, Mass., tragedy, however, is one of more than ordinary horror, being, as it was, the work of an insane woman, who, infuriated by jealousy, killed her husband and child, and then plunged her own soul into eternity by committing suicide. The victims were Dr. Carlos Marston, and Cora Marston, his daughter, and the murderess was Mrs. Susan Marston, his wife. The circumstances, as related by Miss May, one of the principal witnesses at the Coroner's inquest, are as follows:

She says that about two o'clock she was awakened by a noise which seemed to her like scuffling and a fall overhead. She presently heard the report of a pistol, and comprehending the condition of affairs at once, she immediately arose, and crossing one or two apartments passed to the foot of the stairs in the front entry. Here, being afraid to go up stairs, she called loudly two or three times to the doctor, but from him she received no response, for at that time he was probably still in death. Mrs. Marston, however, appeared at the head of the stairs without a light, and in a firm, calm tone, which seemed to indicate method in her madness, ordered Miss May to go to her room and remain quiet under penalty of having her brains blown out. The frightened girl could but obey, and after hastily throwing on her clothing she went out in quest of help.

DR. CARLOS MARSTON'S RESIDENCE AT DEDHAM, MASS.

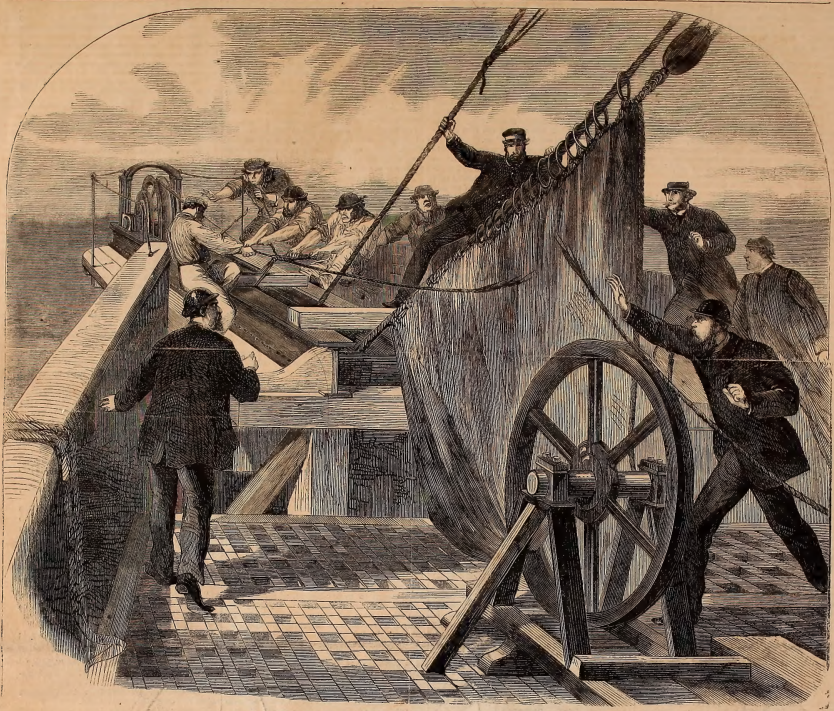
Arriving with several neighbors to whom she had given the alarm, the party proceeded up stairs to the room occupied by Dr. Marston, and found him dead, lying beside his wife, who was also a corpse. In an adjoining apartment they found the little girl, who died almost immediately after being discovered.

Mrs. Marston had been for many years thought insane, and her house had been avoided by her friends for sometime previous to the tragedy, on account of her strange conduct. The murders were committed by the administration of chloroform, and the use of a pistol. The case is still under investigation.

THE BEDCHAMBER OF DR. MARSTON—POSITIONS OF THE BODIES OF MR. AND MRS. MARSTON WHEN FOUND BY MISS MAY, MRS. HARTSHORNE AND THE NEIGHBORS.

THE BREAKING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.



WE transfer to our paper to-day Mr. Dudley's sketch of that "sad and memorable" minute when the hopes of worlds were "staged" like the slender cable on which those hopes hung. In his diary of the 2d of July, the day of the disaster, Mr. Russell says: "The cable and wire rope together were now coming in over the bows in the grove in the layer wheel, the cable being wound upon a drum behind by the machinery which was once more in motion, and the wire rope being taken in round the capstan. But the rope and the cable were not coming up in a right line, but were hauled in with a great strain on them, as were shown on the dynamometer to be very high, but not near breaking point. At last up came the cable and wire rope clashing together on the V wheel in the bow. They were wound round on it, slowly, and were passing over the wheel together, the first damaged part being on board, when a jar was given to the dynamometer which flew up from 60 cwt., the highest point marked, with a sudden jerk 3½ inch. In fact, the chain shackle and wire rope clambered, as I were, up out of the groove on the right hand side of the of the wheel, got on the top of the rim of the V wheel, and rushed down with a crash on the smaller wheel, giving no doubt, a severe shock to the cable to which it was attached. The machinery was still in motion, the cable and the rope traveled aft together, the one towards the capstan, the other towards the drum, when just as the cable reached the dynamometer it parted 30 feet from the bow, and with one bound leaped, as it were, into the sea.

"It is not possible," continues Mr. Russell, "for any words to portray the dismay with which the sight was witnessed, and the news heard. It was enough to move one to tears, and when a man came aft with the inner end still lashed to the chain, and we saw the tortured strands, torn wires, and lacerated core, it is no exaggeration to say, that a strange feeling of pity, as though from some sentient creature mutilated and dragged asunder by brutal force, passed through the hearts of all. The precise spot where this accident occurred was lat. 51. 29; long. 39. 6; 1,186 miles of cable had been payed out; distance from Valentia, 1,069 miles; and from Hearts Content, 606 miles."

CORA MARSTON'S APARTMENT—THE APPEARANCE OF THE BODY UPON ENTERING THE ROOM IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE MURDER.

VERY few of the sudden deaths which are said to arise from diseases of the heart, do really arise from that cause. To ascertain the real origin of sudden deaths, the experiment has been tried in Europe, and reported to a scientific congress held at Strasbourg. Sixty-six cases of sudden death were made the subject of a thorough post mortem examination; in these cases, only two were found who had died from the disease of the heart. Nine out of 66 had died from apoplexy, while there were 46 cases of congestion of the lungs, that is, the lungs were so full of blood they could not work, there not being room enough for a sufficient quantity of air to enter to support life. The causes that produce congestion of the lungs are cold feet, tight clothing, costive bowels, sitting still until chilled after being warmed with labor or a rapid walk; going too suddenly from a close, heated room into the cold air, especially after speaking, and sudden depressive news operating on the blood. These causes of sudden deaths being known, an avoidance of them may serve to lengthen many valuable lives, which would otherwise be lost under the verdict of heart-complaint. That disease is supposed to be inevitable and incurable, hence many may not take the pains they would to avoid sudden death, if they knew it lay in their power.

THE BREAKING OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE ON BOARD THE GREAT EASTERN.

THE FAIRY MORGANA.

BY ROSENBERG.

I

The Fairy Morgana sleeps under an oak,
Which wars'iven in twain by the storm's red stroke;
The Sun wakes to laugh, and the Cloud comes to weep,
Nor the drop, nor the beam, stir her magic sleep.

II.

On her cheek has the theft of the East-wind shed,
Leaf by leaf, from the rose, yet they blushed less red,
Less white on her bosom that panted below,
Did the North wind let fall the flake of the snow.

III.

But not for the fall of the leaf, nor the flake,
Did the Fairy Morgana arouse or awake:
The seasons may change, yet the lid folds her eye,
As the lily-buds hide their young hearts from the sky.

IV.

The Fairy had wept over each broken dream
Her fancy had painted on cloud or on beam,
And there must she sleep, till a joy without pain
Bids the blue of her eye to waken again.

V.

The Lover went by in the youth of his bliss,
He bent him the Fairy Morgana to kiss;
The Fairy, she murmured, and turned her around,
A thorn on the bloom of his lip she found.

VI.

The Monarch, he paused by the bolt-riven tree,
And his royal lip touched her right tenderly;
The Fairy Morgana, she uttered a moan,
The nettle had stung her that grows by the throne.

VII.

The Soldier drew nigh, and he slackened his rein
As he paused on his road from the battle-plain;
But scarce had he bent him, than loudly she cried,
The point of his dagger had entered her side.

VIII.

The Poet beheld her, and laid by his lyre,
As he pressed her warm cheek with his lip of fire;
The Fairy Morgana, she shrank when he knelt,
In the flame of his breath, the fever she felt.

IX.

In blushes and wonder, the Maiden went by,
And gazed on the Fairy with marveling eye,
But ere she might kiss her, she turned her away;
Girl's hopes have their twilight as well as their day.

X.

The Courtier bent o'er her, with soul full of guile,
A lie on his lip, on his cheek was a smile;
But fierce was the Fairy Morgana's quick start,
The barb of his lie had passed into her heart.

XI.

The Bond-slave, he tarried, and longed to draw nigh,
Yet, in silence and shame, he sadly went by;
She shuddered in slumber, and turned her again,
She heard, as he passed her, the clank of his chain.

XII.

The Bigot gazed down through the emerald leaf,
And sharp was the pang of her soul-tearing grief;
To the slumbering Fairy, his secret was known,
She felt that the heart in his bosom was stone.

XIII.

And many went by her, but ever she slept,
While the tears in her sleep through her eyelids crept,
Till the rattling footsteps of grim Death came by,
Then the Fairy awoke, but she woke to die.

A TALE TOLD BY A TEA-KETTLE.

Of course I am only an old, black tea-kettle, and you will think it very silly of me to attempt to speak, yet I can tell you a tea-kettle is not such a very stupid thing after all.

I am of the advanced age of fifty years, and it is likely that in my day I have seen much. When no one supposed, I was quietly making observations on people and things around me, and while, to all appearances, only stupidly steaming away, I was in reality laying up a store of interesting things, which I could reflect upon at my leisure. For you see I never intended to speak, only that this very day I overheard the gossiping, open-mouthed frying-pan say to her old-maidish friend the griddle, that I was a poky, good-for-nothing, old thing, that kept up a puffing and breathing like the grandmother who lived in days gone by, I don't like such disparaging remarks, and I much disapprove of the frying-pan, who is constantly splintering about something, and often neglects her duty. Yes, she often neglects her duty, for only last week, I overheard Jane, the cook, saying to her, "Drat you, you will burn my fish!"

THE PARTING AT THE GARDEN GATE.

Also, the frying-pan says my temper is furious, that she has known me to boil over any number of times a day. I do admit I am given to ebullition, it is in our family; but I never give way to it if I can help it. I fully know my weaknesses as a teakettle, but at the same time hope I understand my duty—which is more than some, whom I could mention, do. Thus I came to speak of some of the incidents which have occurred during my past life, and which I still hold in vivid remembrance.

Fifty years seem a long time back, and things are greatly altered since 1815. I know if I enter into any length of talk on the changes which have taken place, I will be set down as an old fogy, therefore I pass on without comment.

The old stone house at Hazedon must have been at least fifty years old when I went to it. At that time it was looked upon as a model of comfort and beauty, though now—a-days people would only laugh at it as dull, ugly, inconvenient old place. It was not a very high house, though rather deep and wide, and seemed to me to have an infinite number of rooms, and odd corners, and deep recesses. There was an inner and an outer kitchen, and as the kitchen was my domain, I will confine myself to a brief description of them. The outer kitchen was tiled and used only for working in, or to accommodate the laborers employed about the farm. The inner or best kitchen, as it was called, was floored with oak, spacious and comfortable, and served as a household room. In the evening, when the family gathered, I thought it did look a particularly pleasant look; the light from the great log-fire striking upwards to the oak-rafters, or falling really upon the group assembled. At the time from which I date this story, the family was small, consisting of Mistress Trest, or the mistress, as I shall call her, Agnes and Deb.

It was a most pleasant hour and once had a large circle round her fireside—boys and girls, hand some and gay, grew up only to pass away. One, a daughter, had been urged by her mother to a marriage for which she had no inclination, and which broke her heart, sending her to join her young brothers and sisters where they quickly lay at rest. The only remaining child, a son, had gone to Boston to be a merchant. Master Richard was as unlike his mother as he could possibly be, and I call to mind at her early years in life, for to me he was a noble specimen of a man. People hinted that the mistress had never been tender as a mother, and especially after her daughter's sad fate, she was much spoken of; but to Master Richard she showed only the fondest devotion.

Naturally she had a cold, severe manner, which did not yield to any surrounding circumstances, nor decrease with long acquaintance; and she excused nothing trifling or unimportant on shabby her. She was called proud, too, and was more or less avoided by many on this account.

Agnes was a young orphan whom the mistress had been prevailed upon to adopt. I think she was the fairest creature I ever saw; she was only sixteen when she came to us, slender and graceful, and wearing her golden hair about her as a light, reminding me of a lily standing in the sunshine. Her eyes were blue as rifts in summer sky, and she had a wonderful power of feature and expression. The house had seemed rather dark and still till Agnes came, when her presence brightened it as if an angel had passed in at the door.

Deb was an old servant; she had lived in the Trest family many years, and was an acknowledged authority in the family and neighborhood. She was tall and straight—straight to stiffness—and she did not seem to have a pick of flesh on her bones, or so thin. She had no eye to speak of, while her nose and mouth were large—the former long and thin, of the head, white and grim. A little bit of lightish-colored hair was drawn tightly up to the top of her head, where it was secured by an enormous tortoise-shell comb, which reminded me of the back of the rocking-chair in the living room. The hair was so scant, and the comb so formidable, that the effect was ludicrous. Deb's hands and feet were big and bony, and she had a sweep of arm that commanded reach of everything. She always wore a dark stuff dress, short and narrow; the skirt pinned up to the waist, showing her thick gray worsted petticoat. Low shoes, and blue home-knit stockings completed her attire. Deb never seemed to grow older, and no one knew what her age might be; and she had a sort of toughness, and power of endurance that I never saw in any other creature. Her step in the house was absolutely silent—even the mistress did not interfere with her. In character she was an odd combination, or rather contradiction; she was as soft as she appeared hard, as kind as she appeared cruel, and as obtuseness as she appeared indifferent. In a word, she was like a tortoise—a very tender thing, only wearing a hard exterior. I think she would have died, rather than be seen to laugh or cry—though I have known her to do both, when at night, after the family had retired, she sat by the fire, as was her usual habit. The work over and the day done, with the world all withdrawn from about her, this strange being appeared in her true light; all the hardness melted; her hands, which had held the reins firmly all day, would drop gently upon her knees, while every emotion of the heart came out to play upon her face, changing it so from its ordinary look, that one could but wonder.

I liked these quiet hours with Deb, when she was revealed the woman I knew her to be, and not what she was commonly judged. I had respect for her lonely evening moods, and never disturbed them, not even by singing softly, though night was my best time for this particular practice.

I was interested to know how Deb would take the appearance of Agnes in the house, and at first I rather trembled for the poor little thing, fearing she would intimidate her by her sharp manner; but though Deb did not relax a bit, I was relieved to see that Agnes no more minded her than if she had been quite meek. Indeed, I think her abruptness rather pleased her, for she soon found that she would say one thing and mean another; while if the mistress said anything, you might be sure she meant just that and not anything else. Deb might flout and contradict Agnes across the room, and she only laughed; but when the mistress reproved her, or spoke sharply, she would look pale and frightened, and sometimes burst into tears. And the consequence was, Deb was, and she always took refuge with Deb after any of these occasions, though I never could see that she received a particle of comfort from her.

The mistress used to spin—for spinning was to ladies in those days what piano-playing is now—and to my mind it was the most beautiful and musical of the two. And at first it was supposed Agnes would learn, as all young girls did; but dear me, she had no gift as well here as she had with arm or wheel as Agnes. She did, to be sure, make the trial, and a very pretty one it was—that is, she was very charming over it, though it was only a succession of absurd blunders. Deb looked on in grim silence, and one would have thought she gloried in the poor child's perplexity and failure, and so, in reality, I believe she did; but I think she hated to see anything so bright and pure, set down to that which to Agnes could never be anything but drudgery. Agnes herself showed great displeasure when she found all her efforts at teaching Agnes in vain, and at the last, read her a lecture upon her idle habits.

I could not see things in the light in which my mistress viewed them; for instance, this affair of Agnes's failure in spinning. I thought it no more a concern, on the contrary, I thought with Deb—the child was best as nature had intended her, and it has always occurred to me we are too apt to judge others by ourselves. Deb's ideas are good for use or useful who do not measure up to our standard. I once heard one say this, "They also serve who only stand and wait." I have forgotten my own expression, or whether it was borrowed from a book, I cannot say, for my knowledge is necessarily limited; but I thought it very beautiful, and when I applied it to the life of our Agnes, I knew it to be true, for the dear child was exercising an influence on all around her, which in some presence seemed to create a soft and beautiful atmosphere, reminding one of saints and the mansions where they be; while her actions, so spontaneous, so child-like and innocent, were a perpetual feast to every one. It was Christ's divine bearing, His meekness, His patience, His love and gentleness so much as His miracles, that drew souls and accomplished His mission on earth.

So Agnes's little wheel was set aside, for it was only too evident that it would not answer, and as she was once more free to flit about the house and garden, singing with her sweetest voice, I noticed the mistress would often pause, as if kettles are all musical, and I was considered quite accomplished; but I never yet heard any melody equal to Agnes's voice. It was exquisitely sweet, but touched with sadness, and the words were always of a quaint, touching kind, that moved the heart. When she would be singing in the garden, or upstairs, I have seen Deb pause and bend the poor logs till they could bear it no longer, but broke out in angry flashes at her treatment. The logs blamed the tongs a good deal, saying he was a willing instrument in cruel hands, and even enjoyed the work; but the shovel, who was suspected of such an attachment to the tongs, took his part openly, and he didn't like it, and he and the poor abused logs. I didn't like the shovel: she was proud because she was sometimes taken into the parlor to clear up the ashes when a fire was wanted; and besides, she was very sentimental, always quoting these lines;

"Sure the shovel and tongs
Were formed for each other,"

which I thought quite ungrammatical.

But I must hasten on, for if there is anything I dread it is long reminiscences.

Master Richard was accustomed to visit home occasionally, though Agnes had been with us a year before he came again. The mistress talked to Agnes about her boy: I think she would have talked to herself if there had been no one to listen, her heart was so set on him. So Agnes knew all about Richard, for she was the best listener the mother could have had. She knew just how he looked and how he spoke; what he did and what he didn't like; and, in fact, had him by heart, as a child gets its lesson from a book. The mistress talked of her son's success in business, and the prosperity that awaited his future; how he was rising, and would one day stand first among the merchants; then he should marry one his equal in position.

The mistress's peculiar views for her son's happiness, appeared to concern Agnes very little; she would rather have had him finally head was covered with brown locks, and that he had a frank, engaging manner. Money-getting, and marrying seemed things beyond this innocent child's ken, and she thought of them as stupid. Agnes had many young friends in the neighborhood, and I think more than one young man tried to win her favor; but though she was charming and pleasant to all, I could see their attentions made no impression upon her.

But at last Master Richard was to come home on a visit, the mistress had got a letter telling her so. We were all more or less excited, in consequence, and Deb kept up a constant poking of the fire, to conceal her joy. As for Agnes, she was too artless to hide anything, and so she talked on in her innocent way about how glad she would be to see him, and wondering if he would like her. Then as the day of his arrival approached, her white muslin dress and cape received a fine rip; and Deb undertook this precious piece of work.

Well, on the day fixed, Master Richard came, and I recollect his mother and Deb standing in the foreground, with Agnes in her white dress and a sash like a little behind them, blushing and smiling. How lovely she looked! and no wonder Master Richard's eyes glanced beyond his mother and old Deb to the fair vision standing there. I saw him start when he looked at her, and a color of surprise and admiration flashed across his cheek. It was a picture to see them as they thus met, and when I think back it still comes up as a picture to my mind.

After this it was "Agnes and Richard," for they were inseparable from the first. Master Richard followed Agnes about in the yard and garden, and devised many little plans that they might be together. Even in all the merry-making given in honor of his return, I heard them say he staid beside Agnes, giving her all his attention, and having eyes nor ears for any other.

It could not help but see the mistress watch the two very closely, and I noticed after so did Deb, only in a different way; the mistress's face seemed to harden as she saw them so constantly together, and I thought as if she would like to separate them; while Deb's face softened, and I saw she thought it just right that they should admire each other. For my part, I thought it a beautiful sight.

What I thought strange, was, that one evening Master Richard, speaking of Agnes, suddenly said:

"Mother, you never told me in your letters that you had given me a sister."

The mistress said not a word, but Agnes flushed with intense crimson.

Master Richard staid but a fortnight; he said he had made arrangements to return at the end of that time. The mistress drooped her face and looked grave, at the announcement of his departure, he said:

"Never grieve, Agnes, when I come again I will stay till you are tired of me."

"When will you come again?" asked Agnes.

"Very soon, I promise you," he said; and I knew that he meant it.

But still, when the parting came they both looked sad, and several times Master Richard came back to say he had forgotten to bid Deb, gotten something; but it was only to say another good-bye to Agnes. And at the very last, when he had given one of his gay, suddenly turned and called to Agnes to come out. She went out, and through the window I could see her leaning over the gate, the sunshine falling upon her lovely hair, and her face raised to his. She held a bit of ribbon grass in her fingers, which she had plucked as she went down the walk, and I saw him take it from her as he held her hand. He stooped and whispered something to her, and then said aloud:

"How will you do, Agnes?" and she brightened up and looked very happy. I am sure he would have kissed her if the mistress had not been standing in the doorway. Poor fellow, I wish he had!

Afterwards I knew that it was Master Richard that told Agnes of his love, that he would write to her; and so he did, as soon as he reached Boston.

One day when she had been in the village she brought home the letter, and he wrote, too, I can never forget. She came in flushed and breathless, and holding the letter above her head, said innocently:

"It has written to me!"

I suppose if all the world had been assembled in the great kitchen at that moment, she would have said just the same words, looking just as she did. The mistress was knitting, and she dropped her work, and fixing her eyes upon the poor trembling thing, said in a low voice that was tremulous with anger:

"Agnes, your childish ways may do with two old women, but you must learn to be discreet with young men."

Deb was about spreading the cloth for supper, at the time, and she paused for a moment while her mistress spoke, and then began in her hasty way, then she brought it round with a mighty sweep, and laid it with a flop; and when Agnes looked appealingly to her, she turned her head, like a horse. But in the evening when she was in the garden cutting sweet marjoram, I saw Agnes steal out, and creep close beside her on the side of the bed of herbs, take out her precious letter and read it to her. And the only way I could tell that Deb was interested was by the way she cut up the herbs while Agnes read; sometimes she cut fast, and again she cut slow; and sometimes she didn't use the knife at all, but tore the stalk to pieces, root and all; while at others, she snapped the tops off, as if she were thinking, and not quite assured of her work.

I am sure Agnes answered Master Richard's letter, for he continued to write week after week. All the while my mistress had an angry look; and after the correspondence had gone on for some time, she one day said to Agnes:

"Agnes, I don't wish you to write to Richard any more; it is not right."

"He wished it," said Agnes, faintly.

"That may be; young men are always seeking to be amused, and you must not yourself up to some silly notions about him, that may make it awkward for you both in the end; for I warn you, Richard cannot marry you."

"I never thought anything like that," replied Agnes." I know I love him, but I did not think it wrong. I never had a brother."

"You don't love him as a brother, Agnes, and you may as well be undeceived."

Ah, that was a rude hand to tear the veil from that young heart! As the mistress spoke I saw a change pass over Agnes's face, and I knew that that tender revealing which should come as the perfume of a flower when its bloom is perfected, had been prematurely forced, and now she sat blushing with a sort of pained joy at the untimely disclosure.

"Of course," continued the mistress, "Richard will make a grand match one of these days. I expect it of him, and I know he will not disappoint me."

"Then why can't we be happy till he does marry?" asked Agnes, eagerly.

I wonder such simplicity did not touch the mistress's heart, or at least have confounded her; but she put on an unfeeling look, and set her lips as one who is about to make a final speech, while she said:

"It can't be, Agnes; either you are very ignorant, or pretend to be, that you should talk in this way. Promise me you will write no more to Richard."

"Oh, I can't!" said Agnes, weeping and clasping her hands. "It is too hard."

"It is what is right and best, and you must promise."

Then Agnes gave a strange sob, and her face paled to the whiteness of death.

"What will he think of me?" she murmured.

"I will arrange it that Richard will not think hardly of you. Now give me your word."

I have heard that when a hunted doe is pressed to extremity, it suddenly turns with such a look in its eyes as causes the hunter to spare its life or immediately take it.

It must have been such a look as this which came into Agnes face as she turned it to the mistress. I know the mistress started, and said, hurriedly:

"You consent, Agnes?" and the poor child said "Yes," in a tone that struck strangely upon my heart, and then she rose and went up to her room.

I don't know just how I felt, I was so wretched. I wished Deb had been about, though of course the mistress would then have chosen another time.

I think the day I saw a change in Agnes she had a wistful look on her face, and moved about as one in a dream. As time went on, however, that brightened, for I saw the prospect of Master Richard's return. But the week slipped away and he didn't come; and then I saw she lost heart entirely.

I wondered that Master Richard did not come, for I knew that he meant to.

There was such a visible change in Agnes, that at last the mistress began to speak about her. She did not join her young friends any more, though they came to tempt her out; and since the day the mistress spoke to her about Master Richard, I never heard her sing.

One night after she had gone to bed, Deb said very abruptly to the mistress:

"That child's ailin'."

"No wonder," rejoined the mistress, "when she leads such a life as she does. No girl can be well who does not take bodily exercise."

"Umph!" ejaculated Deb.

"I don't see that she looks worse than usual; she always has a pale appearance," continued the mistress.

"She's goin' to die," said Deb, "every shortly."

"I'd like to know how you know?" said the mistress, with an angry flush.

"Got my eyes," returned Deb. Then they sat silent till the mistress went to bed.

But after this she made Agnes walk out, and bought her a pretty new dress, and was more attentive to her than I had ever known her before. For all this the poor child did not rally, but seemed to fade, and had that far-off look in her eyes which is so painful to see.

One night as Deb sat by the fire, Agnes, who had gone to bed hours before, came softly down stairs in her night-dress. Her shining hair fell over her shoulders, and she held something in her hand.

"What's all this?" said Deb, sharply; though I saw she was not cross.

Agnes did not answer till she stood quite beside her; then she put her arms around her head, and laid the object against her head, saying:

"Deb, I am going to die!"

"Nonsense!" said Deb, with a jerk; and pushing her away she got up and fell to stirring and poking the fire. "Go to bed, child," she said down again she said, very shortly: "where's the pain?"

Agnes shook her head. "It is not that, Deb; there is no pain, it is not sickness; but I feel as if I were floating out of life. I can't make any resistance. I can't rally. I am like a poor little bird adrift upon a stream. Deb, don't think of Richard"—here her voice choked—"I still seem to be going. I will never see him again, Deb."

How she looked at Deb wistfully.

When she recovered, she said:

"I want to ask something of you, Deb; here is a little packet I want you to give Richard when he comes. I have no message, for I have said all in the letter. Only there is one thing I did not tell him, and you may—yes, you may tell him, Deb, that I still love him, and he kissed me once when he came across the fields in the moonlight. For he did kiss me, Deb, and I was frightened, and cried; and then he was grieved at seeing me troubled, and in trying to comfort me, without knowing what he did, he kissed me again. Tell him I am even glad he kissed me, because he was not to see me any more. And now take me in your arms, Deb, for it is a long time since any one held or fondled me, and I think I am still only a child."

Deb had put the packet in her bosom without a word, and she took the little white figure in her arms, and held it tenderly as a mother would a baby.

"You ought to be in your bed," she said, very decidedly. "Rest is what you want."

"Yes, rest!" said Agnes, absently. "I am always seeking it, but it never comes. There is but one place where rest is found."

"Where's that?"

"Out in the old church-yard below the hill."

"See here," cried Deb, "I won't have any more of this! You're as nervous as a mouse, and your hands and feet are as cold as frogs; I expect we'll have you sick a-bed to-morrow."

But Agnes buried her face, crying softly; and then Deb stroked her cheek and smoothed her hair. When she was quiet, she said to her:

"Now I'm goin' to make you an egg posset, and you've got to eat it."

So she put her in the big cushioned chair, and set about making the posset, talking very briskly all the while.

"You have been so good to me, Deb," said Agnes watching her.

"No I havn't," returned Deb, stopping short with the skillet in her hand. "I'm always as wicked as the devil."

Agnes laughed at her odd expression, and when the posset was done she insisted she should take some of it.

Seeing her so cheered up I began to hope, and in a little while Deb took her up as if she had been a child, and carried her off to bed.

But when Deb came down, she sat down and threw her apron over her face, and then I knew poor little Agnes must be failing.

She got up after a while, and poked the fire very hard; then she drew the table into the middle of the room, and made preparations for writing a letter. She took a narrow-necked ink-bottle and a quill from a shelf, and a sheet of foolscap paper, a stick of red sealing-wax, and her thimble from her pocket, and laid them on the table, lighting a fresh candle.

Of all the work Deb had undertaken in her life, I suppose the writing of that letter was the most serious. I thought she never would get set down to it; and when she was once seated, I thought she would never get through. She set the candle first in one place and then another, and the ink-bottle would be either at the very corner of the table, where I expected every dip of her quill would push it off, or she suddenly brought it under her very elbow. She snuffed the candle when it didn't want snuffing, and when it did, she let it alone, and poked away by its dim light. I have no doubt the poor soul had not written a stroke since she was a girl, and the different forms of the letters had slipped her memory, so that she was obliged to stop every now and then to recall them. As she shaped each letter, she made a corresponding motion with her mouth, so that I could tell when she was making a G, when an A, and so on through all the alphabet. I think she jumped up as often as six times during her writing to stir the fire; in this, as in other things, it seemed a relief to her feelings, and helped her along. When the letter was finished she folded it up in a big square, sealed it with the wax, and made an impression with the end of her thimble. Then she put it in her pocket, and went to bed.

I knew that letter was for Master Richard, and I knew it was about Agnes; and I blessed Deb in my heart.

The next morning Agnes didn't come down to breakfast, and my heart sank. Deb was very cross, and I knew this was a bad sign.

"I shall send for the doctor," said the mistress.

"'Twon't be any use," said Deb.

But still he was sent for, and he came, He was an old gentleman, very fat, and it took him so long to get upstairs that I thought he never would get up. When he came down he put his hat on one chair, and sat down on another, not saying a word, but staring hard at the floor.

"What do you think?" asked the mistress.

"What do I think about what, madam?"

"I mean, do you think Agnes very sick?"

"I don't think her sick at all."

The mistress flushed up and looked ill at ease.

"That is a very peculiar organization upstairs, madam."

"She was always very delicate looking," said the mistress; "and I did not put her to any work."

"Quite right," said the old doctor; "she should live as the birds and flowers. Have some one to take care of her."

"What do you suppose ails her?" asked the mistress.

"That is just what I wish to know, madam."

"She must be sick," said the mistress.

"She is not sick," said the doctor.

Then there was an awkward silence.

"What do you recommend?" then asked the mistress.

"I recommend that woman in the short gown—Deb, I think, you call her—to stay with her all the time. That woman is a wholesome character. Give the child plenty of old wine, tell her all the gossip of the neighborhood, never go into the room with your feet in slippers and your voice muffled, let there be a constant stir and noise in the house, and keep life around her keyed up to the highest pitch, till we see if we can bring about a reaction; for I tell you, madam, if we do not take care, we shall have her slipping into heaven before we know where we are. Already she seems to have one wing dipped in the blue."

He went off quickly when he said this.

Deb trudged up and down stairs constantly, and cooked every variety of dainty for poor Agnes. The wine was brought up from the parlor cupboard, and everything done that serves in most cases, but all to no purpose.

"I intend to write to Richard," said the mistress to Deb.

"Too late!" said Deb, and left the room, with her old green bonnet drawn down over her face.

Every day the doctor came, and, as he had done on the first day, always sat down in the kitchen after coming downstairs, and, staring hard at the floor would say to the mistress:

"That is a very peculiar organization upstairs, madam."

This speech never failed to make the mistress angry.

At last, when a week had gone by, I saw there was no hope. The tray came down without the dishes having been touched, the broiled chicken, with its parsley sauce, the jelly and the wine, just as when they went up. And Deb had a red ring round her eyes, and looked worn to a shadow.

Agnes's companions came to see her; and one day a young girl, to whom she was greatly attached, leaning against the dresser with her sun-bonnet in her hand, burst into tears, and said to Deb:

"Oh, Deb, what ails Agnes? I think she will die!"

I could only keep hoping Master Richard would come. One day the doctor staid upstairs a long time: and when he came down he walked to the window, and taking out his big red silk handkerchief, blew his nose over and over again very hard. Then the mistress came down, white as a sheet, and dropped upon a chair, trembling.

Oh, poor little Agnes! Then I knew she had drifted quite out to the great ocean, and was lost to us for ever. And that afternoon, just when it was a few hours too late, Master Richard came. I will never forget the scene which ensued.

A dismal rain had been falling, for it was in the late autumn, and I remember he was quite drenched when he came in. He glanced quickly over the room, and then said, in a sharp voice:

"Where is Agnes?"

Deb wrung her hands, and I saw her face work with emotion.

"Where is Agnes?" repeated Master Richard, in a louder tone.

Then Deb put her head down on the table and cried.

"Not that, Deb!" he said. "O God, it cannot be that!"

No one answered; but his mother went to him and put her hands on his shoulders.

He flung them off as if they had been vipers, and cried out:

"Mother, you deceived me and killed her! Oh, why did I trust you? Go away—don't touch me—I hate you! The dear, dead face, upstairs, is not more indifferent to me than I will be to you henceforth; and no other woman's love shall ever cross my darling's grave to reach my heart, so help me heaven! O Agnes, Agnes!"

Then he turned to go upstairs, but seemed as if he could not, putting his hand to his head, and saying:

"My God, how shall I face this?"

It was only after the third effort that he went up, and then we heard him crying:

"My poor, murdered lamb, speak to me! I have come back!"

But the sweet voice which was to have greeted his return was frozen into eternal silence. And though he poured out his love and grief for hours beside her, Agnes never so much as raised her little white hand. The mistress shut herself up in her room; and late at night, as Deb sat by the fire, Master Richard came downstairs, but looking at least ten years older. His face was fixed and white, and his voice had a dull sound, as one who had parted with hope.

"Tell me everything, Deb," he said, sitting down beside her.

Then Deb took the little packet from her bosom and gave it to him, with that curious, but sweet message.

"Tell me again," he said; and she went over it in a hoarse, choking voice.

He covered his face with his hands and shook with sobs. When he opened the packet a long tress of shining hair fell out, and he pressed it to his lips, saying:

"Oh, my darling!"

The next thing was a little withered flower, and then there were his letters tied with a bit of ribbon, and a long letter which Agnes had written. He read her letter over and over, and then got up and walked about the room.

"I must go away from this place, Deb," he said. "I must go away to-morrow. A few days sooner and I might have saved her, and now she is lost to me for ever! I loved her from the first, Deb, on the day I came home and saw her standing in the door. I knew I never could love another; I meant to tell her I loved her when I came again—I would have written it, but for the selfish wish to see her blushing face and hear her sweet voice in answer. My mother deceived me most cruelly; she told me Agnes was attached to an early friend, and I felt it so deeply that I could not come home. I knew my mother's ambition long before this, and I am punished for trusting her. I am a rich man now, but my wealth will only be a burden to me. I wish I had my fortune to make over again, that in care and toil I might seek forgetfulness. For a time I thought it was to be 'life with Agnes,' now it is only that dreary thought—life without her! I am only twenty-eight years old, Deb, and my future lies before me like a desert waste. I wish God would cut short my days, for joy and hope are dead!"

"Hush, hush!" said Deb, solemnly; "we must suffer the Lord's will."

"It has been cruel, cruel work," he said, setting his teeth hard.

Neither of them went to bed that night, and in the morning Master Richard went away. He had asked Deb for some little token of Agnes, and she gave him her blue ribbon—the sash she wore on the day he first saw her.

I must pass lightly over the few days that followed, over the time when our pretty Agnes, in her white dress, and with flowers on her bosom, was carried down the garden walk, and laid in the old churchyard, at the foot of the hill. A gloom fell upon the house, as if the light had departed, and so it had. Deb became more active and sharper than ever, but I knew it was only to keep away the heartache. Every night I saw her tears dropping on her bony hands, as she sat in her old place, and I knew her loss was next to Master Richard's.

The mistress was a changed woman. She gave up her spinning, and would sit by the hour with her hands clasped, not speaking a word. One day, about a year after Agnes's death, she did not come down to breakfast, and Deb, going to her room, found her dead in her bed.

Then poor Deb wrote her second letter to Master Richard, and he answered it; and I heard her tell a neighbor she was going to Boston, to keep house for him.

The furniture was sold, the house closed up, and Deb went away, and I never saw her again. This is the way it all ended, and I passed into another family. But I like to think back, and I often wonder if Master Richard and Deb did not sometimes go to see the little grave in the Hazedon churchyard.

Fifty years ago! Dear me! I shall soon be out of service, and all that I know will pass away with me!"

AUTUMN FRUITS:

A Harvest Hymn.

Not always with the jester's cap and bells,
 Not always with the quibble on the tongue,
The laughing lip a cheerful story tells:
 A people's pæan should be gravely sung.

As deepened ruts in elm-embowered lane—
 The broad-carved traces of the wagon wheel—
Show where have passed huge loads of garnered grain,
 So human hearts some kindred impress feel.

The breeze-blown sails that turn about the mill
 Make merry music in the autumn air;
Whilst cheapened loaves the laborer's table fill,
 Where chubby cheeks with brightened eyes repair.

That radiant face which to the threshold comes,
 Those bulky meal sacks round about the floor,
Show sunny blessings entering lightened homes,
 Scaring the wolf of famine from the door.

Peace, Plenty and Prosperity—these come
 From Him whose sunbeams did the bounty raise,
And for these gatherings of our harvest home,
 A nation's voice sends forth a hymn of praise.

THE LAST WALL-ST. SENSATION.

New York has been the locale of many gigantic operations in the money market and finances generally, as well as in all matters of social, political, moral, and commercial importance, among which, during the last few years, that of the Huntingdon defalcation, perhaps, rated as the most extensive in the financial world, until the recent Wall street revulsion shook the business community of this city to its very centre. Huntingdon is now paying the penalty of his crime in the prison at Sing Sing. But what is to be the result of the Ketchum operation in the same line, is yet to be developed. As the case now stands, it appears that the criminal operations of Edward B. Ketchum amounted to the very moderate sum of $4,000,000, which he had availed himself of by abstracting securities from the vaults of the firm of Morris Ketchum & Co., and otherwise using "scrip," "funds," and "collaterals" that were not exactly "personal property," in his financial operations in Wall street. At length his defalcations were discovered, and the bankruptcy of the above house, of which his father was one of the principal partners, was the result. Not only have his operations affected that firm, but a number of others have felt its disastrous influence, as might be expected, yet so high is the standing of his father, and the house with which he is connected, that at a meeting of the creditors, the said firm was relieved of its indebtedness upon the payment of sixty per cent., which is in substance, the ultimatum of the affair, so far as the creditors are concerned.

TOWN GOSSIP.

There have been only four railroad accidents during the past week, which is at once a source of considerable surprise and comfort to all, whether travelers or stay-at-homes. All have, however, agreed upon the necessity of some additional legislation for the punishment of the guilty parties, for the disastrous results and the guilt are the same, whether passengers are killed by some ruffian laying a piece of timber across the track, or by some wretched board of directors making one switchman do the work of two, out of a murderous and miserly economy.

There is considerable discussion among the lawyers, whether the great Wall street sensationalist, Ketchum, junior, has been legally guilty of forgery in the matter of the gold cheques, inasmuch as he never uttered them; some of the lawyers, however, contend that depositing them as collateral security, constitutes in effect an utterance. So far as Wall street is concerned, it has been a nine days' wonder, and although not forgotten, is no longer a prominent subject of conversation.

In the industrial world, the latest item is the arrival of about a score of England's representative commercial men to "prospect" our great American adventures, whether of oil wells, railroads, steamship lines, or banks, for despite an occasional Jenkins, there is a growing disposition among English financiers to invest in American securities in preference to any other. It is needless to dwell upon the great advantages to be derived from a visit from men of this class; it will undo many of those false impressions made by flimsy reports of such men as Mackay, Trollope, and their brother line-spinners. One thing cannot fail to astonish them, and that is the total absence of all those evils which an expensive and sanguinary war invariably entails upon a country. We venture to say, that the only traces they will find in any of the loyal States, are the sorrowful countenances of those who have lost relatives in the struggle. In every other respect, the war—terrible as the visitation has been—has lifted a great incubus from the American breast, enabled it to breathe with a freer and more joyous spirit, and given an impulse to its commercial industry which will astonish the world.

We notice in a Cleveland paper, a description of Bond's Portable Sporting Boat, which can be divided into two parts, each of which forms a complete boat. It is most admirably adapted for parties going on distant hunting or fishing excursions, as they will stand more hard usage than any other boats, while the cost of transportation is but a trifle. The length of the boat is 16 feet.

Theatricals have recommenced in full blast. Clarke began his annual season last week at the Winter Garden with two of his best parts, "Major de Boots," and "Toodles." We hope, however, that so fine an artiste—for Mr. Clarke does not trust to broad grimace for his success, but presents an elaborate performance, which embodies his idea of the character, just as Owens does in Solon Shingle, and Booth in "Hamlet"—will give us something new.

At Niblo's we have the agreeable expectation of seeing the Ravels on the 18th, after an absence of several years. How many recollections their re-appearance will cause? Their connection with the American public is one of the most gratifying theatrical facts of the age. The Ravels may be truly said to have delighted three generations of New Yorkers.

The last week will be remembered for the opening of Barnum's new Museum, now situated at 539 and 541 Broadway, known as the Chinese Hall, and the scene of the Buckleys' triumphs. The new Museum consists of five large saloons, and a splendid lecture room; these stretch across the entire block of 200 feet. Among the great advantages of this location, is the rapid egress in case of emergency, as ample doors at both ends allow the entire audience to pass out in five minutes. The stage of the Lecture Room is 50 feet wide, by 46 feet deep, and the auditorium is about 80 feet deep. It will accommodate about 2,500 persons. The decorations are very elegant. Considering the short space of time in fitting the present building, the variety and number of curiosities Barnum has gathered together are really wonderful, and sufficiently evince that he is still the same energetic manager.

Mr. Stephen Massett (Pipes) is going on a lengthened Western tour, where he will present his "Drifting About," so popular in New York.

EQUAL TO THE EMERGENCY.

Not many years ago, two Frenchmen, one wealthy and in the possession of ready cash, and the other poor and penniless, occupied, by chance, the same room in a hotel. In the morning the "seedy" one arose first, took from his pocket a pistol, and holding it to his own forehead, and backing against the door, exclaimed to his horrified companion:

"It is my last desperate resource; I am penniless and tired of life! give me five hundred francs, or I will instantly blow out my brains, and you will be arrested as a murderer!"

The other lodger found himself the hero of an unpleasant dilemma, but the cogency of his companion's argument struck him "cold." He quietly crept to his pantaloons, handed over the amount, and the other vamoosed, after locking the door on the outside.

Hearing of this, another Frenchman, of very savage aspect, one night tried to room with a tall, raw-boned gentleman of Arkansas, who had been rather free with his money during the day, and evidently had plenty more behind. Next morning, "Pike" awakening, discovered his room-mate standing over him, with a pistol leveled at his own head, and evidently quaking with agitation.

"What the deuce are you standin' thar for in the cold?" said Pike, propping himself on his elbow, and coolly surveying the Gaul.

"I am desperate!" was the reply. "You give me one hundred dollar, or I will blow out my brain!"

"Well, then, blow and be darned!" replied Pike, turning over.

"Bote you will be arrested for ze murdaire!" persisted the Gaul, earnestly.

"Eh, what's that?" said Pike. "Oh, I see!" and suddenly drawing a revolver and a five pound bowie from under his pillow, he sat upright. "A man may as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb," he coolly remarked; and at the word he started for the Gaul.

But the latter was too nimble; for the "hoss-pistol," innocent of lead, exploded in the air, and with one frantic leap our little Frenchman was standing in his night-robe at the foot of the staircase—a proof that what will suit one latitude will not answer for another.

FLOWERS AND DIAMONDS.

Whatever may be the difference of their value in exchange, we know that a single rose in the hair of a fair young girl adds more to the adornment of her person than a string of diamonds. Is not the blush of an innocent, happy girl a more delicious thing to see than the blaze of the most profusely diamonded woman? And then, chemists now are said to be able to reduce the diamond to its primitive charcoal; but rose leaves are still rose leaves; though dead, their odor is a delicious memory of the by-gone "time of roses."

Girls should be like the flowers that adorn them—pure to the sight and sweet in memory. Bright, but impenetrably hard, diamonds teem with peril to their wearers. There is a charm in them, St. Ambrose says, which is not known to those who bear their yoke. Women who bear diamonds, said the saint, may be as bright and dazzling as the gems, but their hearts, assuredly, will grow as hard.

More than half the charm of dress, and all the charm of adornment arises from the appropriateness of each to both place and person. Diamonds that flash over gardens in the country are burning insults to the flowers. They belong to state, stately persons, and stately occasions of festival or solemnity in cities, or in sovereign presence elsewhere. On an Evangeline's brow the rose, not the gem, is becoming; and jewelry looks ill on the fingers of Basil, the blacksmith. In short, dress, like everything else, should be in unison with the wearer's place and condition. Hiawatha's flaunting feathers, Minnehaha's prairie flowers, were well suited to their pathways and the shadows of the forest, but in Broadway would be laughed at.

Ants of Business.—Nothing is more interesting than to see an army of ants engaged in divesting a tree of its foliage. In doing so, they manifest an intuitive system and order which is truly surprising. A regular file is continually ascending on one side of the trunk, while another is descending on the opposite side, each one of the ants bearing a piece of a leaf of the size of a sixpence in his mouth. A large number appear to be stationed among the upper branches, for the sole purpose of biting off the stems of the leaves and thus causing them to fall to the ground. At the foot of the tree is another department, whose business is evidently that of cutting the fallen leaves into small pieces for transportation. A long procession is kept constantly marching, laden with leaves. Some years ago the ants entered one of the convents at Maranham, who not only devoured the drapery of the altars, but also descended into the graves beneath the floor, and brought up several pieces of linen from the shrouds of the dead.

Washing Horses.—In regard to the care of horses, Sir George Stephen says: "Whenever it is necessary to wash a horse's legs, do it in the morning. Most grooms act on a different principle—wash them as soon as the animal comes in. I am satisfied this is a bad practice. When the roads are dirty, and the weather wet, and the legs are already soaked, washing can do no harm; but to deluge the legs with water the moment a horse enters the yard, heated with exercise, is to my mind as unnatural and absurd as to jump into a shower-bath after playing an hour at cricket. My plan is a rubbing down with straw and a dry brush, and the next morning wash as clean as soap and water can make them. Pick and wash the soles as soon as a horse comes in."

Persian Women's Scientific Division of Men.—The "Seven Wise Women of Persia," who by royal edict prepared a code of laws governing domestic matters in that realm, lay it down as a fact that, "There are three kinds of men: 1. A proper man; 2. Half a man; 3. A hupul-hupla. A proper man always gives his wife whatever she wants; your half man is a poor, snivelling wretch, who gives his wife but little; and you hupul-hupla is a despicable, jealous creature, who gives his wife nothing, but makes her do her own work, and is so suspicious, that if she stays away all day, he is sure to ask her where she has been."

THE HORRORS OF ANDERSONVILLE—THE MIDNIGHT VISION OF THE MURDERER.

VISION OF THE MURDERER.

CASTLES IN THE AIR.

BY MARY E. C——.

NEAR a vine-wreathed casement sitting,
Is a maiden young and fair,
Dreaming, while the merry south wind
Toyeth with her nut-brown hair.

In her eyes a dreamy languour,
Like a spirit hair awake,
Coral lips, half sad, half smiling,
Folded hands of fairest make.

Sits she there in hazy twilight,
Dreamer's time and poet's hour,
When the spirit is uplifted
By some unseen magic power.

Those blue eyes are never gazing
On the blue-crowned distant hills;
Heeds she not the soothing murmur
Of the tinkling, rippling rills

Art thou dreaming, maiden, fair one,
Building castles in the air—
Glorious castles, princely dwellings,
Richly grand and quaintly rare?

Out upon the future's greensward,
Rieath up his magic home,
Grand, with turrets, gables, cornice,
Crowned with arching, stately dome.

Light within is brightly gleaming,
Gilding spacious stucco'd halls,
Where, in golden frames are hanging,
Pictures culled from mem'ry's walls.

Fadeless flowers are ever blooming,
Free from blight or mark of death,
Rarest strains of sweetest music
Touch the ear like angel's breath.

Heard not is the sound of wailing,
Ne'er is seen a falling tear,
All is rose-hued, joyous meeting,
In this dreamland's castled sphere.

Vows made here are never broken,
All is holy pure and fair,
Every face is bright with beauty,
Such as saints and angels wear.

Who will dwell with the fair maiden
In these castled fairy towns,
Breathe the air with love-sweet laden,
Pluck these gorgeous passion flowers?

That bright blush of rosy tinting,
Blue eyes lit with tender flame,
Tell the tale in love's own language,
Whisper sure the lov'd one's name.

Fair young maiden, may you never
See your castled home decay,
Leaving them but sleeping in anguish
Over fiends made of clay.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATTERMAN'S MAKE," "BEEDEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.—ESAU'S TROPHY.

We need not tell our readers who it was that followed Anthony into the dining-room, and became at once the object of such close if not flattering attention. But it is necessary that we should narrate the incident that brought Esau into his new position. The young adventurer had at first enjoyed the share assigned to him by "luck" of watching, unsuspected, the burlier thieves in the beautiful moonlit garden; of giving sudden warning, and then removing out of harm, of showing his musical capabilities from the platform of a bale of newly-mown hay, and for the benefit alike of sick aldermen and discontented burglars, and chuckling at the surprise that must be felt by the former audience at such untimely rawellings. But when pistol-shots began to fly about the air, he fancied he would be better back again in Leicester Square than more thought would any of itself have been sufficient, he had a new motive given him when, as he was running, he came suddenly upon one of the flying thieves, who, without a word, knocked him down with the butt-end of a pistol he held, and then, as he lay stunned and sprawling, threw the weapon into savagely, muttering, in a hoarse, suppressed voice:

"There, you varmint! Don't poke yer nose into things you don't understand again!"

He said no more; but leaving his pistol, as if he had intended to get rid of it, disappeared over the wall.

Esau was as much struck with the robber's text as with the commentary; and he was wonderfully tickled by the sight of the pistol, which must be the robber's own, and which surely now might be Esau's. Giving himself no time for reflection, he pushed it under his waistcoat, out of sight, and followed the example of the burglar in getting away as fast as possible, and back into one of his London haunts—the cellar of a poor old woman, who let him sleep there rent free, in return for his doing any little bits of business she wanted from Esau.

But Esau got home too late to sleep, and too full of his adventures to be quiet about them; so while his feeble, querulous, but kindly-natured patroness gave him the washings of her own unroasted teapot, with bread and a lump of dripping, for breakfast, he told her the story.

"Go back, you little fool—go back with you directly, and tell them at the house," was her first greeting, after a pause as if of wonder, and when Esau was expecting a compliment for his behavior. Esau looked sullen at first, but was in due time convinced he ought to carry out to the end the part he had undertaken, of a faithful though unknown friend of the family; so he set off to return.

He walked along, sometimes briskly, at others loitering, as if time were nothing to him, and that secretly-coveted pistol a good deal. Now he turned from the road to help to toss hay in a field where only the farmer and his son were left at work; but his quick eye happening to see a rabbit crossing at the corner of the field, very near, he started in chase, never stopping till he reached its hole, which the boy marked by leaving a peculiar-looking bough sticking in the ground near it. Then, too, he was a good deal amused by his being so generally known by the inmates of the cottages he passed. The men, smoking their pipes at the house doors after breakfast, looked at him and at his pistol, which he mischievously just allowed them to see, and shook their heads, uttering an emphatic assent to the opinion given by one of them, that

"That boy won't never come not to no good, whoever lives to see it."

But the little children went running into the cottages, calling, loudly and excitedly:

"Mother—mother! here comes Esau!"

And the mothers generally had a friendly nod and smile for him. At one place he stopped to mend a child's whip; at another to earn a halfpenny by running a race for a village-boy, lending his hand of hair while the ass a baby's play-thing while its mother got the supper ready—a bargain of which the crowing and tugging baby seemed to think better than Esau did. But he took fresh thought and pushed on, after a sly look at the pistol, and after cocking it, and levelling it at imaginary burglars in the hedge, and pulling the trigger.

He had strange modes of relieving the monotony of his journey. Sometimes he would cease to disappear from the road altogether, but soon his heels would be seen either dangling from a tree, or standing on, sole upright, while his head and buttercups, in the middle of a field of long grass, where he had found, and was watching, a skylark's nest, till the lark herself came down from the sky, singing deliciously, and coming in as straight a line as if its song were a silken web-like thread, which it had wound about it to climb heavenward, and which it now unspun to return to its nest in the grass.

And then, taking heart of grace, Esau dawdled no longer, but—ran as fast as he could—trying to forget what a good pistol it was, and how he should like to fire it off with real powder and shot, if only once. At last he reached the alderman's house, rung the bell, waited five minutes, rang no answering again, and then was, to his surprise, met, not by the servants, but by a young gentleman, who heard his business with so little interest that he might have known of it beforehand, and merely said, as Esau was showing the pistol:

"Come in with me."

Thus it was that Esau again presented himself at the alderman's, and so much later than he needed to have done, making his appearance, and offering his testimony and his trophy.

But why had Anthony thought it right to leave his friends at so critical a time, and in so rude a manner, as if merely to answer a door bell? Can we without shame record of him, in this unsentimental age, that he had been so completely overpowered by the alderman's letter, and by the general sense of relief from a position of debt and difficulty, as to be absolutely unable to trust himself to speak any but the most formal words, even in womanish fashion before all those people—before her, the doctor's daughter—would have been an act he could scarcely have brought himself to do. Indeed it is, when he found that even delay did not restore his equanimity, he had taken advantage of the sudden sound, the ringing of the gate bell, to escape from the room, and from the additional sting of the lawyer's absurd and unworthy explanation. What he did, where he went, and what he remembered himself during the first few minutes that elapsed between the first and the second ringing of the bell, let us leave unsaid. Enough to know that he had gone back to the room ready conquer the grief—the gratefulness—the passionate desire to cry back to that grave, "Oh, you have rightly known me!" that had been in his heart ever since he was not in the assembly a calmer looking face. It was pale, certainly—very pale; and intrusive eyes might have noticed something beautiful in the moisture that Anthony had to dash again met the people in the room; but he said, carelessly:

"Esau boy has picked up a pistol belonging to one of the thieves?" and, under cover of that diversion, walked back to his place, motioning Esau to a corner near him. Esau understood this as an invitation to squat down at his ease, in a manner more picturesque than seemly; then, after a pause, Anthony seemed to have found the persons in the room, obviously in order to speak. The instantaneous lull was remarkable, and, in any other mood, would, to poor Anthony, have been alarming; but he had just passed through too many great and elevating emotions to be open so soon after to the influence of trifling ones. On the contrary, he felt more than the first few bewitching words, his look became so animated, his voice so thrilling, and his form so full of dignity, that Esau almost thought it one of this world indeed the half-shy, half-mirthful Anthony Maude who had spoken to her outside the house.

"Esau, you have earned your place now with other wise, and I hope you do not wish that I should do so—you have heard what my uncle writes to me to do. Hear me now before we leave. May God in his goodness make me"—he paused, as if wishing to say something that would not come to him—"make me fit for such a destiny; and if He finds I neglect or violate the solemn duty now imposed, may He take all this away from me, for I shall deserve it."

Before any knew he had finished he was again sitting in his chair. But then, after a moment's pause, he seemed to remember something, rose again, shook hands warmly with Sleuth, and said to the auditory:

"I am proud to say that Richard Sleuth and I are friends, that this is his house as well as mine, and that I look to him to help me in my affairs."

He was getting a little agitated once more; so, in order to calm his excitement, he turned to see where Charles Pompeus was, and he found her just where he had left her, but looking at him with such moist eyes and glowing cheeks, that he grew warm himself; and then, to his relief, he beheld thought him of the doctor—a wonderful sedative. He went to him, and, with a half bow and half smile, said:

"Doctor, you will bear with my oddities, won't you? For the sake of my uncle you will remember how much I owe to your friend's countenance and sympathy." Artful Anthony! He consciously got on better the moment that word, or countenance, was added to that. "Yes, doctor, I assure you I am rather frightened than elated by my good fortune. But I ask you sincerely and entirely to be my friend—my friend, and Dick Sleuth's."

"Hem! hem! Well—well—young man, I know no reason why I shouldn't be your friend, and, as you say very thoughtfully, Richard Sleuth's friend also."

"And may I at once ask your advice on a matter that drives me almost distracted, doctor?" asked Anthony.

"Do—pray do—speak out!" replied the doctor.

They went through the conservatory into the little conical room between the conservatory and the hall, a sort of corner cut off from the general lawn and flower-system of the grounds. The doctor, as they walked, took the young man's arm in a gracious, condescending way.

"The servants," said Anthony, when they were out of hearing. "I wonder whether Dick's say something about them. But I am not the fellow, and I won't be, to even seem to blame him."

"Quite right—quite right. Very likely he meant to leave all that to you."

"Mightn't I say he hinted at something of the sort once?"

"Of course. If he did, that's the very thing."

Anthony looked puzzled; and then the doctor smelt a rat.

"Ah! young man! I see—I see. Beware! Take my advice—the advice of a man of mature years and large experience—and I—and—hem! banish all doubt. Be resolute. Tell the truth and shame the devil! Capital motto! Keep it before you, young man!"

Anthony looked half inclined to laugh, while a little annoyed. But the truth-loving doctor went on:

"Hem! hem! Give the housekeeper an annuity of fifty pounds a year, if she leaves you—and—hem!—give the other domestics gratuities—say—hem!—one-year's wages for each year they have been in the service."

"Yes; and might I say that arrangements—arrangements have been made in—in the family for some time?"

"Gently, young man," said the doctor, his large, broad face beaming for the first time with a smile, as he began to suspect an admirable Joke.

The end of the conversation was that Dr. Pompeus went home to dress, to take a short but imposing oration to the housekeeper and other servants, and, somehow, insensibly glided into the path that the cunning Anthony had sloped for him; so that, when the servants had discussed the matter some hours after, there was a general agreement that the old man had really settled everything very well indeed, only, on his part, rather enjoyed the position thus put upon him of giving moral counsel, and exercising legitimate authority.

CHAPTER XIV.—SLEUTH'S TRIAL.

WHEN people look on the rising sun, they seldom trouble themselves to think of the sun that set only a few hours before. So was it here. The alderman's memory had faded fast before the natural yearning for life, and even the murder had long kept out the question of the property, and the thoughts of the two young men so critically situated. Besides, every one knew the alderman had been dying—they had hourly expected to hear he was dead—and they could not therefore long retain the first healthy glow of excitement and indignation at the fact this murder, and with exactly the same kind of reception they could have given to the news of any other. If the alderman had been, at the time, in any less critical position, there would have been a great outcry at his death; as it was, it was wonderful how soon the first horror subsided, and how under the diversion of other and more attractive themes, and which more or less affected the interests of the majority of the persons present.

But there was one man who never, by any chance, forgot, even for a single instant, the dread event; for instant warned him to the deepest thought.

What but that was Sleuth thinking of while the doctor and Anthony were talking together apart? Was it Miss Pompeus, upon whom, when he did not think she observed him, his eyes had contracted a bad, and to her annoying, habit of constantly fixing? Was it the riding habit; and though he seemed to be interested in Esau, and to smile at the answers the vagabond lad had given him, was it not the while stretching his faculties of hearing and divining to the utmost, to enable him to guess the purport of the talk in the little garden. Sleuth never once thought of his actual truth of the case about the servants. He felt, on the contrary, sure that two fearful things for him had happened together, when Anthony had gone out just as the boy was coming in with the burglar's pistol.

He could not, for the moment steady his thoughts sufficiently to call up all the many possibilities involved, but he saw only too clearly that the finding of that second pistol might be extremely dangerous—perhaps, indeed, had suggested something to Anthony which he was already consulting the doctor about. How he measured, moment by moment, their slow footfalls, crushing the gravel with them! How, when they once stopped, he seemed to understand they had come to some horrible and mutual conclusion; and how the unseen spirit again whispered "Fly!" till he was relieved by their going on again! How he prayed (for Sleuth still retained himself religious, and quite entitled to pray) that the next few hours would pass all, these people disperse, and he be able to sit down with God in peace! Peace! Sleuth is learning fast, but has much yet to learn. Meantime his lips may almost be seen to move, as he silently shapes on them the two words that now comprise, he thinks, the greatest dangers—"coat—pistol!"

He does not deceive himself. Glad as he has been to find that, even after murder, creation at large, and the alderman's domestics in particular, seem to move on very much as before—still, he is quite aware that people will, now that the heir question is disposed of, return to the remembrance of the alderman's bloody death, and to the inquiries consequent on the crime. He saw the two men return, and then, while the doctor made his speech about the servants, he wiped the palms of his hands, which persisted in coming with moisture, and felt he was as ready as he ever could be for the ordeal.

"Hem!" began the doctor, according to his wont, but in much more severe and magisterial loudness of tone—"All other business having been disposed of—hem! it is my duty, not officially—I repeat, not officially at present"—here the doctor looked round with more benignant air than he had first assumed—"but rather as a friend of the deceased and one who has been, I am told, fearfully murdered. But of that I must be presumed just yet to know nothing. Mr. Stamp, will you be so good as to act pro tem., as my clerk, and guide the proceedings?"

Mr. Stamp just gave one impatient scratch of his head with the fingers of his left hand, as though to allay some momentary irritability in that particular part, but then resigned himself with a good grace to what he feared might prove an infliction. But he was mistaken. For once he had a certain wholesome dread of intermeddling with a man that he knew to be able and experienced; so he simply looked most magnificently grave great weight and dignity to the informal proceedings by his appearance and behavior.

"Perhaps Mr. Sleuth will tell us what he knows about the matter first," began the lawyer.

Mr. Sleuth was not at all flattered by this prominent position. He had hoped to have heard what passed, and then have shaped what he had to say more or less according to circumstances. This ill-luck a little discomposed him; and after he had striven with his internal agitation, and pretty well conquered it, a new incident occurred not calculated to reassure him. The door opened without any warning—without even a preliminary tap—and two men entered, with staves in their hands and their hats on their heads, whose businesslike bluff placed in their aspect—ministers of justice. They explained that they had only quite recently heard of the business, and had come as soon as possible when they did hear. The doctor motioned to them to be seated, and they, knowing him to be a magistrate, became, of course, very humble and respectful.

Sleuth, with these appearances, thought it wisest to repeat as nearly as he could, word for word, the statement he had made to the housekeeper—laying stress on the fact of the presence of the burglars while attending to his dying uncle, his uncle's firing at the burglar, the burglar's firing with his pistol, Anthony's pursuing him ineffectually, and returning till he met the housekeeper in the corridor.

The housekeeper pricked her ears as she heard, Sleuth mention her name, and some words were exchanged between Phillis and her, that filled Sleuth with a consuming anxiety all through the rest of the scene.

The housekeeper's statement was to the effect that, being very much alarmed to hear shots fired, which seemed to her to come from her alderman's room, she had gone up, opened the door, and found him lying in an extraordinary posture—huddled all in a heap on the bed. He was quite dead, and there was a wound on his temple, which seemed to show a pistol-shot had killed him. She also found a piece of burnt wadding on the bed. This she produced, and it was what the police, who had received from Anthony and Sleuth.

The lawyer and one of the officers, who rose for that purpose, came to the table, and examined the pistols.

"This," said the lawyer, taking up the handsome double-barreled one, "was, I presume, the alderman's?"

"Yes, sir," said Sleuth, or, at least, he fancied he had said so; but the lawyer paused for no answer, he supposed his dry lips had failed him, and he had spoken inaudibly; so, the listening his eyes with his tongue, he tried, with a firmer voice, a second time to speak, and he did get out the words, then, "Yes, sir."

"I think, Mr. Sleuth," went on the lawyer, "you said the alderman, after you had left him, and in pursuit the robber, and gave you the pistol? What was the good of the pistol, if the other barrel was not fired?"

"Oh, but it was, sir."

"It was? Then how happened it to be empty now?"

Mr. Stamp looked inscrutable as he put the question; but Sleuth felt it in his marrow. He was not dismayed, however; anything but that.

Nothing cheers an undiscovered criminal in danger so much as to let him see he is supposed to have done something which it is easy to dis-prove. Though Mr. Stamp was touching so closely on the very heart of the mystery, Sleuth saw that he was doing so in a double mistake; first, that he (Sleuth) must have intended to suggest that one barrel only had been originally loaded, and that, second, the present empty condition of the barrel was likely to prove of some importance. So he said, with admirable calmness:

"I gave it to my cousin Anthony loaded, and he fired it off, in the housekeeper's presence, through the window, because she was timid of taking it as it was."

Of course both the housekeeper and Anthony affirmed this, and Mr. Stamp, if a moment's suspicion had crossed his thoughts, lost it altogether as he thanked Mr. Sleuth for his clear statement.

But before Sleuth had ventured to feel he had a right to use a certain passage of Scripture which would seem coming into his mind, in order to his own wish not to humbug himself at so critical a moment—the passage which says, "the bitterness of death is past"—the housekeeper broke out with the old feeling, by saying she wished to add a word or two more.

"It isn't worth mentioning, I dare say, gentlemen, but right is right, and if we are called on to speak, it is my belief as we ought to say all we know, and leave it to God, and to his minister of justice on earth, to set things straight between."

The housekeeper received a gracious nod as she here curtsied to the doctor.

How Sleuth's face—not daring to look directly at her—kept its pale expression, without any change, during this, was astonishing. With head shaggy bent, as listening, eyes rolling unconsciously, he still preserved, in all other respects, an attitude in no respects differing from that of a pause, went on:

"I am sure Mr. Anthony won't be angry with me for handling his word, for, of course, it's nothing to him—can't be—what I'm going to say; but still everything should be mentioned when one talks of the horrible doings of such a night. Well, I was, of course, very much frightened when I discovered the alderman dead, not by course of nature, but murder—and I hurried out, as fast as my poor old limbs would let me, into the dressing-room, and into the corridor; and just as I got there I heard some one go into the safe-room. But I wasn't in time to see who it was—but I thought it was Mr. Sleuth, and I called to him. But nobody answered, and when I got to the door it was locked. And I called again to Mr. Sleuth to tell him the alderman was murdered. And then, while I was wondering why I got no answer, I found the door gave way, and I went in, and I saw a man running towards the window, looking so like Mr. Anthony that I thought it was him, and that he was running after the prisoner; and I called him by his name—Mr. Anthony, but he didn't stop; and when I mentioned it to Mr. Anthony, he said he had never been in the safe-room at all, and he told me I had been dreaming. But right is right, and I say I saw some one that I thought was Mr. Anthony, and that's all I know about the matter."

"I assure you, my dear Mrs. Milton," said Anthony, "that, whoever you saw, it was not me. I came from the pursuit of the burglars right up the stairs, and, knowing my uncle's delicacy, and fearing he would be greatly excited by the affair, I turned neither to the right, to the safe-room, nor to any direction but to the left, which took me, as fast as I could go, to the place where I found my poor uncle lying dead, and where you and my cousin found me."

"Hem! hem! I really don't see what importance these trivial details can have," observed the doctor, and there was for the moment a general silence,

What would not Sleuth have given to be able just then to read the hearts of the lawyer, of those horrible-looking officers of justice, of the housekeeper; but, above all, of Phillis, whose behavior grew more and more inexplicable! Not once during this eventful time had she allowed him to get a full, and as it were, confidential look exchanged between them; and, as if to confirm what had been suggested, there was a strange self-absorption in her whole manner, as she sat apparently unconscious of those around her, in the overwhelming pre-occupation of some starting and terrible thought. Like flashes of searing lightning rushed through his brain a series of questions in short, abrupt sentences, whose fatal radiance seemed only to deepen the subsequent gloom.

"Was it she whom I heard outside the door? Did she see and reload the pistol? Did she see the paper in my hand which I destroyed? Did she find the coat, and then become sure of all? Is she watching now to speak, but hesitating?"

A moment after Sleuth said, with a wonderful smile on his face of gentle suggestion, that yet didn't at all feel sure the course proposed was right:

"Wouldn't it be well to go a little more regularly to the matter while we are about it—say from the beginning? Here's the hall to be gone into first warning, and seems to have been banging about the place all night."

The doctor approved the idea, and began; but as it proceeded Mr. Stamp noticed, without, however, attributing much importance to the matter, that Sleuth took the water-bottle from the table, held it up as if to be sure it was empty, and then quietly went out, as if to refill it. Phillis noticed it too, and instantly her face colored. She half rose, but sat down again, hesitatingly; then, with a whispered word to the housekeeper, went out too, but at a different door, saying to her relative, so as to be overheard:

"I must see to things for a few minutes; I'll be back directly."

Mr. Stamp noticed that incident also, and could not help connecting the two departures together and having odd fancies. But he was a man of sense and practical experience of life, and soon dismissed ideas that hardly accorded with either sense or experience, he thought. Then he listened to the examination of the vagrant.

Esau was engrossed by the contemplation of a fat, befrilled little boy, worked in coloured wools, on a fire-screen, and took no notice of the doctor's first summons; and the doctor, rapping on the table with the gold edge of his spectacles, said, more loudly:

"Do you hear, sir? You may step forward."

Esau started and looked round at the doctor, still not exactly understanding him. He rather thought he had received a hint to go, and looked dubiously towards the door, but not feeling sure where it might lead him, stared back again at the doctor.

"Hem!" exclaimed the doctor, leaning back in chair. "Is that boy deaf?"

"No I ain't," answered Esau, promptly, and with rising color.

"Then step forward!" said the doctor, with emphasis, and regarding him severely.

"Well, I'm ready, ain't I?" retorted Esau. "I don't want to stop, do I? I don't mind; I think some on yer might show me the way."

"Hem!" observed the doctor. "I don't like the look of this. Mr. Sleuth, once than we think of in that boy. I declare, he's trying to escape! Detain him, Mr. Stamp, detain him, if you please."

"Poor little fellow! he didn't understand," said Miss Pompess, crossing the room and laying her hand kindly on Esau's arm. "There now, look here; you've only got to stand at this table, and answer what my father says to you."

"And he tell me to hook it for 'em, then?" muttered Esau, more than ever shuffling his feet under the delicately gloved hand, "and then made out how when I was a goin'?"

The doctor stroked his double chin solemnly in his white cravat, looking at Esau all the time steadfastly, cleared his throat with a slow deliberation of consequence, as if no one every "then" was of more importance than any other person's brightest eloquence, adjusted his gold spectacles, and then, with the air that they were firm, brushed off a geranium petal that had fallen from the brilliant bouquet in his button-hole, laid one plump white hand on the table, laid the other plump white hand shortly over it, and said:

"Well, boy?"

Esau stared at him.

"Begin," said the doctor.

"What, sir?" asked Esau, simply.

"Give your evidence, sir."

"What's that, sir, when you please, sir?"

"Good gracious, what shocking ignorance!" exclaimed the doctor. "What parish do you belong to, my poor boy?"

"I don't belong to no parish?" answered Esau.

"What do you mean by that, sir?"

"I gets my own living, and never has a farthin' from no parish."

"Hem! There's something suspicious about this boy," said the doctor. "I shouldn't be at all surprised if he isn't connected in the robbery, after all. I shall question him closely. Do you observe, Mr. Stamp, how his color changes? Now, boy, look at me, and give your evidence."

Esau's face was, indeed, nearly crimson, and his bright eyes flashing angrily.

"I didn't help in the robbery," he answered, "come, now; and I don't see for what you're accusin' me—all 'cos that you're a arstin' me to give up—never a finger on 'em."

Esau turned his ragged empty pockets out before the doctor, and as he held them up conspicuously with his dirty fingers he happened to catch a glimpse of Anthony's face. Its whiteness, and something in their faces caused a mischievous twinkle to take the place of the angry flash in his eye.

"My poor boy," said the doctor, with benevolent patience, "this is truly shocking; but come, let us see if we cannot understand one another."

And the doctor expanded his chest and spoke loudly, with a sort of "Clarence in his voice and eye, as if saying—"Absurd as you may think it, I, Doctor John Pompess, am going to stoop and allow the little vagabond to understand me."

"Hem! What is your name, boy?"

"Esau, if you please, sir."

"Esau, eh? Well, Esau, what took you into the alderman's garden the other night?"

"Nothing, please, sir."

"Nothing?"

"No, sir; I clumb the wall."

"Well, yes, I understand. You climbed the wall. And now, what did you want there, Esau? What were you doing?"

"I was a lookin' after the thieves, sir," answered Esau, with an air of perfect innocence.

"Looking after the thieves!" repeated the doctor, glancing round triumphantly, as if to say, "You see, my clear questioning can penetrate even this dark soul, and draw some light from it."

"Very good, my boy—ve–ry good. Now just give your version of the story. Speak up, and don't be afraid. Come, now, tell me all about it."

"Yes, sir; then I give my account with him," said none on yer took no notice; and that's all, sir."

The doctor gazed around the room severely.

"The boy is giving important evidence now," he remarked to Mr. Stamp. "You hear; he gave warning twice, and nobody took any notice. It looks suspicious. I am very glad I questioned him myself—ve–ry glad. Well, my boy, try and be a little more minute, will you? There were two of the rascals, were there not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Can you describe them?"

"What, sir?"

"Can you tell me what they were like?"

"Not both on 'em, sir."

"Ha! Not both of them, eh? Well, one of them. Go on, my boy."

"The stout 'un, sir?"

"Yes, my boy—go on—don't be afraid. The stout one, you say, was like—was like—"

"You, sir,"

The doctor's double chin began to rise slowly over his collar, and the bouquet in his button-hole became agitated.

"Like—me?"

"Yes, sir."

"Me?"

"Yes, sir, if you please, sir."

The doctor glared at Esau, and Esau's unflinching, innocent, cunning eyes never moved from the doctor's face. Mr. Stamp sat grimly biting his nails; and, several of the servants were seized with a coughing fit, Anthony and Clarissa had turned their backs.

"Hem! Mr. Stamp," said the doctor, turning slowly round to the lawyer, "this boy is incorrigible. His dense and shocking ignorance and depravity render his evidence perfectly worthless. He will oblige me by withdrawing him."

Mr. Stamp being absorbed in one of the documents on the table, Esau remained standing where he was. The doctor left this, and tried to avoid looking at him; but somehow, as he took up a pen and tried the nib on his thumb-nail, his eyes were drawn, by some strange fascination, to Esau's, and his cheeks turned to find the little vagabond still looking at him.

"Did you hear me tell you you could go, sir?" he said, plunging the pen anywhere but into the ink.

"Where, sir, if you please?"

"Anywhere, sir!" thundered the doctor.

"Thank you, sir," answered Esau; and making a dive under the table, and under the doctor's august legs, went tumbling down the conservatory steps, and there stopped, to see what else was going to happen.

* * * * *

The very instant Phillis found herself outside the dining-room she began to walk fast, then to run, and then to fly, with almost supernatural speed, through passages, up flights of stairs, then through numerous rooms, up more stairs, till panting and breathless, she reached the door of her own bedroom, and there, just as she had expected, found Sleuth.

Whether he had been in and come out again, or was only just going in when interrupted by hearing her, she could not tell.

"Phillis——" he began.

But she swept past him into her own room, gave one rapid glance round, went to and touched the bell at the head of her bed, with a long, deep sigh, she strove to calm herself and speak to the miserable man outside.

"Phillis," he said, catching at her hand and holding it against her will, "what means this? At—at a time so trying for me—I mean, when I am looking for help, I shall lose all if you don't find this cursed codicil—how it is, Phillis, at such a time, you don't look at me, try and speak to me, or give me one comforting word?"

"Perhaps a comfortable look from Miss Pompess would do," retorted Phillis, with heightening color, that convinced Sleuth she was not entirely trying a part in her passion.

"Phillis, I mustn't stop. I must know what is passing below. What will they think if they learn of this encounter?"

"Yes, and here?" said Phillis, looking at the bedroom in a significant but by no means agreeable manner.

"I—I came here——"

"Thinking that I should follow you?" asked Phillis, with bitter irony.

"Phillis," cried Sleuth, stamping his foot with passion, "I have loved you—I want to love you still. If I ever get this wealth it shall be all poured into your lap. Phillis, shouldn't I mean to make me so angry by all sorts of—of fancies? I care not stay one moment longer. Phillis, are we friends? Will you be my wife—one person in the world to whom I might trust everything, who would never fail me, if—if only she knew how much I loved her, how passionately I loved her, and loved the very ground she walked on?"

"Richard, Richard, Richard!" But Phillis could not go on. A sort of hysterical laughter stopped her.

Phillis, darling, believe me—believe me! On my soul it is true! I never, in all my life, did or mean to anybody as to you now. I am very miserable—very, very!"

Phillis saw the tears starting to his eyes. It was too much. She suddenly clasped him in her arms, and kissed his forehead, saying:

"I believe you, Richard, you tell me falsely, or if you have done any—any wrong to-night."

"But I haven't! There! No more words. Let me get back now. I trust you, Phillis, in life or in death. Mind that."

And then Sleuth, still profoundly miserable that he had not learned what she knew (why knew anything)—had not got the codicil, if really it was in her possession—but satisfied he had silenced her, went back with the water-bottle replenished, and, having a sort of general observation as he went in, that all the water-bottles in the bedrooms had been drunk dry, and he had to get it where he could.

Meantime, in his thoughts, the first inquiry was, "Have they been at the cost again?" He was answered by the very first remark he heard, which was from the lawyer.

"Well, the young rapscallion's evidence is clear enough, I think, and there's any more to talk of, unless it be of that mysterious person in the coat. The housekeeper certainly saw some one, and thought at first it was Mr. Sleuth."

"Dear me! I think—really—really so it is! I wonder I never thought of it before," suddenly exclaimed Sleuth, his pale face growing quite radiant. "It's one of the burglars Mrs. Milton saw. To be sure it was! The man that came to the door of the dressing-room, the only one that we—that is, I and my poor dear uncle—saw, were —yes—wore a light smock frock, or something of that kind. I think it was a smock frock," repeated Sleuth, remembering he might have told Anthony or the housekeeper so. "But at such a time as the night, Mrs. Milton might easily fancy it was a light coat, like Mr. Anthony's. Besides, I wouldn't swear," said Sleuth, already familiarised in mind with things he knew he had to get through, "that it was a smock frock. Very probably it was a light loose coat after all, and so Mrs. Milton was right."

The lawyer looked grave. The two officers whispered to each other, in low, hoarse voices, so that Sleuth heard a part of what was said—"A good thing this!" The doctor hemmed two or three times. Suspicion was visibly stealing like a dense atmosphere round Sleuth, though no one said—perhaps no one could have said—what particular thing or deed it was that was pointed to. To his immense relief, Anthony now spoke with generous warmth.

"I can't, for the life of me, guess what all this means. But if it means that it is thought strange that somebody, at such a time, should go to the safe-room, I, for one, see no reason why Sleuth must have been the man disguised in my coat——"

"No, no!" interposed the lawyer.

"Oh, you don't mean that?" said Anthony, "I was going to show you he couldn't very well manage that. Well, I don't care what you or anybody mean, for I know I mean no more to say that either I or Dick Sleuth went to the safe-room with any unworthy motives. I say, I or Dick Sleuth. But, whether he did or not, if anybody is really to be believed, I think it is myself. For I know I have such a coat, but my cousin hasn't—at least, I presume so—have you, Dick?"

Could Anthony have known how awful the question was, without knowing why it was so, he would have hesitated to have put it in such an assembly. Every mouth there feared to open, every face appear, and be identified with him; but he did not seemingly hesitate a moment to answer:

"No, Anthony, I have no coat of the kind, as everybody here knows, said Sleuth, with a quiet smile.

"I must say," observed the housekeeper, "I have never seen Mr. Sleuth, during all the months he has been in the house, wearing anything of the kind."

"Of course," said Anthony, "it was—must have been—the burglar. Don't you think so, Mrs. Milton?"

That obstinate-minded old lady shook her head.

"For my part," said the lawyer, after a pause, "I should say that there would not be a doubt left on the matter—I don't see how it can be—for the unfortunate—the very unfortunate—circumstance that Mr. Sleuth alone can speak to this particular burglar's dress, and is ready to identify the man seen by Mrs. Milton. I suppose, Mr. Sleuth, you did not see anything of the light frock or coat on one of the men in your pursuit?"

Anthony looked embarrassed for the moment, but smiled, as if with unbroken confidence, then said:

"On the contrary. I believe I must say I did get glimpses of both the men—or at least I fancy so—because one was a little shorter than the other, and both were in dark dresses."

This was, or seemed to be fearful. But Sleuth smiled in his soul, for here he was right; the man had worn a dirty-looking smock frock of some kind. So securing his opportunity—and, in truth, that fact would hereafter be made clear—he fastened upon it, and refusing to see danger in anything else just for the moment, he said:

"Dr. Pompess, be so good as to hear me repeat that I am positive the burglar that—that shot and killed my uncle—that the burglar wore, I think a smock frock, or long shabby over-coat, of a similar color to Anthony's. I was too much excited, as you may suppose, to form a distinct idea about the man's dress. Besides, I saw him only for an instant. Then the alderman fired; and then the—the—the smock frock—coat, or no coat, he stood for not so much smoke, I couldn't see any more. And how to get to the window to run after him without feeling my way to the door. That's the truth!"

"THAT'S THE TRUTH! I say," repeated Anthony, "because Dick Sleuth says it, and because I believe he's a man of a thousand when it comes to the push, as I did to him last night when he sent for me to hasten my coming."

Whatever the audience generally thought of Anthony's declaration, they did not seem to satisfy the officers, who came to Mr. Stamp and said something in a low voice to him as to "clearing the premises," and then began quietly hunting for the burglars." Mr. Stamp listened, with much uncomfortable, and then they all three talked in low tones together, and then suddenly light broke from an unexpected quarter.

Apparently Esau had been paying no attention to the scene since he had got over his own part in it; and Clarissa, who had watched the little vagabond's audacity in looking at her and smiling, as if to say, "I like your face!" had called him to her side, and, with her back to her elder sister, listened—with only imperfect interest, till Anthony was cleared by his generous interpretation; then, perceiving by the importance of the scene that he said to her dirty-faced but bright-eyed companion:

"I say, you shall know some day what a man running in and out of the house in a light frock—who wasn't a burglar. Or whether one of the rogues really did wear a light coat or smock frock?"

"Don't I, though?"

In an instant Clarissa said to her father:

"Papa, this wonderful boy says he can tell you——"

Esau waited for no more explanations from such an ignoramus. "Stand out o' the road, can't yer?" he shouted to her. Then striding into the centre, he said to the doctor—for Sleuth was shocked for him everybody present, in his portly person and magisterial importance:

"Here, kim along, all on yer!"

And away he went, instantly followed by everybody but the doctor, who, seeing the move, and to himself, as if in difficulty, "Of course the court can adjourn for the moment to the open air?" and then walked after them, almost with a blush on his face at the absurdity of the young vagabond's behavior to him.

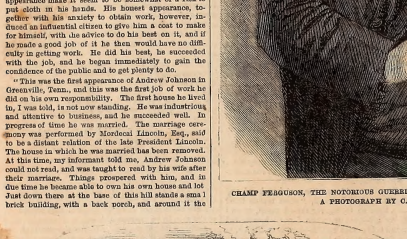
As to Sleuth, he felt as a man who goes forth in the full ardor a fearful storm, looks up, cries "Clear at last!" and that instant feels his very brain crushed by a thunder-clap—instantaneous and terrific.

ANDY JOHNSON.

His Workshop and his Homes

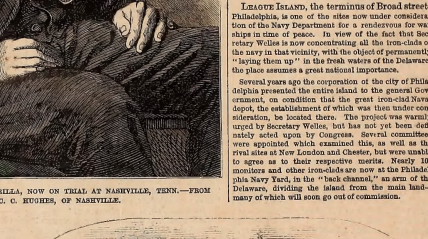
AMERICA has been fortunate in the various crises through which every great nation must pass in its way to supreme dominion, for that our republic is doomed to be the dominant empire of the approaching era, is apparent to all, even to those to whom the fact is most unwelcome.

Every fact connected with the life of President Andrew Johnson indicates the training he has undergone to fulfil his great mission. From infancy to boyhood, and from boyhood to manhood, we find the same stead, progress, and the same hardy strengthening of his moral and mental system. What a man was in the past cannot fail to be interesting to all, and we present several illustrations of the present ruler of our great Republic.



Greenville is a village in East Tennessee, and contains about 1,000 inhabitants. It consists of four squares, with streets running through at right angles. A recent visitor says:

"Greenville is especially noted and honored as being the home of Andrew Johnson, present President of the United States. This renders the village interesting to all, and everything connected with Andrew Johnson's residence in it is of the deepest interest to the American people. Many years ago, on a certain evening, a rude, black-headed, black-eyed, good-looking boy, said my informant, drove into town with a poor old horse in a little one-horse vehicle, in which he had his mother and a few household things. They succeeded in securing an humble habitation by rent. This secured, the next object was to secure labor by which to live. He began to inquire for tailoring to do. His youthful appearance make it seem to be somewhat of a risk to put cloth in his hands. His honest appearance, together with his anxiety to obtain work, however, induced an influential citizen to give him a coat to make for himself, with the advice to do his best on it, and if he made a good job of it he then would have no difficulty in getting work. He did his best, he succeeded with the job, and he began immediately to gain the confidence of the public and to get plenty to do.



"This was the first appearance of Andrew Johnson in Greenville, Tenn., and this was the first job of work he did on his own responsibility. The first house he lived in, I was told, is not now standing. He was industrious and attentive to business, and he succeeded well. In progress of time he was married. The marriage ceremony was performed by Mordecai Lincoln, Esq., said to be a distant relation of the late President Lincoln. The house in which he was married has been removed. At this time, my informant told me, Andrew Johnson could not read, and was taught to read by his wife after their marriage. Things prospered with him, and in due time he became able to own his own house and lot. Just down there at the base of this hill stands a small brick building, with a back porch, and around it the CHAMP FERGUSON, THE NOTORIOUS GUERRILLA, NOW ON TRIAL AT NASHVILLE, TENN.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY C. C. HUGHES, OF NASHVILLE.

THE FIRST HOUSE EVER OWNED BY PRESIDENT JOHNSON, AT GREENVILLE, EAST TENNESSEE. FROM AN AMBROTYPE BY MARSH & REIFF, OF GREENVILLE, EAST TENN.

THE RESIDENCE OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON, AT GREENVILLE, EAST TENNESSEE.—FROM AN AMBROTYPE BY MARSH & REIFF, OF GREENVILLE, EAST TENN.

ANDREW JOHNSON'S TAILOR SHOP, AT EAST GREENVILLE, EAST TENN.

grocery fixture. It stands on the corner of the square, near where the mill race passes under the street, on its way down to the little mill.

"That is the first house ever Andrew Johnson owned. It now belongs to another person. But down there about due west from where I am, and almost directly opposite the old mill, whose large wheel is still moving, is the house which is scarcely perceptible, a rather old-fashioned looking, two-story brick house, standing near the south end of Main street. It has but one entrance from the street. In front of it stands three or four small shade trees. The fences of the lot and windows of the house show evident signs of dilapidation, and the consequence of rebellion and rebel rule. Like many other windows of the South, a number of panes of glass are broken out and their places supplied with paper. Glass could not be obtained in the Confederacy.

"As you pass along the pavement on Main street, by looking into the lot you see several young apple trees, and in the spaces between them are potatoes growing. In the rear of the kitchen stands a small aspen shade-tree, and down there in the lower end of the lot is a grapevine, trained upon a trellis, forming a pleasant bower. Scattered over the lot are a number of rose, currant and gooseberry bushes. At the lower end of the lot and just outside stand two large weeping willows, and under their shade is a very beautiful spring. This is the residence of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States."

Up the street stands his old tailor shop, which the correspondent of the N. Y. Herald thus describes:

"The place where the famous knight of the scissors held forth was the next thing that attracted my curiosity, and so I went also to see that. 'A Johnson, Tailor,' painted in crude letters, en invitation of the original, said Eureka to me, and I stepped before the magic symbols, gazing intently on the little eight by ten frame building. It was plebeian in the extreme, built very much on the style of a farmer's smokehouse, of rough weather boarding, whitewashed. On either end the boards are torn off in places, and the chimney is crumbling to decay. An old negro, raised by President Johnson, and assuming his name, is the sole occupant of the building, and he is the successor in business of 'A Johnson, Tailor.' He says: 'Mass Johnson been in de trade de bow tailor in dese diggins.' President Johnson's first public office was Mayor of Greenville. I next visited the place where John Morgan was shot, which is a garden in the rear of Gen. Crufts's headquarters, in the centre of the city. It is now full of evergreens, fruit and vegetables, and an old gray-headed negro pulled aside the corn to show me where the noted guerrilla fell. He was making great endeavors to gain the house when a ball from the carbine of a soldier sent him to his 'last ditch.'"

LEAGUE ISLAND.

LEAGUE ISLAND, the terminus of Broad street, Philadelphia, is one of the sites now under consideration of the Navy Department for a rendezvous for war ships in time of peace. In view of the fact that Secretary Welles is now concentrating all the iron-clads of the navy in that vicinity, with the object of permanently "laying them up" in the fresh waters of the Delaware, the place assumes a great national importance.

Several years ago the corporation of the city of Philadelphia presented the entire island to the general Government, on condition that the great iron-clad Naval depot, the establishment of which was then under consideration, be located there. The project was warmly urged by Secretary Welles, but has not yet been definately acted upon by Congress. Several committees were appointed which examined this, as well as the rival sites at New London and Chester, but were unable to agree as to their respective merits. Nearly 100 monitors and other iron-clads are now at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, in the "back channel," an arm of the Delaware, dividing the island from the main land—many of which will soon go out of commission.

The law of youth is expansion: the youth is but a series of irregularly developing forces; manhood with experienced intellect and the discipline of life, establishes a meridional equilibrium. Each age has its passion; love of food reigns from infancy to puberty, amativeness from 20 to 30, ambition from 30 to 50. After that appears avarice, heaping up money on the brink of the grave, and thus giving the last stroke to the farce of life. Where is there any poetry in life, except in childhood, or courtship, or maternity; and does not reality soon shadow its paradisiacal light? Fame—what benefit is it to have a million applauding, rather the reverse, as it tends to check achievement, or cause it to run into weakening excess; while, after death, it is but a perfume blown across a grave. Man is the slave of passion, the fool of reason, the victim of death, but his vanity carries him buoyantly on from the cradle to the winding-sheet. Mean smile at what their acquaintances say and do under the influence of that motive, but the most ridiculous thing in the world is to see one man laughing at the vanity of another. Yet, though to the observer the most ridiculous of passions, man should be thankful for it, as the pleasurable counterpoise given him by God as a reward for his sufferings and labors.

CHARLES HERRMANN,

(The Prestidigitateur.

THIS celebrated necromancer was born in Hanover, in 1821, and is one of a family of seventeen children. His father, who was a man of considerable ability, was a proficient in parlor magic and legerdemain, and, when the subject of our memoir was quite a child, removed to Paris, where he supported himself by giving private entertainments in which his son Charles assisted. On one occasion, while performing at M. Carnot's academy, at Versailles, that gentleman was so much struck with the intelligence, beauty and vivacity of the juvenile artist, that he offered to admit him, free of charge, among his pupils, an offer which was promptly accepted by his parents. Here the young Herrmann remained two years, making wonderful progress in all his studies, but still retaining his boyish devotion to the paternal art. It was while at this academy that, happening to wander, with some of his fellow scholars, into the forest of Fontainbleau, he ascended a tree and commenced some of those bird warblings for which he is so remarkable. The family of Louis Philippe, happening to pass beneath the tree, were astonished to hear such beautiful sounds, but still more astonished when the bird itself, in the shape of young Herrmann, came tumbling from the tree into the midst of them. This led to an invitation from the royal party to visit them a few days after. After several years practice in Paris, the great Prestidigitateur commenced his grand tour by crossing over to England, where he gave over 400 entertainments, to immense audiences, in London, Dublin, Edinburgh, and, indeed, in all the principal cities of the United Kingdom. In 1850 he revisited his fatherland, where his success was almost magical. After visiting the principal German States he went to Italy, where the usual flattering reception awaited him. After another visit to Germany he went to St. Petersburg, where he remained a year, receiving many distinguishing marks of public approbation, among others, the Emperor Nicholas presented him with a costly gold repeater. Warsaw was next visited, and then Copenhagen and the Hague, after which he performed before Leopold in Brussels. Lisbon and Madrid were next visited by the enterprising magician. In the latter place he presented the proceeds of several exhibitions, 60,000 francs, for the benefit of the Spanish soldiers wounded in the war against Morocco.

From 1859 to 1865 Herrmann has visited Cuba, Brazil, Buenos Ayres, Monte Video, the United States, Turkey, Asia Minor, Egypt, England, and other places. The Sultan of Turkey was so much pleased that he conferred upon him the unusual honor of the Order of Merit

In Havana he was presented, by the editors of that city, with a costly baton of solid gold.

Four years ago he made his debut at the Academy of Music, and the reception he met with was most flattering. He is now performing at the Academy of Music his farewell engagement, which there is every prospect of being brilliantly successful.

At the conclusion of his present engagement in this country, Professor Herrmann intends visiting some portions of Eastern Asia, including the Celestial Empire, he then intends returning to Europe, where he will take a final leave of the profession to which he owes his fame and fortune. We have not space to enumerate the various marks of public favor which he has received from crowned heads. Wherever he has traveled he has reaped a rich harvest of golden opinions, as well as dollars.

PROFESSOR HERRMANN, THE PRESTIDIGITATEUR, NOW PERFORMING AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, N. Y.

CHAMP FERGUSON.

THIS noted guerilla, the Mosby of the West, is now on trial in Nashville, Tenn., for the many horrible atrocities perpetrated by him during the war. It was this man who publicly boasted that he had, with his own hands, put to death 100 Union prisoners.

Champ Ferguson appears to be about 40 years of age, or upwards. He stands erect, is fully six feet high, and weighs about 200lb. He is built solid, and is evidently a man of great muscular strength. He has a full, round face, which is bright and intelligent looking. His large black eyes fairly glitter, and almost look through a person. His face is covered with a stiff black beard. His hair is jet black, very thick, and cut rather short. He brushes it back from his fine high forehead. He is certainly a very intelligent looking man, and nothing vicious is portrayed in his face. His countenance is, on the contrary, pleasing, and one would readily take him for an honest farmer as he appears. His face is reglining to reveal the footprints of age, and wrinkles can be traced on his forehead and under his eyes. He dresses in shabby style. A pair of coarse grey homespun pants, and a faded gray rebel uniform coat, over which he wears a very old and greasy black heavy cloth coat, a coarse factory shirt, and a faded black slouch hat, with good heavy boots, completes his attire. His voice is firm, and it is evident that he is a man of iron nerve.

IF brooks are, as poets call them, the most joyous things in nature, what are they always "murmuring" about?

SIDON AND TYRE.

No description can do justice to the squalor and filth of the streets of Sidon on a wet day. All of them are more than half arched over, and very dark—so narrow that two asses cannot pass—with a gutter a foot deep running down the centre. Where not arched, a rotten screen of sticks, overlaid here and there with pieces of ragged matting and wattle, adds to the deplorable appearance of the place. Coppersmiths seemed the most thriving, as well as the noisest of the artisans, while, like every one else, they sat in their open shops, hammering away on the ground. We turned up a blind entry, and then mounted a flight of steps in the corner, at the top of which a door ajar led to a courtyard, clean and tidy, on the roof of the dungeons below. * * *

The port, when compared with the harbors of classic Greece, must have been a spacious one, and was perhaps enlarged by an artificial mole, of which, though not noticed by any writer, we thought we could descry the traces. In many places the old roof has been quarried out till the sea makes a clean breach into the harbor, but this has probably been the work of later times. The jagged, fretted rocks in the sea are full of carved doorways, huge stones of old arches, with many of the holes still visible where the stanchions of gates had been fitted, and strewn with masses of undecipherable masonry. We were struck by the Cyclopean character of the work—immense stones let in to form the edges of the ancient quays, by the sides of which, among and on these ancient rocks, must have been the warehouses of Sidon. The massy of broken columns on all sides form a breastwork against the action of the sea below; but these remains are so perforated and honeycombed by the water and by the boring shells (pholades) that it is impossible to make out their style. Time, man, and, above all, the incessant dashing of the waves, have so honeycombed rocks, stonework and columns alike, that no clear plan of the style of building can be ascertained. Such is the harbor of Sidon, the cradle of the world's commerce, the mother of Tyre.

Sidon in the rain is wretched enough, but what is that to Tyre in the dry? The filth and squalor of the little city surpass even that of a Tunisian town. Scanty bazaars, about five feet wide, wattled over at intervals by decayed sticks and palm leaves; the street never less than ankle—often a foot—deep in putrid mud; dilapidated, windowless hovels, raised among huge fragments of polished granite and porphyry columns, prostrate in rubbish—such is modern Tyre. Through these we picked our steps to the shore, where a few fishing-boats form the navy of her "whose merchants were princes." We ascended to the highest part of the promontory, and from the ruined walls looked down on the wondrous fulfillment of prophecy. For half a mile the sea flows to the depth of a foot or two over flat rocks, covered by one mass of broken columns, leaning or prostrate in bewildering confusion, as if pitched pell-mell into the water. This is literally Tyre; "the waters have covered her." She is "a place for fishermen to spread their nets on."—Tristram's Palestine.

DURING the prevalence of the cholera in India a soldier had been carried to the deadhouse who had only swooned, and on recovering himself was naturally very anxious to get away from the unpleasant companions with whom he had been lodged. There was a sepoy sentry near the door, and on his supposed distinct hearing against it with all his might, in desperate anxiety to get out, the sepoy, nowise disturbed at this unusual incident, challenged in due form, and demanded, "Who comes there?" The clamor for liberation being renewed, the sepoy, no doubt imagining that it was an unruly ghost who wanted his body buried before the regular time, replied: "There are no orders for opening the door; and besides, your box (coffin) has not yet come."

RELICS OF THE KING OF POTTERS.—A most remarkable and unexpected discovery has just been made under the gallery of the Louvre, in the Place du Carrousel, where it is being rebuilt. It is one of the events in which Bernard de Palissy baked his chef d'œuvre. Several models of faces, plants, animals, &c., have been dug up in an excellent state of preservation, and also some fragments of plates, &c., bearing the well-known stamp of their maker. Some of the models represents the bust of a kind of monster, whose eyes, cheeks, lips, &c., are all turned of shells. Now in an autograph MS. of Bernard, discovered at La Rochelle a few years back, mention is made of a formal proposal of his to build a grotto for Catherine de Medicis in which was to be adorned with fantastic figures. It was here, therefore, that Maitre Bernard des Rustiques is said to be called on the cover of a copy of his admirable book, dated 1563, and preserved in the Imperial Library, lived and worked before he was cast in 1590 into the Bastile on account of his religious opinions. After having miraculously escaped the massacre of St. Bartholomew's eve. According to the Abbe Le Beuf, his contemporary, he died in misery in that fat-famed cut made witness of the crimes of the French Monarchy.

LEAGUE ISLAND, AT THE TERMINUS OF BROAD STREET, PHILADELPHIA, PENN.—FROM A SKETCH BY F. H. SCHELL.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

EVERY man wishes to have his own individual farm or lot; but the graveyard is the common lot.

MEN often attempt, by the light of reason, to discover the mysteries of love. They might as well hold up a candle to see the stars.

ALL should marry. Every I should have a second I. We pity a person with only one eye. He can see but half the things going on in the world.

IN a certain parish on the Borders, not long since, an old curate, who had a very scrupulous helper, observed that one of his hearers was becoming rather irregular in his attendance at church. Of course the divine felt it his duty to visit the backslider, and accordingly on the next occasion, but the gudeman was not in. He inquired of the old wife why John was so often absent from kirk.

"Oh!" she said, without the least hesitation, "I think you may ha'e got roses see loud that John canna be spared to gang to the kirk he did when preaching perted, see peaceably."

MAN travels to expend his ideas; but woman, judging from the number of boxes she invariably takes with her, travels only with the object of expanding her dresses.

THAT miser, old Moneybags, who has lately joined the army, has got into great disgrace, when commanded by the corporal to "charge!" he positively refusing to do so unless he was guaranteed his own rate of interest.

A LADY on one occasion traveling in a railway carriage, was much annoyed by a Cockney companion constantly introducing his conversation with "this 'ere," and "that 'ere." A few minutes afterwards, she quietly requested him to close the window, remarking: "That 'ere is affected by bad air."

THE following is a specimen of Western eloquence:

"Where in Europe, compared with America? Nowhar! Where is Anglum? Nowhar! They call England the mistress of the sea, but what makes the sea? The Mississippi makes it, and all we've got to do is to turn the Mississippi into the Mammoth Cave, and the English navy will be floundering in the mud!"

A YOUNG lady who let her lids drop on being spoken to tenderly by a young gentleman is anxious to recover them, and offers a handsome reward for their restoration. An acknowledgment of her acquaintance assures her that they could not have been propped behind or they would not have been lost.

SUPPOSING the ornithological emblem of the United States to be a crow, sick, would it be contrary to law?

Because it would be ill eagle (illegal).

"STEER, your heart," said a considerate father to his son, "for you are going now among some fascinating girls."

"I would much rather steal theirs," says the unpromising young man.

OUR youthful joker tells us that a Miss Buchanan once rallying her cousin, an officer, on his courage, to which he replied:

"Now, Mr. Harry, do you really mean to tell me you can value a man's merit without knowing?"

"Yes," was the prompt reply, "or a Buchanan's either." And so it is.

THE man who "carries everything before him." The waiter.

HAIR that ought to flow in natural waves.—The locks of a waterfall.

"I've heard, captain, "said an English traveler to the captain of a steamer, running on the Upper Mississippi, "that your Western steamboats can run in very small, shallow waters, in fact, the water is not more than two or three feet deep?"

"Two or three feet deep," exclaimed the captain, in tones of withering contempt; "why, we wouldn't give a — for a boat that couldn't run on the sweat of a water-pitcher!"

A MAN coming home one night rather late, a little more than he had ought to, "sawing liberty, procured a glass of water and drank it, in doing so he swallowed a small bee, which had fallen into the bottom of the tumbler, the end of the thread catching in his teeth. Feeling something in his mouth, and not knowing what it was, he began to pull at the end, and the little ball unwinding, he drew out a thread of three or four yards in hand, and still no end, apparently. Terrified, he shouted at the top of his voice:

"Wife! wife! I say, wife, come here! I am all unraveling."

A VERY loquacious lady offered to bet her husband $50 she would not speak a word for a week.

"Done," said the delighted husband, instantly putting down the money, which the lady as soon took up and put in her pocket, observing, naively, that she would secure it before she lost her tongue.

"Why," said her husband, "I've won it already," and required her to first owe.

"Not at all," said the lady, "you are mistaken in the time—I mean from after I am buried."

The lady went shopping the same afternoon.

TAKING UP INDIFFERENT HUSBANDS.—A little man seeking for a husband has long beautiful hands took up with but indifferent husbands, after many fine offers, was thus aptly answered by a country maiden: A young friend of hers, during a walk, requested her to go into a neighboring orchard, and there get him the handsomest reed; she must get it at once going through, without pausing. She went and coming, brought him a poor reed. When he asked if that was the handsomest one she saw, she said, "No," replied she "I saw many finer as I went along, but I kept on, in hopes of finding one nearer, until I had gotten nearly through them, and then was obliged to select the best that was left."

A PROMPT REPLY.—On a Sabbath evening very recently, a minister from a distance was officiating in a well-known church in Belfast. A stranger, who had gone in with the crowd, and who sat near the preacher, appeared not to be captivated by his eloquence, for he frequently pulled out his watch as if measuring the time for his departure. Just as he was in the act of examining his watch for the fourth or fifth time, the pastor, with great earnestness, was urging the truth upon the consciences of his hearers. "Young man," said he, "how is it with you?" whereupon the young man with the gold repeater bawled out, in hearing of nearly the whole congregation, "It's a quarter to eight." As may be supposed, the gravity of the assembly was very much disturbed for a time.

LAW.

An upper mill and a lower mill
Fell out about their water;
To war they went—that is, to law,
Resolving to give no quarter.

A lawyer was by each engaged,
And both were wounded,
When fees grew slack, the war they waged
They judged were better ended.

The heavy costs remaining still,
Were settled with a lottery;
One lawyer took the upper mill,
The lower mill the other.

THIN SHOES.—Caligula once wished that the Romans had but one head, that he might strike it off at a blow. And we the power of striking, we would accept it in a way more beneficial to mankind, or rather womankind. We would forbid, under a heavy penalty, any female appearing out of doors in thin shoes. Such is the influence of fashion, that for the sake of having, or appearing to have, a small foot, a lady will promenade the streets with her feet encased in shoes pervious to ice, snow, and water, and her own feet barely covered with stout thinner than paper. No wonder that consumption is the 1st, the untimely list, of so many of the female, fair, beautiful, and accomplished of the fair; no wonder that, chill so lightly, they are unable to withstand the inclemencies of our climate, and that the most obsolutest constitutions are not proof. Nature clothes the feet of her children, male and female, in stockings, but not dresses our ladies on a system diametrically opposite. Hence, as we have already remarked, the ravages of mortality, and see how many of their number are the victims of fashion, they would be startled, if not astonished, by the fact.

JOSEPH'S WELL.—My next journey was from Damascus through the mountains of Arabia Petrea and Mount Sinai to Cairo. This route is more frequented to the usual one by Jerusalem and Ghaza, that I might see the Wells of Jacob and Joseph, and the Lake of Sodom and Red Sea. Near Seafad is shown the well into which Joseph was let down by his brethren; it is in a small courtyard by the side of the Khan, is about forty feet in diameter, and is cut through the rock. I was told that the bottom is hewn in the rock; its sides were well lined with masonry as far as I could see into it, and the water never dries up, a circumstance which makes it difficult to believe that this was the pit into which Joseph was thrown. The whole of the mountain in the vicinity is covered with figures of shepherd stone, but the main body of the rock is calcareous. The people here relate that the tears of Jacob dropping upon the ground while he was in search of his son, caused the white stones black, and they in consequence call these stones drops of tears. The well is held in veneration by Turks as well as Christians; the former have erected a small chapel just by it, and consequently seldom pass here without saying a few prayers in honor of Yakeed.

TIME.—Time is the most undefinable, yet paradoxical of things; the past is gone, the future is to come, and the impression the past even strives to make we attempt to define it; and, like the flesh of the lightning, all dread, flees before it. Time is the measure of all things, but is in itself unmeasurable; and the measure of all things, but is itself unmeasured. Like space, it is incomprehensible, because it has no limits; and like space, it is nothing of a fact. It is more obscure in its source than the Nile, and in its testimony than Delphic oracle. It is known by the terrestrial, but retreats like the swiftest torrent. It gives wings of lightning to the moments, but is said to pass and lends expectation a curb, but enjoyment a spur. It robs beauty of her youth, to bestow upon her that picture, and builds a monument to merit, but denies it a house. It is the friend of truth and the fathomer of falsehood, but the trial and final friend of error. It gives to every opportunity with it, and reproaches him behind it; he that holds it is the wisest, but will have little to fear from his enemies; but he that hath made it his enemy will have to help Zeus to help himself.

THE POWER OF THE HEART.—Let any one, while sitting down, place the left leg over the knee of the right, and with the right hand, in a fairly strong, abundant, all muscular control over it. Speedily it may be observed to become unsteady, and to move about in little space at regular intervals. Counting the number of beats, it will be found to be seventy-two in a minute. I agree exactly with the leadings of the pulse. Every one is aware that, at a fire, when the steam in the engine is forced through bent tube, the tendency is to straighten the bent, and if the bend be a sharp one, considerable force is necessary to overcome the tendency. Just so it is in the case of the human body. The arteries are but a system of hose through which the blood is forced by the heart. They also belong to it, all the muscles which it at bent too, and every time the heart contracts, the blood is driven through the arteries which are straighted them; and it is the effort which produces the motion of the leg referred to without much ocular demonstration, quite sufficient to convince the sceptical by that circuitous mechanism, the normal pulsations of which are never perceived, the pulse value we give them.

SOAP SUDS FOR GARDENS.—Soap suds, although generally deemed only fit for being run off into the cesspool, may be used in a variety of advantageous manner possible, are nevertheless highly beneficial and economical. Soap suds are excellent insecticides. Hence they should never be wasted, more especially in the garden, where they may be applied with advantage without much ocular demonstration, quite sufficient to convince the sceptical by that circuitous mechanism, the normal pulsations of which are never perceived, the pulse value we give them.

SOAP SUDS FOR GARDENS.—Soap suds, although generally deemed only fit for being run off into the cesspool, may be used in a variety of advantageous manner possible, are nevertheless highly beneficial and economical. Soap suds are excellent insecticides. Hence they should never be wasted, more especially in the garden, where they may be applied with advantage without much ocular demonstration, quite sufficient to convince the sceptical by that circuitous mechanism, the normal pulsations of which are never perceived, the pulse value we give them.

GLANCES.—Perhaps the short hasty gazes cast by day in the crowded thoroughfare in a dense city at the heavens, or a bit of tree seen amid the buildings of the suburbs, are more effective than the long look—have in it more of intense appreciation of the beauties of Nature than the long look. Such gazes will be equal number of sight-seers enjoying large opportunities of sight-seeing. We give a "Watch Free to each Agent. Send 25 cents for one Certificate and our Special Terms of Premium. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,
P. O. Box 4770, New York.

METROPOLITAN ENTERPRISE

GREAT GIFT SALE

OF THE

New York & Providence JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.

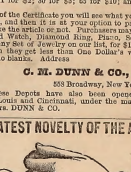
Capital--$1,000,000!

Depot, 558 Broadway.

An immense stock of Pianos, Watches, Jewelry and Fancy Goods, all to be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you see what you will receive.

CERTIFICATES,

Naming each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents—3 for 50 cents; 7 for $1; 14 for $2; 30 for $5; 65 for $10; and 100 for $15.



On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then if you like you have option to pay the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, Sewing Machine, or any Set or Jewelry on our list, for $1; and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks.

Address

C. M. DUNN & CO.,
Box 5643, New York.

☞ Immense Depots have also been opened in Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati, under the management of Messrs. DUNN & CO.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE

THE POCKET SEWING MACHINE

Specially adapted for Quilting, Embroidering and Braiding.

EASILY USED—BEING HELD IN THE hand, and traverses the material to be quilted or sewed at the rate of 1,200 stitches per minute, and gives entire satisfaction. Follows any design stamped on the cloth. Sent by Mail, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $5.

STATE RIGHTS FOR SALE.

Address, A. S. GILCHRIST, Secretary
Pocket Sewing Machine Company,
17 Wall Street, New York.

GREAT SALE

OF

Watches and Jewelry,

BY

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,

(Agents for the Manufacturers),

No. 36 Beekman Street, N. Y.

$1,000,000 Worth

OF

WATCHES and JEWELRY,

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, but to be paid for until you know what you are to receive.

100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches.....each $30 to 50
500 Silver Watches.....each $20 to 30
10,000 Gold Pens and Pencils.....each 5 to 8

And a large assortment of Jewelry of every description for ladies' and gents' wear, varying in value from $3 to $20 each. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

Certificates naming each article and its value are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents—3 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 100 for $15.

RETURNED SOLDIERS

and all others who wish to make money easily, can do so, by acting as Agents for us. We give a WATCH FREE to each Agent. Send 25 cents for one Certificate and our Special Terms of Premium. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,
P. O. Box 4770, New York.

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Feet, &c., besides being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE removes hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body easily and without injury to the skin. GOURAUD'S ROUGE for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The genuine of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them for the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Callender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co., Boston; Johnson, Holbrook & Co., Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$8 IMPORTED $10 WATCH.

Fine European Watches, direct from our own manufactory, Serviceable, Correct and Warranted, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

AN ELEGANT WATCH in Fine Gold-Plated, Double Case, Richly Engraved, English Full Plate Jeweled Movements, adjusted Regulator, Jubilee and Hunters Cases, Fine Enameled White Dial and Fancy Hands, Stem Winder, Stem Set, with Key, Case, Chain and Five Vest Chains, with beautiful Gold Locket, Guard and Five Vest Chains, with Diamond Cut Dials, all complete. Sent to any part of the country free, for only $10.

A SPLENDID SILVER WATCH, Serviceable Pattern, Small Size, in Heavy Solid Double Cases, with Key, Case, Chain, Gold Locket, &c., sent free for only $8.

The Great Imperial Watch, containing a Rare and Wonderful Combination of Mechanism, Useful and Ornamental, correct working Thermometer, an accurately adjusted Compass, Compact Silver Case, Chain and Locket, and a Reliable Calendar, indicating day of month, week, etc., rendering it a Watch a value to the Solid Silver Patent Lever Cases, with Chain and Locket, sent free for only $20.

Just Published.

FUN! FUN!!

The LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JEFFERSON DAVIS, price 25 cents. Sent by mail. Address C. A. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 321-24

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Sore

LEGS, Sore Throats, Bad Colds, Coughs, Cancers, and Wounds of whatever character, gradually yield to a course of these medicines. All sores are for a time the safety-valves of the constitution, and should be slowly healed by the ointment with the aid of the pills. Sold everywhere.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 Photographs of Actors for 25 cents; 100 Photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y. 321-26

TO DEALERS.

Use PERRY'S Moth & Freckle Lotion, which is prompt, safe and reliable. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all Druggists. Price $2 a bottle. Send for Circular 50 cts. Young Man 50 cts.

For 50 cents I will send, sealed and prepaid, the FRENCH COMPOUND, highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair on a smooth face in five weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Address E. R. HOBBS, Drawer 126, Albany, N. Y.

Every Man his own Printer.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Newspaper size, $10, $16, $26 and $50. Price of an Office, with Press, $16, $20, $40, $48 and $75. All Type, Cards, &c., for the LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 23 Water street, Boston. tf

$25 A Day.—Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address SILVER & LAKE,
321-33 Biddeford, Maine.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample (by mail), Photographic Cards (52 views), $1.25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1.50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price. Address FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y. tf

CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without tying. Sent by mail for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 321-33

THOSE HANDSOME FAIRY ALBUMS

For holding 40 Pictures.....price, postpaid.....$1 25
For holding 80 Pictures.....price, postpaid.....$1 50
Agents, Booksellers, Stationers, Peddlers and trade list. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for catalogues. 321-33

Agents WANTED Agents WANTED

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 321-33

Booksellers, Stationers,

And General Dealers, send for our great Catalogue of Fairy Albums, &c. HILTON & CO., 139 Nassau street, New York. 321-32

The West Indian Hair Curler, warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair in five minutes. Also short ringlets or waving massive curls. Sent to any address on receipt of 25. Address THE HENDERTON HAIR CURLING CO., Hyde Park, Dutchess County, New York Post, Office.

Conjuring.

The whole art of conjuring made easy, with full directions for performing 100 of the most astounding feats of legerdemain. Sent post-paid on receipt of 25 cents. Legerdemain. 100 illustrations. Price only 15 cents. Sent free by mail. Address M. M. SANDORN, Braidwood Falls, New York.

Rose Seymour,

The Story of a BALLET GIRL'S LIFE. Just issued. Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.
HILTON & CO., Publishers, 139 Nassau st., N. Y. 321-33

All who want to know how to raise Whiskers, Curl the Hair, cure Freckles, Pimples and all other blemishes, send with red stamp, H. B. WILLIS, 84 Nassau street, New York. 321-24

Greatest Convenience of the Age!

ASHLEY'S

PATENT SCREW EGG BEATER.

The only one that can be used in a small vessel, or that will beat from one egg to any required number. All other beaters need be attached to some place to be used; this needs only to be held in the hand. Will do the work thoroughly in less than a minute. Durable, simple and cheap. Warranted to give satisfaction. For sale by all House Furnishing and Hardware stores. Agents wanted. Sample, post-paid, for 50 cents. Circulars free. E. E. ASHLEY, Sole Manufacturer,
529-23 Office 95 Maiden lane, (Box 5,646 P. O.) N. Y.

$90 A Month.—Agents wanted for six entirely new articles. Address O. T. GAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine. 321-24

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $300,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 10 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get your Circulars containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
158 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they meet instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an extraordinary book of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address
tf T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

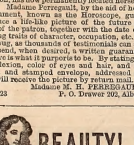
Books, Pictures, Cosmetics, etc. Catalogues free. Please address BLACKIE & CO., 713 Broadway, N. Y. 509-24

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 50 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
83 Nassau street, N. Y.
tf

LADY AGENTS WANTED

To sell valuable articles wanted in every Family. Catalogues sent free.
CHAS. MANCHES, 658 Broadway, New York.



DR. HARRISON'S
PERISTALTIC LOZENGES
A POSITIVE CURE FOR COSTIVENESS, PILES
DYSPEPSIA, HEADACHE
SOLD EVERYWHERE

Produce immediate relief, and never require increase of dose to effect a cure. Will be mailed on enclosing the price, 60 cents. J. S. HARRISON & CO., M Proprietors, Boston.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
611-23 P. O. Drawer 202, Albany, N. Y.

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS
May be secured by the use of FROF. DU BREUX
FRISER LE CHEVAUX.
One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionable ladies of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, prepaid, $1. For descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERARD, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

"How Tis Done; or, The Secret Out."

The original and only "BOOK OF WONDERS;" containing the Great Secret of a Mountebank and Whatnot for 25 days—Gambling and Marked Cards Exposed and Explained—Ventriloquism Taught—Ventriloquous Talking Secrets, Imitation Liquors, and 100 other Secret Arts never before published, is the only "original" BOOK OF WONDERS. All others are imitations of this book. Price only 25 cents or for $1. Mailed free.
521-24 Address HUNTER & CO.,
Hinsdale, N. H.

The Great Money-Making Article.

Everybody wants it. Soldiers or Soldiers' Widows can make $10 a day. Sample, with particulars, sent free by mail, for 25 cents. Address
E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing for August 18, 1865,

No.
No. 14720	drew	$100,000
No. 19242	"	50,000
No. 2879	"	20,000
No. 14311	"	10,000
No. 4489	"	5,000

Drawn five capital prizes.
Prizes paid in gold. Circulation furnished. Highest price paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make $5 dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine an invention unanimously needed by everybody. Or a sample and terms for mail for 50 cts. that retails easily for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

A Providential Discovery!

ASTHMA CAN CERTAINLY BE CURED

By an old physician who has spent the past ten years in the East Indies, and who, while in Siam, discovered the important secret of their method for the complete cure of this terrible complaint. For full particulars with testimonials, address (enclosing 10 cents),
*16-22 DR. B. M. LEWIS, Troy, N. Y.

FURNITURE, FURNITURE, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,
BY DEGRAAF & TAYLOR.
(FORMERLY H. P. DEGRAAF,)
No. 87 BOWERY, NEW YORK.

This establishment is six stories in height, and extends 242 feet through to No. 65 Chrystie Street—making it one of the largest Furniture Houses in the United States.

They are prepared to offer great inducements to the Wholesale Trade for Time or Cash. Their stock consists in part, of

ROSEWOOD, PARLOR and CHAMBER FURNITURE; MAHOGANY AND WALNUT, PARLOR AND CHAMBER FURNITURE.

Also, CANE and WOOD SEAT WORK, all qualities; HAIR, HUSK and SPRING MATTRESSES, a large stock ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE, in Sets, from $22 to $100.

Tucker's New Style Patent Spring Bed.

The best as well as the cheapest of any in use. Retail price, $2 each.
Their facilities for manufacturing defy competition. All work guaranteed as represented.

GEORGE L. CANNON'S
AIR WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS,
AND KITCHEN RANGES &c. &c.
614 BROADWAY NEW YORK. BETWEEN BLEECKER & HOUSTON STS.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. Madame French's Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, etc., without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 138 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. 1,000 different Kinds. Send stamp for a Catalogue.
000 VICTOR DELAPO, 60 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

Will force a beautiful set of Whiskers or Moustache on the smoothest face in from five to eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin, and will cause bald heads in eight weeks, and no humbug. I receive recommendations nearly every day from those to whom I have sent it, and found it genuine. Read testimonial:

Parkhurst, Jr., Fort Dupont, Sept. 8, 1864.

"DR. BERGEN.—Dear Sir:—I have personally experienced the benefit of your Golden Odor, I compliments from getting my testimony as to its merits. My face was entirely smooth, and my whiskers to be sorry. I commenced using your Golden Odor, and in six weeks I found a crop of Whiskers and Moustache, and to-day they are now growing finely. I sincerely trust that this testimonial may be the means of benefiting to you as the Odor is to your humble servant and well-wisher.
"W. JONES PARKHURST."

I will send my Golden Odor by mail, sealed and postpaid, for $1 25; or two Orders for $2. In order to obtain the genuine article, all orders must be sent to
DR. C. BERGEN,
621-24 P.O. Drawer 6305, Chicago, Ill.

Albums for the People.
Holding 24 Pictures, and sold at 25 cents. Send stamp for circular giving price by mail on receipt of the Album.
C. HUGHES,
Album Manufacturer,
621-24 102 Centre St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
BROADWAY AT BIBLE HOUSE,
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we manufacture and keep constantly on hand a full assortment of STEREOSCOPES & STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS, Fluid Batteries, Electrical Machines, Magic Lanterns, Field, Opera and Marine Glasses, Pocket Compasses, Barometers, Thermometers, and Spectacles. For publications, our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,
We were the first to introduce these into the United States, and we make the most extensive assortment in this country, including price lists from 25 cents to $15 each. Our Albums for the 25 cent size are unequaled for beauty and durability to any others sold for $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.
FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.
Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects to which additions are constantly made, and of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:
Groups of Statuary, 100 Other Statesmen,
100 Reg. Generals, 100 Other Generals,
100 Celebs., 16 Navy Officers, 125 Actors,
40 Artists, 125 Misc., 40 Prominent Women,
120 Capitol Views of Washington.
Including copyrights of the Most Celebrated Engravings, Painting, Statuary, etc., in all parts of the world.
An order for One Dozen Pictures from our Catalogue will be filled on the receipt of $1, and so on in proportion.
Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D. will please remit twenty-five cents on the dollar with their order.
☞ The prices and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

ILLUSTRATED ALBUMS, for 18 Pictures, 75 cents; 24 Pictures, $1. tf

$75 Per Month and all expenses paid to Selling Machine Agents. Address, D. B. HERRINGTON & CO., Detroit, Mich.

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,
A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years, and cannot be detected. Price $1. 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO., Perfumers,
000 133 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

New Patent "Snap and Catch'em" Fish Hooks. Takes every fish that bites. Agents Wanted. Send 25 cents for sample Hook and terms to JOSEPH BRIGS, 363 Broadway, New York. o

How to Win a Sweetheart or Lover.
If any young gentleman or lady wishes to know how to begin a love correspondence, or if they wish to speak their mind in a lastly, beautiful or careless way to their lover, this book tells exactly how it should be done. It tells you how to write love letters, and how to win your sweetheart every time. It tells you how you can marry whoever you wish, and how you can become rich in a very short time. Handsomely bound in gilt muslin. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, Publisher, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Model Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 13 White Street, New York.

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.
Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.
Treating on "Psychologic Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate, win the undying love, and secure the hand in marriage, irrespective of age or personal appearance. Sent by mail for 50 cents, by F. B. DOLGE & CO., Box 1228, Portland, Maine. 518-21

Wanted! Attention!—(Something new.) I will send by mail, postpaid, a beautiful MILITARY WATCH CHAIN, made of hair, for one dozen or $1 75 per half dozen. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.
Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc., supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid envelope, any address (single copy) may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y. tf

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW and popular INVENTIONS of great value to families; all pay great profits. Send 15 cents and get 80 pages; or 25 cents and get 80 pages and a sample gratis.
*17-18 EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

MATRIMONY.—If you want to be married, send a stamp and address to
H. C. KELLOG,
*17-18 423½ Broadway, N. Y.

6 CHANCES FOR $1
In the greatest sale of Jewelry in this country. $1,000, 00 of Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry and Silver Ware, etc., to be sold for $1 each; not to be paid for till you know what you are to get. Sealed envelopes, calling for every article in the assortment, from the manufactory house, are mixed, and sent when ordered, one for 25 cents; six for $1; one hundred for $12; and a watch will be presented to every agent. Agents can make $20 a day, and are wanted in every town in the United States and Canada. Address
J. TOWNSEND & CO., 15 John St., New York.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with the date of marriage. This is no humbug, as testimonials from within number can assert. By stating age, height, color of eyes and h. ir, and inclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address Miss JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 88, West Troy, N. Y. 519-21

$55 A Month.—Agents wanted that can earn from $55 to $100 a month, and all expenses paid. For full particulars address with stamp, E. R. LOCKWOOD, Detroit, Michigan. 520-21

New Photograph Cards for Gentlemen. Samples, with Catalogue, sent free on receipt of 25c.; or Colored for 35c. Address RUGO RUCHE, New York. 520-21

EMPLOYMENT
AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—Thousands can realize a hundred dollars weekly. No capital required except these found in every household. Profits 100 per cent. Demand sizable as flour. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage. Address HOPKINS & BROWN, 641 Broadway, New York. 519-22

New Books, New Books, and Sporting GOODS. New Styles Cartes de Visite. Sample 25 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. F. MANCHES, 658 Broadway, New York.

The Great New England Remedy!
Dr. J. W. Poland's
WHITE PINE COMPOUND
Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of six on years in the New England States, where its cures have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Dipcheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Blessing from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial and be convinced of the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. Burnham & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Peter F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?
MY UNGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

ONLY LOOK!
FREE TO ALL.
Citizens and Strangers should send their address, and receive a large Illustrated Paper replete with the choicest literature of the day. SENT GRATIS. tf CHARLES E. HALLETT, 119 Nassau, N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed
From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY FORMULA." Mailed to any address for $1 25 by S. C. UPHAM, 35 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 512-24

Freckles, Tan and Pimples
REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 35 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 512-24

Asthma Cured.
Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,
and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Sent free of from on receipt of any standing yield of once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address by S. C. UPHAM, 35 South Eighth street, Philada. Circulars sent free. 512-24

OFFICERS, SOLDIERS AND CITIZENS!
Genuine Gold Rings.
All the Army Corps Rings in 10 Karat Gold, Solid Enamel. Warranted at $3 and $4 each. A liberal discount to dealers. Sent by mail. Address
E. BEACH,
13 Maiden Lane, N. Y.
512-24

WHISKERS, $1.
$1. For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the "Canadian Compound," a highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face, in six weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box, 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburg, N. Y.
512-24

Stereoscopicons and Magic Lanterns
For Public Exhibitions, with Photographic Views of all prominent places, men and events in the WAR FOR THE UNION & CIVIL WAR. Greatest assortment. Philadelphia. Priced and Illustrated Catalogue sent gratis. 512-25

The Book of Wonders tells how to make Gilded willow slippers or any other trash. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game. How to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Omelets and Curing Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 2027 P. O., New York. 518-24

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by the use of
DR. SEVIGNY'S
RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.
The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the ladies of Paris and London with the most flattering success.
The names of the purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address
BERGEN, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

Magic! Magic!!—A beautiful Morocco MAGIC POCKETBOOK, which I have just imported. This is an ingenious invention, which every man of wit and fashion should possess. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1. Address C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

To Beautify the Complexion,
USE SHULTZ'S WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.
The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a freshness and transparency to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. No toilet is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 60 cents. Address
C. F. SHULTZ,
511-23 285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

$10 TO $20 A DAY IS MADE by Agents selling our Illustrated Soldiers' Certificates. Printed in fine Oil Colors, in the highest style of art; size 19 x 24, and representing an elegantly carved and gilded frame for the soldiers' photograph, while a laurel wreath encircles a space to be inscribed with the battles in which he participated. A splendidly engraved certificate of HONORABLE SERVICE, renders the whole an invaluable memento of the late terrible and bloody rebellion. Sent by mail, carefully enclosed in a tube, post-paid for $1.50. The most liberal terms to canvassers. BILLOCK & CO., 529-2t0 19 Beekman street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $20 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Soldiers' Letter Writers presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. Comply right off. Make immense, demand increasing, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.
o M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers, 102 Nassau street, New York.

DUNN'S

Great Gift Sale. Great Gift Sale.

o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON PAGE 14.

SMOLANDER'S

COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF

BUCKU,

Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, &c. PRICE ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. BARNES & CO., and F. C. WELLS & CO., New York. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents.
529-3t0

GREAT SALE
OF
$1,000,000 worth
OF
WATCHES AND JEWELRY.
See advertisement. ROWEN & CO. Page 14.
o

PARLOR ORGANS!

Church Organ Harmoniums, School Organs, and Melodeons. We have just completed improvements which render our instruments far superior to any manufactured. THE PARLOR ORGAN, with new combination stop, to person singing by, without. Send for illustrated catalogue. CARHART NEEDHAM & CO.,
6311-2t No. 97 East 23d street, N. Y.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF

PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. THE celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is noiseless in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c.; requires no Lubrication or Change of Stitch—is NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a LIFETIME.

"Even the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Special Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Try Ward's India-Rubber Enameled PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS
ALSO, WARD'S FRENCH PRINTED PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS,
AT ALL GENTS' FURNISHING STORES.
The Trade supplied at
No 387 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

EDITOR OF FRANK LESLIE'S: DEAR SIR—With your permission I desire to say to the readers of your paper that I will send, by return mail, to all who wish it (free), a recipe, with full directions, for making and using a simple VEGETABLE BALM, that will effectually remove, in ten days, Pimples, Blotches, Tan, Freckles, and all Impurities of the Skin, leaving the same soft, clear, rosy and beautiful.

I will also mail free to those having Bald Heads or Bare Faces simple directions and information that will enable them to start a full growth of luxuriant Hair, Whiskers or a Moustache, in less than 30 days.

All applications answered by return mail, without charge. Respectfully yours,
EBOR. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
No. 831 Broadway, N. Y.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. 000o

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.
6312-4

THE PERILS OF POPULARITY.

Perplexing predicament of a distinguished Lieutenant-General, one of the fair boarders at the hotel having carried off his hat and boots as memorials of her favorite hero.

AMERICAN STEEL COLLARS
PATENTED
APRIL 19TH 1864

Self-adjusting Enameled "Snow White" Linen finished, $1 and 80 per doz. Samples mailed, 75c and $1. Illustrs Circular, $1 25 per doz. Sizes 12 to 17. Also, Enameled Linen Cuffs, $1 50 per doz. 101 Cuffs, $7. Steel Cloth Bosoms, $1 50 per doz. Sent Steel Collars," $1 50 ; Cuffs, $1 00 per pair. Send "size" and "price." Trade supplied. ROGERS FOWLER, Patentee and Manufacturer, 78 Nassau St., N. Y.

Important Announcement.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell some new and SPLENDID STEEL ENGRAVINGS. Sample lot sent for $10 that will sell for $20. Catalogues and terms sent on application.
HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman street, N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted and spread information, which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try this remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburg, Kings County, New York.

PINEAPPLE CIDER.

DR. TALBOT'S Concentrated Medical Pineapple Cider will cure you if you are sick, and if you are well, will prevent sickness. See long advertisement in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER from May 13th to June 17th, 1865, inclusive. Send for circular. One ounce sample bottle sent free by mail, on receipt of 30c. to pay postage. B. T. BABBITT, Nos. 64 to 74 Washington st., N. Y. 6310-2d

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S PIANOFORTES.

99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money is the JOHNSON PEN, warranted for one year, 14 carats fine; also every variety of Pencil-holders on hand. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. E. S. JOHNSON, Manufacturer and Office, No. 15 Maiden lane. 319-3t0

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address
o C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Dispense with the Laundry.
Patent Self-fastening Steel Collars, 75 cents each; the American do., 60 cents; Steel Bosoms, 75 cents; Steel Wristo, 75 cents per pair. Sent to any address on receipt of price, by OTTO ERNST, Patentee, 62 Bowery, New York. o

Vineland Lands. To all wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $50 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The best health record in the world. Letters answered. Papers giving full information, will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.
From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune.
"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

GOLD ENAMELED $2 EACH.

ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.
B. T. HAYWARD,
MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
208, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
I have now ready the ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND BADGE, and the appropriate Badge for every department of the army. I will send sample, coin silver, on the receipt of $2. Local agents wanted everywhere. Send for wholesale illustrated circular.

P. S.—I have no connection whatever with HAYWARD & CO., No. 239 Broadway, New York. o

STEINWAY & SONS,
Manufacturers of
Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,
Warerooms, No. 71 & 73 East 14th St.,
Between Union Square and Irving Place,
NEW YORK. tfo

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,
One Dollar Each.
(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT AND RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to DENOTE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It regulates no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Just introduced into this country from Europe, where it is protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Send, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. All orders must be addressed to o J. W. DELAMBRE & CO., Sole Proprietors, 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

For a Fortune
Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-3to

Shooting, Fishing,
AND Sporting Tackle
of all kinds.
ALFRED WOODHAM,
424 Broadway,
Bet. Canal and Howard Sts., N. Y.
Repairing done well. tfo

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 10 cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
000o

The Brazilian Hair Curler. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair into very ringlets or heavy massive curls. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1. Address
o R. S. CHASE, Cohoes, N. Y.
513-2t

ARMY WATCH. $10

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Out Hands, "English Movement," and Correct Timekeeper, with an accurate "Miniature Calendar," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, on receipt of $10. A BEAUTIFUL LADY'S WATCH, same as above, with the Miniature Calendar, &c., specially adapted to the Army, Sent free by mail, on receipt of $10 to any part of the country, for only $7.

English and American LEVERS from $25 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.
Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers.

THE BROWN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 800 times, mailed to any addressa for 50 cts THREE of different powers for $1. Address
000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

A New Publishing House.—The cheapest place to buy books in the country. Have you seen Hawley's new publications? You can buy your books cheaper of the house than at any other place. J. R. HAWLEY, Publisher, No. 13 & 15 Park Row, N. Y. o

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York. o

THE ARCANA WATCH.
Ladies' Size, $25. Gents' Size, $25.

Elegant as an 18 karat Gold Watch—First-Class Timekeepers. Sent by mail, free of charge, on receipt of price. A case of six for $125. Will sell for three times their cost. GIRARD W. DEVAUGIE & CO., Sole Importers, No. 16 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!
Cured by Reide's Crimean Ointment. Price, 35 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents.
529-3to

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.
Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 270-3to

25 RARE RECEIPTS

Containing many Secrets and much valuable information never before made public, including over 160 Receipts now in exclusive use by the celebrated Metropolitan Hotel of this city. Price 20 cents; mailed, postage free. Address HUTCHINSON & CO., Publishers, 669 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR!

Obtained at great expense, and forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run,	Nashville,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Troy Bottom,	Belle Plain,
Gettysburg,	Fair Oaks,	Savage Station
Fredericksburg,	Monitor,	Fairfax,
Chattanooga,	Dutch Gap,	Fort Morgan,
Pontoon Trestle,	Canal,	Harrison's Landing,
Richmond,	Petersburg,	Lookout Mountain,
Chickahominy,	Charleston,	Cape Fear,
Mobile,	&c., &c.	&c., &c.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Just published by
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, N.Y.

You may as well forbid the Mountain Pines to wag their high tops, when fretted with the gusts of Heaven, as seek to stem the current of popularity of JAQUES'S FAMOUS BAYER'S WING BOOT BLACKING.
It is the best in the world. o

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20

$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions, $20. J. S. TODD & CO., 20 Nassau street, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.
513-3to

The National Park Bank of New York.

Capital,.....$2,000,000 | Surplus.....$1,200,000

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.
J. L. WORTH, Cashier.
"NEW YORK, August 21, 1865. 519-3to

Jaques's Extracted Perfumes
For the Handkerchief are unquestionably the best now in market. The Pond Lily, May Flower, Garden Lavender, Rose Geranium, Jockey Club, Violet, and Bouquet, give us a perfumed rainbow galaxy of earth's beautiful creation. Ask for Jaques's Perfumery for Handkerchief.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 522—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 30, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

"Reconstruction."

THE people of the United States have watched with absorbing interest, not unmingled with impatience, the developments of President Johnson's plan of "reconstruction," as the re-habilitation of the rebel States is sometimes called. The antecedents of the President, his sacrifices for the Union, and his emphatic declarations on his accession to his high office, all tended to inspire the public over which he was so suddenly called on to preside, with a confidence that the results of our long and weary struggle would not be lost through weakness or treachery. All comprehended the difficulties of the task before him, and all were, as they still are, willing to second his efforts in restoring the Union on the basis of permanence, itself impossible without the radical removal of the pre-existing disturbing causes. This process, all have comprehended, must necessarily be slow. The development of the President's plans, however, were not of a kind to increase the confidence of the loyal men of the country; the speeches and conduct of some of the provisional governors of his appointment were those of secret, if not open rebels, and the almost complete ignoring of the results of the war, by the rebel States, except as regards the mere personal freedom of the blacks, was a cause of deep and widespread alarm. The people longed for a clearer exposition of the President's policy than could be deduced from what was going on before them. Happily it has been afforded, in a somewhat wordy speech from Mr. Johnson himself, to a committee of Southern men, and in a concise and clear enunciation from Mr. Harlan, Secretary of the Interior, to the Republican Convention of Iowa. Although latest in date, we give the first place to the indications of the President. He said:

"While I think that the rebellion has been arrested and subdued, and am happy in the consciousness of a duty well performed, I wanted not only you, but the people of the world, to know that while I dreaded and feared disintegration of the States, that I am equally opposed to consolidation or concentration of power here, under whatever guise or name they bear; and if the issue is forced upon us, I shall still endeavor to pursue the same efforts to dissuade from this doctrine of running to extremes."

In other words, Mr. Johnson is determined to maintain the sovereignty and independence of the States, so far as they may not endanger the national integrity, or the perpetuity of the general Government. Unfortunately the measure of this relationship is a matter of individual, State, or sectional interpretation, and must remain so, at the risk of eternal discord, unless the relation of the States and the nation are so distinctly defined as to admit of no dispute. Probably Mr. Johnson would assent to this statement, and point to that article of the Constitution which provides for its amendation as a remedy for the anticipated evil.

At any rate, he has acted strictly in accord with his avowed principles in his proclamations providing for the re-organization of the rebel States. He holds that the results of the war have not changed or impaired the Constitution or laws of those States, as they existed at the outbreak of the rebellion, except as regards slavery, and in that respect only so far as set forth in the Proclamation of President Lincoln. That Proclamation made the slave free, but according to Mr. Johnson's interpretation, gave him no political rights. Slaves, now freedmen, may be in the majority in the State, as they are in Mississippi and South Carolina, but they can have no voice in determining the future relations of those States. Mr. Johnson does not pretend that they ought not to have such a voice, but only that it is beyond his authority to confer it on them. He knows that it is not Republicanism, to deny them a voice; he knows it is not right, and we may add that he suggests no remedy for the wrong. His is an executive duty. He takes the constitution for his chart; he will administer it as he finds it, or accordingly as the people, the source of all power, may change it, or as the representatives of the people, within their province, may interpret it.

And here comes in the letter of Secretary Harlan as an indication and guide. The Constitution guarantees to every State a Republican form of Government, and as Congress is equally the judge of the qualifications of its own members, it will be competent for it to ask, when the members from South Carolina and Mississippi present themselves, if they appear there as the true representatives of the people of their respective States, conformably with the requirements of Republicanism? In other words, if their States, denying to more than half of their people all political rights, are in form or principle Republican?

ENORMITIES OF THE DAY—BARBAROUS METHOD OF CONVEYING CALVES AND SHEEP TO THE SLAUGHTER HOUSES OF NEW YORK CITY.—FROM A SKETCH MADE ON THE SPOT.

We cannot present the point in question more clearly than in the language of Mr. Harlan:

"President Johnson maintains the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States does not confer on the Federal Government the right to interfere, primarily, with the question of suffrage in any State of the Union; that the question may arise and properly be decided by Congress, when Senators and members present themselves for admission to seats in that body, under the clause of the Constitution which makes each House the exclusive judge of the qualifications and elections of members; and that other clause of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that 'the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a Republican form of Government.' I infer that if any State should adopt a law on the subject of suffrage, which would clearly show the State Government to be other than Republican, it would be the duty of Congress to reject applicants for seats, and to adopt whatever legislative remedies would in their judgment be necessary to carry out the guarantee of the Constitution."

In effect, President Johnson remits to the only body competent to act on the matter, the question whether the rebel States shall come back, without fully in substance and spirit conforming to the altered condition of the country. That he will carry out, with the full power of the Executive arm, the decisions of this only competent body is certain; and if the rebel States imagine for a moment they are to retain the substance of their ancient oligarchical despotism, and come back with augmented political strength, to ally themselves with Northern minorities to control the policy and patronage of the Government, they will find themselves mistaken. They can never have a representative in Congress until they reform their constitutions, so as to make them Republican, in the judgment of the body which must decide on the qualifications of its own members. Let them take warning in time. The moral triumphs of this war are to be as grand and permanent as the material ones.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Circulation over 50,000.

This valuable Family Paper has now reached its Seventeenth Number, and a circulation of upwards of 50,000, showing in its unprecedented success, that it meets a great popular demand, and a thorough appreciation in the Family Circle.

Each Number contains a variety of short stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Directions, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures and Portraits.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER has a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER is the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent artists.

Every number contains a striking portrait, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of the CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every Family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York. It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Terms for the Chimney Corner:

PRICE 10 CENTS EACH NUMBER.

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year (With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)	20 00
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

QUERIES.—Why are pretty girls like oatmeal cakes? Because they give the heartburn. Why do the recriminations of married couples resemble the sound of waves on the shore? Because they are murmurs of the tide. Why is playing chess a more exemplary occupation than playing cards? Because you play at chess with two bishops and at cards with four knaves. What commodity is always afforded at cost? The law. If you want to be a "swell" of the first water, what should you do? Get the dropsy. In what circumstances is a woman that wears stays? Straitened circumstances.

Barnum's New American Museum,—BROADWAY, between Spring and Prince streets. Increased Attraction. Open from Sunrise until 10 P. M. Over 100,000 Curiosities; a Sixth Saloon has just been added, in which is exhibited the identical LINCOLN LOG CABIN built by ABRAHAM LINCOLN in 1830, and in which he resided for two years. Three of the Tallest Giants in the World; largest Fat Woman Living, and prettiest Circassian Girls ever seen. Bohemian Glass Blowers; two Glass Steam Engines in motion. A Cherokee Indian, born without arms; Professor Hutchings, Lightning Calculator. Afternoon at 3; Evening at 7¾. Another New Spectacular Drama, SADAK AND KALASRADE; or, THE WATERS OF OBLIVION. Splendid Scenery, Costumes and Effects. Sadak's Female Light Guard, Magnificently Armed and Accoutred. Previous to Pantomime, MADAME MARIE MACARTE, in brilliant acts. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer; Mammoth Prize Frog, Master Timothy, weight 90 lbs., in Comic Evolutions. Cosmoramas, Stereoscopticon, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquaria, Mammoth Turtle, &c.

Admission, 30 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

Grand Exhibition of the Victoria Regia, the wonderful and celebrated mammoth water plant of the Amazon, in full bloom, raised at an expense of over $4,000, at REID'S Floral Establishment, 807 Broadway,
E. BALKEY, Proprietor.

Admission 50 cents; Children 25 cents.

Caution.—Those using the RED JACKET BITTERS are warned to beware of impositions and counterfeits. The proprietors are doing their utmost to protect the public against counterfeits. Each bottle has a private U. S. Revenue six cent Stamp over the cork, and the proprietors' name, BENNETT PIETERS & CO., blown in the glass of the bottle.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 30, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the leaf only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

The Revolution in Peru.

THE tame, not to say cowardly, submission of the Government of Peru to the insolent demands of Spain, has resulted, as was supposed it would, in a revolution, which has been singularly unanimous and bloodless. The whole country, with the exception of Lima and its vicinity, where the general Government has its seat, and is able to exercise some influence if not much power, through the means of a well-paid garrison, has rejected the authority of Gen. Pezet, accidental President, through the death of the President, Gen. San Roman. Ariquipa, the second city of Peru, Cuzco, Piura, Ayacucho, indeed all the principal towns, have pronounced against the weak Administration in Lima, and call for a change in the personelle of the Government. The permanent commission of the Congress, sitting in Lima, has also demanded a change in this respect. The revolution calls for no change in the constitution or laws, nor for any sweeping reforms. It requires simply that the rulers who have humiliated the State, and who are not above suspicion of collusion with Spain, shall give up the reins of power and leave the country. It spills no blood, for the unanimity of the people is such that no collision can occur, and there will be no fighting—unless, indeed, Pezet and his accomplices shall have the temerity to contest the popular wish by arms. They are now shut up in Lima, the navy has abandoned them, and Callao (the port of the capital) is blockaded by the revolutionary forces.

Attempts have been made to stigmatize the movement in Peru as a "rebellion," but they will deceive no one acquainted with the facts of the case. The truth simply is, that Pezet, like Almonte and Miramon in Mexico, Santana in San Domingo, and Garcia Moreno in Ecuador, is a pliant tool and confederate of the parties to the European coalition against Republicanism in America, a weak, vain, unprincipled man, distrusted and despised by the people of Peru, and who has been the instrument of their humiliation in the recent difficulty with Spain.

Among the acts of Pezet and his handful of partisans was the arrest of that sturdy old Peruvian patriot, Gen. Castilla, several times President of the country, and at the time of his arrest President of the Senate, and his incarceration on board a filthy war-vessel, which was sent off on a long cruise, first on the American and then to the Asiatic coast. This vessel was in Panama not long ago, where a distinguished Spanish American officer and statesman obtained admission to her. We subjoin his account of his visit from a private letter:

"The Peruvian vessel of war, Admiral Guise, on board of which the well-known Gen. Castilla, for several terms President of Peru, is prisoner, arrived in this port last week. It was not, however, until yesterday, that I was able to obtain permission to visit him, and then only under the condition not to give him any information of the revolution in Peru, nor to speak with him on the political condition of that country. The commander of the vessel told me that he was obliged to exact these conditions under orders from his Government, with the object that the prisoner should know nothing of what might be going on in Peru. I suppose the General understood this, inasmuch as he made no reference to anything relating to that Republic. The officers of the vessel informed me that he had been deprived of all communication with his friends, even to the suppression of the letters from his wife.

"The Guise is the most uncomfortable vessel I ever saw, and the treatment of Gen. Castilla is infamous. The Peruvian Consul here was able to send to his late President a box of wine, of which he offered me a glass, served on a filthy box, for which the General asked to be excused, saying that he was ashamed that he was unable to treat me with greater decency.

"Notwithstanding, the poor old man sustained his personal dignity, and I found him energetic, strong, and speaking with enthusiasm of the American Union against European pretensions. He was ignorant of the great events which had taken place in the United States during the past few months, and was so overjoyed to hear of the triumph of the American cause, as to forget for the moment the indignity and cruelty with which he has been treated by the actual Government of Peru.

"When I informed him of the death of President Lincoln, he was affected to tears, and found language too weak to express his horror of the crime and of those who incited it.

"The depth of his sorrow was only equaled by the height of his joy on learning of the sympathy evinced in the United States for the Liberal cause in Mexico, and of the glorious result of the heroic defence of the patriots of Santo Domingo. The intelligence roused the energy of the old man, who appeared to recover the vigor of a youth of twenty.

"My visit was a long one, and he expressed himself much gratified with my attention. He is now quite deaf, in consequence of exposure suffered on board the vessel, which is close, dirty, and uncomfortable in the extreme.

"This afternoon there came into port a Peruvian steamer, bringing sealed dispatches to the commander of the Guise. The treatment of Gen. Castilla shows that there is nothing of Republicanism in Peru, as represented by the existing Government. The country was literally weighed down by the tyranny that existed there, which seems fully to have justified the appeal to arms which has resulted in general, and bloodless, and almost complete revolution against Gen. Pezet and his government."

THE Britannia Theatre, London, has produced a grand romantic drama, entitled, "The Confederate's Daughter; or, the Tyrant of New Orleans." The actor who plays the part of Gen. Butler has had his salary doubled, as a compensation for the groans and hootings he is obliged to encounter from the pit and gallery. A London correspondent observes, that the General bids fair to take his place in the popular history, drama and ballads of England with crook-back Richard, Guy Fawkes, Blue Beard, Haynau, Herod, and other interesting characters of ancient and modern time; and that if he and Judas Iscariot were to walk arm in arm through the New Cut or Seven Dials, the Jew would not get the worst of it, such is the ignorance and prejudices of the British masses.

THE statutes of the State of Maine permit a prisoner arraigned for murder to testify in his own behalf. A case has recently been tried in that State in which a man, charged with killing, was enabled to refute the evidence against him and obtain his release. The testimony of witnesses left no doubt that the prisoner killed the person alleged; but as the deed was done in the dark no one but himself could know whether it was in self-defence or not. The remarkable simplicity and apparent truthfulness of the prisoner, his prompt and ready answers, freedom from all contradiction and equivocation, and, in fact, every test of truth were so striking, that the court, jury, and the crowd of listeners were all convinced that he was fully justified in the killing. Without his own testimony, however, it is doubtful if he could have escaped conviction.

THE Democratic Convention for the State of New York adjourned on the 7th. It nominated Republican candidates for Secretary of State and Comptroller, and adopted, among others, the following resolution, which is only a paraphrase of that adopted by the convention which nominated Mr. Lincoln:

"Resolved, That the position originally taken by our Government in reference to the interference of European Powers with the people of this continent, called the 'Monroe Doctrine,' is a policy which has preserved peace and avoided foreign entanglements, and cannot be abandoned without dishonor to us as a Power among nations, nor without danger to democratic institutions."

ONE of the few loyal counties of Mississippi, during the war, was the county of Jones, which furnished a large contingent of soldiers to the Union army. It sent a sturdy delegate to the late convention for reorganizing the State, named Crawford. One of his speeches is reported as follows:

"Mr. President—Sir, I have come up here to express the feelins of my constituents on the great subjec. I come up here, sir, to represent my constituents where I come from. People hoot and wink up the streets and say 'There goes Mossyback, from Jones!' but, sir, I have no prejudices; I am disposed to treat my enemies in a more Christian, a more missionary spirit than they treated me. I am a Mossyback, sir; and I stand here to-day to represent the county of Jones, otherwise known as 'the free state of Jones.' But let not people think to insult me with impunity. I love a dog for his faithfulness; but the yelping of puppies I despise. People said that the county of Jones—'the free state of Jones'—seceded from Mississippi. Yes, sir, we did secede from the Confederacy; and, sir, we fought them like dogs, we killed them like devils, we buried them like asses—yea, like asses, sir! My people down there in the county of Jones did, in their sovereign capacity, did secede, and did become Mossybacks, sir. We did fight them like dogs, and will kill them like hellions—like hellions, I say, sir. But I didn't come up here to gas, sir, and I surrender my rights to the floor, sir, expressing only one sentiment—that I stand up for the county of Jones in general; yes, sir, I am for Jones all the time."

THE Richmond Bulletin, speaking of Stonewall Jackson, says: "Possibly a prejudice may exist in their minds [those of loyal people] against General Jackson—a prejudice growing out of the fact that he drew the sword in the late war against the United States." Well, yes.

THE following paragraph, from a speech of John Randolph, of Roanoke, on the floor of Congress, published in the Commercial Advertiser, of Jan. 8, 1817, shows that the plan of overthrowing an obnoxious administration by force of arms, in imitation of the customs and habits of foreign nations, was cherished at a very early day in this country:

"The time has arrived when there is no longer any necessity for suppressing the fact that the grand armory of Richmond, Virginia, was built with an eye to putting down Mr. Adam's administration with the bayonet, if it could not be accomplished by other means."

THE following passage from a late letter of his to Gen. Grant shows that Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, is not the Wise of four years ago, but a wiser, and, it is to be hoped, a better man:

"So far from my being opposed to the name 'freedmen,' as indicating the condition of slaves freed by the war, the chief consolation I have in the result of the war, is that slavery is for ever abolished; that not only the slaves are, in fact, at last freed from bondage, but that I am freed from them. Long before the close of the war, indeed, I had definitely made up my mind actively to advocate emancipation throughout the South. I had determined, if I could help it, my descendants should never be subject to the humiliation I have been subject to by the weakness, if not the wickedness, of slavery; and while I cannot recognize as lawful and humane the violent and shocking mode in which it has been abolished, yet I accept the fact most heartily as an accomplished one, and am determined not only to abide by it and acquiesce in it, but to strive, by all the means in my power, to make it beneficent to both races, and a blessing especially to our country. I unfeignedly rejoice at the fact, and am reconciled to many of the worst calamities of the war, because I am now convinced that the war was a special providence of God, unavoidable by the nations at either extreme, to tear loose from us a black idol, from which we could never have been separated by any other means than those of fire and blood, sword and sacrifice."

THE telegraph tells us that Gen. R. E. Lee, late commander-in-chief of the rebel forces, has availed himself of the instrumentality of Gen. Grant, to apply to the President for pardon. On what grounds he founds his application, unless that of "having always been a Union man," we are at a loss to discover. There is a great deal of mawkish sentiment abroad about this man, which has about the same foundation or excuse as that which is usually bestowed on "interesting criminals," whose "gentlemanly bearing" more than condones their crimes, and whose well-earned cells are carpeted by young ladies deriving their notions of morality and propriety from the yellow-covered literature of the day. If treason is to be regarded as a crime at all, not to say, as President Johnson defines it, "the greatest of crimes," then it concerns public morality and the national welfare, that such a man as Lee shall meet his deserts at the bar of public opinion, if not in the dock where stands the shivering instrument of the barbarities which his authority could have prevented—we mean the wretch Wirz, of Andersonville. If crime is to be apotheosized in his person, if his traitorous conduct is to go undenounced by justice, if his name is not to be held odious, it might be as well to confess at once that wealth, office, pretension, pomposity, some ability and a great deal of assumption, are enough to outweigh and entirely excuse conduct, that without these inadmissable palliations would be condemned as utterly inconsistent with patriotism, a high sense of honor, or fidelity to the plainest duties of a decent and loyal citizen. Is the country willing to say, in his case, that attempts upon its life are to be forgiven as soon as the power to commit them has been wrested from the traitors who made them? Is the worst punishment of treason to be only its disappointment? An attempt is making to place this pink and paragon of treason in the Presidency of a Virginia College! What are the doctrines to be taught there? That it is the duty of every citizen "to go with his State," regardless of the question of right or wrong, or as a real or artificial majority may indicate? That the desertion of the flag he is sworn to support is no offence moral or legal? That starvation of prisoners is a legitimacy in war? That it is right to employ incendiaries and assassins on "detached service," to burn down hotels and murder Presidents? That it is decent in a vanquished general to glorify his troops and his cause, and thus abuse the generosity and leniency of his conqueror? There is not an enemy of the United States, a secret rebel or open foe, at home or abroad who does not extol Gen. Lee. Even "provisional governors" of rebel States are permitted to blaspheme the name of Washington by mentioning his in the same connection. But we look in vain for anything on his conduct or character to justify the encomiums lavished upon him. What are the great battles that he has won? Where are the evidences of his chivalry and gentility? They are illusive. A cold-blooded, commonplace, in every sense mediocre man, save in that quality of animal courage which he shares with the bull-dog, he stands before us to-day blackened by inhumanities for which language has no name. Robert E. Lee deserted the flag he had sworn to uphold, and the Government that educated and supported him. He became the leader of insurgents whose insurrection he believed to be uncalled for. He deferred his submission long after he knew that he was beaten and his cause hopeless. He allowed the villainies of Andersonville and Libby to go on unrebuked and unrestrained. That such a foe of his country has been lucky enough to escape the bullet or the the gallows should abundantly content his friends and himself. Let the defeated Slave Power worship Lee as their hero—as indeed he is. But let the North consign him to the abhorrence of all loyal souls.

THE wheat crop of the country is hardly an average one, but the deficiency is likely to be more than made up by the corn crop, thanks to the fine warm weather of the first two weeks of September. There will be more corn harvested, and probably more pork made, in this than was in any former year; and both of these staples must be cheaper throughout '66 than they have been in '65. It is is estimated that the good weather of September has added fifty millions of dollars to the value of our agricultural products for the year.

An election has just been held in South Carolina for members to a convention to amend the constitution of that State. In the city of Charleston out of 1192 votes polled, the "Union" candidates received 137. The unpardoned rebel cavalry leader, Wade Hampton, the most conspicuous of the fire-eaters, has been elected to the convention. We may expect to see a nice lot of rebels sent to Congress from the Palmetto State. Fortunately, Congress has the right to judge of the qualifications of all men who present themselves as members.

The desperation to which some of the Southern chivalry have been reduced by, by the close of the war, is illustrated by the Richmond (Va.) Republic, as follows:

"We lately heard a desperate threat from a man who was short of funds. He said he would have money—if he had to work for it! If he had threatened to commit highway robbery or murder, he could scarcely have worn an aspect of more ferocious determination. We could not doubt that he would desperately labor at the last resort of a gentleman: beneath his dignity, and only excusable on the ground of absolute necessity."

The rebel Indian tribes, out West, Albert Pike's pet children, are being "constructed." It is well known that many of them hold slaves. The representatives of the Government in the great Indian council now going on at Fort Smith, insist, as an indispensable condition to a restoration of these tribes to their ancient relations with the United States, that slavery must be unconditionally abolished, and freedmen have the right of being incorporated into the tribes on an equal footing with the other members thereof."

TOWN COSSIP.

IF Charing Cross, which is a sort of Five Corners in London, coming out of the Strand, were sufficient to astonish old Sam Johnson a century ago, what would the author of that cosmopolitan book, the Dictionary, have said, had he ever walked down Broadway. That intelligent creature, our constant reader, is doubtless aware that the fame of Lexington crowded out to a sort of Saint Vitus state of admiration, that the pulse of the human heart beat fullest at that spot, the aforesaid Charing Cross, of the period when woodchuck meat was better, and so we will transfer his axiom to Broadway, in the year 1865.

Sitting on the calm shores of that most charming lake, Mahopac, philosophically waiting for a nibble, it seems to us as Broadway had never existed, or was unworthy force and vivacity of the great oriery of American life. It is only by contrast that we feel the full force of a great fact. Nowhere in Broadway equal to a day in any other city. Indeed, in no other city in the world can that concentrativeness be found. In this respect it is not one of a vast metropolis, and at the same time a little village. If you start from Delmonico's to Union Square about one o'clock some afternoon, you will meet more celebrities than in any other city on the face of the globe; and not only American celebrities, but the famous of the world. We say nothing about the beautiful women, for there is more loveliness floating on this fairfaced promenade, than has been seen since the days of Zenobia or Cleopatra, when Dennis said: "All women were beautiful."

As an instance of what Broadway can do, one day last week we met, within a couple of blocks, a collection which threw the happy family into the shade. There was a countess in disguise, half a score solid British capitalists, with Sir Morton Peto at their head, all looking as sickly as a Lenten fish, a National institution, rumpsteading, and with about as much expression in their faces—a Mexican President, a favorite actress, a well-known prize-fighter, the leader of the American Bar, the new prima donna, about a dozen editors, an elegant assortment of burglars, and a distinguished general, of whom the most we can say is carefully out of his way, that he has never once had the pleasure of seeing them. Such a fortunate here will make an unbearable governor for the army. In this respect, the great advocates of New York has no counterpart on the globe. He can be met in Broadway's stride, in the very spot through which all living virtue and vice, all illustrious men and women, focused for the time being in the metropolis of the New World, pass through in all seasons a day, by the digestive process of business or curiosity.

One of the pleasantest topics in the literary circles during the week, has been the discriminating criticism in the Atlantic Monthly, for September, on Forsyth's Life of Napoleon, lately published here by Scribner. There is really so little scholastic criticism in this country, that when we find a work so admirable as Forsyth's so reviewed in the spirit of learning and acute appreciation, we note the event as something pleasurable. There are so many points in common between the age of Napoleon and our own, that nothing is more profitable than a close comparison between them. The writer in the Atlantic, while duly appreciating the multitudinous learning of Middleton, and the store of information his life of the great orator contains, rightly charges him with want of knowledge of the genius and research displayed by Middleton, that Forsyth's recent work is certainly the very best biography of Cicero ever written, and that the numerous industriously with which the volumes abound, give tangible and living shape to the ancient theme. Forsyth understands the disastrous fate of the great Roman Consul to his vanity, but he will find that all men, whether ancient or modern, contend for their intellectual powers, have been remarkable for that failing. As an illustration, we are more oratorical than the ladies, and whoever thought with a woman—decent or not—was a much more attractive book, whether for town or country, than Forsyth's Life of Marcus Tullius Cicero, when, in July, wrote as long letters as even our own William H. Seward.

This has been an interesting week at the theatres, both for what it has introduced, and for what it has taken away. We find, [illegible] and bounding, has bounded upon the Olympic stage, and charmed all with her well-turned ankles, and her still better turned wrists. Burgess, in Brongham's admirable burlesque of "Pocahontas" she was all that clever dramatist could desire, and although we missed him as Powhatan, the cast generally speaking was pretty good—after Brougham, Dowdige is decidedly the best on the stage—still even that clever comedian cannot give the rollicking savagerie of the Indian king, who seems as though he could cut off John Smith's head by way of a jollification. Nevertheless, after Brougham and Dowdige, Pearson is a very acceptable representative of the scalping monarch.

The past week ought to be thanked for one blessing—it has cut the last of New York of those dreary antiquities, the Bears!—a facetious weekly, playfully alluding to that peculiar nun, their agent, says: "It is clear they came to bury their fame here for they brought their coffin with them." They are, however, very clever and elaborate artists, and it is a pity they did not find a better arena for the exercise of their elocutionary efforts than the Broadway.

We have only so much room in Barnum's New American Museum on another page that we cannot oversit now by noting that his lecture-room is crowded every night to see the great moving picture of the battle of Gettysburg.

Herrmann is also drawing to the Academy of Music crowds of a night in his clever tricks.

Next week we shall say something about the Ravels, who once more tread their almost ancestral boards of Niblo's.

Apropos of Niblo's—we have much pleasure in contradicting the rumor that Mr. House, the author of "Aprah in Pursuit," and the dramatic version of "Romeo and Juliet," because his own name is in the well-known line of "a plague take both your Houses, I say."

Wallacks commences with a new play by Tom Taylor, and with four new stars, Mrs. Scott Siddons, who was one of the best comedians on the stage, has returned from his trip to England, and we notice that the piquant and fashionable actress, Miss M. Clair, is one of the company now. Mr. Moss, at once ever verdant, courteous and ornamental, of course, is treasurer.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Gen. Steedman, commanding the Military District of Georgia, in an order issued on the 14th inst., says that he has ordered the confiscation of a large number of rebel and national firearms, have improperly fallen into the hands of the freedmen in various parts of the State, and directs that they be immediately given up.

Hon. J. Warren Merrill, Mayor of Cambridge, Mass., has given $10,000 to Waterville College, to endow the professorship of Natural Sciences, provided that The Trustees of the College have voted to name the professorship after the donor. Combined with this gift are received $150,000 during the past year.

Gen. H. J. Cresson, Adjutant-General of the army, writes from Richmond to the Western Christian Advocate, that he met Dr. Edwards, of the Methodist Church, South, who, in conversation with him about the work which should preach in the church, said: "This cannot be, sir, as the negro has become a freeman, and it is too great a to be thus easily bridged over. I fully and can only believe that the negro will be saved, but it is to be called to appear before my judge, Jesus Christ, in the next heaven, I would, therefore, in my humble endeavor, preach up the divinity of slavery. It has divine sanction in the Old Testament."

—We learn from the Rio Grande border, that the Texans troops have been withdrawn from the camps of natives put in their places. The reason of this, is said to be the appointment of Texan officers to give and take offices. Baron De Bruur, who was sent on a secret letter to our Gen. Brown, has been dismissed.

—Seth Kinman, the well-known hide trapper, has constructed and presented to President Johnson a luxurious chair. The President has taken a seat in the great feature of the "institution" is, that by touching a cord, the back can be thrown down, and the chair made into a bed, with dat in front from under the seat, snapping open and forming a foot-rest. Mr. Kinman's exhibition came off at the White House one day last week.

—An interesting trial took place in Ravenna last week, under the Ohio liquor law. A returned soldier named Oliver Lee, who had been honorably discharged at $1[illegible] by some unknown persons. His wife brought suit for damages of $5,000 against the man who sold him the liquor, and obtained a verdict in her favor of $1,000.

—The receipts of treasure at San Francisco, from different sources, during the first six months of this year were $19,000,000. The total production of the Nevada continued $25,671,782. The product of gold and silver from the Nevada mines for the first six months of last year, was estimated at $28,000,000; so we have in the present year, $19,000,000, a decrease this year over the same period in 1865, in $8,581,689.

—The export of specie for the past eight months, has been as follows: Gold, $30,000,000; gold and silver at the rate of $50,000,000 a year. The Tribune thinks that if we add to this the annual home supply, the product of gold and silver greater than all our exports of all the commodities of the country.

—A fight between a bull and a panther came off in Jersey City on the 20th inst., in which heavy bets were made by the Mexicans. The panther made a spring, alighting on the back of the bull, burying his fangs in the throat, and held on until the latter fell down exhausted from loss of blood. The loss of blood, and then soon put an end to the contest by tearing open the throat in a most dreadful manner.

—The Secretary of the Treasury plumpers" for hollow checked damsels. The plumper is made of porcelain, or [illegible] glass tubes, lately purchased here by the other. They fit on the inside of the cheeks, giving a round, plump appearance; hence doubtless their name.

—One of the South Carolina railroads takes as fare, specie, greenbacks, coin, or cotton. The latter article must be purchased before entering the cars, for a notice across the platform reads: "Cotton will not be received by the conductors on the train."

—The Duke of Newcastle, of the late Col. Fletcher Webster, and grandson of the famous Expounder, died at Marshfield, on the 20th inst., aged 70.

—The Utica Telegraph states that a few months ago Dr. Horton, of that city, lost two of his three children. Last week the doctor himself died. On the following day the remaining child, a bright girl of ten, did not wake well, and complained of pain in the head. Symptoms of geranium, but mistook for it yellow jaundice, which is a fatal disease. The child died in a few days. The mother was unconscious of the mistake she had committed, until the doctor's wife, who had attended the family, [illegible] and sunk down and died. The father and child were buried on the same day, and the stricken one bereaved alone over the grave, who was six months ago a happy wife and mother of three children.

—Dr. William Hay, of Hagerstown, Md., died in his age of 92, on the 7th of Sept. He retired from active professional life about two years ago, when his medical brethern gave him a public entertainment, expressive of their respect for his skill and character.

—On the 3d of Sept., at his Rooms in Broadway, died Thomas Worth Whitley, in his 60th year. He was a man of strong mind, of great benevolence and warmth of heart, and possessed considerable ability as an artist and sculptor. He was the first to introduce the use of the Fresco in Hoboken, and was distinguished for his delightful social qualities. He was born in Yorkshire, England.

—The excellence and fidelity of Anthony's war views, which extend over the entire area of the Southern States, has made them familiar to all who take an interest in the momentous scenes they depict. Next to the place itself, the faithest centres in an exact counterpart taken from the very spot represented, which may be called a real sight of it. The views representing actual scenes of war, have been also under circumstances of considerable danger, as well as expense. As one out of numerous instances of the latter, we may refer to that of Mr. Anthony from one of his photographers. It alludes to his view of Duck Creek Gap: "I intended to take more views of the Gap, but the rebel sharpshooters [illegible] me, smashing in the door where I was working, and knocking heaps of sand over my films. When the wind changes, so as to blow out the smoke, I will get you views of the gunboats under fire at the Gap."

—The city debt of New York is over $30,000,000.

—A company are digging for gold in Troy, Vt., and find with considerable success.

—Mrs. Maria Thornton, who recently died in Washington, at the advanced age of 102 years, was the widow of Dr. Thornton, the first architect of the Capitol. Dodd, the original architect of the capitol, and the first superintendent of the Patent Office.

—The New York Fall Book Trade Sale commenced on the 6th of September—the catalogue forms a volume of 600 pages.

—A lady on Long Island, upon being applied to by the census taker for the number of her family of children, and then told him she could not remember the names of the old ox or sows, she was not quite sure which.

—A Cincinnati lady, very respectable and wealthy, but terribly afflicted with corns, was cured in the streets a mule costume while watching the nocturnal rambles of her husband.

—The Boston Post says: "The New England cotton mills are extending their operations as fast as the supply of hands can be procured. Many large companies have their agents in Lancashire, England, for procuring operatives. Many of the mills are running double sets. We hear of large new cotton factories being projected—one recently started at Lowell, Mass."

—The United States Penitentiary at Albany, New York, has four hundred and fifty women. One-half of both sexes are colored. The "silent" system is so well carried out that not a word is spoken about the cause of the murder of Mr. Lincoln, was from a discourses delivered by the Chaplain some weeks after the assassination.

—An enterprising correspondent who has visited Galena, Illinois, says that Gen. Grant's valley tailor is in charge of his father's hide store there, for two years before the war, and that he is to be found there to find out whether the General voted for Lincoln or Douglas in 1860, as none of the neighbors took interest enough to remember.

—Gen. Fremont, Col. Zagony and another gentleman, have taken out a patent for exciting any tint procures rot in wood, and insect sulphate of iron and other chemicals. The process is simple enough. The discovery is what they believe it, it will be a fortune to the three parties who can be prepared very cheaply, and will be used for railroad ties, wharves, shipbuilder and many other purposes.

—A clause in the Virginia amended constitution prohibited all who had aided, participated in, or sympathized with the late rebellion, from voting or holding office. The first disability has already been removed by the Legislature. The proclamation of Gov. Pierpoint now submits to the people the question: Shall the last disability be removed? The people will vote to alter or amend the third article of the constitution, namely, as to the right to vote. I have seems to be no doubt that this disability will also be removed.

—A national bank has been established at Portland, Oregon, with a capital of $100,000. This is the first incorporated institution having authority to issue bills ever organized on the Pacific coast of the United States.

—The Richmond Whig states that the application for pardon of Robert E. Lee, late rebel General-in-Chief, and Governor Letcher, of Virginia, accompanied by a friendly and complimentary note from Gen. Grant.

—At the beginning of the war, Charleston, S. C., had about 140,000 inhabitants, now, according to census, there has been burned, and a large number of others have emigrated, leaving about 40,000 inhabitants. Columbia, the capital of the State, has suffered in like manner.

—The Boston Journal says: "The Secretary of War reports that within the past week the men of his command at points on the Rio Grande, have been stationed at Sandy Hook, have been repeatedly fired upon from Lookout Heights, by concealed foes, supposed to be returned rebel soldiers.

—Gen. Schimmelpfenning, one of the bravest leaders of the Germans in the late war, and commander of the 54th, at Warrenville, near Philadelphia. His disease was contracted by exposure and fatigue in the service of his country.

—Miss Hannah F. Gould, the poetess, died at her home in Lynn on the 18th inst., aged 68 years. She was born in the last century, the first volume of her poems was published in 1832, and she has been one of the most prolific writer, both in prose and verse until quite recently.

—Mr. Benjamin Brown died at his residence in Waterford, Conn., on September 23, aged 98 years. He enlisted in the army of the Revolution, and served in defence of New London, on the 6th of September, 1781, receiving a wound in the leg which lamed him for life, and was the first to decoy the British fleet on that memorable occasion.

—A singular accident occurred to a railroad train which left Boston for the other day. A car containing ammunition blew up, destroying nearly all the cars in the train. There was but one passenger coach attached, and it was separated from the remainder, and no terrible number were killed or wounded.

—Since the war began, upwards of 600,000 men, with all their regimental officers, have been mustered out of service, and returned to their homes never to his decoretz at the expense of the Government, over the whole country, from the extreme north.

—The steamer The Queen, which arrived here on the 8th of September, on her first passage across the Atlantic, brought 1,500 tons of cargo. In addition to about 1,500 tons of cargo and coal for her return trip. She has been chartered for 12 months, and in July Foreign.—Abd-el Kader attracted so much more attention in Paris than he did in London, that he left several days earlier than he had intended in order to avoid the crowds.

—Late Paris fashions mention a general vanishing away of crinoline, which, in its place, bustle or bustles, kitchen gardens, all, all gone). In Paris, every lady wears a bustle, and in London, the first, by the way things of an island of the Pacific. In June, its sensible and sensitive people, the brilliant crowd almost in vain to find one vestige of a bonnet. The bonnet has returned to its native seat, the head. The fashion has become right and left wings of the wild and voluminous enfarine into which fashionable beauty has been compressed, and which, in the early part of the other hair upon which it can by its hands.

—Since the beginning of the war, [illegible] Thiers, the French historian and statesman, are peculiar. He rises at 4 o'clock, and works until 8 o'clock, when he takes a cup of tea, he works till 12 a.m., when he breakfasts with Madame Thiers, and receives visitors in the morning during the next 24 hours. At 4 o'clock he dresses and goes out to dine with a few friends, and in the evening he receives his friends till midnight, when he goes to bed again. This is the sort of life he has led for many years.

—The Index, the accredited organ of the rebellion in London is dead. Its last number says: "This is the last number of the Index. Many, we doubt not, will sympathize with the regret we feel in making the announcement. We deem it our duty to set forth why the publication of the Index is stopped, and also say a few words of farewell." Then follows a stat-ment of the reasons for ceasing the publication of the paper, the chief being the fall of the Southern Confederacy.

—The Belgian Chambers have given their assent to a law which will have the effect of rags from that country free of duty after June 1, 1866. Russia also has reduced her rag exportation tariff.

—The official Power Gazette contains some interesting news from Rome. In the discovery of a painting by Raphael, known under the name of Madonna di Loreto, for a long time the Madonna patroness, which purchased lately at Mantua from a second hand clothesman, was covered with a thick coat of dust, which concealed the figure on the canvas. It is stated to be proved to be a painting of exquisite beauty, and Professor Blase, after a minute examination, declared it to be not only an original Raphael, but one of the best preserved productions of that great master.

—New carriages of a very luxurious kind are about to be placed on the Great Indian railway between Peshawur and Moscow. In addition to a handsomely-furnished and well-ventilated saloon, these carriages comprises a series of smaller apartments opening on each side of the saloon. The sofas, ottomans, and cushions of the daytime, are at night converted into beds, mattresses, pillows, &c., so that the passengers can sleep with all the comforts of home. There are, also, compartments for the cookery for lunch and dinner, and when the travelers wake in the morning, they find their breakfast served by the attendants, who have made all the arrangements for the washing and dressing of the passengers. The journey will be performed in the word country, but when we find England reach this height of comfort in railway travelling accommodation? Carriages of the description above-mentioned are to be built for the Indian railway during the second and third, as well as for the first-class, the second-class and the inferior class of the third-class. A slight additional charge above the ordinary fares will be made for the saloon carriages, but those who do not choose to pay it can travel in the old carriages.

—The Mexican decoration, entitled the Order of Our Lady of Guadalupe, was founded by the late Mexican Emperor, Augustin I. (irritible), re-established by Santa Anna, in 1843, abolished by Juarez, after the invasion of Mexico by the French. The Emperor Maximilian has just issued an ordonnance for the order to be distributed by the Mexican Minister in Paris. Only twenty-five Knights Commanders and twenty-five Grand Cross has been conferred. Ross Bonheur has received the Cross of Knight Commander, and Colonel Clay, an English sea captain named Grover has also received the decoration, but has immense attention to save shipwrecked unfortunates.

—The secular authorities have been obliged to interfere to allay popular excitement. Prince Napoleon, to prevent the working of miracles. Several persons, [illegible] of whom were sent to the galleys, professed to see the Virgin with the Saviour in her arms in the clouds, and to hear the angels sing and musicians lay on the ground in a state of ecstacy, the man who had been cured of a fever by drinking the spring a chapel on the spot. One day early this month no fewer than fifteen thousand persons were present at the order which were half a dozen girls, who either were or affected to be blind.

—The Duke of Brunswick is reported to be on his death-bed. It is said that he has left 100,000,000 florins, 2,000,000 for the building of a Protestant church at Rome, and three to his side-de-camp. What is to become of the remainder of his property is not yet decided.

—Every chance of a deficient crop of wine in France this season is gradually disappearing, and although it is admitted that the quantity of the vintage will be less than was expected, the deficiency will not be so great as to render distinctive, as the rise in the price of wine is not only probable but almost certain.

—The Insulaire Reine publishes a rather remarkable article on the Dependencies of Russia. From it, it appears that in 1812 Russia required 1,000,000 men to attack Napoleon, and that the army rose to about 2,000,000 during the campaign. In the present day it were anxious times for the country. All Europe armed, and Russia could not muster more than 1,135,000 men on a war footing. At the end of last year the number of soldiers was reduced to 1,000,000, and it is hoped that the army will be reduced during the present year to 800,000 men. By the end of 1867 the peace status to be 600,000 men. This number will, it is said, be sufficient, as the country will be thoroughly packed, and the roads, at present rough and almost impassable, will be improved. Russia is not a rich country, no doubt, formidable, but it is probably no larger than France, Austria and Prussia put all the land the territory is considered. So enormous is it that it is not difficult to understand how it is that it is so difficult for the Government to bring more than 200,000 men into the field.

—Siam, it appears, has enjoyed the rule of a literary monarch. The Bankok Times says: "Among the many of the King of Siam's works, the most popular are the First King of Siam. His Majesty has written a great number of books, but this is the only one that has any circular work. Should his writings ever be collected and published, they will form a library of the most brilliant princes and sovereigns of Europe."

—The most popular person in the Fiji Islands, published by the British Foreign Office, it is shown that though far remote, that island group is advancing rapidly in commercial importance. The value of the exports amounted to nearly £20,000, in which cocoa-nut oil figures as the largest item, and cotton the next. The cotton plant is there a perennial, and the oil is so fluid, that the bottle of the specimen is described as equal to that grown in South America. The climate is said to be favorable to work in the open air all the year round; the white population of the islands is 1,000.

—According to the latest advices just received from Europe, a severe frost, with grain, has visited the Nile Canal from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, realizing the prophecy of Isaiah, that "the waters shall dry up," which, since 1852, has devoted itself to the great task with untiring energy.

BEEF TEA.

THE waste of beef in making beef tea is enormous. 62,000lb. a year are used in the one hospital alone; and if any head of a household, where beef tea is made, will calculate the cost of the addition to the butcher's bill in the shape of beef tea used, he will be able to form some notion of the quantity annually wasted in the preparation of that valuable but more than half wasted throughout the country. At the present price of meat this is a very serious matter. It is a waste which, if it could be avoided, would greatly get all the nutritive part of the beef, and leave nothing but the mere juice and soluble matter.

The British Medical Journal, on the other hand, asserts that fibrine is absolutely insoluble in water, and that all the fibrine left in our beef tea after we have got nothing but mere water. If this be true, Liebig is as great a romancer in his way as the cook who, when asked for a receipt for making beef tea, replied: "Get no bone for one dinner, replied."

But Liebig is not the man to bigger than my thumb."

We believe the safest way for the patient is to drink the juice of the meat, as recommend which "Liebig" so generally runs out. The fact is, Liebig's plat of tea is made from a pound of beef, and is considerably less than half an ounce of solid matter; and though we have not analyzed it, we feel sure that the nutritive matter contained in the pint of fluid" (for do not guess that it is more) "is not worth 2d. The British Medical Journal makes two suggestions; first, eat the bouilli, which, it says, may be done by a smooth application of dressing boiled beef; next, use mangrowise and less beef tea in finer cases and the like. Who is to decide rejected by the feebler stomach, and it contains all the elements of the blood—albumen, iron, albumen, tasse of meat of the soldier, besides, wine by itself will support life for a very long time. We heartily agree with this latter suggestion. Wine, by all means, for sick poor as well as for sick rich. But how, if you please, are middling folks to get it? Where is the sick poor to get wine, if it is not to be bought or sold? Madeira is not; port is not—I am not within the means of ordinary people.

BARNUM'S NEW AMERICAN MUSEUM.

HAVING in a previous number illustrated the destruction of the old American Museum, we think it only due to the amusement-loving public, to illustrate the successor to that world-famous institution—Barnum's Museum—which has now traveled from the corner of Ann to midway between Prince and Spring streets, Broadway. It is a spot long known to New Yorkers as the Chinese Hall, where 16 years ago the elder Patti charmed the ears of concert-goers, and where four or five years later the Buckley Minstrels produced those capital burlesque operas, which grotesque miscegenation of the Italian and darkey operas was the crowning triumph of burnt cork and melody. In future times, however, it will be more famous as the Carthage to which the modern Ænea carried his scorched Penates, preparatory to founding a grander empire higher up town, which shall represent more the national character. To accomplish so great an object, Mr. Barnum can confidently rely upon the co-operation of the Government, as well as that of the people.

The new Museum, which is situated at 539 and 541 Broadway, consists of five long saloons, and a splendid Lecture Room—of which we give an exact representation. The stage of this room is 60 feet wide, by 46 feet deep, and the auditorium is about 86 feet deep, and calculated to hold 3,000 persons. The decorations are very elegant. Among the great advantages of the present building, is the rapid egress in case of any emergency, as ample doors on both ends enable the entire audience to pass out in five minutes.

Considering the brief space of time occupied in fitting up the present building, the variety and number of curiosities Barnum has succeeded in gathering together, are decided proofs that he is still the most energetic and able manager of the time. As evidence of his activity, we may mention, that long ere the ruins of his old Museum were cold, he had dispatched agents to Europe to gather up, without any regard to cost, every article of purchasable curiosity they could find. He is about proceeding himself to the old world to continue the search in person.

BARNUM'S NEW AMERICAN MUSEUM, NO. 539 & 541 BROADWAY, N. Y., BETWEEN SPRING AND PRINCE STREETS.

THE TURNERS' FESTIVAL AT CINCINNATI.

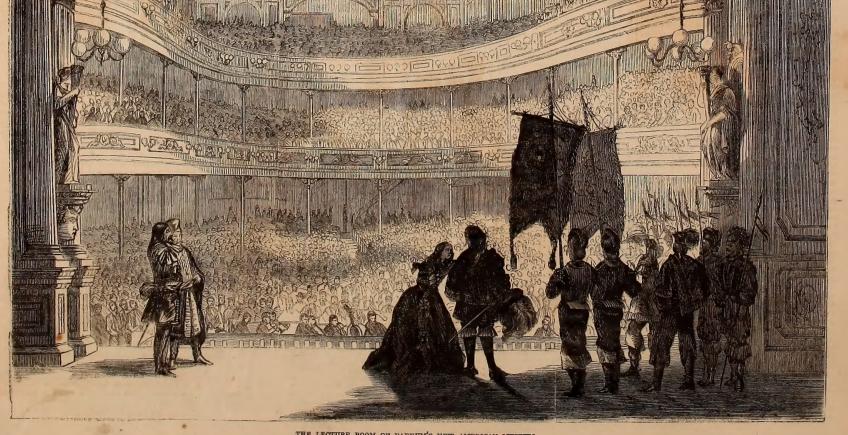
THE Turners are too well known to require any history—their objects, like most of those springing from the Teutonic race, are most comprehensive and praiseworthy, embracing at once health, recreation and benevolence.

Our sketch represents the gathering in front of the Turners Hall, which is situated in Walnut street, just above 14th street, in that most opulent of Western cities, Cincinnati. The meeting was held to celebrate the 11th annual Festival of the North American Turner Band, and delegations came from Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Tennessee, Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, Washington, Indiana, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas and New Jersey.

The Turners' Hall, the streets in the immediate vicinity, and also in several leading thoroughfares, were profusely decorated with flags and banners, while the music of many bands, and the charming melodies excellently sung by the deep-chested German voices, seemed to give inspiration to the surrounding air.

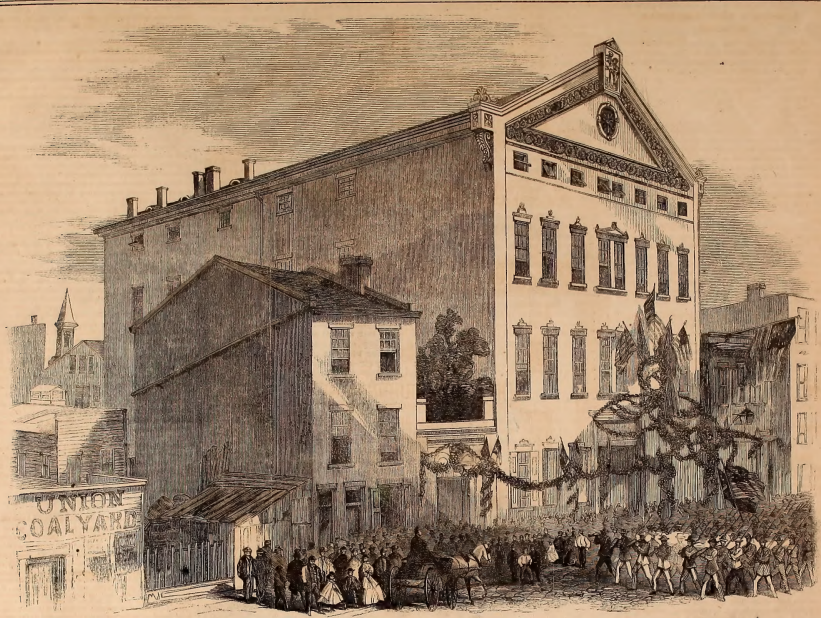
In this country, Turner societies date back from 1848, that famous year of German Revolutions. Since then they have been steadily gaining in numbers and importance, and promise in time to bind the great German heart in one.

The festivities commenced on Saturday night, Sept. 2, but the regular programme was for Monday, the 4th of Sept., when a salute was fired at daybreak to inaugurate the ceremonies.



Their pic-nic was held at Parker's Grove, a beautiful spot about two miles from the city. Here they were addressed in an elegant speech by Mr. Jacobi, the President of the Association, who took upon himself the task which Mr. Mayor Harris was prevented fulfilling through sickness. Our space will only allow us to give one extract, which admirably embodies the intent of this great Association:

"If I refer to the benevolent purposes of your Association, I cannot refrain from speaking with admiration of your kindness to the sick and distressed, your generosity to the widow and orphan, and the helping hands you have always extended to the youth or the stranger in our land, to aid in procuring for them such employment that, through habits of industry and economy, they may acquire a competency, and become useful and honored citizens. Thus, on the one hand do you assist those who are worthy and willing, but who have not opportunity or means, and on the other, do you promote the material prosperity and growth of our city by bringing among us a worthy, industrious, energetic and patriotic people.



"If I consider another purpose of your order, I must accord equal praise to the labor you bestow upon the education of youth in manly sports and martial exercises, whereby their physical condition is so strengthened and improved that when danger threatens the country of their adoption, with love of which their minds have become so imbued, they are not only willing to take up arms in her defense, but are more able to treat them as the true soldier should. These exercises discourage idleness and vice, and prevent that effeminacy which was the chief cause of the downfall of the Roman Empire. The legions, once so formidable, which had borne the helmet, cuirass and buckler in the days of the Scipios, under the burning suns and upon the scorching sands of Africa, found that panoply too heavy in the cool climates of Germany and Gaul, and the Empire was lost. Thus will it ever be with that Government whose people suffer their strength and manhood to become enfeebled by idleness, sensuality and effeminacy."

After grand balls at Turners' Hall and Jefferson Hall, and a variety of entertainments, comprising dancing, gymnastics, singing, music, eating and drinking, the joyous gathering broke up on the Wednesday, after spending a most agreeable time, which will long be remembered by its numerous participants.

ARTESIAN WELLS are a peculiarity of Alabama. There are two in Montgomery and three in Selma, of various depths—all gushing wells. One in the former place gives a stream two inches thick, with great force, and of all the water I ever drank, this, to my taste, most merits the descriptive adjective—cool. Before I knew that it was artesian water (so curiously could not occasion the sensation), I remarked the peculiarly palatable flavor, and drank with great gusto and without satiety. It is very "soft" water, and entirely free from nauseous minerals. One well at Selma, 4 inches in diameter, runs a stream almost large enough to turn a mill. No augers have failed to strike water in Alabama, and in the prairie country at much more convenient depths. On account of the drouths, to which the plantations are subject, it may be artesian, instead of surface water, and might be profitably sought for the use of "stock."

THE LECTURE ROOM OF BARNUM'S NEW AMERICAN MUSEUM.

GREAT GERMAN FESTIVAL—THE TURNER HALL, WALNUT STREET, ABOVE 14TH, CINCINNATI, OHIO.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY J. W. WINDER & CO., CINCINNATI.

AN EPISODE.

The maples cast their lengthening shade
Athwart the pathway in the glade;
And Mary waits beside the gate,
Until the lazy hours grow late;
Her heart beats fast with quickened throb—
With many a hope, and many a sob.
"What if he should not come to me—
"Oh, I should so unhappy be!
"But then, they say, the war is done,
"And Johnnie dear, will meet me soon!"

The sun goes down—night shadows creep—
The twinkling stars begin to peep—
The moon comes up—but still no sound
Of footsteps fall upon the ground.
Fair Mary's hearts a home for fears,
For hopes, and joys, and also tears;
"He will not come—the hour has fled,
"My Johnnie's numbered with the dead.
"He will not come—he will not come!
"Where sounds the trump, and beats the drum,
"He lies in death—perhaps, Oh, [illegible]!
"Uncovered even by the sod."

She turns away with leaden pace,
With tearful eyes, and downcast face;
A rustle in the grass behind—
Around her waist an arm is twined—
Upon her lips a kiss is pressed—
She weeps from joy on Johnnie's breast.

"DEAR LITTLE BIRDIE, WHERE DID YOU COME FROM!"

THE INVISIBLE MAN:

A MADHOUSE RECOLLECTION.

OLD Polonius discovered, in his conversation with the demented Dane, the method there often is in madness. However much the doctors may differ agree on the question whether Hamlet's madness was a sham article or a genuine, the truth is undeniable that there is a deal of that useful quality—method—exhibited in the vagaries of the insane.

SPOOK INTRODUCES HIMSELF.

I have had much experience in the study of insanity, a posteriori, from living and acting facts. I have conversed with maniacs of every grade and almost every description in some of the leading lunatic asylums in the land, and could lay before the reader many cases illustrative of the truth I have mentioned. My present purpose, however, is not especially to prove or illustrate anything; yet the reader will find, in the queer relation I am about to produce, no little indication of a careful observance of the general fitness of things, adhered to amid the developments of a most crazy conceit.

In the year 18—I resided in the city of Utica, where is located the spacious and admirably conducted State Lunatic Asylum of the State of New York, and I was in the habit of making frequent visits to that noble institution, where I was often permitted to converse at liberty with patients of a proper class. It was there that I one day met the gentleman who related to me a portion of his imaginary history. Seated quietly at my side, he conversed with me on various topics with a coherence and profundity, that seemed to render it very doubtful whether he was indeed a fit subject for confinement in an asylum. I doubted whether he was not altogether sane. But after a while I chanced to make this remark:

"I have never seen you before on any of my visits here. You keep your room a good deal, don't you?"

Instantly his eye was ablaze.

"Ah!" he said, "then you don't know that I am sometimes invisible?"

"Are you, indeed?"

"I am. At a word I can render myself invisible to mortal eye. You doubt me. If you will come to-morrow I will prove it to you; to-day there is too much electricity in the atmosphere, but I think to-morrow will be more favorable."

"You interest me."

"Stay, I will trust you my history. I know I can confide in you; honor beams in your clear eyes. On one condition, then, you shall hear all."

"Name the condition," I said.

"It is that you will not contradict me, nor disbelieve me. I cannot endure to have my veracity doubted; I am the soul of truth, and never told a lie in my life. You my not at once perceive the reasonableness of what I tell you, but you must not dare to doubt me. If I tell you, sir, that you are nothing but a papier-mache manikin, you must understand that, though you cannot comprehend that great truth, I can; for I have means of knowledge such as does not fall to the common lot. Do you agree not to deny me?"

"Most assuredly. I shall not contradict anything you say, however impossible it may seem to me. I would not be so rude."

"Enough. I will begin at the beginning."

You will not care to know where I was born. I have no reason to believe that I came into the world in a manner other than the customary manner. I am known here by the name of Thompson. My dear sir, that is all a fiction. My real name is Widge. My father's name was Wave, and my mother's maiden name was either Wenn or Watt, I have forgotten which. I had a brother, and his name was Vy, but he is dead.

When I was eighteen years old I loved the fairest maiden the world ever saw. Her father's name was Woo, and her own name was Lucille. She had light-brown wavy hair, worn combed straight back from a brow of alabaster. She was of medium height, rather slightly built, and yet possessing a developed and agreeable embonpoint. Her nose was slightly inclined to the Roman, and her eyes were large, full and blue. She had a round and dimpled chin, with a little fold beneath; barely suggesting the idea of a double chin. So much for the lady.

We moved in different spheres. She was a fashionable belle and I was a book-worm. Yet we met occasionally at social parties, and I touched her hand in the dance as I might touch the hem of a thousand dollar handkerchief, never thinking of such a thing as pressing to my lips such a treasure.

But gradually a change came over the spirit of my dream. She deigned to look upon me, and awakened hopes in my breast, which eventually led to love on my betrothal. I asked her papa's consent, and he told me to go back to my mother. I left him in despair, and wrote a note to Lucille proposing elopement. Alas! angry papa got hold of the note, and raised a rumpus. He took Lucille out of society, and forbade me to enter his house again.

Imagine me, sir, on that eventful night, perusing a document I had received from the angry parent, to the above effect. I tore the note into infinitesimal pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. I flung back my coat collar and strode the room with lowering brow.

A clock on the mantel-piece struck, occasionally thrusting my fingers frantically through my hair, to reduce it to a properly disheveled illustration of raging passion and unquenchable woe, casting frequent glances in my mirror to observe the effect, I was suddenly made conscious of the presence of a second party in my room, by a low chuckle. I looked toward the corner whence the sound proceeded, and there, perched on the back of my big easy chair, sat a cunning imp, with an elbow resting on a knob of the chair-back, supporting on a webby hand a little rat-like head, with great watery eyes.

"Widge," said the imp, "how are you?"

"Tolerable," said I; "how's yourself?"

"Warm and hearty, Widge," said the imp.

"Do you want anything of me?" I inquired.

"Well, no—nothing special. But I say, don't you want something of me?"

"Really, I——"

"Hold on, Widge! You're in trouble. Ain't you?"

I said I was a little that way.

"Of course you are, my dear fellow," said the imp; "I help folks out of trouble. Don't you want anything of me, Widge?"

"Oh, my dear, are you?" said I; "eh-hem! Who are you, any way?"

"Spook!" said the imp.

"Well, Spook, you're not the devil in miniature, are you?"

"Widge, you do me an injustice. I am an honest imp, and mean you well."

"Pardon, good Spook! Well, then, if you can aid me in defying the ban of the paternal Woo, why that's the boy for me."

"Precisely."

"Yes; can you help a fellow?"

"I can, Widge."

"Will you, Spook?"

"I will, Widge."

"Good fellow! Give us your paw on that," said I, stepping forward with outstretched palm. But the imp made a gesture to me to keep off, and said:

"Look here, Widge!"

I looked. The imp lifted up both his hands, winding a leg around the chair-knob for support as he did so, and then gradually brought his palms together, shook them heartily, and was gone.

Astonished, I rushed forward to the chair on which he had sat, when I was arrested by the squeaking voice:

"Look out, Widge! Look out, Widge! Don't squash a fellow!"

I stared amazed.

"Why, where is a fellow?" I said.

"Ho! he! he!" squeaked the voice; "under your nose, Widge, under your nose! Can't see me, can you?—that's the talk. Here I am."

And there he was; complacently scratching the end of his nose and grinning at me as if bubbling over with delight.

"Well, I declare!" remarked I.

"Do you?" said the imp.

"What does it mean, Spook?"

"It means, my dear boy, that I will help you."

"I don't see."

"Listen! I will give you the power of invisibility. Go, stand before that mirror, and do as you are told."

I walked across the room to the mirror. The imp was there before me, and squatting crosslegged on the mantle.

"Here, Widge, do as I do."

I obeyed. The imp went through the same manœuvre as before, of bringing his hands together and shaking them—in which movement I followed—and then I could see him no more.

"Are you making a fool of me, Spook?" I asked, looking around the room in great facetious visitor.

"Not a bit," was the answer. "Look in the mirror, Widge."

I looked in the mirror, and started back in affright.

"Ho! he! he!" squeaked the imp.

There was no reflection of my form in the glass, though I stood directly before it.

"You are invisible," said the imp.

"That is so, Spook. What shall I do?"

"Nothing."

The imp sat on the marble, cross-legged as before, calmly scratching the end of his nose.

"Why, Spook?" said I.

"Scratch your nose, you noddy!" said the imp "Don't call me noddy, dear Spook," said I, as I complied. "I'm sensitive."

"Anything to oblige you," said he.

I looked in the mirror, and was delighted to find my image duly reflected there.

"You are a good Spook," said I. "I never saw your better. You have made me happy. I thank you."

"I hate thanks, Widge," said the imp soberly "but I could see he was gratified. "I bid you good-bye, my dear boy. Fly you to your lady-love."

And he was gone.

A thought struck me. "Spook," I cried, "come back, Spook, come back, and tell me how I can inform my Lucille of my new power; if I come suddenly and mysteriously upon her, I may frighten the dear girl to death."

"I will be there," was the answer that came ringing down the chimney.

I flew to Lucille's residence.

Reaching the house, I beheld Lucille at her window, leaning her head against the pane, and gazing out into the darkness. I knew she was sad. My heart bled for her. I knew for whom she longed. I sighed.

Going through with my instructions for becoming invisible, I passed before a street lamp, and perceived that I cast no shadow. It was sublime. But now, how could I reach my Lucille's parlor without being overheard by angry papa?

"Oh, Spook!" I breathed.

"Eh?" squeaked he at my side.

"What! are you there?"

I was delighted.

"Of course I am," said the imp. "Didn't I say I'd be on hand?"

"So you did, my good fellow. But now, how am I to get in?"

"Walk in! The door will open if you lift the latch."

"But the noise?"

"Drat the noise! Nobody will hear if you are careful. But come with me. You are a little nervous, poor love-sick cool."

"Don't, Spook!" I murmured.

"Well, well, come on, Widge. Remember you are invisible, and shall be almighty power. Be as mischievous as you can, and don't signify your presence to the girl till I tell you. Trust me—it will be all right."

"Blessed Spook!" I whispered, and obeyed.

We entered the hall of the house unnoticed, and gently passed up the stairs. We stood at the door of the parlor in which I saw my Lucille.

"Lay low!" hissed the imp in my ear. "I'll have this door open shortly."

A minute after, the door swung quietly ajar, and I slipped in. Confusion! There sat angry papa, quietly reading a newspaper, and Lucille gone!

Angry papa quickly rose as he felt the cold air from the open door, and muttering a malediction on the careless housemaid, shut the door, locked it, and put the key in his pocket! Then he quietly resumed his paper.

I looked about for means of egress. In vain! There was another door leading from the room, which was a small one. I thought of the windows; but that way out was dangerous.

Just then I felt Sir Spook alight on my shoulder, and I bent my head to hear his suggestion.

"It's all right!" he hissed.

I made no reply; but I felt by no means certain it was all right. By the instant removal of the imp's tiny weight from my shoulder, I knew that he was off, and busy somewhere about the room.

"But perhaps you're getting tired of my story, sir?" said the maniac, interrupting himself.

"Oh, by no means; I am full of curiosity to know what your impish friend did next. Pray go on."

Remember, it is every word true, sir—every syllable. The imp, I shortly saw, was busy with angry papa; for he suddenly started up from behind his paper, with a "Why! What's that?" and rubbed the top of his head vigorously, so that I concluded Spook had alighted on his pole for an instant. After a few timid glances about the room, he again subsided behind the paper.

For a minute or two all was silence.

Crash! over went the papa's chair, and away he flew across the room, rubbing over my foot as I sat in the corner. Papa was evidently frightened, and from the agonized manner in which he rubbed his thigh I easily understood the naughty trick my good imp had played him. Really, I didn't want to hurt Lucille's father; and if Spook could have put us well without running pins into him I should have been glad. I wanted to call the imp to me, and tell him so, but, of course, I had no such easy way to look.

Angry papa was still rubbing his leg, and casting wild glances about the room; but he finally seized his newspaper again, and moved slowly over towards the grate, where blazed a merry fire. He was evidently very much puzzled in his mind about matters. Removing his paper on the table, he parted his coat-tails and turned his back to the fire—a posture peculiarly favorable to meditation, I think, sir. So when I observed papa's eye fixed upon a hole in the wall which presented no attraction to my own eyes, I understood that the spot was acting as a reflector to warm papa's unmentionably toward. He stood thus gazing for some minutes, while I watched him curiously. All at once he gave a spasmodic shock forward, as if his head had been pushed from behind, and then turned and stared at the blank wall over the grate as if he would like to ask it a question or two; and when he turned towards me again, a living note of interrogation was dancing a jig in either pupil of his eyes. Very suddenly—so suddenly that it took me quite by surprise—he made a rush for the door, stumbled over me, and sprawled on the floor. I felt the imp on my shoulder; his ratty form was shaking with mirth; he whispered "charming" in my ear—and was off again.

Poor papa regained his feet a picture of terror. He staggered across his chair. It moved backward, and he took a hearty seat on the floor. At that moment Spook extinguished the lamp. Papa was overcome.

"Help! help!—murder! thieves! help!" he shouted. "Lucille! Help!"

There was a rattling at the door. It was locked, and angry papa had the key in his pocket.

"Open the door, papa!" said a voice outside.

How my heart leaped at the sound of that voice!

"Oh, I can't!" groaned papa. "Call Joseph! Break the lock! For God's sake get me out! Oh, the room is full of devils!" And then papa began to groan again, while from occasional "Oh's!" and "Ah's!" and "Get out's!" I knew that Spook was busy with my poor man's hair and joints.

Presently the door flew open, and in rushed Joseph with a light, followed by Lucille and an old woman-servant, the only other person in the house.

Spook was on my shoulder, shaking with suppressed laughter.

Lucille lifted the prostrate man from the floor, and placed him in his chair, while Lucille—the dear girl—threw her arms about his neck, and all three joined in crying, in different words, what was the matter. But they could get nothing but groans from papa; and Lucille, with a fierce glance at the device of brindy, which stood on the sideboard, directed Joseph to convey her father to his bed. It was done, and Lucille remained in the room, seating herself in his chair.

Lovely Lucille, beautiful she looked, as she sat with her cheek upon her palm, busily thinking. I longed to be allowed to scratch my nose and scratch it for her sake; but as the thought passed through my mind, the imp was on my shoulder.

"Don't you think of it!" he whispered in my ear.

Ah, what a trial it was! But while I waited, Spook was at work. Presently I beheld him seated on the table by Lucille, partially concealed by the shadow of an inkstand, scratching his nose solemnly, and looking into my darling's face with a gaze of intelligence a metamorphosis, and a canary bird hopped from behind the inkstand. It was Spook, by the merry twinkle of the tiny eye.

"Dear little birdie!" exclaimed Lucille, in surprise, "where did you come from?"

She extended her hand, and the bird leaped upon it, cocking its head on one side, and shooting from its eyes such a glance as only Spook could command. Then, as Lucille brought her hand slowly against her bosom, the bird laid its bill so lovingly against her neck I was ready to be jealous.

"Sweet Lucille!" piped the canary.

"Why!" ejaculated the maiden, extending her hand so she could see the bird again. "Did you speak, birdie?"

"Yes, sweet Lucille, I spoke."

"Well now, if that's not funny!" she said. "Why, what good company you can be to me, can't you?"

I began to be fearfully jealous.

"In my dear Widge's absence," she added.

I longed to fly to the dear girl's arms.

"Where did you come from, birdie?"

"From one who sent me to tell you of his coming," chirped the canary.

"Why, who can it be?"

"One who loves you."

"One who loves me? What a funny answer,—but I might expect it from such a funny bird. Tell me his name, birdie."

"Orson!" said he.

"Well, then, is it Smith?"

Sir, she said, Smith! Do you know, sir, that Smith is my deadliest enemy? If there is any one I hate in the world it is Smith. He has dodged me everywhere all my life. He is here, he is there, he is everywhere. He sits at table with me, he preaches to me in church, he feels my pulse, he duns me, he borrows money from me, he beats me at billiards, he brings me the newspaper, he sits in my sunshine, he dances, he sings, he howls, he yells, he torments my life out of me. It is Smith out-doors and Smith in-doors—Smith on land and Smith on water—Smith in town and in country—everywhere Smith, Smith, Smith, Smith! The devil take him.

My entertainer arose and paced the hall with a lowering brow.

"Well," said I, wishing to lead him back to his story, "so Lucille spoke of Smith, did she, Mr. Thompson?"

"Thompson, sir! Thompson? Do you come here to insult me with your damnable Thompsons, when I have told you my name was Widge?"

"Oh, excuse me, Mr. Widge! I was forgetful. Pray go on. How did the bird fix matters?"

"Hang it, sir, you have grown devilish inquisitive all at once. Hark you—I wish to ask you a question. Is your name Smith?"

"Certainly not; my name is——"

"Liar!" shouted the madman, getting red in the face. "You are Smith! I know you! I spit upon you, Smith, Smith, Smith!"

Two keepers came hurrying to the scene. Mr. Thompson was furious, and they had hard work to get the poor man to his room.

I afterwards understood that he was unmanageable for several days. I had committed great folly in allowing him to run on at such length with his pet delusion, and since then I have always been more cautious in my interviews with the demented. At least, I never heard more concerning the story of the Invisible Man.

PEACE.

BY EDEN E. REXFORD.

Oh, fairest land beneath the sun,
A golden glory fills the air,
And drives the hills and valleys dun
Away from hills and valleys fair.

The cannon's throbbing notes are still,
We hear no more the rifle's crack,
And blackly dotting all the hill,
We see no army's bloody track.

The drums are hushed, the air is still
Of all the direful sounds of war,
And Peace is holding on the land
And sends her greeting smile afar.

The battle-flags are furled away,
No more to flutter in the fight,
What need have we of them to-day?
The Wrong lies prone before the Right!

No more along the throbbing wires,
Come bitter tidings of the fray;
But on the hills the victory fires
Light up the dawn of Freedom's day.

Oh, nation, long the starless night;
But now along the clearing sky
The morning breaks with peaceful light,
And sees the battle-shadows die.

In this glad hour join heart and hand,
No black should mar this golden day,
Or cast a shadow over the land
From which the night has passed away.

Send upward through the list'ning air
One universal psalm of praise;
To Heaven, and Him who reigneth there,
Our grateful hearts to-day we raise.

And while we chant the victory hymn
A thought steals in upon our souls,
And spite of all our eyes grow dim,
And voices lose their stern control.

We think of those who died, that they Might make the nation great and free;
They won the peace we know to-day,
This grand and blessed liberty.

Fame writes to-day upon her rolls
The deeds that make our land sublime,
And chants a requiem for the souls
Of those whose names belong to time.

Give us thy benediction, Peace;
Drop blessings on our chastened land,
From North to South, and East to East,
Walk thou with Freedom hand in hand.

THE GRAVEN RING.

BY ENFIELD.

My name is—no, I shall not tell my name—no, nor even my occupation, nor would I even narrate this story could I get clear from the command that has been laid upon me. I am a most unbelievable word—my name, then, is, for the present occasion, Rowland Dennis—not my real name, but the name the reader shall know me by, for he shall never meet me after this is written, for the destiny—well, I will tell it all, and try not to be interrupted.

Last summer I was out to the seaside to gain a little vigor into a frame that is beginning to show signs of wear from the constant demands I have made upon it in pursuit of money, which I have not yet got, and I went to a secluded place where board was cheap, where the inhabitants would not be more intrusive than is usual, and where I hoped I could pass the season without attracting attention, let me be as eccentric as I pleased. In the city, devoted to business, a man must conform to the rules of society, or be a man out. So as he pleases. At least so I hoped, and for two days enjoyed myself. How? Do you ask how? I built sand-piles, and threw stones all day. I was happy, and could have lived in this manner for ever.

The third day it rained, and my evil destiny appeared. Yet it was nothing. The book said that a certain nymph in olden times had a cave by the sea. I was indiscreet enough to ask if there was a cave near by, and was told a very beautiful one could be shown me. So I waited impatiently for the rain to cease, and knew not what fate had in store for me.

The next morning I went, having been directed particularly, and wandered about in a rain search all the morning. I had at last seated myself upon the edge of the cliff, amusing myself by throwing pebbles into the sea, and watching the grasshoppers, which were in great numbers there, when I saw distinctly, in the water at the foot of the cliff, a ring, that in the shallow water of the surface of the sea gave it the appearance of a golden serpent. "I was very small. I at first imagined it a ring, and then believed it only a yellow grass-blade or a stone, and so sat looking down idly upon it, not deigning to descend.

Slowly and surely I became convinced it was a ring, graven beautifully, a golden circlet of beauty.

"Pooh," I said, "some usual thing," and then I felt I hold not the truth; that it was gold, and I longed for it. Beauty has always an influence on me, and I must possess it. I was about to descend the cliff, when lo! it was.

Suddenly I was aroused; a figure was behind me. Her figure—no, not her's, but another. I felt my heart beating as I looked up. She could not but have observed my plan for and staring eyes.

"Excuse me, sir; I have lost my ring. A ring more valuable to me than life, and I think I remember having lost it when I was on the cliff."

I wanted that ring. To say that I could have died rather than have returned it, rather than have allowed another to possess it, does not express the intensity of my feelings. And yet I rose gracefully and answered—

"How sorry I am. Not two minutes ago I was thinking there was something which glistened like a ring in the water below there. Let me ready my vision and look over, and then I will descend and get it for you."

She placed her hand in mine. She let me support her as she leaned over and looked down, half in fear lest she should fall, half in joy that the treasure could be seen gleaming in the water below. There was no swell on to-day in the little sheltered cove, and the calm sea was quite plainly. She was lovely, but I no longer for that ring I could have cast her down into the sea—had I dared.

"Oh, I thank you so much," she said. "Henry will get it for me, I am sure, and then you will not be at the inconvenience of such an exploit; but I am so much obliged to you."

"I will get it for you in a moment. Your friends may not come till the tide becomes too deep."

Thus speaking, I hurriedly pulled off my shoes and stockings and descended the cliff, stepped excitedly into the water, and reached out to take the ring. I touched a human hand—a hand I knew long ago, which comes to me at times. I was not startled; I was her own selfishness that parted us. Twas she that wished for marriage only to cover her shame, and ruin me whom she had been content to. I started back, and was about to ascend the cliff, when I thought of the ring.

I looked back. It was gone.

No, it was on my finger. I must have put it on to keep it safe. How ridiculous in me to be so frightened.

Why did she start and turn pale when I appeared upon the cliff? Why did she sink down with a low moan when she saw the ring on my finger? I did not know. I know now.

"Lost, lost, lost."

"Your ring is safe, my dear maiden," said I, holding it up to her, and she looked, as well as I could in the confusion my own brain was in, that she was overcome with joy at its recovery.

She turned away. "I can never wear it again," said she. "I was not your friend. Keep it for me. No, do not, for it will bring you trouble. Yes, be bold and keep it for me, and let whatever may come, do not part with it."

I felt confused, and knew not what to answer. What sort of a greeting was this to give a man who had prayed for her but that ring? Was she angry that I had put it on my finger?

"I did not do it intentionally," I stammered. "I found myself had—placed it there without my knowledge."

"Twas ever thus," she moaned, slowly rising. "Where I have lost it, it was not from carelessness on my part; it was taken by her."

Dead and at the bottom of the sea she must be. That is the reason I love the ocean. It is her tribunal. But did she know it. What? I regained my self-command.

"You have not told me your name, my lady friend, nor even your acquaintance are to, to whom I shall be most happy to conduct you."

"They are in the cave. I had forgotten them."

"The cave is cold [?] where I have been gambling about all the morning and have not been able to discover it."

I accompanied her along the rocks, and down a path; after turning once or twice, the cave became visible. Two or three ladies and gentlemen were also visible.

"Here she comes at last. Why, Lin, we actually imagined you had changed into a mermaid, and all the gentlemen have been so anxious to set out in search of you, but we wouldn't let them leave us here alone. What have you been gathering? Come, let us see your treasures. Shells, I'll be bound, all manner of weeds."

So they rattled on, and I was introduced as a gentleman who was looking for the cave, and as my name and appearance seemed to suit the party, I was invited to join them, and as there was one more lady than gentlemen, I was most happy to do so. Was I? That ring on my finger might be noticed. I tried to take it off. It would not move. I should be remarked if I tried longer, and so desisted.

I became acquainted with Miss Linnie Hope. We became friends. There was a congeniality between us. There was a frightful barrier between.

"What is the history of this ring?" I asked.

"It has none, but its fate is, that whosoever is unfaithful, goes mad, or loses it, or something like that."

"Am I going mad?".

I gave up my retired ways. I was ever with Miss Hope. The gentleman remarked it, but only smiled. At last I told her my history, and we parted.

What was this history? Only this. Certain natures are doomed to misfortune from their birth. They are born dumb, or are without the power of creating sympathy in others. They see their fellow-men as has only its own selfish hopes and ambitions, that they never care for another, that love is only passion and loneliness combined. The ring she had lost had been given her by a lover; but she had never allowed him even to kiss her. It was the understanding that neither should love their property, and that whosoever found the ring would be the test. If found and worn by another, the charm was broken. That person would find love, and never be blessed in it. She told me this, and I loved her. She loved me still after my history had been told, and yet I cared not for her. What was my history, do you ask? I have told it.

Once I was betrothed, not as others are, by lips and loving words, but by a secret spiritual essence. We also wore rings, and I had placed mine into me and I felt its power. I had seen her. I met her. Our eyes exchanged glances, and we became joined in a spiritual union. She was my spirit near me, and was confident I influenced her in the same manner.

It was by the sea we first met in bodily presence. She, with her father—I, with my wife. Yes, my wife. You know the history now. The woman I married because she asked me to, and I believed it was love, and found that charm and kept her secret. She is dead. Both are dead, and 'tis the other one who haunts me, and accuses me of being unfaithful, for she loved me once, and I could say suicide, heaven never has granted her knowledge. She lies beneath the sea, and I come there to meet her. Many days I have been floating over and over her to make me suffer. For, as I told the story, I saw the wolfish gleam in the eyes of Linnie Hope as I had seen it in the eyes of the other. She had appetite and I cared nothing for love, and I had been faithful, for she was gone, and I could tell her that my heart was like lead, not to be warmed into life but by the cunning of the ideal I had in my mind. So we parted.

I went back to the cliff, seating the ring, and the first day a stranger accosts me and asks to look at it, but I would not suffer it to be taken from my finger.

"Where got you that?"

"I found it in the sea."

"And I have lost my tooth."

When next I saw him it was with a lady, apparently rich, and of good family. They looked at me. I felt a strange thrill in my finger. I looked down. The ring had regained not into a golden serpent, which hung down writhing, as if endeavoring to escape. I felt the ring slipping off, and clutched at my hand. As I glanced up I saw the lady white and panic-stricken.

Was I, or she, or all of us, possessed by a destiny that placed those grands upon us?

The ring was safe, I saw that, but should I be subject to such attacks?

The next day I met the gentleman again. He came to buy the ring. I would not sell it. He offered me a fabulous sum, and I—I needed money. He said he had a dear friend who had lost such a ring, and he was anxious to buy it back. I refused to sell.

I received a slip of paper saying action was certain against me to recover a ring which I had found, but which belonged to another person. I was commanded to appear, and, above all, the ring was required to be placed in the hands of the plaintiff on the morning. I refused to part with it, and was locked up.

The next day my counsel appeared, saying he had been retained by the lady, and that a verdict had been paid, and that I should be remembered for the harsh treatment I had received. He wished to know what defense I wished him to make. I told him he could make none, for I could say nothing.

The friend, true or false, appeared, swore to the ring, implied that I could have stolen it, but would not state where lost. Neither would the gentleman. The court declared the evidence defective, for unless that ring had been or had been lost under circumstances which would incline the fact to my being in some way connected with its disappearance, nothing could be done and the matter must drop.

"Let me look at it a moment," said the judge. I held it up towards him. Lo! out rolled a long golden snake, and, with a hiss, fell to the floor, and disappeared. I closed my hand on the ring. It was safe.

"Bless me!" said the judge, and then seeing my arm still extended, with nothing dangerous apparent, he begged me to open my hand again. I did so. He examined the ring minutely, and without a certain fear as if he thought something might show itself at any moment. When I turned back the gentleman had disappeared.

I met her again. The lady that I had seen with the gentleman. She would have spoken. I saw the look in the eyes I knew too well: the foreboding of love, the fear of a destiny that was about to be known power. I could not trust myself to speak, for I still loved Linnie, and a destiny held us.

I was sat upon in the dark and my hand grasped. The ring I felt was being tried, but was immovable: a feeling like the falling of a house on me, and I was left insensible. From that shock I have never fully recovered, but I awoke to consciousness at last, and Miss Hope bent over me.

"Faithful, faithful, and yet you loved me not; 'twas only from duty," and then she kissed me.

"Why do I write this story? Because I must; and the destiny tells me it must be completed ere I sleep.

I retained the ring, for I loved it, gloried in its brightness, its beauty, its rarity, and yet I longed to part with it.

One day Jennie said:

"Give me the ring, and I will return it to him."

I gave it back to her, saying, as I did so:

"Thus I loose your love, for you will never love one so cold, so morbid, so unimpressible as myself."

But she cried:

"You gain more, for I return your true esteem in place of worst regard."

Then she sent the ring back to him, and he went to sea. He was a sailor by nature, and with an air of moody sullenness by me, and with a melancholy madness as he turned away from me, and I saw her no more.

Dead! He must be dead, and the ocean swallows all; for again I saw the ring by the sea, and again a life form was beside me, looking down through the shimmer of the waves for her lost treasure, and again I descended for it. But no touch enthralled me, no vision of a woman birled in the sea entranced me. I found only a gilded stone, which I brought and showed to Linnie, and we cast it back into the sea. Yet the ring has been lost, and I have found the ring, with no serpent power, and yet evidently the identical ring. She knows not when 'twas found, if not by the sea or by me, and it is not the same; and the fate says write this, and it shall ever be a guidance to your love.

So I write within sound of the moaning of the sea, no longer a dismal sound, no longer oppressing my heart with sadness, for a lady, fair Linnie, is beside me, and the completed life all men desire stretches away into the future before me.

EVERY DAY BARBARITIES.

Conveying Calves and Sheep to the New York Slaughter Houses.

THE sketch we publish on our first page, for so frequently are we in the habit of meeting near our centre and market-places, that its publication may be considered by some as almost superfluous. But many of the large cities of America does not move the public heart to call upon the Legislature to put an end to such scenes, as we ourselves can do it. But the experience of the world proves that all modifications of cruel practices, and the humanizing of every day life, is the result of the slow but certain influence of positive its impetus from the silent pressure of public opinion; and we know of no better nor surer method than by presenting to the public eye an exact representation of what our Artist saw not over a week ago near the Hudson River. And what every one knows who those parts of the city knows is so common a custom as not to excite even a passing remark.

In the cities of Europe such scenes are not confined to the brute creation—they are re-enacted upon the human—the standard of common every day life is lowered and brought down to the level of the brute, and with it every sensation that sympathy, which is the connecting link between us and the being we are taught to regard as our Saviour. The fact is, we have become so accustomed to the practical denial of Christianity, since it ignores the life of the Saviour, that we must feast ere we can fall to the ground unknown to our Heavenly Father.

In addition to the hardening effect which such scenes must have upon the rising generation, which thus takes its first lesson in murder, its influence upon the public morals must not be forgotten. It is impossible that animals thus maltreated and goaded by suffering, can be wholesome food, and the sanitary authorities should teach us to put an end to such revolting spectacles as the one we publish to-day. In their degree, the men who inflict such barbarities upon the poor dumb creature s about to be slaughtered to restore our wasted strength, belong to the same category as the monster who, in a fit of passion, kicks his wife to death, or the death our gallant patriotic soldiers in the Golgotha of Andersonville.

FLYING FROM BONDAGE.

Freedmen and their Families arriving at Baltimore.

AMONG the gratulations which every lover of fr edom and hater of slavery pours forth when he hears of the colored people's emancipation, we are apt to forget the terrible undercurrent in the altered state of things. Born slaves, they have lived slaves, and have their notions of freedom, and themselves. With the exception of their full-grown passions and physical strength, they are so many children, and, with some few exceptions, are to take immediate steps for themselves and families than children s re. We wish to call attention to this fact, as it will materially assist in forming a correct judgment as to what is best to be done. The negro nature is very susceptible of kindness, and the treatment of the wicked and ill-judged system of terror has destroyed their veracity, and implanted in them a cowardly habit of duplicity, the fault of which must be placed upon their oppressors, who boldly proclaimed, through their most aged and learned divines, that the negro had no right which a white man was bound to respect.

What our Artist was lately in Baltimore, he was much struck by the scene that presented itself every morning during the time he was there. Negroes of every age and condition came, in every kind of vehicle, bringing with them every description of household goods. The south-eastern section of the city was particularly overrun with these unfortunate creatures, who had been so suddenly called from slavery to liberty that they had not as yet realized their position. This, however, every day will see them do, and experience will find them seats at the great table of nature.

THE BRITISH WAR STEAMER CALATEA,

Practical Target Firing at an Iceberg.

OUR Artist has given a very striking sketch of an incident he witnessed on board H. B. M. steamship the Galatea, while it was waiting on this side of the Atlantic for the arrival of the Great Eastern with the Atlantic cable—and we take this opportunity of thanking the officers of that noble war steamer, the Galatea, for their courtesy to him. In order to be all ready for the monster steamer, the steam of the Galatea was kept almost constantly up, and about the first week in August she proceeded to sea, and dropped anchor about two miles out, in the fairway of the port. Now all them she would trip her anchor, and run out to the eastward to see if she could discover anything of the great vessel, that carried the hopes of so many people connected with that costly experiment.

On the 16th of August, as they were steaming along at an easy rate, an iceberg came in sight, which was considered a good opportunity for target practice. When the Galatea got within about a mile she commenced firing with round shot, but without producing any perceptible effect. Shell was then tried, and with the most marked results; for when the shell struck, it seemed to burrow in the iceberg, and, as it exploded, masses of fractured ice flew up in the air, like brilliant jets of sparkling fire in the sun, and then falling down in a shower of crystals. The officers told our Artist that the height of the iceberg was about 150 feet, and that the extreme altitude from the root to the crown, as 300 feet. So large were the masses detached from the berg by the shell-firing that it lurched first over on one side and then upon another, till after oscillating it regained its equilibrium.

THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.

NOTHING can possibly exceed in singularity the scenes which present themselves to the traveller, on entering that vast expanse of the noble St. Lawrence, known, on account of its innumerable channels amongst the granite rocks, as the Thousand Islands.

Here Nature appears to have used her utmost fancy in preparing a grand panorama, to feast the wanderer's eye, over it reaches the vast open seas of fresh water, which in its short course to launch its mighty waters into the St. Lawrence winds, in acres of every dimension, through a rocky country, which is singularly impressive with the exception that at last some scene we had just left behind. Here, in fact, in ages gone by, through which the great river now flows, the grand mountain chain of North America, urged its verge between the two great lakes, Ontario and Erie, and which vertical range extends from the granite mountains of the west, over to the dividing ridge which lies between the river Ottawa's Bay and the tributary waters of the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence.

Here, by some tremendous effort, which has evidently shaken the whole American Continent, from the eastern extremity of Lake Ontario, to the other side of the region, through which the grand river flows in north-westerly course, the river has once rushed over a country of rocks, and has worn out a bed for itself, which have now disappeared, and, amid the torn and shattered masses of the electric granite, its mighty course silently but swiftly wends its undisturbed way to the ocean, through the islands.

Most of the Thousand Islands are covered with dense masses of forest timber, and some of them have pine, low and flat, give the idea of the draught scenes of an Italian lemon, as seen in the beautiful bay of Sorrento and city of Naples; but, in general, others are split and rent into a variety of fantastic forms, and present a view of singular wildness.

Again, at another turn of the labyrinthine channel, you pass under a dark avenue of precipitous rock, covered with the moss and lichen of ages, and on whose dizzy height the eagle may be seen to soar, while the hoary pine or fir tilts its proud, dark head, supported only by the slender fibres of which its life and finally clasping bare roots are formed.

Then, suddenly, the fairy picture presents itself, it grooves growing, as it were, out of the water, and apparently stopping all further progress; whilst, in a single second, the verdant curtain is drawn, and the eye wanders over the broad bosom of the lake that seems here and there only by a few small rocks protecting above its surface, and which is studded by the scattered islands forests of the main land.

We have attempted to attempt descriptions of scenery having no parallel as a whole, and through which ever traveller journeys a day to traverse may wish, to be a truly fell in all its varied grandeur, should be observed at leisure.

CARDS.

THE origin of playing cards is of so ancient a date that no one has been able to discover exactly how age it is; we know that they have been found in nearly every country, differing from each other in the figures and number in the pack, but all bearing a general relation to each other. In Europe cards have been used for hundreds of years; and there is a pack of cards in the British Museum, given by a Brahmin, in 1816, to a gentleman, said to be the one invented by him. In China cards were used as long ago as 1120 A.D. Chinese cards are oblong, whereas in Hindostan they are round.

Some Germans say that cards were invented in France in the time of King Charles VI., in order to turn his mind from the melancholy state into which it had fallen; but others say that cards were known in France before that time. Card-making was a great business in Germany; the suits there were hearts, bells, acorns and leaves; those of France, spades, hearts, tiles and pikes. In the year 1420 gambling by cards was so extensive that the magistrates published a sermon against it, and so eloquent was he, that all who heard him brought their cards to the fire, and burnt a double quantity.

King Henry VII. of England was a great card-player; but when Cardinal Wolsey came to the throne, and when James IV. of Scotland first saw her she was playing at cards. The ace always is number one. Before it was fond of card-playing, but he was so stupid and dull that he could not be kept to book for it. The four suits that we are most familiar with—diamonds, hearts, spades and clubs—were derived from the French. Many years ago the French named the four kings David, Alexander, Charlemagne and Cæsar, in honor of the four nations. The revolution the kings went left off, and Moliere, Racine, Voltaire and Rousseau took their places. La Fontaine, Voltaire and Rousseau also supplied for figures of Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude and Justice. In America, the four sovereign suits are, a pack of cards was issued in New York without kings and queens. Washington was the knave of diamonds, Franklin of hearts, Hancock of clubs, and Lafayette of spades. For queens they had Virtues, Graces, Cities and Rivers; the knaves were represented by Indian chiefs. Since the Southern war broke out Columbia has taken Washington's place, and the four suits are flags, shields, eagles and stars.

WARD, of 17 Cortlandt street, has invented what has long been wanted by all lovers of good coffee —a self-stirring coffee-roasting machine. It is self-acting, requires no attention, and for family use, by which ladies can roast their own coffee. It is said to possess a quality that the aroma is not lost in the mouth, and the coffee all the purer. In a word, it is the only way to obtain the aroma of coffee.

IT is known that the eminent French surgeon, M. Nelaton, received 400,000 francs ($80,000), for his professional visit to the late Emperor Napoleon. It is not so well known, we believe, that this fee was asked, not, as has been stated, because the doctor was anxious to be rich and too old to make the journey, and that he, therefore, set a prohibitory tariff, but because M. Nelaton avoids all utterly hopeless cases, as this was known to be, and thus does not endanger his just reputation for saving his patients—where there is a gleam of hope. For his demands by the French surgeon whom Queen Amelia recommended to King Leopold, without successful result, amounted, it is now said, to 150,000 francs, or $30,000. The English surgeon who operated successfully on the royal patient (Mr. Henry Thompson) left the honorarium to his Majesty's generosity, and pleasure, and received $30,000 and 30 order of Belgian chivalry.

THE BRITISH GUNBOAT GALATEA FIRING INTO AN ICEBERG ON THE MORNING OF THE 10TH OF AUGUST, FIFTY MILES FROM THE ENTRANCE OF TRINITY BAY, NEWFOUNDLAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. BECKER.

ARRIVAL OF FREEDMEN AND THEIR FAMILIES AT [illegible]

ALONE

BY J. B. S.

The waves play low upon the pebbly shore,
With tones that seem to speak in wail and moan,
And to my fancy, keep repeating o'er,
The words—"Alone—thou'rt left alone—alone!"

Ah! how they fall upon my ear to-night!
They nearly craze my o'er-wrought, weary brain;
And flitting in the moonlight, phantoms white,
Dance on the wavelets, to their ceaseless strain.

Alone—alone—ah! yes, I am alone!
Alone with fancies of a severed soul—
Alone! and list'ning to the hatred-like tone
Of the light waves, that wailing, shoreward roll.

Better the bellow of the mad, wild sea,
And the loud shock of thunder o'er the deep,
Than the low, listless, moan of waves to me,
Tormenting fancy from its fevered sleep.

Bound the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAKE," "REUBEN'S WAY," ETC.

CHAPTER XV.—ISAAC SATISFIES EVERYBODY.

SLEUTH found Isaac standing in front of a dense clump of luxurious trees, three or four planted near together, and looking like one tree of immense circumference.

"I sect him slink in there a while man and come out a-fly un; and I'm 'spicious if I don't go in and find his skin if he's left it."

Isaac disappeared between the leaves, and Sleuth waited, unable to think, to speak, to move, to hear from movement till he knew what it was he had to face. It might be the cost, and Esau might have seen him wearing it. It might be the hue glad's enough, and then Sleuth would be at once vindicated, unless (and this was the most awful idea of the whole) the coddicil should there turn up, perhaps from a pocket of the suicide frock, and then not even Anthony himself would long be able to resist the suspicion of murder.

Presently Isaac emerged with the smock frock, which he held in triumph on the edge of a bludgeon that he had also found there. The sight of these trophies satisfied the scanty officers at last of a fact they had begun to doubt, namely, that burglars had been present at all. As to the others, they accepted at once as their own the lawyer's emphatic remark:

"Nothing in the world can be clearer, you see, Mrs. Milton."

That worthy lady did see, and was satisfied. She ventured, however, the remark:

"Why did he come back to unlock the door when I was calling, instead of getting away?"

"I'm afraid, my dear Mrs. Milton," said the lawyer, in answer, and with a peculiar tone, "he did it in order to murder you. No, don't faint, because he didn't do it, after all, as you very well know. Perhaps he thought you were too close on the bell to allow him to open the window without one hollow man interrupting him, and therefore returned, as thinking it more easy to deal with a woman; and then—to do the wretch justice—very likely he thought he had done enough for one night, and so spared you."

"Mercy on me, I should think so!" exclaimed the housekeeper, quite in a tremble at this new view of the case.

* * * * * * *

No better evidence could be given to Richard Sleuth of entire success in laying all suspicion other than the fact that he was selected, by common consent, to go round with the officers to show them the dead body, the wound, the dressing-room, the safe-room &c., preparatory to their hunt for the two burglars. From him, also, these gentlemen took their cue as to the aspect and appearance of the thieves; for he had not only seen one of them close, but had previously had a glimpse of the two outside the house, when they were frightened away by Isaac's whistle. They were particularly gratified to find that the man seen so close, and who was, "in course," they said, "the murderer," had a lively mark—a scar almost like a wale—across his cheek.

"You see, sir," said one of the officers to Sleuth, "we can do with very little; but we must have enough to go on. A few inches of firm ground, big enough to set one's feet on, and a man may look about him, and soon discover which is which. We might take a fancy, now to this man, now to that one, and say these are the pair, and we might find they were pardners; but at the last moment out they come with a knife, or a gun, or worse are you? Now, you see, sir, this beauty-spot you tells us on makes us sartin sure; when we sees it we're not far from one of the rogues, and it's only a bit of patience wanted then to catch the other."

A capital theory, no doubt; and Sleuth was much influenced by the man's belief that it would succeed sure; but it had the disadvantage of being a little unsound in its base—the presumed fact as to the burglar's blemished countenance. Richard Sleuth had now well finished up his "trial" by putting the officers on a false scent; for he had really seen too little of the burglar's face to be able even thus vaguely to describe it.

* * * * * * *

Half an hour later, when all were reassembled in the dining-room, and the officers had received all necessary instructions from the lawyer, Anthony, Sleuth and the doctor, Mr. Stamp said aloud:

"We think—I and my friends"—here the lawyer drew himself a little apart from one of the "friends" (the officers), who both smelt badly of rum, "we think," he repeated, respectfully addressing the doctor, "that there isn't a doubt of any kind remaining, and that we may now leave the pursuit of the rogues to these efficient gentlemen, who, however, think the rascals have got too good a start to be caught. So I propose, Dr. Pompess, that we now dismiss the painful subject from our thoughts, do honor, in silence and sympathy, to the memory of the deceased gentleman, whose premature fate it would be idle, I think, to dwell on, and then call on Mr. Anthony to open to us his cellars, that we may drink, in a glass of good wine, the health of the living!"

"Hem! hem! I approve—I quite approve," said the doctor.

And then, all giving way to the release from restraint they felt, there was nothing but handshaking, and kind words, and bustling about of servants, as all alike felt they had done in effect their thought. Fortune had made another turn, and bright, happy days were in store for these on whom the goddess looked so fondly—these her newest favorites—the hair and his faithful, loving cousin, Richard Sleuth.

CHAPTER XVI.—SLEUTH'S DREAM.

SLEUTH slept in his own room that night for the first time since the alderman's illness had become serious, and as he locked the door he could almost fancy the last few weeks had been a dream. This was not the room which had always been kept in readiness for Anthony. The alderman, in his first burst of generosity at his uncle's bed in another Esau, hawing the old smock-frock. Then he saw himself in his uncle's room with the officers, and proceeded to the safe-room, and went with breathless, sickening interest. Even while the bell rang, and his hair streamed with perspiration, he watched the officers search in the wave, he saw the officers walk from the alderman's room satisfied, and wait at the door for him. Then he saw himself open the door, and he watched them with anguish to see his foot had become glued to the floor by some blood that he had trodden in. He saw the officers looking, smiling and wondering; he heard Anthony calling him; then the lawyer, and the pompous doctor, and Sleuth, looking down in the gap, shrieked to his startled boy not to look, for that his head was wrenched and writhed—the foot was glued immovably.

All the household came pouring in at the door; the shrouded figure was lifted out up, and pointed him out to them; then the whole picture fell into the waves, and Sleuth dreamt he was still in the dark, groping about for his candle, with the bell ringing ever louder and more loudly than ever, the darkness grew blacker, and all the floor seemed breaking away, and letting the room fall with a stunning, shivering crash. Sleuth dreamt that he went back to the bed and leaped upon it, and flung himself down to stop his ears with the pillows.

The pillows! Where were they? Gone; and there was a gap—not such a gap as Sleuth had made in the safe-room, but a deep, long, intense gap, and down it, with headlong haste, Sleuth fell, and fell.

He caught at strange things that he passed in the darkness: at birds, but they tore his hands with their beaks; at trees, but their branches broke like tinder; at slimy walls, whose touch kept accompanying him his fearful speed. Sometimes faces he knew passed him going up as he went down. Phillis passed, wan and shadowy-looking, all the bright youth beauty gone, but rising slowly, with clasped hands and eyes gazing straight upward. She looked at Sleuth as she passed him, and let fall a tear on his face. It seemed to burn him like a coal, and drive him down faster—faster.

Then the alderman's daughter passed him, not as he had seen her at the wedding, rumored woman—but as the alderman had loved to talk of her—a little golden-haired child. But now she seemed to float in a white, misty wrapper, which, together with her hair, made a light that scorched his eyes. She was not looking up, like Phillis, but down, and flying slowly, and singing and beckoning with her arms to something beneath her. This something Sleuth soon passed. It was Silas Maude, with his white head thrown back, and his mouth open, struggling upwards and towards his little daughter. Sleuth would fain have looked back to see if he reached her; but there was a horror in the sound dropped on him with such a fearful weight, that he was borne down faster—faster.

The lower he fell the more horrible became the sights he met. At last he thought he saw at the bottom of all a black sea, on which one hideous white bird swam by itself. Long before he came to the bottom he saw this bird spread its wings and fly up towards him. As it came nearer it grew larger and fatter, till at last it looked more like a cock than a bird—only just had time to see this when it seized upon him, and wrapt itself round his head and face tighter and tighter, till his breath stopped. Sleuth tore at it, but in vain; for its arms, if it tightened round him like living sinews, it dragged him down and down, till he heard the black waves roar, and leap up to whelm him, and—

Sleuth woke. The sun was shining in at the two round windows. The sunshine streamed upon the bed where he lay, and not more than the dream seemed that, in his dream, he had rent from top to bottom, trembling so that the old fringes of the bed shook, and the sweat poured from his face and hair. He flung himself from the bed, dragged himself to one of the windows, and tried to kneel and put up his hands in prayer; but the freshening wind breeze were too much for him—he fainted away.

That night proved to be but the first of many similar nights. Sleuth's sleepers remorselessly, and the scheming, overwrought brain, no longer compelled to fight a life and death battle, sank supine, and became the prey of its own brood of horrible recollections. Sleuth dreaded even to go to bed at last, lest he might be overheard, crying out in his sleep dangerous words.

So let us leave him—with his dread secrets and fearful burden of punishment—to address ourselves to the onward movement of our story, in which he is, and is content to be, for a time, but a subordinate actor.

CHAPTER XVII.—FROM THE PAST TO THE FUTURE.

Busy days succeeded. There was the inquest, and the preparation for the funeral, and the seeing each evening the officers, to hear their report. We need not dwell long on either of these things. The inquest passed off without giving Sleuth a single fresh alarm. The jury had become thoroughly saturated with the general idea of the neighborhood—namely, that the alderman's house had been attacked by robbers, who probably knew that he was dying, and chose the time accordingly; but meeting with an unexpected check from the old man, had killed him. The inquest was soon over, and a verdict of "Wilful Murder" returned against the unknown burglars. The funeral also passed off quietly, in the presence of Anthony, Sleuth, Dr. Pompess, the lawyer, and a few neighbor persons; the whole having been managed with such secrecy as quite to prevent the anticipated assemblage of a large number of people. The alderman was buried in the pretty little hill-side cemetery of Carbiton, and there found his resting-place. No more will that busy brain watch the rising and falling of the stocks; no more will that with unfailing accuracy of judgment at the exact time to buy or to sell. No more will he dream again the dream of his early days, when as an apprentice lad—not rich, but in Parliament, and surrounded in his own house with the young and dear ones who were to be the joy of his declining years and prove future generations. No more will he hear, what Anthony in astonishment and indignation heard to-day, that his memory remain "dear" to the citizens ranked in the alderman's brain since he first also accidentally overheard it.—"Ah, that's the alderman's new house, is it? I thought it was founded on dead men's bones—the bones of his own countrymen—killed in the wars with Napoleon, and by the treachery of the British English contractor—his leastwise, he wanted to be—sold secretly to the enemy!" If the alderman did make some of his money in this way, he had taken care to put not a fact in his teeth now; he will never again hear either the voice of praise or of blame. Peace be to him!

Anthony and Sleuth sat together alone late that night, both fatigued with the long-protracted business of the day, and with the excitement both had undergone. Anthony's thoughts were strangely mingled, and involved both pain and pleasure. The fact he had heard that day for the first time about his uncle's commercial transactions, and at first had disbelieved, he had been obliged to accept a few words with the lawyer, who, in the course of questions addressed as much as could be expected from him, supposing the story to be quite true, Anthony thought he wouldn't like to be the one to tell him that it was otherwise unpleasantly founded; and that thought led naturally to another—the murder, and the inoffaceable stain such an event fixed on the house. And then Anthony began to speculate on how he could pull down the house, which he thought ugly and fantastic enough, and build a new one; and so thinking, and planning, he caught himself wondering who would be likely to share it with him besides Richard Sleuth? and then for a long time he rested quite pleasantly on a host of general considerations about the person, voice, manner, and so on, of Clarissa Pompess.

Sleuth watched him from behind a convenient screen—not at all unwillingly to understand—perhaps from a faint smile—at all events, from some change of face—how Anthony thought the alderman's house would look at last, and lost no time in creating a diversion.

"Anthony," said he, "I think the officers must be waiting to speak to us. They've been some time ago, and I have been expecting them here; but perhaps they are stopping to refresh themselves in the kitchen."

Anthony sighed, as if with a sense of some agreeable vision passing away, and said:

"I wished they'd have done with the affair one way or the other. I wish they'd find the men, and make it clear they can't find them."

"Oh, here they are," said Sleuth, going to the door. "Yes, it is the chief officers, who have come to say they had completely failed. Sleuth guessed why, but the men themselves attributed their want of success to their not having had sufficient time to explore the ground after the rain, and many papers, including, as he now almost hoped, the coddicil; but whether there were also other reasons, such as suicides of which the thieves might have been identified, Sleuth knew not, and could not tell them.

"Well, Anthony," said he, after a pause, "I'm sure you must have employed cleverer officials than these gentlemen have proved themselves—no, nor men who were more determined to do their duty. I will say that much, though they did fancy, somehow, at first, I had been playing tricks with that mysterious coat. Is it worth while to send them off again?"

"Do the doctor" (who had, as magistrate, issued the warrant) "and the coroner think enough has been done?" asked Anthony.

"They must, sir, both on 'em," was the reply.

"Very well; stop them," said Anthony. "Dick, will you see them here?" he added, as Sleuth was about to retire, to indulge, if possible, in a revival of his vision; and Richard Sleuth was so liberal in satisfying the men, that they left him with a wish which they didn't scruple to avow—

"Wish you'd had the estate, sir!"

Sleuth smiled, and they parted with the best possible feelings on both sides.

"Dick," said Anthony, as he returned from his brief walk, "what's to be done about the alderman's letter? I shouldn't like to-night, the first after the funeral, to pass without something being settled. What do you advise?"

"Well, I have been thinking about it," said Sleuth, who spoke quite truthfully, for he saw good reasons why he should think about it, quite apart from Anthony's reasons for doing the same thing. "Yes, I have been thinking about it; and as you will be very busy here for some time—seeing people, looking into things, and enjoying yourself—"

"Ah! never mind the enjoyment," interposed Anthony.

"Well, but, as I say, you'll have a deal to think about and attend to at home. So, if you like to let me go, I'll do my best."

"I quite would like that very much. But don't you think I ought to go myself?"

"Well, Anthony, that depends. If you haven't anybody you can thoroughly trust."

"There, Dick, it's settled now. Be off. Get your portmanteau ready packed, eh?"

"No," said Sleuth, echoing back Anthony's laugh. "A carpet-bag, business, not mine. But then, if I do it for you when you want, why, it's you who are doing it in effect, isn't it?

"I like logic, Dick, because one can always twist and turn it about, till it does and says just what we want. I don't see that it can matter which of us two goes. I have my own knowledge to start with—the name of the vagabond husband—the name of the place where the miserable pair ever lived."

"No; but I feel pretty sure, if we hunt over the alderman's papers, we shall find letters, or things of that kind."

"Very good. Catch, Dick!" And Anthony threw a great bunch of keys across the table to his cousin; but Sleuth missed them, and they went to the ground with a loud clash. "There's the keys, just as the lawyer handed them over to me. Go where you like, if you feel industrious-minded. I don't. Now, then, I think we have done, and let's know the result; I'll await you here. In fact, I have a bit of a secret I want to talk to you about, when I feel I have got this off my mind."

"Very good. Catch, Dick!" And Anthony threw a great bunch of keys across the table to his cousin; but Sleuth missed them, and they went to the ground with a loud clash. "There's the keys, just as the lawyer handed them over to me. Go where you like, if you feel industrious-minded. I don't. Now, then, I think we have done, and let's know the result; I'll await you here. In fact, I have a bit of a secret I want to talk to you about, when I feel I have got this off my mind."

For a long time Sleuth was quite unsuccessful. But when he had finished his task of examining—after spending nearly two hours in his search, and including in it a close review of the contents of Anthony's box—the one that contained the whole of his writing-desk, apart from the alderman's bequest—he put before Anthony the following letter, written on dirty paper, and yellow with specks, and tears or more decay the young men knew not, though both noticed the fact in silence:

"Father.—I have sworn to God, on my bended knees, this night, never again to write to you, or to make to you a fresh appeal for mercy, forgiveness, aid, if you exert me now. Oh, father, I am in such distress and misery, that if you saw me, you would not know me—misery I have brought up, you could not but pity me—you could not! Oh, father, think—think before it is too late—of the little girl you loved so much, and spoiled so! Will you not again let me love you—let me confide in you? Oh, father, have bitterly I have repented my conduct—how my brain almost turned to a madness, and I am oh sick to hold my head with both hands that I may not shriek out in mad laughter as I see my children—Kitty, husband, and child—and a husband, who remind myself of my home, you, and your once unhappy child, Ellen, no more! Father, father! I speak wildly, then forgive it—understand it. It is the last time I shall do it. I will write no more; I will conceal even your very name from my babe, if I can, and die. —— No, I will not say what I was going to say. Oh, father, I am your own daughter in very soul, even in my passionateness and recklessness. Let me hear you will take me again to your arms—I and my babe—I do think, father, there is not in all this world a poor creature who will be so fond of love and gratitude as your once fondly treasured

HELEN.

There was no other name, for the unhappy woman had prudently kept out of her spread the name of the man whom she had married; but on the back of the letter there appeared the following endorsement:

Helen Stonor, 6 Margaret's Yard, Kirkgate, Leeds.

The spirit of the answer might be guessed from the spirit that had filled in here the missing name of the husband, but there is justice to the alderman. It must be observed that, when the poor heart-broken but resolved woman received the reply, which proved in effect her sentence of death, she did not peruse the whole of the contents of the letter, had, by his folly and conceit, destroyed for her all her chance by going to the alderman's house at the time when, who knew of her existence, but he had he thrown overboard if a reconciliation happened—and there seeing self, in spite of herself, in the end, she and her husband quite understood one another, and the game they were playing.

"Well, Dick, I wish to heaven you had managed to find the address without finding that letter. God help her! If I had known, and if the alderman had lived, I should have found it hard not to say something. However, there, then, is the only fact you must expect, I suppose, to help you. Get what money you like on my account from the lawyer, Mr. Stamp. He told me to resort to him, pending our making proper arrangements after the funeral.

"And now, Dick, if there's the heart of a man in us, we must, after this double appeal—the alderman's letter to me, and this unexpected appeal to us from the poor wretched, if it lives,"

"Oh, certainly—certainly. But I own, Anthony, I don't expect to find it alive."

"Why?" asked Anthony, sternly.

"Because—because children born under such circumstances seldom live long."

"Yes, that's true, Dick. But—excuse me and my habit of plain speaking—we have no right to think of aught that might incline us to be too easily satisfied. In fact, Dick, I'd go myself now in spite of all; but I should not like to seem both preaching and practicing against you.

"Anthony," said Sleuth, with great earnestness, "if, with all you have to attend to and think about, you are sure you can do it better than me, go."

"Well, Dick, you have me there—I'm not sure."

"Then don't go. I am sure. I'm as poor as a rat—no property to think about, nothing in the world to care for, unless it be my cousin and friend; and when he asks me to do this, and do it well, I—"

"Not a word more, Dick! You'll do it splendidly, and there's the end of the back boy or girl strapped to your back, in token of your love for it."

After the laugh thus produced, Anthony changed color a little, and Sleuth saw the "secret" must be coming.

"Dick," said he, with as much indifference as he could assume, "the doctor and Miss Pompess have promised to call in here to-morrow morning, and have lunch with me; and then I've said I'd go for a ride with them if I could find a decent horse."

"And you're afraid you can't, so soon?" asked Sleuth.

"Not exactly," said Anthony, with a half smile. "Dick— Hang it! how I do hesitate about the bush; and yet—yet—"

"Yet what?"

"Why, Dick, you've been such a correct chap, according to all accounts, that you're really beloved a little in explaining certain things. However, here goes. Dick, I have been leading a bad life—the alderman's bequest has really helped it and had cast me off, I should never have said he had wronged me. Confound it, Dick, when a man wrongs himself, it should be up with a cheer as we used to talking about wrongs done him by others. I have been extravagant—spent money in many ways I don't care to tell you, Dick, because I might spoil your life. You would have disapproved. Well, I got into debt. I don't know how much; but I should think, altogether, perhaps two or three thousand pounds. Dick, I'm really troubled, what an uncommon lively thing debt is?—how it grows and grows, when you have once set it going, without your knowing it—how double, or—confound it!—without your taking any of the pleasure either?"

"You mean by interest?" asked Sleuth.

"Oh, interest and discounts, and I don't know how many other strong commercial words."

"Well, but Anthony, you can pay off all that out of your own?"

"Exactly; but till they're paid, I'm not at all comfortable about the train that I see collecting behind."

"Train!" repeated Sleuth, dubiously.

"Oh, what an innocent you are! Don't you know that, by the time a man's debts in certain places have heard of my good fortune, and are burning with enthusiasm to share it with me? Why, my dear fellow, I'm not at all sure but I'm responsible I feel at the prospect of my visitors to-morrow, just, too, when the doctor and Miss Pompess will be calling."

Richard Sleuth read the many notes handed to him, which were inscribed in a wonderful variety of handwritings—from the most delicate female penmanship, to the rudest and vulgarest holding scrawl, where a few words covered the entire outside of the letter.

The readers of these notes did indeed get a vivid idea of Anthony's doings and friends at Oxford, Newmarket, and in London, from these epistles, which were all, in one manner or another, mixed congratulation; of self-surety that the writers would be welcomed, when they came to pay their respects to the new lord; and of how they could make one agreeable to him—the day after the funeral —and, in many cases, of suggestive remarks about wares or other mysterious matters of the choicest kind the writers had to introduce to him.

"A pretty locale we shall have if they all come! But, by the lord, if they do, I'll play them a trick. I don't yet start on your journey till after to-morrow. I must look to you, Dick, to help me out of this. I wouldn't for the world have the—the doctor catch me with such people. And I say, Dick," added Anthony, with a smile of intense enjoyment breaking out all over his face, "I've got a thought, and I think I've hit on a way to get rid of I'm man enough to work it out. But I say, Dick, do you happen to know whether uncle ever got (for your benefit, you rogue, not mine) a picture he often threatened to buy and hang up—that famous print of the Rake's Progress—the first of the series —where the heir—"

"It's very odd, Anthony, if you are speaking only in joke, but the alderman did, the very week I came here, bring home such a print, and talk of having it framed and hung over his mind, gave it to me, and I put it away in my box."

"His! he must have meant that for me, I fear, and, when I was there with, cared no more. You were too good, Dick, to note it. Well, get it out, hang it up in the most conspicuous place you can in the dining-room, and when the delightful-minded visitors come to-morrow, let them be shown in there, and there have what they like to eat and drink; and who knows but what, looking on that picture, they'll take the hint and be off?"

Sleuth looked in Anthony's face, as if wondering whether Anthony really thought his "Friends" were likely to be got rid of so easily, or whether he was merely jesting; but Anthony imprudently got him an incredulous look back, began to smoke, and, in a moment, turned till bed-time, he scarcely spoke another word.

When Sleuth awoke next morning, Anthony was knocking at his door, and shouting:

"I say, old fellow, you're rather late; don't you forget my face. The advance-guard's already in sight!"

"I say, boy, where does that right hand road go to?" inquired a pedestrian of a country rustic.

"I don't know, sir," replied the boy. "mine been "where since we lived here."

REDMOND O'HANLON,
THE IRISH BRIGAND.

REDMOND O'HANLON and his rapparees and a system of black mail succeeded the Cromwellian struggle in Ireland. The north was his favorite haunt; but he is said to have been connected with bands who took toll through all parts of the island, and met four times in the year to adjust the division of the spoils.

The O'Hanlons being of the old race and old religion, and Redmond, gentle by birth and generous by nature, the peasants and small farmers stood in no fear of him, but were ever on the watch for his safety. Farmers, traveling peddlers, and people in middling circumstances, on paying Redmond, or a trusty agent, half a crown per annum, were safe from plunder; and if, through mistake, they suffered at the hands of strangers, their losses were made good on information being conveyed to the chief.

One day meeting a poor man, who was going to sell his one cow to pay his rent, and pitying his his case, he lent him five pounds, and bade him appoint any time and place he chose for repayment. Strange to say, the trust was punctually kept and the debt discharged.

Being in want of arms, he presented himself to the commander of the garrison in Armagh, dressed in a country gentleman's, and requested him to allow a few of his men to go with him beyond a certain place, where he suspected the great outlaw to be concealed. The chief, in good sum of money about him, and did not wish to lose it." The colonel complied; and Redmond and his guard met and dined together for about seven miles. Every man had drank more or less on the way at the country gentleman's expense, and when he was about dismissing them, after a parting glass from his own flask, they were only too ready, at his suggestion, to fire a feu de joie in honor of his safe delivery. Instantaneously a whistle brought a party of fellows from behind with charged guns, and the poor red coats had to resign muskets, bayonets and every regimental article of use, and walk back to Armagh in their pigtails.

Redmond was once pursued by the military for nearly three days, during all which time he had scarcely got out of the saddle. At last, in desperation, he entered the house of a friend, and fell to a breakfast of bread and butter, and milk. He had scarcely commenced when the house was surrounded, and the captain, leaning over the half-door, said, in a polite tone:

"Captain O'Hanlon, you are the king's prisoner; resistance is useless."

"So I perceive," was the answer; "but, as you have not allowed me to take a meal for three days, I am sure you will not disturb me now till my hunger is satisfied."

The request being reasonable, was granted. Redmond coming to the end of his milk in great roundels, which he sprung on, seized his cold barbuss, with which he covered the officer, till he had cleared the half-door, and the surprise, and the fear of being shot, prevented the soldiers at each side from firing at him till he had got to some distance. Being much refreshed with his good breakfast, and the soldiers tired out, he escaped with a slight wound or two.

The great southern robber, Power, hearing of Redmond's fame, came to the north to make his acquaintance. Stopping for the night at a country inn, he observed a comfortable-looking man, who, after the family had gone to bed, was observing him, passed a well-filled purse from one pocket to another. Next morning he managed to overtake the man with his horse on the side of a wood, and ordered him to stand and deliver.

"I will-deliver," said the other, "when I cannot help it," and taking a loaded pistol from his holster, he fired at Power.

The weapon of the other was discharged at the same moment, but neither of the men was materially injured, only they threw their swords, and hewed away for some time at each other, first on horseback, and then, by mutual consent, on foot. Both were skilful swordsmen, and after a variety fencing on both sides, remained still safe from any serious wound, but much fatigued.

"Let us rest a while," said Redmond, "I never met my match till now. Who in the world are you?"

"I am Power, of Cork, and you must be either the devil or Redmond O'Hanlon. I came here all the way to see that celebrated man."

"Confound your stupidity, and my own, also! Here we are trying to kill each other, and what would have become of our followers?"

Of course mutual embraces and kisses also followed, for all the fighting that had not ceased in Ireland. Power assisted Redmond for half a year, but finally got tired of oaten-bannocks, and returned to give his native province the benefit of his personal presence and prowess.

O'Hanlon's life did not entirely prejudice him against law and order. Meeting a poor peddler one day bitterly lamenting his disfigurement from that he had just been robbed of five pounds in money, and likewise of his box, and moreover that he had been licked and ill-treated by that notorious robber, Redmond O'Hanlon, he roared at the fellow, and applied a title to him which reflected on his mother's good name.

"You son of a —— gentleman," said he, "the rogue that robbed me said he was Redmond O'Hanlon."

"Let's follow him," said the other, "and never fear that I won't make him sing to another tune!"

Coming up to the thief, they eased him of his late acquaintances, which Redmond, resolving to the right owner, bound him over to prosecute the robber at the next assizes. He then wrote the following mittimus, and intrusted it and the thief to three trusty followers, to be delivered over to the charge of the Armagh gaoler.

"By Redmond O'Hanlon, de loco one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for County Armagh, and chief ranger of the mountains.

"I herewith send you the body of —— who was this day brought before me, and examined for robbing Mr. —— on the king's high-road, requiring of you to hold him in safe custody till next general assizes to be held for the said county, and for your so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given under my hand and seal this 4th of March, 1695.

"REDMOND O'HANLON.

"To ——, Gaoler of Armagh."

However informal the commitment, the rogue was secured, and sworn home next day by the peddler. Audience, officers, counselors, judge, and all, joined in one roar of laughter at point's of the trial when O'Hanlon's magisterial interference came before the court.

As the chivalrous Robin Hood suffered more than one defeat from tanners, tinkers, and stout beggars, so Redmond met a compliment in a shopkeeper's apprentice. This youth's master having to receive a good round sum of money in Newry, was afraid to risk an encounter with Redmond or some of his gang on his return to Dundalk, his native town. In his perplexity his apprentice, sixteen years of age, proffered his services, which, after some hesitation, were accepted. The youth, in the words of Mr. Cosgrave, "dressed himself in the roguish and knavish fashion," went to the field and brought home an old vicious screw (much of the same humor with Sir Teague O'Regan's war-horse, on which he rode out to meet Duke Schomberg, after the surrender of Charlemont), that, when any other came up to meet him on the road, he always strove to bite or kick him, by which means he commonly kept the road to himself."

As he wended on his way he was overtaken by Redmond O'Hanlon, with whom he very freely entered into discourse, making no secret of his business, or of his expectation of being about the same time on the same road on return with one hundred pounds in his possession.

"I wonder," said his fellow-traveler, "you are so free in your communications with strangers; how can you be sure but that I may be Redmond O'Hanlon or one of his gang?"

"Oh, ho!" said the boy, bursting out laughing, "such a simple looking gentleman as you to be a robber! Do you think I haven't eyes?"

"Well, at all events, I advise you to be more discreet. Redmond is famous at disguises, and will spy you if he gets wind of your business. Here's a crown for you to drink my health, but keep a bridle on your tongue."

The grateful youth, sobering at once, made the promise.

And even as the boy expected, the gentleman overtook him on the return next day, and conversation was resumed.

"Well, my boy, I suppose from your looks you have done well with my bad company, and your money is safe?"

"Indeed is it, sir; many thanks for your good advice."

"How are you carrying it?"

"In the two ends of this ticket wallet."

"Dear me! I would like to feel the weight of it out of curiosity," said he approvingly, but the horse lashed out, and he was obliged to keep his distance.

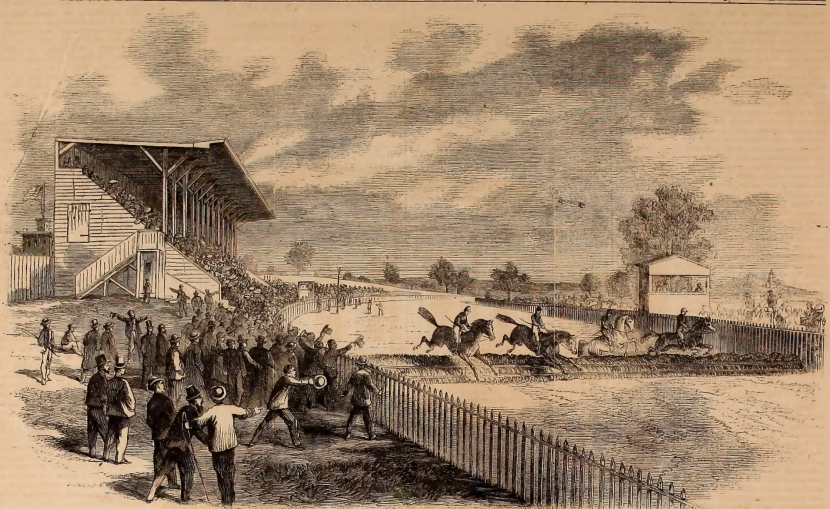
"Throw over that wallet," said he, rather sternly for such a nice spoken gentleman.

"Oh, sir, honey, sure you wouldn't rob me! What would your master say?"

"I don't know, but this is what I say: If you don't surrender it at once, I will send a bullet through you, and another through your garran."

The youth, seeing his master and money be robbed till I was in danger of my life. Here is the money; but you must take the trouble of crossing the ditch for it."

So saying he heaved the bag over the slough that bordered the road and the hedge beyond it, into the next field. This answer the gentleman may, but Sleuth thought the prize worth the trouble, he dismounted, scrambled over the dyke and fence higher up, and laid hands on the bag. Hearing a clatter, he put his head, looked over the fence, and saw the innocent youth making the road to Dundalk short on his own (Redmond's) good steed, and the other pursuing a parallel course on the road, and longing for some one to let fly at.



He was enraged for being so taken in, but much more when he found the two ends of the ticket wallet contained nothing more valuable than the copper halfpence of the time, value for thirty or forty shillings.

Redmond must leave our antlaw, incumbered with his copper, and not daring to lay hands on the ill-tempered, dangerous garran left at his discretion. The boy arrived safe in Dundalk with the hundred pieces quilted into his waistcoat.

After many escapes from armed foes and from private enemies, Redmond was treacherously killed by his own foster brother for the sake of the reward, an almost unprecedented crime in his country.

His followers, when obliged, took an oath of secrecy, never to shed blood unless in self-defence, never to rob a poor person, nor to offer violence to a woman.

DR. DULK recently swam across Lake Constance at its widest part. He had carried his plan of crossing over in his head for five years, and until this year succeeded in it. In July, 1860, he had gone more than half the distance, and was then so overcome with cold in the water, when a thunderstorm arose, and the lake became agitated, that he was forced to turn though he gave up the attempt. In 1862 the very same thing happened again; and in the bold swimmer's third attempt, three hours in the water, a violent wind agitated the waves of the lake in such a manner that he had to return. At length, in 1865, the feat was accomplished. A boat followed at the distance of 12 feet; the swimmer only stopped once, to swallow a little wine handed to him from the boat. Arrived on the other shore, and having near the castle at Friedrichshaven, Herr Dulk landing near the castle at Friedrichshaven, felt he enjoyed a good draught of beer, and afterwards felt no other inconvenience than that of his face and back having to wait for a new skin, the old one having been completely peeled off by the hours and a half exposure under an almost tropical sun.

THE FALL MEETING OF THE HUDSON COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY, AT THE HOBOKEN COURSE, SECAUCUS, HUDSON COUNTY, N. J.—THE HURDLE RACE ON WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 13.

THE HOBOKEN FALL RACES.

THE avidity with which all classes now welcome athletic sports, horse-racing, Highland pastimes, and every other description of open air exercise, is a gratifying proof that the day of muscular development and physical training for the masses is rapidly dawning, nd that those pursuits will not be any longer confined to a class of fast men, known as sports, and whose conduct has thrown a scandal upon what otherwise are healthy and morally wholesome pastimes. The best way to purify any occupation, is to throw it open to the people, whose good common sense soon compels the exceptional men to find their level. From the list of manly sports, as they are called, we must, however, always except pugilism, the only remaining excuse for which, namely, that it discountenanced the use of pistols and knives, has long ago been crushed by the undeniable fact, that in no class is the use of the revolver and the knife more common than among the pugilists themselves.

The Hoboken fall races, under the management of the Hudson County Association, commenced on Tuesday, September 12, and continued till the succeeding Friday. On Wednesday the most peculiar feature in their programme, the hurdle race, came off, and was capitally contested, affording the spectator the highest gratification. The entries were Zigzag, five years, carrying 155lb; Nannie Craddock, carrying 105lb; Gerry Oakle, 135lb; and Lillie Parker, aged 4 years, and carrying 98lb. On starting, Nannie Craddock was the favorite.

Nannie Craddock was first off, and she cleared the first hurdle ahead of the others, Zigzag being last over. She quickly opened a gap, and on jumping the second hurdle she was three lengths ahead of Zigzag, who had passed his horses. The third hurdle was cleared in the same style, Nannie Craddock having a strong lead, and passing the stand six lengths ahead of Zigzag, who was two lengths in front of Lillie Parker. The Canadian mare kept her lead all the way round, the rider of Zigzag waiting quietly till they came on the home straight, trusting to his horse's superior speed to win the race. The last hurdle was taken by Nannie four lengths ahead, and now the momentous struggle commenced. At every stride Zigzag drew closer, but the mare had too great a lead to be overcome in the limited distance, and she crossed the score two lengths ahead of Zigzag, a winner of the race in four minutes sixteen and a half seconds. Garry Oaldis was third.

NOVEL METHOD OF TESTING THE ENGINES OF THE GOVERNMENT GUNBOATS ALGONQUIN AND WINOOSKI, AT THE DOCK, FOOT OF DELANCEY STREET, EAST RIVER, NEW YORK.

Our Artist's sketch was taken at the moment the horses started. It was a two mile dash, over eight hurdles of three and a half feet, and was for $400 10 per cent. to be given to the second horse.

The assemblage was very large, and included a very fair sprinkling of the beauty and fashion of the surrounding parts. Mr. Francis and Mr. James Harvey Lyons, the manager and secretary of the association, deserve much praise for the admirable manner in which they have organized this association.

GREAT STEAM CONTEST
Between the Winooski and Algonquin.

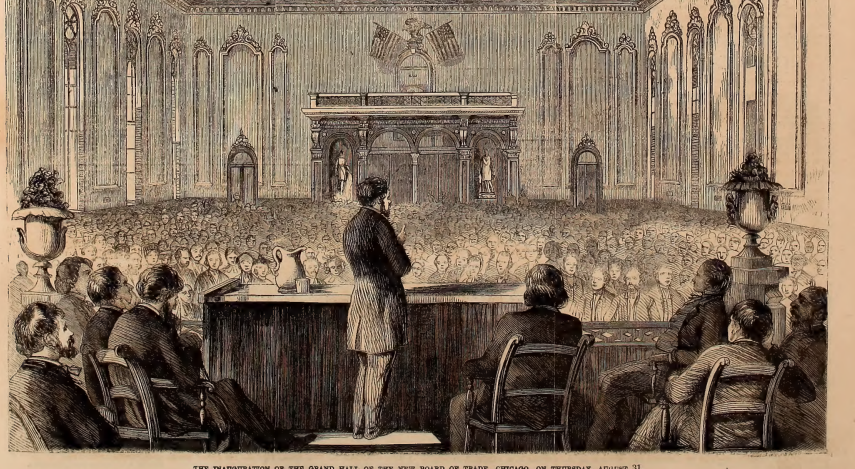
Some few of our readers may not be aware that there has been for some time a feud raging between the Government Engineer Isherwood and Mr. Forbes, of Providence, R. I. The feud we mean, however, is a scientific and not a personal one, and really rests between the unvindictive, unreasoning, although occasionally very destructive things, the steam engines of the gunboat Winooski, constructed by the Navy Department, under the direction of Mr. Isherwood, and the engines of the Algonquin, manufactured by Mr. Forbes, from plans and drawings made by Mr. Dickerson. Mr. Dickerson was so confident of the superior merits of his engine, that he challenged his opponent to a trial of speed between the two boats. Mr. Welles has done many original things in his life, such as building Noah's ark—this being, however, before his beard was full grown, we will allow him to have all the benefit of acknowledged youthfulness in that naval adventure—but we question if he, or any other man, ever hit upon a more original plan for testing the force and speed of anything than by tying them to a post, to see which could pranee his feet quickest; even a couple of horses, placed in a mill, would be more to the purpose. As, however, Mr. Secretary Welles would not budge from his plan, Messrs. Forbes and Dickerson had to submit, and the novel spectacle is now presented to the great amusement of the scientific world, of two war steamers fastened to the pier, at the foot of Delancy street, East River, getting up their steam to see how many revolutions per minute they can achieve. Th to a certain extent it is a test cannot be denied, but that it is about the most ridiculous is equally certain. So far as the trial has hitherio gone, the advantage seems to rest with the Winooski, since on Tuesday the Algonquin (Dickerson's boat) made 134½ revolutions with 63lb of steam, while the Winooski made 16 revolutions with 35lb of steam. As a curiosity of science and naval management, our Artist has given a sketch of this interesting experiment.

THE NEW HALL OF TRADE AND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, WASHINGTON STREET, CHICAGO.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY W. SHAW, CHICAGO.

THE NEW HALL OF TRADE
And Chamber of Commerce, Chicago—Its Opening Day.

The temple just erected to the goddess of commerce in Chicago is a very fine structure, and worthy the great city it ornaments. It is situated in Washington street, and faces the Court House. Its style of architecture is the composite, or Roman Italian, perhaps not the most appropriate for so large a building, but still the effect is very good. The grand front has five windows of 27 feet by 5, with no exception of the centre, which is 50 feet by 10. These range over the portico, which consists of three arches, supported by Corinthian columns, over which is a balcony. On a frieze, between the arches and the balcony, the name of the building is inscribed, "Chamber of Commerce," and directly over the balcony are the words, "Board of Trade." The portico leads up a flight of steps into the vestibule, which extends the entire length of the building, with a number (some 14) of splendid offices on each side of it. These are nearly all occupied by the leading merchants, such as Culver & Co., Davis, Pope & Co., S. P. Carter, and by several banks, amongst them Sturges' bank, and City National Bank, which are located in Nos. 1 and 2. Both sides of the building face respectively on La Salle street and Exchange place. Here are 18 windows, which light up the hall on the grand floor. There is an entrance door also on each side, and these are directly opposite each other. The lower offices and the main hall are divided by a plain frieze, without ornament, and the building is covered by a Mansard roof, surrounded by a parapet, which, in front of the building, is surmounted by a clock, with a seven feet dial plate, the largest in the west. The roof is 17 feet high from the cornice, and contains the timber construction for the support of the ceiling of the main hall. It is lighted by eight oval windows on each side, and by two in the front.

The dimensions of the main building are 93 feet by 181, and the height 100 feet. The size of the hall is 86½ by 145½, and the height 45 feet clear.



Adjoining the building, from this floor, is another, 23 feet by 100, devoted to offices for the Board of Trade, and the two are connected by a covered bridge.

The ascent to the hall is by a double flight of stairs, from the ground floor, and these lead to it directly both to the right and left. The visitor will scarcely be prepared for the magnificent sight which bursts upon him the moment that he enters this splendid hall. It satisfies the eye, even the most critical, if not in all its details, then at least in the grandeur of its dimensions, the beautiful light afforded by the stately and majestic windows, the harmony o the coloring, and the general character of the designs. Its loftiness is absolutely inspiring, and the effect is very imposing. It is elaborately adorned with elegant designs and ornaments, frescoes, and paintings. These exhibit a great deal of talent, and an amount of artistic culture which we are glad to record to the credit of Chicago workmen.

The hall is lighted with Frink's reflectors in the top of the roof. The glare of the bright tin mars the effect of the colored emblazonry in which they are set, at all events by daylight; otherwise, they are a great improvement upon the old plan of illumination.

The ceiling is divided into two large circles, surrounded by frescoes representing Peace and Plenty, with the products of Ceres and Pomona, such as sheaves of golden grain, and baskets of delicious-looking fruit arrayed around them. The circles are enclosed in squares, and in the eight corners are various pictures demonstrative of western trade and commerce—such as the grain elevator, pork-packing house, saw-mill, flouring-mill, railway-train, canal boat, a great river packet, ploughing scene, etc.

Our picture represents the opening of this important institution. The ceremonies were very imposing, and conducted with great effect and decorum. President Randolph, of the Board of Trade, delivered the inaugural address, after which Mrs. S. I. Anderson, of Maine, and Mr. I. S. Roper, of Boston, made eloquent and appropriate speeches. The proceedings altogether were very satisfactory, and worthy of the great city.

THE INAUGURATION OF THE GRAND HALL OF THE NEW BOARD OF TRADE, CHICAGO, ON THURSDAY, AUGUST 31.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A CITIZEN of Washington who owned a very ugly and vicious dog named him "Wirt," and then shot him.

WHEN the committee of the French Academy were employed in preparing the well-known Acad my Dictionary, Cuvier, renown d for his wit as well as his learning, came one day into the room where they were holding a session.

"Come to see you, Mr. Cuvier," said one of the 40; "we have just finished a definition which we think quite satisfactory, but on which we would like to have your opinion. We have be en defining the word crab, and explained it thus: 'Crab, a small red fish which walks backwards.'"

"Perfect, gentlemen," said Cuvi r, "only if you will give me leave, I will make one small observation in natural History. The crab is not a fish, it is not red, it does not walk backwards. With these exceptions your definition is excellent."

"THAT was a horrible affair," said a gentleman in company, "the murder of Dean, and the sealing up of his remains in a tin box!"

"What Dean?" asked half a dozen voices at once.

"Sir Dean," replied the wag.

A NEW York Sabbath school teacher asked a young pupil the meaning of "the wages of sin is death." The boy did not know what wages were, and was asked, "Wat his father got on Saturday night?"

"Drunk," was the answer.

"Poor fellow! So young too! Well, sooner or later we all find ourselves in the pleasures of life.

"The boy cried, "Oh!" And has anything happened to Sister

Is Sir Oping F"—No! and but he has taken a wife."

"WELL, farmer, you told us your place was a good place for hunting; now we have tramped it for three hours, and have found no game."

"Just so. 2 calculate, as a general thing, the less game there is, the more hunting you have."

A GREAT deal has been said about Death on the Pale Horse, but in view of the railroad mortality, people are now beginning to talk about Death on the Iron Horse.

"ALL morning bitters have a heating tendency or effect," said a doctor to a young lady.

"You are quite a bitter cold morning, won't you, doctor?" inquired the lady.

YOUNG HOPEFUL TO BANKRUPT PARENT.—"Papa, what am I like Mr. Lowe ?"

B. P.—"Can't say, dear; don't see any resemblance.

Y. H.—"Why, I'm going to be his c'nosign (sereuat)."

B. P.—" Don't see it."

AN Irish lad, having been asked if the man who had just flogged him was his own father, replied:

"Yis, sure he is the parent in me; but he tries me as if he was son by another father and mother, but luck to him!"

THE following will be found at Portsmouth, upon the tombstone of a carpenter, inscribed by his widow:

Here lies Jeremy Little, a carpenter industrious,
A very good natured man, but somewhat blasterous:
When that his knife with his authority withstood,
He took a little stick and hamm'd it down for good.
His wife now left alone her loss does so implore,
She will take a little stick to hang her a little more:
For now he's dead and gone his fault appears so small,
A little thing would make her think it was no fault at all.

AN innkeeper observed a postilion with only one spur, and inquired the reason.

"Why, what would be the use of another?" said the postilion; "if one side of the horse goes, the other can't stand still."

DOWN east there resides a certain M.D. Good spirit said he was aroused from his slumber by a very loud knocking at his door. After some hesitation he went to the window, and asked:

"Who's there?"

"A friend," was the answer.

"What do you want?"

"Want to stay here all night."

"Stay here, indeed! was the benevolent reply.

"I SAY, Mr. Johnson, did you hear 'bout de catalepsy dat befell Phillus?"

"Of course I did, fo'—what was it?"

"You see, the doctor ordered a blister on her chist; well, as she lay on de table, he blow, she got an ox de hand-box, and it drawed her new pink bonnet out ob shape, and she 'peared so mad."

THE following colloquy actually took place at an eastern post-office:

Pat—"I say, Mr. Postmaster, is there a letther for me?"

"Who are you, my good sir?"

"I'm sure I don't know who I am."

"Well, what is your name?"

"Arrah, and what did you the name? isn't it on the letther?"

"So that I can find the letter, if there is one."

"Well, Pat Byrne, thin, if you must have it."

"No, sir, there is none for Pat Byrne."

"Is there no way to get in there but through this spne of an office?"

"No, sir."

"It's hard for ye there isn't. I'd teach ye hether manners than to insist on a gentleman's name; but ye didn't get it sthrait—I'm aven wid ye; divil a bit is my name Byrne!"

WHAT is the difference between a couple of mermaids quarreling and unmarried women?

The former are two sea-daughters, and the latter two sea-sons.

WHITE paper for newspaper is now being extensively made, in this country, out of bamboo. Is not this putting the mark of cane upon the press?

A YOUNG man was observed the other day in the neighborhood of the new Cattle market, playing at pitch and toss in the open streets. Such is the progress of civilization!

SOME one has called riddles the last resource of weak minds, but we must say this no longer, since if report tells true, the Bishop of Oxford entertained the Prince of Wales during the Clergy Corporation dinner the other day, by asking him a whole string of riddles, at which it is said, his Royal Highness laughed immoderately. The last I heard was the following: "Why is it probable that the volunteer riflemen prefer merry-dale archeries? Because they hate to see a Miss at Wimbledon."

SHOOKS' wife loves to make bread, because it cheas her when he beatifully.

MOCK no man for his snub-nose, for you never can tell what may turn up.

A CHARACTER, like a kettle, once mended, always wants mending.

"NOBODY ever lost anything by love," said a sage-looking man.

"That's not true," said a lady, who heard the remark, "for I once lost three nights' sleep."

"I think our church will last a good many years yet," said a waggish deacon to his minister; "I see the sleepers are very sound."

"I SUPPOSE," said a quack, while feeling the pulse of a patient, "that you think me a humbug?"

"Sir," replied the sick man, "I perceive you can discover a man's thoughts by his pulse."

"ARE you fond of Hogg's Tales?" said a rather verdant lady to a sly gbred.

"Yes: I likes 'em roasted wi' salt on 'em, was the response.

"No—but I mean have you read Hogg's Tales?"

"Why," said the humorist, "our hogs are all white or black—I don't think there is a red one among 'em."

A CLERGYMEN recently illustrated his argument on the subject of temperance in a very clever way. A pleasant piece of witticism. He said that "the child, whose nurse started in a passion, was only coaching like a locomotive on the wrong track—it takes the switch to get off."

FREDERICK the Great wrote to one of his generals: "I send you with 60,000 men against the Austrians. On narrowing the troops, his troops were found but 59,000. The officer expressed his surprise at such a mistake on the part of his sovereign. Frederick's reply was, "I counted you for 10,000 men."

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF

PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, is a most WONDERFUL and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is NOISELESS in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and makes the Genuine Lock Stitch. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and will Hem, Fell, Stitch, Tuck, Quilt, Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c.; requires no Lubrication or Change of Stitch—is NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a LIFETIME. This is truly a WONDERFUL LITTLE MACHINE, and is offered as advertised; and it does sew run over the work; IT WORKS ON A CABLE, and all its work is seen through it.

"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Housekeeper it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can operate it."—The Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—The Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement of patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box, with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Rose Seymour,

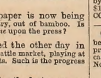
The Story of a BALLET GIRL'S LIFE. Just issued. Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ELLIOTT & CO., Publishers, 128 Nassau st., N. Y.
521-23

All who want to know how to raise Pigeons,

Use the Book, entitled "Practical Pigeon Fancier," 20 other Secrets, address with red stamp, H. B. WILLIS, 84 Nassau street, New York. 521-24

The True Art of Producing a Liteness



Of your future Wife or Husband. Madame Le Grand, Clairvoyant, by the aid of the Psychometer, a newly invented French instrument of intense power, can produce a perfect likeness of your future husband or wife, with initials of name, pecuniary circumstances, and date of marriage. She will also tell you whether your married life will be happy or otherwise. State age, color of hair, and eyes, and enclose 50 cents and a three cent stamped envelope. Address MADAME LE GRAND, P. O. Drawer 5223, Boston, Mass. 521-23

Spanish Curling Cream,

Warranted to Curl the most straight or Stiff Hair, in one hour for $1. Address GEO. BLACKIE & CO., 713 Broadway, N. Y. tf

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The

Ulcers, Tumors, etc., which arise from impure blood, or other constitutional disorders frequently do not yield but cannot resist the action of these medicines. Numerous preparations of sarsaparilla, called by the name of cosmetics, drive the disease inward and peril life, while these remedies are really safe and efficacious in a radical cure.

New Patent Snap and Catch Book.

Takes every fish that bites. Springs open in his mouth. Sells all orders promptly. Agents wanted. Send 25 cents for sample book and terms, to JOSEPH BRIGGS, 339 Broadway, New York.

$10 Per day made selling the Sketches

(11) entitled the "SOUTHERN PRISONS OF UNITED STATES CAPTIVES and Rescues from Libby and ANDERSONVILLE PRISONS," with key (24 pages) explanation. It is decidedly the best selling illustrated historical work that has ever been presented to the public, and will be purchased by almost everybody. Copies sent free to agents on receipt of $1.25. Call on, or address with stamp, HOPKINS & CO., 74 Bleecker street, New York.

Comic Card Photographs of the latest and most ludicrous. Agents wanted. Sample 25 cents. Large profits and quick sales. Send 10 cents for sample and catalogue to H. AVIDSON & CO., No. 660 Broadway, New York.

Something New.

Send 26 cents and one red stamp for an article that every young lady and gentlemen wants.

Address E. R. HALL, Box 209,
New London, Conn.

WONDERS WILL NEVER CEASE!!

During a residence in Spain, I obtained of a Spanish senora a recently extracted Vegetable Balm, the only instrument in the world capable of producing a fac-simile likeness of the human face. Any person desiring to produce an accurate PHOTOGRAPH of your future wife or husband, also, the date of marriage, the future age, height, color of eyes and hair, and enclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly address it to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail.

MISS FANNIE A. MASON,
P. O. Drawer 32, Albany, New York.

Look Here, Boys!

My Golden Compound will force the beard to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days. Satisfaction given or money refunded. Sent by mail for 50 cents, or three packages for $1. Address P. MASON, A. JAGGERS, Calhoun Ill.

METROPOLITAN ENTERPRISE

GREAT GIFT SALE

OF THE

New York & Providence

JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.

Capital—$1,000,000!

Depot, 559 Broadway.

An immense stock of Pianos, Watches, Jewelry and Fancy Goods, all to be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you see what you will receive.

CERTIFICATES,

Naming each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents; five for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 65 for $10; and 100 for $15.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to pay the dollar and take the article. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, Sewing Machine, or any set of Jewelry on our list, for $1; and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. Address

C. M. BUNN & CO.,
559 Broadway, New York.

☞ Immense Depots have also been opened in Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati, under the management of Messrs. BUNN & CO.

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York.

Try Wards India-Rubber Enameled

PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS

ALSO WARD'S FRENCH PRINTED

PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS.

AT ALL GENTS FURNISHING STORES.

The Trade supplied at

No 387 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Greatest Convenience of the Age!

ASHLEY'S

PATENT SCREW EGG BEATER.

The only one that can be used in a small vessel, or that will beat from one egg to any required number. All other beaters must be attached to some place to be used; this needs only to be held in the hand. Will do the work thoroughly in less than a minute. Durable, simple and cheap. Warranted to give satisfaction. For sale by all House Furnishing and Hardware stores. Agents wanted. Sample, post-paid, for 50 cents. Circulars free. E. K. ASHLEY, Sole Manufacturer,
523-26 Office of Sandusky Mirror, Sandusky, O.

$90 A Month.—

Agents wanted for six entirely new articles, just out. Address O. T. CAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine. 521-33

Fifty Method of Employment, Arts,

Secrets, Ways to make Money, &c. Sent everywhere for $1, worth $100. Address

W. FRIZZELL,
Baltimore, Md.

A New and Useful Invention.

A Kerosene Oil Burner that gives a brilliant light without smoke or odor, and without being a chimney. Send 50 cents and get sample by return mail, and try it. Address NEW YORK LAMP CO., 222 Pearl st., N.Y.

HEALTH! UTILITY!! ECONOMY!!!

Self-Stirring Coffee Roasting Machine,

FOR FAMILY USE.

Price: No. 1, $5; No. 2, $6; No. 3, $7.

MADE AND SOLD BY

Eureka Manufacturing Company,

106 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

S. B. WARD, Agent, (Principal Salesroom) 17 Cortlandt Street, New York.

STATE AND COUNTY RIGHTS FOR SALE.

1,000,000 Purchasers Wanted.

Articles to sell everybody. Catalogue sent free. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 521-31

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

It is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh, etc., besides being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S ITALIAN MEDICATED SOAP imparts to the hair more freshness, upper lip, or any part of the face, more whiskers than any preparation. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE, for flushed, red and heated faces. GOURAUD'S ITALIAN DEPILATORY, for removing superfluous hair, 450 Broadway.

The genuine of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them for the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS.—Gilbender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co., Boston; Jenkins, Pittsburgh; Stowe, Cincinnati; Hall, Burlington; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$8 IMPORTED $10 WATCH

FINE European Watches, direct from our own manufactory, for wholesale, Country and Retail Orders at REDUCED PRICES.

AN ELEGANT WATCH in Fine Gold-Plated, Double Case, Richly Engraved, English Full Plate Jewelled Movements, Guaranteed Perfect Time-keepers and Reliable. Fine Enameled White Dial and Fancy Hands, Correct Timekeeper, with Key, Case, Chain, Locket and Charm, with Beautiful GOLD LOCKET, Double Hunting-Case for fine Ladies and Gents, all complete. Sent by express to any of the country free, for only $10.

A HANDSOME Ladies' Watch, Serviceable Pattern, Small Size, in Heavy Double Cases, same as the $10 Watch, with Key, Case, Chain, Gold Locket, &c., sent free for only $8.

The Great Imperial Watch,

containing a Rare and Wonderful Combination of Movements, with Accurate, Beautiful and Correct Astronomical Movements, an accurately adjusted Marine's Compass in combination, with Dial, and a Reliable Calendar, indicating day of month, week, etc., rendering this Watch a perfect timepiece. Handsomely Engraved Cases of great value to the Soldier, Sailor, Farmer, and every one who desires a RELIABLE AND VALUABLE WATCH. This valuable Watch is encased in Finely Finished DOUBLE CASES, with Heavy Hunting Cases over the outer cases being of fine 18 Carat Gold, inner cases of Solid Gold Composition, with Bright Dial, and Jewel for Name. Genuine English Improved Jewelled Movements, Hunting Movements, Polished Cap, Self-acting Stem Polished Click, Hands, Dial, and Jewelled Actions. This Watch is sent by express, as a Rare Invitation of a $200 watch, used by the Royal Princes and Officers of the Imperial Russian Army, as their standard time-keeper. None Genuine without these marks. Sent to any part of the country, ample one, all complete, by mail, to any part of the army or country, $30. Fine Silver Duplex Watches, $20. Officers AMERICAN LEVERS, Pure Silver Hunting-Case, only $30. English Levers, $40. Ladies' Diamond Watches as low as $30.

CATELY BROTHERS, Sole Importers,
102 Nassau St., N. Y. Established 1853.

Just Published.

FUN! FUN!!

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JEFFERSON DAVIS, price 25 cents. Sent by mail on receipt of price. C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid, for $1. 100 Photographs of Rebel Generals for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address 521-26 O. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

Every Man his own Printer.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Press, $10, $16, $23 and $36. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, $20, $30, $65 and $105. Send stamp for the LOW PRICED PRESS COMPANY, 23 Water street, Boston.

$25 A Day.—

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address SHAW & CLARK,
521-33 Biddeford, Maine.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—

Send 25 cents for sample, containing 12 Cards (new), $1.25 per hack; $10 per dozen; also Marbled Inch Playing Cards, $1.50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price. Address FORWARDING AGENCY, 59 Liberty street, N. Y. tf

CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERYBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Harness, Trunks, Valises, &c., 250 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 521-33

THOSE HANDSOME FAIRY ALBUMS

For holding 40 Pictures..... $1 25
For holding 60 Pictures, Gilt Edges..... $1 50
Agents, Jobbers, send stamp for samples and trade list. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. Call and see for yourself. Send stamp for Catalogues. 521-33

Agents WANTED Agents WANTED

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 521-33

Booksellers, Stationers,

and General Dealers, send for our Catalogue of Books, Prints, Albums, &c., 128 Nassau street, New York. 521-33

"Wonders never cease," neither does the immense sale of that greatest of modern wonders,

The American Pocket Timekeeper.

Price One Dollar!!

A triumph of science. The most novel and useful invention of the age. WARRANTED to keep time more than with greater accuracy than the most expensive gold or silver watch, and will last a life time. Now put out of order; while its extremely low price places it within the reach of all. Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price for the MILLION. Price, with white enamelled dial, in gold or silver foil, $1. Sent securely by mail, post-paid. CAUTION.—This invention is the so e and exclusive property of the AMERICAN MANUFACTURING CO., and all parties are cautioned against buying or dealing in imitations. Address orders only to

AMERICAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Box 5643, New York.

Writing Paper, Envelopes,

Blank and Memorandum Books, Cheap, &c. Send for 523-33 LEACH'S, 86 Nassau street, New York.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' RINGS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address as if T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

Something New.—$3

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

LADY AGENTS WANTED

To sell valuable articles wanted in every Family. Catalogues sent Free. Address
CHAS. MANCHES, 638 Broadway, New York.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MADAME N. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of a wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame N. H. PERREGAULT,
511-28 P. O. Box 506, Albany, N. Y.

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN and SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of

PROF. DE BREUX'
FRISER LE CHEVAUX.

One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. His lock nuts by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Sent securely by the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

"How 'Tis Done; or, The Secret Out." The original and only "BOOK OF WONDERS," containing the Great Secret of a Mountebank and Wizard, in 44 days—Gambling and Marked Cards Exposed and Explained; also Sleight-of-Hand, Ventriloquism, Fortune Telling Secrets, Imitation Liquors, and 100 other Secret Arts never before published. This is the only "original" BOOK OF WONDERS. All others are counterfeit of this book. Price only 25 cents—for $1. Mailed free.
Address
521-24 HINSDALE, N. H.

The Great Money-Making Article.
Everybody needs it. Agents or Soldiers can make $10 a day. Sample by patent safety, sent free by mail, for 25 cents. Address
000 E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine an invention urgently needed by everybody. Or a sample will be sent by mail for 50c. Sold retails now for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

A Providential Discovery!
ASTHMA CAN CERTAINLY BE CURED

By an old physician who has spent the past ten years in the East Indies, who, while in Siam, discovered the important secret of their method for the complete cure of the horrible complaint. Full particulars with testimonials, address (inclosing 10 cents), 518-23 DR. R. M. LEWIS, Troy, N. Y.

SAVAGE & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF LANTERNS AND BURNERS,
286 Greenwich St., New York.

Fifty varieties of the latest improved Kerosene Oil Lanterns, also for the CELEBRATED

SAVAGE AND CO. NO-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted immediately. Send for circular.
522-23 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
505 Broadway, New York.

FURNITURE, FURNITURE, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,
BY

DEGRAAF & TAYLOR,

FORMERLY H. P. DEGRAAF,)
No. 87 BOWERY, NEW YORK.

This establishment is six stories in height, and extends 50 feet through to No. 85 Chrystie Street—making it one of the largest Furniture Houses in the United States.

They are prepared to offer great inducements to the Wholesale Trade for Time or Cash. Their stock consists in part of

ROSEWOOD, PARLOR AND CHAMBER FURNITURE; MAHOGANY AND WALNUT, PARLOR AND CHAMBER FURNITURE.

Also, CANE AND WOOD SEAT WORK, all qualities; HAIR, HUSK and SPRING MATTRESSES, a large stock ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE, in Sets, from $22 to $100.

Tucker's New Style Patent Spring Bed,

The best as well as the cheapest of any in use. Retail price, $2 each.
Their facilities for manufacturing defy competition. All work guaranteed as represented.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. White French Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, and injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. 1,000 different kinds. Send stamp for a Catalogue of 000 VIRGIL DELANO, 5 Beekman St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 37 Ann St., N. Y.

Will force beautiful set of Whiskers or Moustache on the smoothest face in from two to eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Will force bald heads in eight weeks, and no humbug. I receive recommendations hourly every day of a man, benefit to me, who has used it, and found it genuine. Read testimonial:

"Washington, D. C., Fort Dupont,
Sept. 6, 1864.

"DR. BRIGGS.—Dear Sir—As I have personally experienced the benefit of your Golden Odor, I cannot refrain from giving my testimony as to its merits. My face was entirely smooth, and by whiskers in a scant, I commenced using your Golden Odor, and in six weeks I found a crop of beautiful hair on my cheeks growing, and they are now growing finely. I sincerely trust that this testimonial may prove of as much benefit to you as the Odor has to your humble servant and well-wisher.

"Sergt. ANTHONY TAYLOR."

I will send my Golden Odor by mail, sealed and postpaid, for $1 25; or five Orders for $5. In order to obtain the genuine article, it must be sent to
DR. C. BRIGGS,
221-24 P. O. Drawer 6959, Chicago, Ill.

Albums for the People.
Holding 24 Pictures, and sold at 75 cents. Also, all descriptions free by mail on receipt of price.
C. HUGHES,
Album Manufacturer,
102 Centre St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
WAREHOUSE AT WHOLESALE,
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are Headquarters for the following articles:
STEREOSCOPES & STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS.
Of these we have an immense stock, including the Celebrated American and Imperial Stereoscopes, Graphoscopes, Delineascopes, and Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibitions. Our Catalogue will be sent on receipt of address on receipt of stamp.

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS,
We were the first to introduce them into the United States, and we supply the trade at Manufacturers' prices. Our list includes the following varieties: ALBUMS for the reception of being superior in beauty and durability to any others. They will be sent by mail, POST-PAID, on receipt of price.

FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.
Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects—to which additions are constantly made—of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.: Abolitionists, 24 Actors, 100 Actresses, 100 Statesmen, 100 Brig. Generals, 100 Major Generals, 100 Orators, 70 Colonels, 70 Navy Officers, 150 Artists, 48 Authors, 150 Singers, 60 Prominent Women, 1,000 Copies of Works of Art.

Including upwards of 1,000 Miscellaneous Engravings, Groups, Statues, etc. Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp. An order for One Dozen PHOTOGRAPHS from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1.00, and sent by mail, POST-PAID.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D. will please remit twenty-five per cent on account, or the same will not be sent.

The prices and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

SOLDIERS' ALBUMS, for 18 Pictures, 75 cents; 24 Pictures, $1. tf

Beauty—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,

A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years and cannot be detected. Price $1. 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation.
HUNT & CO., Perfumers,
000 133 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

New Books, New Books, and Sporting GOODS. New Styles Cards—Gents. Sample 25 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. P. MANCHES, 638 Broadway, New York.

Stop and Read.

Your future destiny revealed by MISS LIZZIE MORRIS of Albany, the only American Gipsy on the continent. Upon receipt of 50 cents, and a post-paid address envelope, I will send the picture of your future wife or husband that is to be. Address MISS LIZZIE MORRIS, Drawer 126, Albany, New York.

How to Win a Sweetheart or Lover.
If any young gentleman or lady wishes to know how to begin a love correspondence, or if they wish to speak their mind in a hurry, bashful or careless way to their lover, this book tells exactly how it should be done. It tells you how to write love letters, and how to win your sweetheart every time. It tells you how you can marry whoever you wish, and how you can become rich in a very short time. Handsomely bound in gilt muslin. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, Publisher, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to their mutual happiness. Read the Private Counsel and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in plain envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.
Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.

Treating on "Personal Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate, win the undying love, and secure the strongest affection, and the most enduring yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address, by DR. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. Circulars sent free. 513-28

Wanted! Attention!—(Something new.) I will send by mail, (sealed,) a beautiful MILITARY ALBUM, with twenty-four pictures of our Union Generals, for 25 cents. Agents wanted immediately. Price per dozen, to agents, $3 per dozen; or $1 75 per half dozen. Address as above. C. L. BRIGGS, Publisher, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; also showing at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had gratis. Address, NATHANIEL MAYNARD, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y. tf

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS of great value to families; all pay great profits. Sample 13 cents and yet 60 pages; or 25 cents and get 80 pages and a set of gents.
517-29 EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

MATRIMONY.—If you want to be married, send a stamp-directed envelope to
M. C. KELLOG,
518-22 422½ Broadway, N. Y.

6 CHANCES FOR $1

In the greatest sale of Jewelry in this country. $1,000 of Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry and Silver Ware, etc., to be sold for $1 each. To be paid for till you know what you are to get. Sealed envelopes, calling for every article in this immense stock of a manufacturing house, will be mailed, on receipt of 25 cents; six for 25 cents; six for $1; one hundred for $12; and a Watch will be presented to every agent. Agents can make $10 a day, and are wanted in every town in the United States and Canada. Address
J. TOWNSEND & CO., 15 John St., New York.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with the date of marriage. She will also, when ordered, give their exact number can assert. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address Miss JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 38, West Troy, N. Y. 522-23

Royal Havana Lottery.
Official Drawing of September 8, 1865.

No. 13390	drew	$100,000
No. 16942	"	50,000
No. 4009	"	25,000
No. 9746	"	10,000
No. 21621	"	5,000

Being the five capital prizes.
Full list of the drawing furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

New and Popular Singing Book, For Choirs and Singing Schools.

Entitled THE NEW SACRED STAR. By Leonard Marshall. The long experience of the author has enabled him to offer in this volume a collection of music uncommonly well adapted to the wants of the public, together with a series of Elementary Lessons and Exercises of unusual excellence for Schools and all persons who would improve their vocal abilities. Price $1.38 per copy. $12.00 per doz. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

The Great New England Remedy!
Dr. J. W. Poland's
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of six years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known that it grows into use as fast as it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWEET, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. Burnham & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Peter F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1 00, sealed by mail, post paid, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

ONLY LOOK!
FREE TO ALL.

Citizens and Everybody should send their address, and receive a copy of the Illustrated Journal, with the choicest literature of the day. SENT GRATIS. tf GEO. E. MACKIE, 319 Broadway, N. Y.

Luxurious Hair Restored

From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1. By S. C. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 512-24

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for $1. By S. C. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 512-24

Asthma Cured.
Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Sent free of Post Office for $1. Not standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. Circulars sent free. 512-24

OFFICERS, SOLDIERS AND CITIZENS!
Genuine Gold Rings.
All the Army Corps Rings in 16 Karat Gold, Engraved to Order (as wanted) at $3 and $8 each. A liberal discount to dealers. Sent free by mail.
E. C. BLISS,
13 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

WHISKERS. $1. $1.

For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a luxuriant growth of hair on the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box, 216. L. L. SHULZ, Lansingburg, N. Y.
512-24

Stereoscopticons and Magic Lanterns for Public Exhibitions with Dissolving Views for prominent places, men and events, for sale by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Priced and Illustrated Catalogue sent gratis. 512-25

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Ointments and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5927 P. O., New York. 522-25

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using

DR. SEVIGNE'S
RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.

The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in a manner entirely new in manner. It has been used by the elite of Paris and London for the past two years with

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

Magic! Magic!!—A beautiful Morocco MAGIC POCKET MIRROR. I have just received. This is an ingenious invention, which every man of wit and humor should possess. Sent by mail, postpaid, for 15 cts. Address C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

To Beautify the Complexion,
USE SHULTZ' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.

The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Mask Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a freshness and transparency to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. No toilet is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents. Address
C. F. SHULTZ,
511-28 285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $30 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gold and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. County rights free, sales to men, clergymen, and women. Circulars and terms by return mail. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.

M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers,
102 Nassau street, New York.

SMOLANDER'S
COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF
BUCKU,

Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, &c. PRICE ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. HARNES & Co., and F. C. WELLS & Co., New York. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents.
520-350

GREAT SALE
OF
$1,000,000 worth
OF
WATCHES AND JEWELRY.

See advertisement. ROWEN & CO. Page 39

PARLOR ORGANS!

Church Organ Harmoniums, School Organs, and Melodeons. We have just completed improvements in our instruments far superior to any which render our instruments far superior to any which render our instruments unsurpassed. The PATENT CHORD ATTACHMENT should be without. Send for illustrated catalogue. CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.
o511-23 No. 77 East 23d street, N. Y.

STAMMERING

cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address H. C. A. BEALS, 377 West 30d St., N. Y.
cowo

Will Pain Killer Cure Cholera Morbus?

Yes, and all similar Diseases of the Bowels.

Those cases of scanty, retarded growth, the person grown to the balsam of the Tonkin-ese Swan-phrahas been found to excite the Beard, Moustache, Whiskers, to the rapid vigorous growth. See Testimonials. The history and a small sample of this Balsam sent sealed on receipt of return postage.
JOHN RAWLINS, 815 Broadway, N. Y.

BALLOU'S
PATENTED
FRENCH
YOKE SHIRTS

anted to FIT, and to be

CHEAPER

for the same QUALITIES and MAKE than those of any other Shirt House in this city.

Circular containing drawings and prices sent free.

F.Y.S.

For sale by all the principal dealers throughout the United States.

BALLOU BROTHERS, 403 Broadway, N. Y.
o

FESTOR OF FRANK LESLIE'S: DEAR SIR—With your permission I wish to say to the readers of your paper that I will send, by return mail, to all who wish it (free), a recipe, with full directions, for making and using a simple VEGETABLE BALM, that will effectually remove, in ten days, Pimples, Blotches, Tan, Freckles, and all impurities of the skin, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth and beautiful.

I will also mail free to those having Bald Heads or Bare Faces simple directions and information that will enable them to start a full growth of luxuriant Hair. Whiskers or a Moustache, in less than 30 days.

All applications answered by return mail, without charge. Respectfully yours,
THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
No. 311 Broadway, N. Y.

A Modern Miracle!

From old age, young, from sin and poor, from high-born and lowly, comes the universal voice of praise for HALL'S VEGETABLE SICILIAN HAIR RENEWER.

It is a perfect and miraculous article. Cures baldness; makes hair grow; a better dressing than any "oil" or "pomatum;" softens brush, dry or wet; the hair into beautiful ringlets or tresses. But above all, the great wonder is the rapidity with which it restores GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.

Use it a few times, and

THE CHANGE!

the whitest and worst looking hair resumes its youthful color. It does not dye the hair, but strikes at the root and fills it with new life and coloring matter.

It will cost you a long, agreeable trial, to prove the truth of this matter. The first application will do good; you will see the NATURAL COLOR returning every day, and the old, gray, discolored appearance of the hair will be gone, giving place to lustrous, flowing and beautiful locks.

BEFORE YOU KNOW IT,

Ask for Hall's Sicilian Hair Renewer; no other article is at all like it in effect. You will find it

CHEAP TO BUY, PLEASANT TO TRY, and SURE TO DO YOU GOOD.

There are many imitations. Be sure you procure the genuine, manufactured only by R. P. HALL & CO., Nashua, N. H. For sale by all druggists.
DEMAS BARNES & CO., Wholesale Agents. o

ITCH! SALT RHEUM!

Cured by Hebb's Crimean Ointment. Price, 25 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents.
520-350

A New Publishing House.—The cheapest place to buy books in the country. Have you seen Dawley's new publications? You can buy your books cheaper of this house than at any other place. J. S. DAWLEY, Publisher, No. 13 & 15 Park Row, N. Y. o

HE KNOWS HE DESERVES IT.

The Editor of De Bow's Southern Review, which used to "fire the Southern heart," returning to Washington to seek a pardon and an office, is startled by hearing a suggestive refrain proceeding from what appears to be a guard-house.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

Residing out of the City, should send for our MEASURING CARD,

And take their own measure, and we will send them a PERFECT FIT.

E. A. BROOKS'S
Boot and Shoe Emporium,

No. 575 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, and Slippers of every description, for Ladies, Gents, Boys, Misses, and Children.
N. B.—LARGEST ASSORTMENT IN THE CITY. o

Self-adjusting Enamelled "Bone Thin" Linen finished, $2 and 20 per doz. Sample mailed, 75c. and $1. Elastic Stitched, $2 25 and $3 00. Paper, with lead, $1 50. Cloth Steel Bone, $2 50; Cuffs, $2. "Steel Clad Steel," $3; Neck Tie, $1. Ladies' Linen Collars, $1 50 per doz. Paper cuff, Sample, 25c. Cloth and "Bone" Cuffs $2 per doz. Sample, 50c. HOWARD & POWERS, INVENTORS, PATENTEES AND MANUFACTURERS, 19 NORTH ST., N. Y.

Important Announcement.

AGENTS WANTED

To sell some new and SPLENDID STEEL ENGRAVINGS. Sample list sent for $1.00 that will sell for $30. Catalogues and terms sent on application.
o HASKINS & CO., 30 Beekman street, N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted and spread information, which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburg, Kings County, New York.

PINEAPPLE CIDER.

DR. TALNER'S Concentrated Medical Pineapple Cider will cure you if you are sick, and if you are well, will prevent sickness. See long advertisement in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER from May 13th to June 17th, 1865, inclusive. Send for circular. One-ounce sample bottle sent free by mail, on receipt of 25c. by the package. Dr. D. TALNER, Nos. 64 to 74 Washington st., N. Y.
5310-23

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address
o C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $50 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufactories and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which this place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.
From Rogers' Geology of Cumberland, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:
"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Unsettled Claims of Officers and Soldiers,

Of every nature, should be presented at once at the United States Army Agency, No. 64 Bleecker Street, New York. Back monthly pay, unpaid bounties, clothing accounts, etc. Applications by mail should be accompanied by the soldier's discharge, and a full statement in writing of what is still claimed. Special attention paid to all claims of deceased soldiers, for pay, bounty, and pension.

GOLD ENAMELED $2 EACH.

B.,T. HAYWARD,
208, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

I have now the Regulation Badge for every department of the army. I will send a sample (coin silver) with your name, regiment, and company, engraved thereon, on the receipt of $1.50, and the style as represented above for either corps, on the receipt of $2. Local Agents wanted everywhere. A liberal discount to dealers. o

Philadelphia Photograph and Album

DEPOT, best and cheapest. Send for catalogue. HARBACH BROS., 36 N. 8th street, Phila. 522-350

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.

Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents.
520-350

EUROPEAN POCKET
TIME-KEEPER,
One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the price named. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and surrounded by numerous SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Just introduced into this country from Europe, where it is protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. All orders must be addressed to
J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
504 and 506 Broadway, N. Y.

For a Fortune

Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-350

Shooting, Fishing, AND Sporting Tackle

of all kinds.

ALFRED WOODHAM,
454 Broadway,
Bet. Canal and Howard Sts., N. Y.
Repairing done well. tfo

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 10 cents.
Address DR. B. FOOTE, M.D.,
0000 1130 Broadway, New York.

The Brazilian Hair Curler. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1. Address
520-24 S. S. CHASE, Cohoes, N. Y.

To all wanting Farms.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company have for sale 1,200,000 acres of choice farming lands in Illinois, on long credit and low interest. Situated in the most desirable portions of the State, and in proximity to churches, schools, and markets. Prices from $5 to $20 per acre. Soil unsurpassed for fertility. Climate healthy. Title perfect. Descriptive pamphlet with maps sent gratis. Apply to JOHN C. WELLER, Land Commissioner,
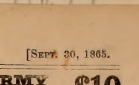
Illinois Central Railroad Company,
Chicago, Ill.



$7 ARMY WATCH. $10

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Cut Hands, "English Movements," and Correct Timekeeper, with an accurate "Reliable Calendar," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat case, with a BEAUTIFUL VEST CHAIN, for only $10.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Miniature Calendar, &c., specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.

English and American LEVERS from $20 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.

Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers.
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

o Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Terms of different powers for $1. Address
F. B. BOWEN, Box 20, Boston, Mass.

STEINWAY & SONS,

Manufacturers of
Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,
Warerooms, No. 71 & 73 East 14th St.,
Between Union Square and Irving Place,
NEW YORK. tfo

THE ARCANA WATCH.

Ladies' Size, $25. Gents' Size, $25.

Elegant as an 18 karat Gold Watch—First-Class Timekeepers. Sent by mail, free of charge, on receipt of price. A case of six for $120. Will sell on the time of their cost. GERARD W. DEVAUGH & CO., Sole Importers, No. 19 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

250 RARE RECEIPTS

Containing many Secrets and much valuable information never before made public, including over 100 Receipts now in exclusive use by the celebrated Metropolitan Hotel of the city. Price 30 cents; mailed, postage free. Address HUTCHINSON & CO., Publishers, 639 Broadway, N. Y.

STEREOSCOPIC VIEWS OF THE WAR!

Obtained at great expense, and forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT UNION CONTEST.

Bull Run	Nashville,	Strawberry Plains,
Yorktown,	Deep Bottom	Bella Plain,
Gettysburg,	Fair Oaks,	Savage Station
Fredericksburg,	Monitors,	Fairfax,
Chattanooga,	Dutch Gap,	Fort Morgan,
Pontoon Trains,	Atlanta,	Hanover Junction,
Richmond,	Petersburg,	Locust Mountain,
Chickahominy,	Charleston,	City Point,
Mobile,	&c., &c.	&c., &c.

Everybody is interested in these memorable scenes.
Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Just published by
E. & T. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway, N.Y.

$1,000 $20 G. & S. Crystal D.P. $20

a year can be realized gilding and plating the Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions sent for $20. L. A. TODD & CO., 39 Nassau street, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.
519-310

The National Park Bank
of New York.

Capital,...$2,000,000 | Surplus,...$1,300,000

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on demand.
J. L. WORTH, Cashier.
New York, August 21, 1865. 519-10

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at that office, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Butters charged low rates. 0000

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.
512-24

STRASBURGER & NUHN,
65 Maiden Lane,
Cor. of William Street.

Having imported the Largest Assortment of

TOYS,
CHINA FANCY GOODS,
BEADS,

Now offer to buyers superior inducements from an entirely new and most complete stock bought for cash, AT THE LOWEST PRICES. 522-350

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S
PIANOFORTES.

90 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

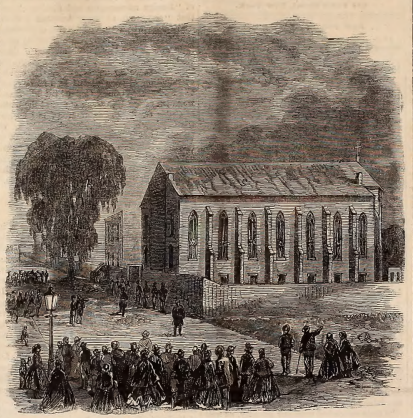
GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money is the HENDSON PEN, warranted for one year, 14 carats fine; also every variety of Pencils and Holders. Pens sent by mail on receipt of 60 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. R. S. JOHNSON, Manufacturer and Office, No. 15 Maiden Lane. 519-310

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York

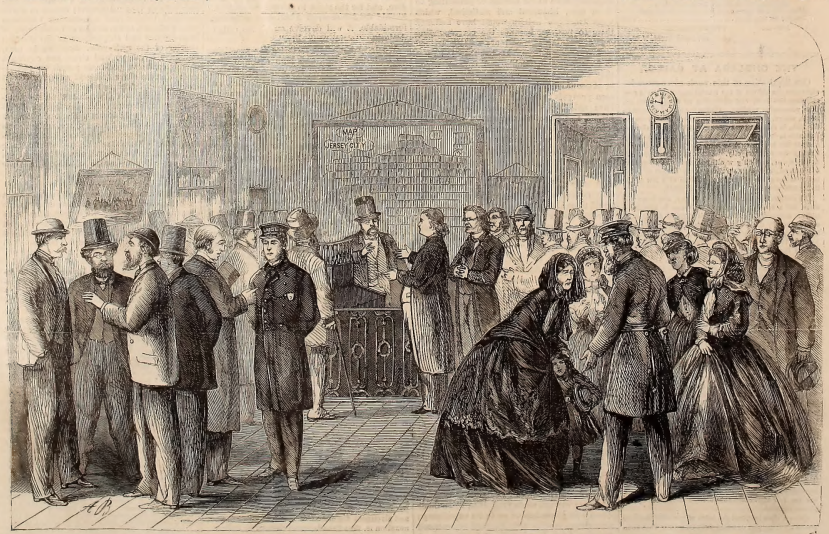
No. 523—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, OCTOBER 7, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 17 WEEKS $1 00

The Rebel Bondholders.



THE close of the war found certain bales of cotton, described as "belonging to the late Confederate Government," in the possession of one of its agents in Liverpool. It was claimed by the United States, and the claim was sustained by Mr. Vice Chancellor Wood, on the ground that "when a de facto government came to an end, its property became that of its successor." The Government of the United States, however, never claimed it on any such ground, and Mr. Seward was not slow in discovering the "gigantic African" concealed in the Vice Chancellor's little fence. The corollory of the decision would be, if taken as good law, that admitting the rebel States to have been a de facto government, the United States succeeding to its effects became responsible for its obligations—an admission which would be exceedingly pleasant and profitable for the aiders and abettors of the rebellion in Europe. The decision, we need not say, greatly encouraged the holders of Confederate bonds in England, who thereupon called a meeting to decide what steps should be taken to obtain from the United States an assumption of these bonds, and the payment of the interest thereon. It is only right to say, what was very naively admitted at the meeting, that there were some of the holders with sufficient sense of shame to keep away; or, as one speaker phrased it—"were disinclined to have their names made public."

The meeting was a serio-comic one, and should have been photographed. It cried "oh, oh," and laughed when some one proposed to send a committee to Washington, to ask Mr. Johnson to pay the bonds endorsed by Davis and Slidell. No one appeared ambitious of being on the committee, and some one startled the whole conclave by an indistinct allusion to Fort Lafayette, which is supposed by most cockneys to be under the control of the "Tyrant of New Orleans."



The publication of the proceedings of the meeting has drawn to light, from Washington, the letters of Mr. Seward and Mr. Adams, written immediately on the reception here of the Vice Chancellor's decision, which will effectually extinguish any spark of hope kindled by that decision in the heart of any rebel bondholder. Says Mr. Seward:

"The United States controvert and deny the declaration of the Vice Chancellor, that they are 'successors' of the rebellion; and on the contrary they maintain that they are now, and during all the time of the rebellion have been, just what they were before the rebellion began—a sovereign State, absolutely entitled to the regulation and control of all property and persons within the United States, subject only to the limitations of their own constitution. It need hardly be said that the United States will hold themselves under no obligation whatever to accept of or to so conform their proceedings to the conditions which the Court of Chancery, or any other municipal court of Great Britain may have the presumption to dictate or prescribe in the present or any other litigation. They claim and insist upon the restoration of the cotton now in question; and while they are content to receive it through the decree of the municipal tribunals of Great Britain, they insist upon their absolute right to the same through the action of Her Britannic Majesty's Government."

It appears from the archives of the rebel Government, now in Washington, that the rebel bonds were widely distributed in London among the editors, which accounts, in part, for their hostility to the United States. They were issued to the amount of $50,000 to the incorruptible political editor of the London Times—Mr. Delane; to the amount of $75,000 to Mr. Sampson, the money editor of the same, and Mr. Spence, the impartial correspondent of that paper, in the Southern interest, received them to the amount of $150,000!! The proprietor of Lord Palmerston's organ, the Post, was bought for $20,000, and was dear at that. Sir Henry de Houghton, who will be remembered as heading the monster petition to Mr. Lincoln to recognize the South, and make peace, it seems, holds $900,00 of the rebel bonds. It is to be hoped that he paid for them! The publication of these names will make a stir in England.

THE GREAT GHOST HOAX—THE HAUNTED CHURCH, "ST. BONIFACE," SOUTH EIGHTH STREET, JERSEY CITY.

SCENE AT THE OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF POLICE, JERSEY CITY—THE CLERGYMEN AND EXCITED POPULACE SEEKING FOR PARTICULARS OF THE ST. BONIFACE GHOST, AND CLAIMING PROTECTION TO THEIR PROPERTY.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner

NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Circulation over 50,000.

This valuable Family Paper has now reached its Seventh Number, and a circulation of upwards of 50,000, showing in its unprecedented success, that it meets a great popular demand, and a thorough appreciation in the Family Circle.

Each Number contains a variety of short stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Directions, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures and Puzzles, etc.

The CHIMNEY CORNER has a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER is the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent artists.

Every number contains a striking portrait, with an original biography, of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of the CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Native Clime, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most accomplished American ladies. This is the most costly steel plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every Family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations a work which will represent our great national unity. The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York. It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Terms for the Chimney Corner:

PRICE 10 CENTS EACH NUMBER.

One copy, three months.....$1 00
One copy, six months.....2 00
One copy, one year.....4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper.....15 00
Five copies, one year.....20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person making a club of five)

One copy of FRANK LESLIE'S Chimney Corner and FRANK LESLIE'S Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year.....7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

THE CHOLERA AT CAIRO.

Our illustration of this week gives more insight into the terrors of the fearful malady that is surely coming on, and advancing so surely upon us, than volumes of reading. Unlike the city of Constantinople, where, as the disease seems to have spared the rich, in Cairo it has taken equally hold of all classes. Business is entirely suspended, stores are closed, and each of the inhabitants as have the means to flee are leaving the stricken city. The dead-cart makes its hourly round, and they walk or ride, some quicker sighted to a funeral, and then, perhaps, only to that of being borne to the grave upon the shoulders of a few of the living that are on the back of a pack mule.

The victims number over 500 per day, and from this mass but a small per centage even can be afforded a coffin. As the illness rages, the dead lie along the streets, only broken by the tramp of a passing funeral, or the hoarse cry of the driver of the cart, calling upon the living to bring forth the dead. The aid of physicians, though the city has many well skilled in the fearful disease, seems to be of little availability. The foreign consulates are doing all things possible to aid not only their own countrymen, but the native population, and yet human effort appears but as a drop in the great bucket of misery. The cry of agony goes up to Heaven only for help, and if the disease is not stayed from thence, there is little doubt but Egypt will be almost depopulated.

BURNING OF THE STEAMBOATS RIVER QUEEN AND ALBREE.

PITTSBURG, within a few days, has been the scene of a sensation, in the shape of a steamboat burning, ending in the total destruction of two of the finest boats on the river.

The alarm was given about midnight of Sunday, the 10th ult., and in a few minutes the country for miles about was lit up with the brilliant light from the consuming steamers, and the citizens poured from the farthest boundaries of the town, followed quickly by the rural population, until the wharves—as far as the eye could reach—were one dense mass of excited people.

The steamboatmen, by almost superhuman exertions, were able to cut adrift and save the surrounding boats, but the two above-mentioned were devoured by the greedy element.

No lives were lost, but the value of property was over $50,000, a large part of which falls on a New York company.

Barnum's New American Museum—BROADWAY, between Spring and Prince streets. The Popular Family Resort, where some 400,000 visit annually, and advancing so surely upon us, than volumes of reading. Unlike the city of Constantinople, where, as the disease seems to have spared the rich, in Cairo it has taken equally hold of all classes. Business is entirely suspended, stores are closed, and each of the inhabitants as have the means to flee are leaving the stricken city. The dead-cart makes its hourly round, and they walk or ride, some quicker sighted to a funeral, and then, perhaps, only to that of being borne to the grave upon the shoulders of a few of the living that are on the back of a pack mule.

The victims number over 500 per day, and from this mass but a small per centage even can be afforded a coffin. As the illness rages, the dead lie along the streets, only broken by the tramp of a passing funeral, or the hoarse cry of the driver of the cart, calling upon the living to bring forth the dead. The aid of physicians, though the city has many well skilled in the fearful disease, seems to be of little availability. The foreign consulates are doing all things possible to aid not only their own countrymen, but the native population, and yet human effort appears but as a drop in the great bucket of misery. The cry of agony goes up to Heaven only for help, and if the disease is not stayed from thence, there is little doubt but Egypt will be almost depopulated.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 7, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the leaf only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

The Revolution of '76, and the Rebellion of '61.

MR. RICHARD GRANT WHITE, of some eminence as a critic and author, is, we believe the New York correspondent of the London Spectator, in which his letters appear over the signature of "A Yankee." His correspondence has been throughout of marked ability, and of great usefulness in conveying to earnest and impartial Englishmen, a correct notion of the character and purposes of our great civil war. He has had the good sense to recognize the truth, that even what are called "well-informed Englishmen," are wofully ignorant of the vital facts connected with this country, as well as to warily mailed by the newspapers to which they blindly pin their faith, and he has consequently been to the trouble of presenting to them data, historical and statistical, which must have surprised many, and have presented them to possess, because the corresponding data concerning England are well understood and appreciated here. He has thus led them to conclusions inevitable and overwhelming, which they would never have accepted by avermen, or at second hand. The egotism of Englishmen prevents their adopting opinions which are not their own, and their own only, in their brains, and they take uncommon pride in believing them to be their own, even though they be no clearer or more valuable than those of Mr. Jack Bunyan, or Lemuel Gulliver.

Mr. Gay, Mr. White has undertaken seriously to refute the "argument," or what English-men have called the "clincher," with which they generally have flattered themselves they could close their opponent's mouth on this or any discussion concerning the late war, viz.: "The South has as much right to secede from the North, as the United States had to secede from Great Britain." This "clincher" was not a monopoly, as Americans may suppose, of a few ignorant Englishmen, but was reproduced with much complacency in Parliamentary discussions, and in the columns of the London press, by Earl Russell, The Thersites of the House of Commons, Mr. Roebuck, formulized it in the words, "The South is exactly in the position of the American colonies with regard to England in 1777."

Of course such a statement shows the ignorance or the unfairness, or both, of those who made it. For, whereas, in the case of the South, secession was the cause of the war, in that of the thirteen colonies separation was the consequence of the war undertaken to force obnoxious measures on the colonies. The secession of the Southern States was preceded by seven months of attempts of the Government to assert its authority over them by arms, and those attempts might have been delayed for months longer, had not the South itself commenced war, by its attack on Fort Sumter. On the other hand, the Declaration of Independence was not made (and even when made it was with grave doubts as to its expediency) until fifteen months after England commenced the war of the Revolution, at Lexington and Concord. It was not made until after the battle of Bunker Hill had been fought, Ticonderoga and Montreal captured, and Boston and Charleston besieged. There is no parallelism, therefore, between the position of the South and that of the colonies, and as regards the principles and morality of the two cases, the distinction is wider still. As well put by Mr. White: "It could not be accepted by a people who had no representation in the Government whose oppression they resisted; the other was accepted by a people who had more than a full representation, and who suffered no oppression. One was incurred not for separation, but for those rights which are dearest to every man of English race; the other for separation, and, according to the confession of its own champions, to secure 'the extension of slavery into the territories.' The likeness between the position of the parties to them is that they both resisted attempts to deprive them of what equally exists between Washington and Lucifer."

As regards the reckless statements made by that portion of the British press in the rebel interest, that the Union armies were made up of "foreign mercenaries and hired ags," and that "sixty out of every hundred Federal soldiers have been starved, bribed, or hocussed into the service," Mr. White presents some facts which, coming as the authors of these calumnies blush even now, when the motive for their utterance no longer exists. By careful examination of such official lists as he could obtain, he ascertains the loss of the killed and wounded of the 19th army corps, at the battle of Cedar Creek, 612 in number, but 60 had Irish, French, German, Russian, Italian or Polish names. In a list of over 3,000 of the Union dead at Andersonville, but 175 were names not English. Of these, probably, some were men whose ancestors had been long in the country, and who were thoroughly American.

"Neutrality."

THERE is much disturbance and alarm in Ireland, consequent on certain developments of the designs and movements of the Irish national organization, known as the "Fenian Brotherhood." Some arrests have been made, and several counties have been put under what is technically amounts to martial law. It is pretended that a very large body of young men have been secretly drilled, that they have large deposits of arms, and that a revolution against the British authority is intended, and is, in fact, close at hand.

One paper, in the English interest, calls for more ships and men, to suppress this Hibernian attempt at secession, and another clamors for "a strong Government at once," for all parties to the proposed movement, who can be apprehended. No one proposes to say "Wayward sister, go in peace," nor has any one suggested that other nations should extend "belligerent rights" to "a people struggling for freedom, and for the right to govern themselves." Should the demonstration become a little more formidable, it will devolve on us the duty of declaring "rights" and "wrongs."

We have abundant facilities for practicing on that declaration, and high example as to how to do it. Most of the captured blockade runners have been the property of parties, and large sales of captured munitions of war are going on. These could be utilized with great rapidity. Quite a fleet of Irish war vessels could be at once put under the flag in a very few weeks; perhaps a few iron-clads might be prepared for the Emperor of China or the Pacha of Egypt. Those potentates very much need a few of these fast vessels, especially since those they contracted for with Laird & Co., a year or so ago, have failed to reach them. After a while it may become Mr. Seward's duty to consult with the Emperor Napoleon as to the propriety of a joint intervention in the quarrel. A great many things have been said and done in England during the past few years to enlighten us as to our duty, in case the revolution in Ireland goes on.

We are inclined to think, however, that it has neither the strength or depth to accomplish the object most desired by Irishmen. We are also inclined that the horrible machinery of "arbitrary arrests" should be brought in practice for its suppression. Hasn't the whole world shivered with horror over the use of this appliance in that barbarous country, the United States? We expected better things of christian and civilized England!

THE question is agitated in Canada whether it is wisest and best for the British American colonies to sever their political relationship towards the British Crown, and carry out the expensive schemes of fortifications and commercially useless military roads which that relationship appears to involve, or at once cast their fortunes with the United States, abolish all restrictions on trade, and as States in the regenerated Union, enter upon a career of glory and prosperity unparalleled in the history of mankind. The last and strongest argument of those opposed to annexation is, that Canada would thereby be obliged to assume and pay a portion of the vast debt incurred by the United States in the late war. The ready answer to this specious and at first glance staggering objection is, that Canada, as an integral part of the Union, even if called on to pay a pro rata portion of the National debt, would, nevertheless, save money by the operation, as her proportion would be less, whether as regards principal or interest, than would be entailed on her by maintaining her present relation, and dribbling out the glass by which it is supposed that relationship can be made secure. The Canadian share of the public debt would be only about $100,000, or something less than the purely unprofitable investments she is now called on to make to secure her so-called independence, and from which no return can be expected. Free trade with the United States would be worth twice the money.

"MRS. GRUNDY" was the title of a somewhat pretentious comic weekly started a few months ago, but which has "gone where the woodbine (this is the latest euphonism for dying), and is numbered with "Vanity Fair," "Yankee Doodle," and the other short-lived "Punches" that have come to New York to naturalize "Punch" on American soil. It seems to us this last and most signal failure should convince aspirants for the honors of the pun and bull, that the English humor is not American humor, and that the reproduction of Punch in form and substance, does not fit the taste of our people. We only come publications that have ever attained success and stability in this country, is FRANK LESLIE'S BUDGET OF FUN, which owes its distinction, in a great part, to a favorable appreciation of the comic side of current events in America, which makes it almost as much a reflex of the humor of the day, as the daily papers. Had it copied European models, and occupied itself with things of no special national interest, it, too, would have gone, and deservedly, "unhonored and unsung," like Mrs. Grundy, into Time's wallet for oblivion.

AMONG the documents produced in the trial of Wirz is a report of Col. Chandler, late of the Confederate service, in which he was Inspector General. In that capacity he visited Andersonville prison. His report is dated August 5, 1864. We quote a single passage:

"My duty requires me respectfully to recommend a change in the officer in command of the post—Brigadier-Gen. J. H. Winder—and the substitution in his place of some one who unites that energy and vigilance judicious with some leanings of humanity and consideration for the welfare and comfort so far as is consistent with their safe-keeping of the vast number of unfortunates placed under his control. In saying this I would not for an instant advocate deliberately and in cold blood the propriety of turning them loose, for the present condition under which they have been suffering is relieved by death to make the present overcrowding sufficiently endurable, and any one who will not consider it a matter of self-humiliation, boasting that he has yet a heart, to witness the stockades—a place for horrors of which it is difficult to describe, and which is a disgrace to civilization—will be unfit to command."

Col. Chandler was put on the stand, and acknowledged this report to be his, and sent to the Government of Richmond. Instead of being removed, the infamous Winder was promoted. Was it as a reward for his deliberate planned and openly avowed purpose and policy of murdering the Union prisoners?

THE Paris correspondent of a daily contemporary tells us that "Americans swarm in Paris. Enriched patriots and self-denying Christians greatly increase the business and amusement of hotel-keepers and shopkeepers in the English quarter of the metropolis. Speaking in high, shrewish tones language, Wall street and canvass shoddy contracts, profitable patriotism and remote Western silver and gold mines, petroleum and pious—at least humbug—(say honored) gold-enriched partners of the Administration—shockingly respectable men (with their females and little ones) who sold rotten ships to the Government, and who have made a fortune of from one per cent of the profits in ostentatious contribution to the Sanitary Commission—these and their like, fill their luxurious, run down Champs de la Pair and adjoining streets of dealers in fancy goods in Pacotoleon Hoods."

A PRO-SLAVERY journal actually admits that "the Southern land-holders have come to the conclusion already that they must have white labor to cultivate the plantations properly." And yet for forty years we have been told that without the negro their plantations would become as so many desert-lands.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Tribune gives an account of a play, called "Uncle Tom's Daughter; or, The Tyrant of New Orleans," as produced at the New Britannia Theatre, London. The piece opens with the proclamation "Emancipation" had been got through with, and "Found General Butler—attaching personification of the swinging, long tail coat that, with long, ravenish black hair, a heavy moustache, a villainously sapidine nose and whiskers, and a dash of a dark blue uniform, loses red breeches and tailless cap—being taunted by Capt. Rhett Silver (the hero) and reminded by the ghost of Capt. Silver possessed of some fearful knowledge of Gen. Butler's past doings (whether in connection with horse-stealing, forgery, or infanticide, was not stated), which himself (Butler) was trying to bury in the Gulf. Grant of New Orleans into connivance with his own treachery. Butler desires to get the Confederate Daughter, Lucy, to promise to that effect, he excited fiendishly, when, enter Captain Travers, captured Confederate and Union officer in his own regiment. Exit—Travers dismissed to prison until Lucy decides. Enter Lucy's confederate, Pedro, a negro, who, fearfully and summarily, by General Butler and Chief Silver, both of whom she scores-on at the top of her voice. Exeunt fiendish, and enter faithful negro, dressed after the Louisiana fashion, in white knee-breeches and Turkish shoes. He contrives to effect the escape of Travers by means of a boat on the river, which (as everybody knows) ran beneath the windows of the guard-house in New Orleans, where Gen. Butler incarcerated the victims of his tyranny. Tableaux. Next act: Enter comic Irishman, in traditional costume, rocky scenery, and immense mountain in the background—Louisiana to the life. He defies the Federals looking after Travers. As the Irishman insults, knocks them about, and ill-uses them, they are naturally seized with a desire to enlist him, as it do so, endowing him for that purpose, with a uniform wherewith to clothe himself. This he accordingly covert purposes, steals their ammunition, and ultimately saves Capt. Travers from re-arrest, since sundry broadsword contests, in which the Confed's daughter, Kathleen, and cousin Irishman are all mixed up together. Thus the Irishman (still in Federal uniform) exemplifies Gen. Butler, and deceives him into giving him a rurse of gold and a pass through the lines. Reaching the Federal side safely, he offers to join the Confederate Federal stronghold, which resembles the Federal one, and has a distant view of the summit of the lower Mississippi. Tableaux: Spiking of guns; more single combat—sailor discomfits Gen. Butler with bread-sword. General fight. Confederates disappear, and Capt. Travers is led to execution. Colours arrive a cou ier from Washington informs the tyrant of New Orleans that he no longer Commander of that Department. And, as the bill says, 'Triumph of the Confederate's Daughter!'"

A London correspondent of the Times, of this city, in a review of the intellectual condition of England and the tendencies of the British mind, gives it as his opinion that "not one scientific mind of any eminence can be found in Great Britain that holds the ordinary traditional belief of the Church."

The living graduates of Harvard College are about 2,400. Of these, upwards of 500 were engaged in the war, and of those so engaged, nearly 100 died in the field. Yale College contributed to the army and navy, from among her graduates for 1859-1865, 505 officers and privates, of whom 83 perished as patriots.

New Hampshire, according to recently published official records, furnished 33,427 men to the National armies in the late civil war. Now, the population of this State, according to the census taken in 1860, immediately before the rebellion, was 326,073. This State, therefore, furnished to the army more than one in ten of its aggregate population, including women and children. But the census tables show that of the New Hampshire people 138,974 were under 20 years of age, and that of those over 20 years of age, 90,649 were women, and 27,926 were men over 50 years of age. The sum of these numbers, 261,529, deducted from the total population, leaves 64,544; showing that of the New Hampshire men between 20 and 50 years of age more than one-half went into this war. How these men did what they undertook to do, appears from the fact, that the returns show 5,818 killed, and 11,039 permanently disabled, besides those less seriously wounded. In other words, the loss of the war fell on the aggregate commonwealth, considerably more than one quarter of its men between 20 and 50 years of age, who were alive and well before the war, killed or crippled for life.

A great trade has sprung up in Denmark and Sweden in the matter of hair. The peasants there are very poor, but they have a profusion of fine hair, which is very valuable in certain quarters where artificial hair is the fashion of the day. Agents for the trade, which has arisen in consequence of this supply and demand, tempt the simple peasantry with alluring promises. They take the opportunity of appearing at the cottages when the husband and brothers are absent. They have with them a bag of tempting articles, and often a beautiful head of hair is exchanged for a couple of Indian silk handkerchiefs. The hair thus collected has to undergo a rough dress as preparations before it is fit for the head of fashion. To produce the undulating lines so much admired, it is rolled round sticks, and boiled in a candour. The hair harvest in these countries is very large, likely to become scanty, for men object to marry the girls with cropped heads, or "short sills," as they term it; and those who are not willing to be shorn of their locks, hold out for ready money, and will no longer barter them for yellow handkerchiefs.

We last week quoted the out-spoken reassertion of the Democratic doctrine by the Democratic State Convention at Albany. We now publish the weak endorsement of it by the Republican Convention held at Syracuse. We insisted, That we have entire confidence in the direction, and the President Johnson, of our intercourse with foreign nations, in his prompt enforcement against them of all just demands in securing redress for national insults and wrongs, and in maintaining the fixed policy of our Government, by which the interference of foreign powers with the institutions of the continent, is regarded as hostile to our peace and menacing to our independence."

The German newspapers advertise a novel entitled "Abraham Lincoln," by Retcliffe, a German who made pseudo-historical researches. Can anything be more ridiculous than to endeavor to raise a fictitious interest in facts so serious and so recent as the life and death of the late President?

A correspondent of the Evening Post inquires whether the calling of the pasece in the Alleghanies "gaps," and that in the White Hills "notches," grew out of the yawning propensities of the Pennsylvania Dutchmen in the first case, and the whittling propensities of New England Yankees in the second?

The Richmond Republic has published some very striking pen and ink sketches of the late rebel officials. The last attempt is on Mr. Mallory, late Secretary of the Navy. The picture, according to the Republic, was the quality that assimilated Mallory to the slug. He is now in prison, but, according to the Republic,

"It would be entirely useless, however, for the Government to release him, if they expect him to take the trouble to walk out of prison. It is impossible to dislodge him from any place, except by his own riverine process with confederate rum—of blowing him up. Nothing but the explosion that sent up the Confederacy could induce him to travel from his location. Even then it is said that the only known thing that safe masterspirit of mischief, J. P. Benjamin, would alight upon his feet, every one knew that Mallory would show the heartiness of sentiment, the unctuous accordant, of any one who was so indolent that some of his neighbors attempted to scare him into doing something for the support of his family, and consequently put him into a coffin, and told him they were going to bury him alive. Having joined with the hearse, a neighbor came out and asked who was dead. 'Nobody,' was the reply, 'but we are going to bury John smith alive; he is too fond of his ease to remain down ground, and we are afraid he will come up if we bury him alive,' said the man; 'that would be cruel indeed; rather than do that I'll give him one bushel of corn.' 'Is it shelled?' said the lazy man, in a very faint voice, from the coffin. 'No,' said the man. 'Then,' says he, 'drive on, boys.'"

A return of the casualties in the army of the Potomac, during the march of Gen. Grant from the Potomac to Petersburg, that is to say, between the 4th of May and the 30th of June, 1864, is the following: Killed, officers 786, men 9,706; wounded, officers 2,786, men 34,161; missing 23,838; total 68,387. The losses of the army under Sherman, from the time it moved from Chattanooga until the capture of Atlanta, were: Killed, 5,284; wounded, 26,129; missing, 5,786; total, 37,199.

The London Saturday Review is seldom puzzled by a slang phrase, but confesses itself unable to understand the following, which is from a second American paper—"Everything being lovely, the goose was greatly elevated." The astonished writer says: "What the goose was elevated about, what the process of elevating a goose consists in, and the connection between the elevation of the goose and the general loveliness of things, are all points on which we can throw no light." Perhaps the Review can understand the matter when it is put in the more popular phrase: "The goose hangs high!"

Since the occupancy of New Orleans by the United States forces, it has been claimed by the stringent rule of the United States military law, from the pest spot of the continent to one of the healthiest cities in the world. This result is attributed solely to the excellent hygienic rules of the military authorities, which, if removed, will be followed by the same fatality as in the former unwholesomeness. A similar regimen in New York would reduce the annual mortality one-third.

The British Association for the advancement of science, has had a most interesting session at Birmingham. Among the interesting papers presented, was one by Prof. Phillips, in which he stated that the coal dug up in one year in England would fill a rail-road train of sufficient size to equal exactly to that of the whole human race—and this though nine-tenths of the force actually set free in the combustion of coal is unavailable and lost in space.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—It is understood that the State Board of Education of Connecticut will insist that the law which shall be enforced which will require children between fifteen years of age in manufacturing or other business, unless they shall have attended school at least three months of the twelve next preceding any and every year in which they shall be employed, under a penalty of twenty-five dollars for each offence.

——The rebel Governor Brown is now domiciled in Mobile on the 4th instant. The Daily News of that city devotes half a column to the arrival of him, ranking him as next to Stonewall Jackson, and "far ahead of Marsh."

——General Beauregard took the oath of allegiance at New Orleans on the 16th inst., and will make application for pardon.

——The New Haven (Conn.) Palladium, which for a third quarter has used steam power in its printing press, now uses a turbine wheel about the circumference of a silver dollar, driven by a stream of water only an inch in diameter!

——It is reported that Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, who was recently released from Fort Warren, by the agency of the Davisite Railroad, is about to take charge of one of the most important offices in the State of Alabama.

——A young colored man of ability and good character, Richard E. Greener, of Boston, has graduated the freshman class at Harvard College.

——The Antietam battle monument will consist of 61 cen xcres. The area will be twice as large as that of the Gettysburg National Cemetery, and will contain twice as many graves.

——Colonel Stowell, of Cornwall, Vt., has recently sold a ram for $5,000, and several of his thoroughbred rams, at $2,500 each, have been recently made.

——Mr. Thomas Hamilton, of Boston, Conn., aged sixty-three years, who has been a sailor since he was a boy, is now living in a log cabin, a sloop built by himself, called the "Who Would Have Thought It," in which he takes and secures as he chooses, and makes a permanent and solitary home on Narragansett Bay.

——We learn that Miss Dix resigned in August last the superintendency of nurses, because the U. S. general hospitals, which are being rapidly closed, and that on the 1st instant an order was issued mustering all such nurses out of the service.

——A gentleman at Florence, writing to a friend in Boston, says that Hiram Powers, the sculptor, has modeled for the statue of Edwin Forrest as Coriolanus, and is still immortalizing the features of the statue in six feet and a half high.

——Mr. Squier, the Central library and collections of Dr. W. B. Hodgson, of Savannah, a distinguished scholar, and well known for his researches in African and other languages, was stolen from the residence of the late owner in South Carolina. That of Mr. Gilmore Simms, the novelist, was also stolen, consisting of nearly 11,000 volumes, shared the same fate.

——The Rev. Dr. Hillhouse, of Hillhouse Avenue, well known as the author of "Wanderings of a Beauty," has commenced writing another work. It is a novel, the scene of which is laid in Europe.

——Secretary Seward has been officially informed that the Canadian authorities have seized the ship Alliance, laden $20,613 75 in gold, and $30,000 in bank bills, which was captured on the 20th ult. by rebel raiders.

——Mr. Longfellow's "Psalm of Life" has been translated into Chinese. Mr. Wade, of the British embassy at Pekin, has done the work, in accordance with the custom of the country, he had the translation inscribed on the pagoda at Nankin.

——Great care should be exercised in the purchase of Government bonds, to see that their numbers have not been altered. In several cases where bonds have been stolen, their numbers have been changed by inserting two additional figures—one before and one after the original number—in that way making the bonds worthless to whoever shall buy them. The frequent thefts of these bonds that occur render caution on the part of purchasers especially necessary.

——Cotton, which grows in India and Italy, has also been successfully cultivated in parts of Illinois and Indiana. The "Egypt" specimens of the former State is very white, short-staple cotton, and will grow from 250 to 300 pounds of clean cotton to the acre. Such states as Illinois and Indiana, which are free from the curse of opinion, should cotton to low the wandering of the grape, as in Italy, to the north of the Ohio.

——The account current between Pennsylvania and the Federal authorities, concerning the number of troops furnished by the State for the Federal armies is closed. The aggregate is as follows:

Enlisted for three years.....Pennsylvania, as credit-d in the United States Provost-Marshal-General's Office, Washington, D. C., 111,511, to April 30, 1865.....

Enlisted for three years.....credited for State service, and in response to calls for emergencies.....

Enlisted for one hundred days, in the State to enlistthe military districts, for the special purpose of defending their own homes.....

Number of color ed troops recruited in the state to fill up colored organizations in other States

Total.....

——A cow attempted to butt a train of cars on a railroad track in Canada and succeeded. After the collision, a reporter says there was plenty of beef, but very little cow.

——A correspondent in Havana writes that if he wished to describe the island of Cuba in a single line, he should call it—

"The island of the flea and the home of the slave."

——Wisconsin has furnished 96,000 troops to the Federal Government, whose terms of service vary from three months to three years. She has about one-half of the arms-bearing population of the State.

——Mr. Wm. Wheelwright, of Boston, has come from Canada to the Southern States, under the impression that large profits are to be realized after rebuilding the cities, etc., laid waste during the war.

——During the month of August, 7,206,025 acres of the public domain were disposed of by the land office at Detroit, Michigan, for actual settlement, under the provisions of the homestead law.

——New York city has a fund of about $60,000, to be appropriated to the support of families of murdered policemen.

——Bears are very numerous in various parts of Arcadoosa county, Georgia. Many have been seen near the settlements swarming with them, and the grain crops are suffering from their depredations. Corn in the milk-state are trodden down and stripped by them as if an invading army had been through it. The raspberry crop was a short this season, and it is supposed that less driven from its summit by the bears.

——Photographs of the New York bank tellers encumber the pockets of the detectives who watch the Broadway saloons.

——Isaac Williams, a Virginian, has been sentenced to three years' imprisonment and a fine of $1,000, for disregarding his oath of allegiance.

——The military force of the United States now consists of 11 regiments of cavalry, 25,000 volunteers, and 60,000 colored troops—in all, 296,000 men, of whom 105,000 are to be mustered out by the 1st of Nov.

——R. B. Rhett, Jr., is soon to resume the publication of the Charleston Mercury. The Independent Press will be started about the same time, by T. Hurley, a white man, and Wm. Bowen, a black man. It will probably not agree with the Mercury very closely.

——Virginia has 19,000,000 acres of unimproved land within her limits. Her population is 1,596,318, and is annually improved. And, yet there are thousands and tens of thousands of able-bodied men living in idleness upon the bounty of the Government.

——It has been decided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he will not merely canvasses and receives subscriptions for books, maps, etc., is not required to take out a license as a peddler, but that a person at any time takes pay when he receive s the subscription, or delivers the books, maps, etc., and receives pay, or obtains pay therefor, upon a subscription previously obtained, is required to become a peddler, and must take out a license as such.

——There are two locomotive works at Taunton, Mass. Between them they have had a set of fifteen. Number 30 manufactured, 72; value of stock, $635,000; capital employed, $1,125,000; capital, $315,000; hands, 200. During the same time six cotton mills have been manufactured, 24; value of manufacturing 712,000 pounds of cotton, and employing 783 hands.

——Professor Agassiz and Dr. Walker, now defends the theory that ye low fever is contagious, and that it is not caused by any specific virus, it does not know that it mmunities one attack of small-pox, and consequently is not true in the case of small-pox. The sick person, then, does not communicate it. Dr. Gerhard, of Philadelphia, denies contagion, and prevails within the region fitted for its development.

——Oysters are to be very plentiful this season, and the season is to be a long one. Many of the natural beds of the bivalves that have lain undisturbed during the last four years, with nothing else to do but to grow large and get fat.

——The estimated cost of the monument to Mr. Lincoln, to be erected in Springfield, Ill., is $200,000, and the sum thus far contributions towards it is $6,000.

——Mr. Daniel Webster, a negro waiter, a nephew, and grandson of Daniel Webster, died at Marshfield last week, aged 75 years.

——A lieutenant and squad of men, recently sent from Nashville into Alabama to recover stray government mules, found a lot of them in the near Galesburg, by a sheriff and posse. One soldier was killed. Nineteen of the posse were lying in the woods, badly wounded.

——In dwelling houses lighted by gas, the frequent burning of lamps is a source of annoyance. A single gas burner will consume more oxygen, and produce more carbonic acid, and deteriorate the atmosphere of a room than six or eight candles.

——An association has been formed in Indiana for the purpose of introducing the camel or goat into that country. Sixteen of these animals have already been imported and distributed among the society.

——The captured treasure belonging to Jeff. Davis, deposited at the Treasury Department, amounts to a total of $140,000.

——Out of 22,770 destitutes fed by the Freedmen's Bureau at Savannah, 15,000 are white people.

Foreign.—Dr. Crane Calvert, of Manchester, England, says that the snowy appearance of American land plaster, when used for making bay, by reason of its mercury, starch in a state of jelly, and a little alum and lime water. The latter is used to make the mixture stimulative; the introduction of 25 per cent. of useless matter, and a proportionate waste.

——Mr. Thew, of the Whitehaven and Furness railway, has recently turned his attention to the construction of those fearful engines of warfare, torpedoes. According to the Cumberland Pacquet, the new projectile comes from the Whitehaven shell—the shape by which Government has shown preference—containing about 100 pounds of powder. The shell, when fired, contains a third shell, which, in its turn contains a fourth. The inner shells are about a quarter of an inch thick, and the outer is about an inch thick. The store between the shells is filled with starch, and the last chamber all round of about an inch. The smaller shells reach the water in succession, and with gunpowder in a very ingenious contrivance of the inventor, and the whole would be blown to atoms by the enemy easily. The enormous quantity of splinters which would be scattered about on the explosion of such a shell must be evident, and its destructive powers are something fearful to contemplate.

——A new combustible is said to have been recently invented in France by M. Stoker. It is composed of very pure charcoal finely ground, and made into a paste with starch. The paste is moulded into cakes or balls of the required size, and then dried. When perfectly dry these may be lighted with a lucifer match, and will continue to burn steadily, like German tinder, without living flame or smoke. The combustible is intended for heating irons, crucibles, etc.

——The Queen of England has now eight grandchildren, six of whom are boys.

——A weak recently published in Paris gives, professedly on good authority, statistics of the cost of the Crimean war to each and all of the powers who engaged in it. During the 22 months of the war the losses in Bill, sick and wounded, were, to France, 95,743 men; to England, 21,82s; to Piedmont, 2,194; to Turkey, 33,669; and to Russia, 500,000. The Paris writer puts the expense of the war to England in money, including the cost of placing the army on a war footing, at no less than $160,000,000.

——In order to make the vine more celebrated for the cultivation of watermelons, the whole of the inhabitants of Astrakan during the recent appearance of the Bey unable to set their fruit, they ate it themselves and died to the last man. The Bey, very angry, enforced labor to bury the last. In all it is said that 82,000 persons died of cholera and had living were buried in Egypt within six weeks.

——A return has been published of the whole of the steam vessels registered in Great Britain on or before the 1st of January, 1865. The number of vessels is 3,154, the amount of registered tonnage 676,742, and the amount of gross tonnage 992,850.

——The Congregationalists, Methodists, Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Universalists, Unitarians, Jews, Catholics, Quakers, and Independents, 12 Unitarians, 5 Jews, 3 Catholics, 3 Quakers, 2 Baptists, and 1 Universalist. The remainder of Irish constituencies, 31 Catholics, 1 Quaker, and 1 Presbyterian. The representatives of Scottish constituencies, 3 United Presbyterians, 2 Free Churchmen, 1 Independent, and 1 Baptist. Total, 658. The proportion of dissenters in the new House of Commons 44, and the number of churchmen 614.

——The Seven Deadly Sins of London, drawn in Seven several Coaches through the Seven several gates of the City, with the Effects the Plague will have in the Year of the last addition which Mr. Paine Collier has made to the collection of "Early English Poetry," is called Vox populi vox dei, by the Baker. It was written in the time of the Great Plague of London.

——The cheap dinner movement, which has done much for Glasgow and other great towns, is extending in London. On the 26th of August the first of a series opened a fourth London establishment at the old Foreign Office, Park street, Westminster, accommodation for dining 4,000 persons daily.

——The terms of the constitution of the Russian peasants, just published at St. Petersburg, if appears that 23,000,000 peasants will be released temporarily to work for the landowners, and that 5,112,492 are either released free from service in addition to their allotment or will shortly be so. Of the 2,949,937 are now freeholders, and 2,162,555 are expected to possess land under contract, through the intervention of the Government, and 447,000 without such intervention.

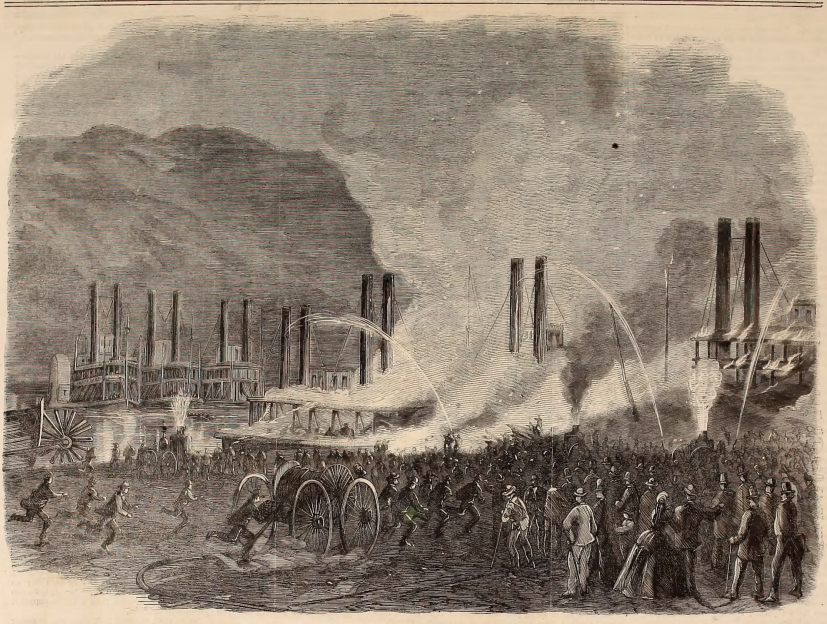
——The French Government has constituted that of Brazil to purchase material of war in France.

——The monument recently erected to Prince Albert, at Coburg, bears on the front the inscription: "Albert, Prince Consort of Great Britain and Ireland, born at Rosenau, August 26th, 1819. With this motto beneath: "Da Lucem Domine." Underneath the motto: "The other side has merely the inscription: "Erected to Albert, 1865."

——Johann Frederick Encke, director of the Royal Observatory at Berlin, died on the 26th ult. He was born in Hamburg in 1791, studied at Gottingen, served in the Prussian army, and after filling various subordinate positions, was appointed to his post in Berlin in 1825. He will be chiefly remembered for his services rendered to the movements of a comet called after his name, brought it we believe in 1819 to the point of its revolving inhabitants have left their houses, their universities and their churches, and have come out to see it. It may to open fields beyond the city. At certain points in the city, the rents of houses have risen, and have been literally piled up by scores, waiting transportation to the line of flight. Out of the city multitudes sleep, on the old city wall, next the sea, had a slide arranged, from which the dead bodies were shot into boats, to be buried in the sea."

AN ARAB PHYSICIAN.

Many years ago, when he was but a boy, and before the French occupation, a negro was born in once near Sidi Ferruch, where he then was. Two of her children were twins, and were named Julian prince and his tutor. Both were at once seized and taken away; but the prince found means to let his friends know of their safety. He was educated with the son of the Dey, and the remainder promised on his reaching his own land. The Dey died behind as a hostage, his prize being included in the prince's escape. The Moslem was never forthcoming, and the poor Italian, who was a doctor in Algiers, was put to death in a barbarous way. Thus he died; but my narrator added:



"I am not sure that he is dead, and I did much to lighten the old Italian's misery; and he, in return, taught me the secret of his knife, and from that time I became renowned among the tribes, and effected hitherto impossible cures.

Our conversation turned on the use of poison, and I found that he was perfectly up in his acquaintance with one. Piqued at my incredulity, the old man showed me a little bottle containing a liquid which to my eyes was as clear as the clearest water, which he asserted was a deadly poison. He threw the water on the ground, and the consequence would be death, and that, he added, with the utmost coolness, in the space of a few minutes. Wishing to test the existing powers of this fearful agent, and after sundry precautions to prevent his inhaling the fumes, I threw the water on the ground, telling him to do so. The operation lasted but a few seconds, and the moment it was over I was struck dumb. I nearly telling him it was a present from the old doctor, recommencing it in consequence to his special protection. Mahomned seemed greatly to wonder at my taste in dogs, but he took it, and at daylight the following morning the black sons of the Arab tribe were far behind me. The next day Mahomned reported to me that my new acquisition had refused his food; and being like most of his class a bit of a dog-fancier, he offered to cure it. Without telling him the reason of my anxiety, I gratefully accepted his reward if he succeed, and Mahomned went away sure of his bakshish.

The dog died, however, on the fourth day.

THE OLD QUARTERS OF CAIRO, EGYPT, DURING THE PREVALENCE OF THE CHOLERA—THE REMOVAL OF THE SICK AND THE DEAD.

THE BURNING OF THE STEAMER'S RIVER QUEEN AND ALBREE, AT PITTSBURGH, PA., SUNDAY, SEPT. 10.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOHN D. GEYSER.

COMES THE BRIDE!

BY ADA VROOMAN.

She blanched from brow to chin,
She grew as white and thin,
As a statue of Despair,

Then I was thrust aside,
And a cry of "Lo! the Bride!
Rent the air.

As they passed out at the door,
I fell upon the floor
Like a stone.
But with the flowers that dropt,
From her bridal crown, I stopt,
My lips from making moan.

'Till midnight chimed I lay,
And did not dare to pray,
Though I sat on the cross
At the Altar, surely kept
Loving watch the while I wept,
For my loss.

When the yellow moon at last
O'er the mountain rose, I passed
Through the door,
But a something at my feet,
Lay silent in the street,
Where naught had been before

Oh, glad was I to see!
My love had come to me—
Mine own beloved now!
I knelt down at her side,
A Bridegroom with his Bride,
And kissed both lip and brow.

But kisses, it is said,
Have no meaning for the Dead,
Stone cold was she!
Yet I clasped her to my breast,
And God's own joy and rest
Came so to me.

When the morning came, they found,
Two statues on the ground
In the street.
One was dead—the missing Bride,
But his fate, who lay beside,
Was not so sweet.

Only mad! men called me so,
When they shut me from the glow,
Of the blessed, blessed day.
But One they know not of,
My Life, my Spirit Love,
Is at my side alway.

The False Accusation;

OR,

SAVED AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR.

"FALL in! fall in! tumble out, boys, and get in line as quick as possible!" the voice of Orderly Thatcher rose loud and clear one morning long before the hour for reveillé. The half-awakened, sleepy soldiers flocked from their tents, half-dressed, and obeyed the order, rubbing their eyes and wondering why they were called from their comfortable quarters at such an unusual hour.

"Fall in, boys! don't wait for your clothes or equipments," continued the good-natured non com., taking his position in front. "Attention! right dress! in place, rest!"

"In place rest is it, yer spalpeen!" exclaimed Jimmy, a little Irishman, a favorite with the whole company. "A pretty place to rest, the likes of this, and we just from avate dhrames, and where we cud rest in perfect pace."

"It's adding insult to injury, Jimmy thinks," said a companion, "and I think so too."

"What is adding insult to injury?" asked the orderly.

"Injuring a man by callin' him up so airly in the morning, and then insultin' him wid orders to rest in a place the likes of this, ye blackguard," answered Jimmy, feigning anger.

"What does it mean, orderly?" asked another. "Are you going to call the roll before reveillé?"

"I can't tell you anything about it," was the reply: "I'm going 'cording to orders from the colonel. Here he comes now, attention!"

As he ceased speaking, Col. C—— galloped up and addressed the orderly.

"Sergeant Thatcher, call your roll."

The order was obeyed.

"Are the men all present?"

"They are, sir."

"That is sufficient. Dismiss them now; but see that no man leaves his quarters until further orders."

"Aye, aye, sir. Attention! break ranks, march."

"Hi-toby-lightning-humbug-sigle-bunr-cheeboo, and that's Pennsylvania Dutch, for I'm blamed if I wouldn't like to know what that's for," ejaculated Tom Elliot, a bluff, but good-natured fellow, who stood six-feet-two in his socks, and weighed two hundred without his overcoat. "There's something out o' common to pay, that's certain."

"It was done to rob us of an hour's rest, that was all."

The speaker was a morose, ill-looking fellow, who had not ceased to grumble since the first order to "fall in" was given.

"You know better than that, Jack Kelley," rejoined Tom. "You know Col. C—— would do no such thing."

"I know that we are treated like niggers, only worse," replied Jack. "We are a set of slaves to a few shoulder-straps; and if I ever am a man again, I'll give some I know of, what they don't expect."

"If you are ever a man, Jack Kelley, it will be something you never was yet," returned Tom, who took no pains to conceal his contempt for the ill-natured grumbler.

A loud laugh from his companions follow Tom's sally, and Jack slunk away, threatening h bluff antagonist with future vengeance.

"Look out for that fellow, Tom," said

"HIS CLENCHED FIST FELL WITH CRUSHING FORCE UPON JACK'S FACE."

orderly. "He will do you some injury if he ever gets an opportunity to do so with safety to himself."

"I don't intend to give him an opportunity," replied Elliott. "I'll risk him; he's such a coward he won't dare do anything."

"He may give you a stab in the dark, when you least expect it; you'd better keep your eye on him."

"Its an old saying and a true one, that a barking dog never bites," replied Tom; "and Jack Kelley barks the principal part of the time. He is continually prattling about the rations, or because he has to do duty, and he has threatened to kill every officer in the regiment. I don't think he'll ever hurt any one, though I shouldn't be surprised if he deserted to the Johnnies, if he got a chance."

"He would injure them more than he would us," rejoined Thatcher, "and I guess 'twould be a good plan to give him a chance to go."

In a little while the crowd dispersed; the orderly retiring to the captain's marque, and the street was deserted.

The forenoon conversation will give the reader an idea of the character and standing of Kelley and Elliot. The former was of Irish descent, though he claimed to be American born. He was a young man—not more than twenty-three years of age—and had evidently been respectably reared. He was naturally clever, but was ill-informed, a fluent reader, good penman, and by taking the right course, might have been an entirely different man, and have had the respect and good-will of his companions, instead of occupying the position he did.

But he was morose, ill-tempered, and disagreeable, disobliging, and, as was generally supposed, dishonest. He had never been detected in any act of pilfering, but watches and other valuables had mysteriously disappeared, and circumstances connected with their loss, had caused suspicion to centre upon him.

About the middle of the forenoon, we were made acquainted with the cause of the morning's strange proceedings. A squad of men from the provost-guard, accompanied by General Sharpe and his staff, came through the camp, and searched every tent and knapsack, carefully examining every nook and corner, and even subjecting the persons of the men. We were then drawn up in line, and addressed by the general.

He said money had entered his room during his absence, and broken open his desk, abstracting a package of money containing five hundred dollars. He had, the previous afternoon, sealed it up to send home by express, and had intended called away before doing so. Upon returning near midnight, he discovered the robbery, and immediately sent word to have the roll called in every regiment of the brigade, and all absentees without leave reported, and a guard dispatched to arrest them.

A staff officer had noticed a man wearing the insignia of our regiment, walking away from the general's quarters, soon after the departure of the latter, but he could not recognize him among our number, although he went through the camp for that purpose.

When he came to Kelley, he eyed the latter sharply, and I fancied Jack turned pale, and endeavored to steal in awkward and unnatural position. "I thought this man to be about the size of the one I saw," said the officer, pointing to Kelley. "I would not say he was the one, for I did not observe him very particularly, and as he was walking from me, I did not see his face."

Do you think he is the man?" asked the colonel, who had a reputation Jack bore.

"I can easily prove an alibi, colonel, if he does," said Kelley, evidently considerably excited. "I was on duty yesterday, and all the time the money was sent to Wall. I was on No. 3 post, at the foot of the parade-ground. Tom Elliot saw me there, as I think he will tell you, for he went past my beat after words."

"He is right, I am ready to swear," rejoined Tom, coming forward. "I went out to the spring yesterday afternoon to fill some canteens, and I recollect seeing him on the beat."

The orderly testified that Jack was on the guard detail the day before, and that called the name in the latter's favor, for no man can be in two places at one and the same time. There were several men in the regiment whom we considered none too good to commit the theft. In our own company, Jack was the only man we would mistrust. A detail was made from each company in the regiment, and after the absentees, and before night they were all brought in, the majority in a state of inebriation. But no trace of the missing money could be discovered. An order was issued at dress parade, offering a reward of two hundred dollars for the restoration of the money and conviction of the thief, or one hundred and fifty dollars for the arrest of the culprit alone.

From some cause that I could not explain, I felt certain in my own mind that Kelley was the guilty man. There was nothing in favor of my supposition; in fact, there was good legal evidence of his innocence. Still I felt that he was the thief. I could no more help it than I could knowing that I was innocent.

The next day Tom and myself were sitting by the cook-house fire, as we supposed, alone, and our conversation naturally turned upon the events of the last two days. I asked Tom if he suspected any one in particular?

"Well," he replied, "it's a hard question to answer; I can only own man in our company we would believe dishonest enough to do it, and he's proved an alibi."

"I understand you," I replied.

"Somehow," he continued, "I can't help mistrusting Kelley. I wouldn't wrong him for anything, but he acted so queer yesterday, when the officers were talking. Did you notice how pale he was, and how he tried to shrink himself up, and look smaller than he was?"

"I noticed that he appeared very much excited," I replied. "But he naturally would, to have the officer accost him as he did."

"Perhaps he would, for he is a great coward, and that's one thing in his favor. It requires some courage to enter the general's headquarters in broad daylight and steal five hundred dollars; and Jack hasn't a bit of pluck."

As he finished speaking I thought I heard a step behind me, and, looking round, there stood Jack, fairly black with passion, having heard every word that was said. Advancing to Tom's side, with angry mien, he said:

"Tom Elliott, did I ever steal anything that you know of?"

"I couldn't swear that you ever did," was the cool reply.

"Well, then, what have I ever done to you—when did I ever lay a straw in your way, or give you any reason to talk about me as you do?"

"I don't know as you ever injured me, Jack," replied Tom, "although you have made some people very sorrowful. I know you haven't got the muscle to do me much harm. I don't want to hunt your feelings, and if I'd known you were standing round to listen, I wouldn't have said what I did. But you know how you have conducted yourself since you joined the company, and why we feel towards you as we do, and I'm willing to be respectable men. We came into the army because we considered it our duty to do so. We expect to go home when the war closes, and we wish to take our former respectable positions in society when we do; so we try to be respectable and conduct ourselves like men here, and not be ruffians as some are. You are strong enough to do whatever you take a different course hereafter, and be the man you are capable of being, and you'll soon win as many friends as you now have enemies."

"I'm as good a man as you are, Tom Elliott!" exclaimed Jack, getting very angry, and brandishing his fists.

"Oh, no, you're not, Jack," replied Tom. "I'm your better as far as strength is concerned. I have only to get down, and you know what advantage you can obtain injour. And that puts me in mind of something else: I said I could not swear that you were absent from the camp, because you sold a bottle of brandy from the captain when we were on the transport."

"You lie! you lie!" roared Jack, fairly dancing with rage, and shaking his fists in Tom's face. "You're a lying thief, and——"

The next instant Tom had sprung to his feet, and his clenched fist fell with a resounding blow upon Jack's face, felling him to the ground. For a moment he lay perfectly still, and I feared he was badly injured, but he soon recovered, and suddenly turning to Tom, with the expression of a demon, hissed through his teeth:

"Tom Elliott, you'll wish you were in h— before to-morrow night! I won't forget this blow!"

"I don't much think you will forget it right away," laughed Tom, resuming his seat as quietly as though nothing had transpired to ruffle him. "Low, sneaking, miserable wretch! he deserves knocking down by everybody he meets."

"I'm sorry it happened, Tom," I said. "I'm afraid it will get you into trouble."

"So am I sorry it happened," he replied. "I don't want to be arrested, and always feel as if I were debased after having a muss. But what could a man do? Would you be called such a name and injured as I was yesterday, and not take it perfectly cool, without doing anything?"

"I know it was more than flesh and blood could stand," I returned. "I hope it will all end where it is."

"I'll risk the coward anyway. But let's go up to supper, as the second dinner bell—I'm going to bunk with you to-night, and I might as well board with you too."

"All right; you're welcome, if you fetch your rations with you," I replied, and we walked away towards my quarters.

I saw nothing more of Jack until roll-call the following morning. He appeared about as usual, with the exception of an inflamed bunch over his right eye, a memento of Tom's fistial prowess. He did not look toward the latter, nor did I hear him speak to any of the boys.

It so happened that Elliott and myself were on guard detail that morning, and while we were mounting I noticed Kelley going towards the colonel's quarters, accompanied by a little fellow, a member of Co. ——, whom I knew by sight, named Doyle. I thought nothing of it at the time; but soon after, while at my post, I saw Jack, Doyle, and Colonel C—— crossing the green in front of the general's quarters. This beat was next to mine, and I directed his attention to them. They entered the general's quarters, and in a little while reappeared, and left the encampment.

"I guess Jack stole the money, and has concluded to repent, confess and beg for pardon," said Tom, as the party entered our Company street.

"I shouldn't wonder," I replied. "But see, they have stopped at your tent; what do you suppose that means?"

"I declare they have! I'd give something to know what they want. Jack knows them, with some uneasiness of manner. "I'll bet the cowardly blackguard has entered a complaint against me for knocking him down."

"But I should think they were searching the tent," I said; "they are taking up the floor boards."

"What in thunder can they be after?" ejaculated my companion. "There, they are coming this way with an armed guard."

"They are after one of us, Tom, that's certain. We'll soon know, for they're coming right towards us."

In a few moments the colonel came up, and pointing Tom out, ordered the guard to arrest and conduct him to the general's quarters.

The order was obeyed, and my companion was marched off between two files of armed guards, and I was left, with the command to walk both beats until relieved by the next guard.

I remained on duty until guard mounting the following morning, and on returning to camp I asked the orderly for what Tom was arrested. On my astonishment I received this reply:

"For stealing the general's money!"

At my urgent request, Thatcher related the particulars as follows:

Kelley and Doyle were the accusers and principal witnesses. They were on guard the afternoon in question, and saw Tom leave the camp and go towards the general's. In the evening, Kelley (accordingly to his statement) became taken sick, and obtained leave to go to his quarters. As he passed Tom's tent he noticed a light, and, looking in, he saw the latter pulling up the floor boards, two or three of which were pulled up. When the robbery was made known, he thought, perhaps, Tom was the culprit, but concluded to await further developments ere making it known. He therefore watched Tom until the night before the arrest, when he again saw him remove the floor boards, dig a hole in the earth, do the sand, and exhume a package, which he replaced after examining it a few moments, to see if it was all right. The package he laid the case before the colonel and general, who ordered an investigation of the affair. Tom's quarters were searched, and the money found buried about six inches beneath the earth.

It was astounded. It could not be possible that Kelley had been guilty of such a crime, and committing such an act, appear so unconcerned, feign innocence so perfectly as he had through all the proceedings up to the very moment of his arrest.

"It cannot be possible that Tom Elliot is guilty?" I exclaimed, as the orderly finished his recital. "I can do not think he is, do you?"

"I don't know what to think," he replied, shaking his head as if to say, it's a hard case. "Appearances are against Tom, and he be innocent, he will have a hard time for him now."

"But, for the Lord's sake, will they take the word of such a man as Jack Kelley against one who has always borne a good character?" I asked, greatly excited. "If Tom Elliot says he is innocent, I would believe him in spite of all the circumstantial evidence. All of Kelleys and Doyles could bring against him."

"You seem to forget the fact of the money being found under Tom's tent," replied Thatcher. "How could it get there without his knowledge?"

The question was a poser, I was forced to admit.

"You see," continued my companion, "it's mighty hard to make your friendship for a man, or his own good name, silence or counteract facts, and I'm afraid Tom will be in a bad box, and would willingly take my place in the ranks, and give up every hope of future promotion, if by so doing I could clear him of the charge, and prove his innocence."

"But you cannot believe him guilty, I know you cannot."

"I told you I did not know what to believe. I do not see how the money could get under his tent floor without his knowledge and consent."

"I tell you it is all a plot," I continued, "I know it is. Couldn't Kelley place the money where it was found?"

"He might have done so, had Tom been absent nights. But you know he has not been out of camp in two weeks, except to go after a canteen of water occasionally."

"I know he has been in camp, and he slept in my tent last night." I fairly shouted, as a glimmer of hope dawned upon me. "Kelley placed the money there then, I know he did."

"Is that a fact?" asked my companion. "Will you swear to it, Hugh?"

"Swear to it! Yes; and what is more, I can prove it by Beebe, and the boys in the next tent, who saw me lying there off and forth until midnight, and Tom told us some of his funny stories."

I will here explain that the number of men usually occupying an A tent was four; but about two months prior to the events narrated a detail had been made from the regiment for provost duty in town. Twelve were taken from our company, and as a result, my tent lost mates. Three were also taken from Tom's tent, leaving us each in possession of our respective quarters. Tom and I frequently visited, sometimes in my tent, and sometimes in Tom's; but upon the night of the robbery, it so happened that I was in neither of our tents, and when I returned to camp my companion had gone to sleep, and not wishing to disturb him, I went to my own tent, leaving him in that of Tom's.

"If Tom was in your tent last night," said Thatcher, after a little reflection, "it is evident enough that he was not tearing up boards, and exhuming money from beneath them, and, of course, that being the case, Kelley has sworn to a lie."

"To be sure he has," I rejoined. "He stole the money from Tom's tent, in order to be revenged for the knockdown he gave him yesterday. Is is all perfectly clear to my mind."

"I am glad you are satisfied that Jack is the real culprit, I only wonder that I doubted it for a moment. But it was a sticker with me how the money came to be found in Tom's tent without his knowledge; for I supposed he occupied it every night. We must watch Kelley and Doyle, and try to fathom the mystery. If we see them in conversation, we must endeavor to get near enough to them to hear what they say. D'ye understand?"

"Yes, I understand."

"We must be careful not to alarm them, or let them know what our suspicions are. But we must get on the right side of Kelley; make believe we think better of him than we did before, and that we are satisfied of Tom's guilt. Tom will be court-martialed in two or three weeks, and we must work hard for evidence to clear him."

"It cannot be the Lord will allow that scoundrel to triumph!" I exclaimed. "Poor Tom, I wish I could see him, and tell him that we believe him innocent."

"I am going down town this afternoon, and if I can get a permit, I shall go in and see him; he's in the guard-house at provost headquarters," replied the orderly.

"If you see him, tell him that his friends—myself in particular—believe him to be wrongfully accused. Tell him from me that I will do everything I possibly can to help him on his trial, and you, of course, will do the same. And here, I've got three dollars, and I know he has none. Take them to him; he may have a chance to send after tobacco, or something extra to eat, by the guard."

"I will give them to him, and I've got as much more to put to it. I must go to the adjutant's office with my morning report; I will see you again this afternoon. Keep your eye peeled on Jack and that little Doyle."

"Never you fear me," I replied, "they won't stir without my knowing it."

Matt Doyle was a mere boy in years and mind. I had heretofore considered him honest, and not at all the companion Kelley would chose in a robbery and theft of that nature. I knew that he was unstable and easily influenced by others. On several occasions within the last three months I had seen him in company with Jack, and had thought I would sometime warn him against being too intimate with him. I resolved to see Matt and endeavor to induce him to furnish any evidence against Kelley. But I was disappointed. He professed to know nothing about the affair, except that he was Tom go through the lines, in the direction of the general's quarters. As for Kelley, he avoided me entirely, and I found it impossible to draw him into any conversation in regard to the affair. I felt that I could understood me perfectly, and knew that I did him. His looks said as plainly as words, "I know, old fellow, that you understand the whole affair, as well as though you saw me place the money there. But you see I've got the inside track, you can't prove it!"

The time passed rapidly, and to the dismay of the orderly and myself, the day of trial found us no better prepared to prove Tom's innocence and his accuser's guilt, than we were the day of his arrest. As a last resort, I called upon Doyle the night before the trial, and appealed to him, with all the eloquence I could command, to disclose what he knew, and save Tom. I assured him that no harm should befall him, if he confessed—that he would receive full pardon for the part he took in the affair. I told him that the truth will eventually be discovered, and that, when it was, he would be more than sorry he had not used his own neck when he had an opportunity. I tried his cupidity, pledging myself—in the name of Tom and his friends—to give him two hundred and fifty dollar's, if he would confess. In fact, I exhausted my persuasive powers in vain; he either knew more than he professed, or he was a more hardened wretch than I had supposed it possible he could be.

To be brief, the trial took place the following day, and although we did all in our power to save the prisoner, we felt there was no hope for him. The testimony of Kelley (who unblushingly swore to seeing the money secreted by Tom), coupled with its discovery beneath the latter's tent, was deemed conclusive. In vain I testified to his sleeping in my tent—in vain the entire company (with the single exception of Kelley) testified to the prisoner's unblemished character. He was judged guilty, and the finding and sentence of the court were forwarded to the Department Commander, and returned approved. Tom was sentenced to forfeit all his pay, to be dishonorably dismissed the service, and to be confined at the Dry Tortugas for ten years.

Through the influence of a permit to visit him in his cell, and I shall never forget his look of despair and agony when he grasped my hand and said:

"Hugh, Hugh!—my mother! my poor mother! God help her now; this will kill her!" And Mary! Oh, God, it is too much! I never told you that I was to be married, Hugh, as soon as the war ended!"

I could hardly speak, and I am not ashamed to say that I cried like a child. At length I tried to say something to cheer him, but he interrupted me.

"You do not believe I took it, do you? You will write to my poor mother, and Mary, and tell them I am innocent."

I assured him of my confidence in his innocence, and promised to write to his friends before the other report of the affair could reach them. I also told him that his companions all believed him wrongfully accused, and that we would endeavor to petition until we obtained a pardon from the President. I remained with him until "Tattoo", and then bade him farewell, perhaps forever.

We were awakened the next morning at an early hour, and ordered to prepare for a hurried march. After a hasty breakfast we were formed in line, and marched to Port Royal Ferry, reaching there about sunrise. Our force consisted of the 50th R. Vol., one company of the 8th Mich., one company of the 3d Mass. Artillery, with a section of Hexham's Battery, and a squadron of Massachusetts Cavalry, who had not been in the fighting enough to learn the drill exercise. They were a splendid material, brave and willing, but inexperienced. Crossing to the main land, we took up our line of march for the white house, intending to cut communication between Charleston and Savannah, by destroying the bridges along the railroad.

The country was a continuation of rice land, and upon each side of the road, as far as the eye could reach, the ground was covered with several inches of water. Just before reaching Pocotaligo we came to a stream crossed by a bridge several rods in length. The planks had been pulled up and removed, leaving naught but the timbers and string-pieces of the structure to cross upon. A narrow causeway led to the bridge, and upon the opposite side was a large force of dismounted rebel cavalry, posted behind stone walls and fences, and concealed in a dense thicket of cypress a few yards from the road.

As we advanced along the causeway, and commenced crossing the uncertain bridge, a withering volley was poured into us from the concealed rebs, which placed horse du combat nearly a score of our men, and drove us back in confusion. Almost the first to fall was Matt Doyle, who was marching in the file just in front of the one I was in. As soon as a stretcher could be obtained, I helped to bear the wounded boy to the surgeon's station. The latter examined the wound, and at once pronounced it as his opinion that Matt would die before midnight.

The first battle of Pocotalgo is now a subject of history, and the particulars have been too often published to make a detailed account necessary at this time. We were kept at bay for several hours, the rebs killing and wounding many of our men, and repelling every attempt made by us to charge across the bridge. At length, the twenty-five of Captain G. Z. Dimmock's Co. (D.) 50th Pa., headed by Lieut. John Foot, made a bold rush, and, gaining the opposite side, sent the whole force of rebels flying, skulking in full retreat. But at this moment, just as we were pursuing the flying foe with excellent hearts, we were ordered to fall back. We did so, and reached the ferry, and the planking of the gunboats, in time to escape capture, the rebs having sent a large force of infantry and artillery across to intercept us.

We crossed to our own side of the river about midnight, weary and exhausted. I was met upon the landing by Hospital Steward Foot, who requested me to go with him, as Matt Doyle was rapidly sinking, and was very anxious to see me. I followed him at once, and found that the great poet and apparently very near his end. He saw me as I entered the tent, and extending his hand, said in feeble tones:

"I am so glad you have come. Where is the Chaplain; I must see him too?"

The Chaplain was soon found, and then the wounded boy, as I expected, made a full and explicit confession, acknowledging that he and Kelly committed the robbery for which poor Tom was imprisoned.

They had been companions in the business for several months, Jack stealing and Doyle secreting the property. They were on guard the afternoon of the robbery, and saw the General mount his horse and ride away just as Tom passed them on his way to the spring. It occurred to the latter to turned, Kenny act his post, and slipping over to the General's quarters, broke open the desk and abstracted the package of money, returning to his post before the relief came around. Matt concealed the package in a deserted cellar until after the search, when Kelley became frightened at the reward offered for the apprehension of the thief, and began to contrive in some way to divert suspicion from himself. He then had the difficulty with Tom, and by reference to our guard-roll the crime upon the latter, thus insuring his own safety, and securing the reward of two hundred dollars, and, in the same time, secured for the blow Tom gave him. He, therefore, watched his opportunity, and the night Tom stayed with me the second time he placed the money in my tent, and entered complaint against him, as has been seen.

If there was a happy man in the world I was that one, as Matt finished his confession. I forgot all about my fatigue as I hastened to call the Colonel, that he might also hear the proof of my friend's innocence. The kind-hearted officer, although he nearly worn out as any of his men, obeyed the summons, and taking down the confession from Matt's lips, left the latter right. At an early hour the following morning I accompanied the Colonel to town, and the case was laid before the General. In less than two hours thereafter I presented the Officer of the Guard with an order for Tom's release, and, accompanied by the latter, started for camp. As we entered our regimental street we met Jack, bearing two files of bayonets, on his way to occupy the quarters just vacated by his victim. He was court-martialled, and received the same sentence given to Tom, with five years added to the ten, at the Dry Tortugas.

Of course Tom's sentence was reconsidered and annulled. Gen. Sherman was appointed to the General, and acted in that capacity until our division was called to Virginia, when he was promoted Lieut.-Colonel, and served on the Gen'l's staff until the latter was killed at Chantilly. He steadily advanced until he became a colonel, and commanded a brigade through the last campaign. After Lee's surrender he resigned and came home, and last week I attended his wedding.

Matt Doyle did not die after all. He lived to become a good soldier and an honest man, and is still with his regiment, although he will, probably, be discharged before many months. Tom Gordon pardoned him, but not until the whole company signed a petition, headed with Tom's name, in his behalf.

INAUGURATION OF THE WILDEY MONUMENT.

SAUTHPORK has just been the scene of an unwonted excitement, the interest in which must spread to wherever the English language is spoken, or where the order of Odd Fellowship is recognized.

On Wednesday, the 20th ult., the monument built at Bullfinch, dedicated to the memory of Joseph Wildey, a good man of English birth, who, nearly half a century since, planted in that city the seeds of an order that since has grown into vast proportions, and a great agency of good.

The day arose beautifully, and at early dawn the city was alive with the movements of Lodges and deputations from every part of the Union, brought together from a desire to honor to their founder. The President was expected to join in the demonstration, and expectation not realized, from the great press of business upon the Ex-cutive, and this gave additional vigor to the preparations.

The procession was formed with James Eidder, Esq., as Grand Marshal of the Grand Lodge of the United States, and head, and at half past twelve o'clock reached the monument, where, after prayer and a statement of the birth and development of the shrouded monument before them, the folds of cloth were removed, and the emblem that typified the Order was revealed to the gaze of the thousands, amid a shout that filled the air for several minutes, and showed, more strongly than mere words, the appreciation of the mass for the artistic beauty of the shaft and station before them.

When the enthusiasm had somewhat subsided, Past Grand Sire James B. Nicholson came forward, and, in behalf of the Committee of the Wildey Monument Association, presented the structure to the Grand Lodge of the United States, with a few appropriate remarks. There was then an ode sung, a benediction from the Rev. D. D. Williamson, and the ceremonies closed by the delivering of the procession, and the "Ode to Old Fellows' Hall, the evening ending in various banquets and joviality.

The procession took one hour and ten minutes to pass a given point, and the number of spectators on the ground is safely estimated at 50,000.

SCENE OF THE INDIAN COUNCIL.

We give this week the illustration of a point in which is now centred great interest—the scene of the great Indian Council, at which nearly all the great tribes of the South and West were represented.

On the 14th September, the Osages, Seminoles, Creeks, Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Choctaws and Shawnees, sat in solemn council over all their differences, and with rich color and picturesque environment with any State, nation, power, or sovereignty whatsoever, entered into a solemn treaty or session of bonds, or any act heretofore done by them, or any of their people, to be inconsistent with their allegiance to the United States, is hereby revoked, canceled and repudiated.

In consideration of the foregoing stipulations made by the members of the respective nations and tribes of Indians present, the United States, through its Commissioners, promises that it will re-establish peace and friendship with all the nations and tribes of Indians that lie within the limits of this country; that he will afford ample protection for the security of persons and property of the members of said nations, tribes, and declares its willingness to enter into treaty, to arrange and settle all questions relating to and growing out of treaties heretofore made between the affected by any treaty made by said nations with the so-called Confederate states, at this Council now convened or last preceding, as the case may be, as the same may be approbated.

This commits our red-skinned brethren to a policy that Uncle Sam will take good care they carry out, or their end will be extermination.

THE LATEST GHOST SENSATION.

WITHIN the past week Jersey City has been the scene of a sensation somewhat in the shape of a ghost, the isle of which rises somewhat in this wise.

A few nights since a gentleman had occasion to visit one of the lower streets in the neighborhood of Newark, when he was greeted with a succession of peculiarly weird, hideous and unaccountable sounds, which seemed to come from the base of the building. We describe himself as not having been at all excited at the time, nor in any way disposed to attribute the cause to the lateness of the hour, or the silent loneliness that prevailed and was the presiding element of the scene. Upon entering the house he was greeted with a succession of bid-ous sounds, too unearthly in their cadence to admit of comparison to anything except the groans and moans which might be supposed to issue from the dismal caverns of a pandemonium, like that of which their dreams in the days of childhood were evoked. In effect they have the same relation to all sounds, which the ghastly casements of death bear to the village living.

The gentleman says he is not superstitious; and that no sounds were made to him unnatural except those wrought into fantasy by terror, he distinctly avers. He passed on, the sounds all the while growing more intense, until, as he entered the East, the sounds the voices grew too terrible for human imagination to endure.

Here the gentleman paused and endeavored to collect himself sufficiently to investigate the possible causes of the scene. Upon the floor, however, there was no corpse, no tomb, and then suddenly a burst of wild voices would seem to issue simultaneously from all parts of the building, intermingled with the sounds of a heavy thrasher, and dying away only to give place to a second succession of shrieks more ghastly and unusual than the last.

He then left the building, and afterwards divulged the singular experience which he had undergone. Upon his return to several friends by whom the reality of the sounds has been verified.

It is positive, too, if any hoax is in progress, that no familiar element can be detected in their analysis. There is, so witnesses aver, nothing metallic about the sounds, and nothing that can be attributed to wood. Beginning with a dull moaning cadence which seems to resemble more than anything else the croon of a certain species of swivel common to the East, the sound gradually and distinctly expands in volume, until distant shrieks almost startling in their intensity succeed, gently all the building, and then die away in low, peculiarly hollow rattles, like the falling of clouds upon a coffin.

Thus for the origin of the story, the explanation of whose singular phenomena no investigation has as yet succeeded in developing—which is the fact that a second hardly have escaped the scrutiny of the public.

Meantime the matter is the talk of the town in Jersey City, which is perfectly tremendous. On Sunday night hundreds of men and women excited to the highest pitch of morbid curiosity congregated around the house in the vicinity of nearly all the up-town houses of worship in the city. About 40 persons went over from Brooklyn also—among them a number of the profession—and a numerous crowd from New York attested the sensation which the report had up to the time created, in its various phases.

Up to the hour one hundred persons assembled in Line street, and were forcibly dispersed by the police; another, in Grant hundreds, thronged the edifice of the German Catholics on South Eighth street, and another building in Hamilton square was surrounded until a late hour in the night.

Last night there was no abatement of the excitement. The ghost has, however, been very generally located in the northern part of St. Mary's Cemetery, but as yet distinctly known to the populace, and our reporter was strangely requested to make no mention of any particular locality. Among the various explanations thus far suggested by the heavenly cars, the old idea that some fellow has by some device found his way under the flooring of the St. Boniface, and is amusing himself by practicing upon the credulity and superstition of the people, by means of burnt straw and ash, and regaling the alarmed visitors with dismal yelps and howls.

One gentleman, well known in the city, insisted that the ghost is found in the vicinity of the cemetery, in the South Eighth street. He relates that while his daughter was in the building nightly, hunting for the ghost, she saw, in passing the above-named edifice, a spook or ghostly figure, which suddenly waved its hand mysteriously towards the spire, buried a pave-stone directly in front of the door, and instantly took leaven of sight, and suddenly disappeared.

His description of the spectrum as having been gigantic in appearance, with eyes hollow and fiery, like marsh lights, and wearing a robe of white, which gradually resembled a cloud, so vapory and mist-like was its apparent texture. At the same time the spook uttered the most unearthly order, which seemed to issue from within the building.

Night before last, during the progress of the storm, another light was seen to move to and fro slowly over the ivy in the edifice of St. Boniface. A policeman, who was present and took notice, describes the light as having born yellow with a bluish tinge, and totally unlike anything he had ever seen. They would be seen only for an instant flitting to and from, and then the light would disappear, leaving all in darkness.

Thus far the matter progressed among the populace. Last Sunday night, the excitement wonderfully prevailed, and the ghost was the sole topic of conversation. Men talked of spectres and shadows upon the street, women talked of the shivers of with terror, about the strange mystery, and parents absolutely shook their heads in solemn silence, as they spoke of the weird revelations which went from lip to lip.

But last night the excitement waxed wilder and more tumultuous; several German societies turned out in force, and the police were called out in full force, a proc-dure sufficient to drive away any ghost or resurrectionist that ever lived. Jersey City was in a perfect state of insanity.

The same facts of a very peculiar order came to light last evening, that only served, when disseminated, to add to the mystery of the ghost. Several gentlemen of undoubted veracity and respectability were invited to visit the house of one of the parties who had a company with the sexton. As they entered the gate and passed around the building, the most unearthly lights previously mentioned were observed by one of the party. Decided to pursue the matter, and, with the consent of the master, until one of his companions hazarded the remark:

"Why, the building is lighted!"

And sure enough the edifice was lighted; a saintly, bluish flame appearing exactly in the position of the mysterious lights.

"The gas has evidently been lighted to frighten away the ghost," remarked one of the party, and they entered.

The investigators entered. The edifice was silent as a tomb within, and the tall columns gleamed like spectres under the mysterious light. No sound save that of the muffled footsteps of the party disturbed the solemn stillness that pervaded the atmosphere. It was as easy as noon to evident, under the circumstances, that the gas had been lighted to frighten away the ghost, and more superstitious than ever from the heart of Moslem Saracen, the party left the premises somewhat disturbed. The faint flame of the candelabrum only served to light the gloomy aisles of the edifice more terribly by haunted the gloomy aisles of the edifice more terribly suggestive.

"Let us turn off the gas," stammered one of the party, at length.

The gas was accordingly turned off, but strange—ah! but it appeared to the excited party, uncertain flame flickered above the candelabrum, continuing to burn with the same mysterious light. No sound was to save that of the muffled footsteps of the party disturbed the solemn stillness that pervaded the atmosphere. It was as easy as noon to evident, under the circumstances, that the gas had been lighted to frighten away the ghost, and more superstitious than ever from the heart of Moslem Saracen, the party left the premises somewhat disturbed. The faint flame of the candelabrum only served to light the gloomy aisles of the edifice more terribly by haunted the gloomy aisles of the edifice more terribly suggestive.

"Let us turn off the gas," stammered one of the party, at length.

The gas was accordingly turned off, but strange—ah! but it appeared to the excited party, uncertain flame flickered above the candelabrum, continuing to burn with the same mysterious light. No sound was to save that of the muffled footsteps of the party disturbed the solemn stillness that pervaded the atmosphere. It was as easy as noon to evident, under the circumstances, that the gas had been lighted to frighten away the ghost, and more superstitious than ever from the heart of Moslem Saracen, the party left the premises somewhat disturbed. The faint flame of the candelabrum only served to light the gloomy aisles of the edifice more terribly by haunted the gloomy aisles of the edifice more terribly suggestive.

But as the light went out, a low, moaning, ominous sound issued from within the building, gradually expanding in volume, until ghastly shrieks and groans mingled with the sounds of a heavy thrasher, succeeded with unearthly laughter in every part of the building, and then, with a peculiar murmurs, like the falling of dirt upon a multitude of coffins.

The party left the premises, and again a bluish flame appeared above the candelabrum.

Upon the 20th inst. will occur the veracity of every one of the several gentlemen pres nt.

Upon the whole matter, we believe, the crowd became next to unmanageable, and seemed determined to tear the edifice to the ground, without one or two coolheads in the city.

The whole affair, however, treated the whole matter as a hoax, and insisted that the whole story is a fabrication of some one determined to create a sensation.

We were assured at the police headquarters Jersey City, that there was more to come of it than the shallest brain dare acknowledge; but we must wait for further developments. We were, moreover, informed that the sexton resided in the course of a day or two by the clergyman and trustees of the church, and would resume his worship in the city, giving all they know about the matter.

This stands the case of the Jersey City ghost at present.

TOWN GOSSIP.

NEW YORK blooms twice a year; once in the spring, and again in the early fall. At the first blooming he jaded fashion of the metropolis emerges from a chaos of dissipation, dull opera, and violent rural shows, which, not being able to vent itself on the gay, green fields, or wilds, or on the sea-shore, or in the parks, or on Broadway, and luxuriates in sixteen dresses of chrysalis hues, and bonnets of the latest Parisian style. At the time the autumnal leaves begin to discard forever before the rural districts think of throwing off the livery of winter. For a couple of months this baby, of fickle caprices, is petted by the gay fools as all off to the country—there for a few months to regain health, to bring the roses back to their eyes, and color to the cheeks, and with the slight admixture of the springs and bathing places, return in the early autumn to blossom once more upon Broadway.

This second blossoming is just now occurring, and Broadway is gay with returned ruralists once more. The street is full, and old faces are charmed with the past are again nodding from their vis-a-vis of bonnets, or doffing the hat to the fair.

It is well to bear in mind that really the absorbing topic of the week is "the opening" which means, superficially, the fall fashions. Every autumn there are some one who is not thoroughly posted on terms, the first day on which fashionable milliners show their goods to the gazing public. At this time these arbiters of fashionable millinery have been excessively busy in two ways: firstly, in endeavoring to steal the fashions from the importers, and secondly, in endeavoring to prevent the country milliners from stealing from themselves. That they are both unsuccessful it is hardly necessary to say, and the importer who brings from Paris a score or two of bonnets to act as models in our benighted city, wakes up one morning, astonished, to find that the fashions have got out, and are already, unbought, in the stocks of half the milliners in town. And in its succession the town milliner finds that in turn she has been robbed in the same way by the innocent country fabricant.

This being the state of things it is hardly necessary for us to describe what is the coming style, as we must take it for granted, that all the citizens of Brooklyn and the city mean's of Jonestown are at this time posted on the prevailing mode; in which supposition, if we are not correct, we would respectfully refer them to Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine for October, where all proper curiosity will be satisfied.

Another sensation of the week, something on which Leaches are vainly endeavoring to feed, is that the occurrence of the Jewish New Year, or "Rosh Hashana." It is commanded in the old testament, Leviticus, xxiii., and in two verses, and is kept with great solemnity and festival, throughout the Hebrew world. The Synagogues are always full, and for the poorer classes they are erected for the occasion. In these the faithful gather at dawn, dressed in their grave clothes, say their prayers, and listen attentively to the blowing of the Shophar, or trumpet that is supposed to typify the last trump. Tradition gives us this day under the name of "Jom Hadin," or the Day of Judgment, and is kept until sunset on the evening of the 23d Sept., when the solemnities close with penitence and prayer, continuing until the 30th, that day being counted in Hebrew Chronology as the 10th of the seventh month.

Another subject of excitement among all nautical classes, is the very droll race between the steamers Alexander and Washington, a race made in accordance with the ideas of Mr. Secretary Welles, which is by tying them to the sea and allowing them to steam away for 96 hours, at the end of which time, as our theory goes, the palm will be awarded to the victorious one. At the present time each is working hard for a defeat, and we are not sure but both will be awarded the palm of "race."

At this moment, in the city of New York, there are many thousands of ailsant and educated men wandering the streets who are unable to procure employment, even though their ideas of remuneration be ever so moderate. Many of these have been thrown upon us by suddenly let loose upon the community by the mustering out of our armies, and by the hard and brutal fact that there is a prejudice in the minds of employers against returned soldiers. We will not ask why this is, for the answer is simply that the soldier knows that the employer very much, we must also blame the soldier for his pres-ed caution. He has, as a rule, very little money to encourage a belief in his recklessness. He has not somewhat grown to be a habit to look at his whole class as shiftless and foraging ops ations, in which the laws and customs of war have made him familiar. We have encouraged in the minds of citizens the belief that the camp has educated a class of desperadoes, of which they are now suffering the results. We see but one way of rectifying this, and that is a system of colonization and land labor into the rural districts. Without exception, they are artificers in wood and leather, an class for a trade remunerative. Let our returned soldier organize themselves, or other, and go into the country as they mutually agree on, or where they can make a good location for their works. By so doing, they can retain their old associations, and by the aid of the law of the land, which will speedily unravel what now bids fair to be a trouble some law, the city and country be relieved.

We are gratified to see that at a late meeting of School Commissioners, this matter was taken in consideration, and the thing so much referred to as lead to the issue of an order that no child should be allowed to sell any principal. This is a beginning, and we hope soon to see it go on to a full and perfect end. The power of the press is something supp ssedly repulsive to a parent, who loves his children, in the knowledge that he is en-nuing them to lead a life of misery, by the power of the pen and pandisment on them, when, perhaps, they will not do for themselves, but only for a parent's whim. It seems as if there was but little difference either a man or woman's wife or child, to the law of this palpable correction, and how many would do the first.

The week has been one of deep heat, but in the theatrical world. All New York has opened her dramatic doors, and the public are invited to be initiated in theatrical experiment. There is something wonderfully strange about this profession. In the midst of a terrible civil war they still went on with their daily avocations, and increased their accumulations of gold invested in material prosperity. Now that the war is done, and by the argument of the sword who declared that the Nero fiddling while Rome was burning, we should relapse into apathy, we are still in the midst of a very palpable correction, and how many would do the first.

The week has been one of deep heat, but in the theatrical world. All New York has opened her dramatic doors, and the public are invited to be initiated in theatrical experiment. There is something wonderfully strange about this profession. In the midst of a terrible civil war they still went on with their daily avocations, and increased their accumulations of gold invested in material prosperity. Now that the war is done, and by the argument of the sword who declared that the Nero fiddling while Rome was burning, we should relapse into apathy, we are still in the midst of a very palpable correction, and how many would do the first.

The week has been one of deep heat, but in the theatrical world. All New York has opened her dramatic doors, and the public are invited to be initiated in theatrical experiment. There is something wonderfully strange about this profession. In the midst of a terrible civil war they still went on with their daily avocations, and increased their accumulations of gold invested in material prosperity. Now that the war is done, and by the argument of the sword who declared that the Nero fiddling while Rome was burning, we should relapse into apathy, we are still in the midst of a very palpable correction, and how many would do the first.

We shall commence with Wallack's, which opened on Saturday night with "Rose Michel," and to be played by Tom Taylor, founded upon a Russo-Parisian story.

It opens at the time when the first revolt in the person of an artist who has been let out on furlough by his master in Russia, and who is supposed to be dead until the act-ual, as a consequence, arrives. The artist, by his ingenuity, has made a double French lady, who is a reproval, and who is used as an insult to the Czar, who rises a noble Russian, or a Russian nobleman. Just about this time the real Frenchman, who is supposed to be dead, arrives, and the consequences are that he, who turns up as the natural nobleman, stabbed by him, he naturally leads to a pretty battle of fists. In the cooking of this title, there is some of the agonizing necessary to make up the usual high excitement, but there will be a raising of the scene, and liberation of the artist as soon the report is made to the Russian Court, and in finally reach d by a mechanic discovery that the artist is not the man, but the other.

There is nothing in the play itself, but in its working up it shows to the greatest advantage the manner of its putting on the stage, reflects credit on the management. It is not to say that the old favorites were not welcomed back with real fervor, while the new ones received the most enthusiastic reception of hope for, of Nibbs's, the Revels have, after years of recuperation, re-appeared. They are hardly the Revels of old, though some of the old favorites are still about them, and brings back the old broad laugh. The public of this day demands more extensive, and, if possible, as it is exemplified in th over-crowded house s of every night at Nibbs's. It is useless to attempt to say that the entire piece will be produced, or any performer appear, the public will not have about all the same, and then the curtain goes up, the inevitable latest, "only standing room" is displayed.

At the Broadway, the Keans have crowded every night since they opened, and if success be the test of merit, then they must possess merit of more than common order.

On Saturday last this theatre introduced to us a new sensation in the person of Mr. Rockford Fairchild. Mr. Fairclough has, we believe, been a stu-ar to the stage for some time, or made a few appearances in the provinces, as the name was not announced on the bills. One thing of which we are sure, he does not lack confidence. He has made a very favorable sensation, for at least made sufficient impression on the audience to make them ask the question if there was the making of a good actor, and allow them to offer him the encouragement of several calls and some complimentary applause. Fairclough, if he sticks to the stage, will assuredly in a few years make a good actor.

Hermann, who has been astounding New York in some way this week, has not yet made his appearance at all to the crowds that flock to him. The Academy, which is generally looked upon as the most infallible spot in the city, has not a vacant seat after half past seven, and on ar very night, somewhere near a thousand a few hours away from the doors. Under such circumstances, criticism is dumb, and the performer stabs.

We could go through the week's catalogue thus, and only record the daily doings of New York. Our whole populace has gone theatre-mad, and every performer of any excellence may make a sure thing of success, if he brings his wares to this market.

A HORRIBLE backbiter wants to know if ladies in corsets mean staid women.

GRAND CELEBRATION OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS, AND DEDICATION OF THE MONUMENT ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF P. G. SIRE, JOHN WILDEY, THE FOUNDER OF THE ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS IN AMERICA, AT BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 20.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WEAVER & BACHRACH.

OHN WILDEY, THE FOUNDER OF THE ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS IN AMERICA, AT BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 20.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WEAVER & BACHRACH.

LITTLE CHARLEY AND THE PICTURE.*

BY SARAH HOWARD WEBB.

On California's mountain
Our pleasant cottage stands,
And roses 'round the lowly walls
Are train'd by loving hands;
And tall pines whisper music low,
As the fragrant breezes pass,
And shadows come, and shadows go
Along the bending grass.

It is a home full lowly,
But pleasant, calm, and sweet,
For childhood's merry voice is heard,
And childhood's dancing feet;
And gentle peace, with folded wings,
Sits brooding o'er the scene,
And strange, bright birds, like fairy things,
Glance through the shining leaves.

'Twas evening's calm and holy hour,
And 'neath the silver moon
Each little plant and opening flower,
Sent up a sweet perfume;
And near the open casement,
Where rose-trees floated in,
Our little darling Charley sat,
With hand beneath his chin.

With tiny hand 'neath dimpled chin,
Our pet of three years old,
Sat poring o'er Harry Leslie's page,
Where prisoner's wrongs are told;
The broad white brow was clouded o'er,
That oft all calm so glad,
And thoughtful eyes bent tearfully
Upon the picture sad.

A group of starving, ragged men,
In loathsome prison bound;
Some standing, with their naked feet,
Some seated on the ground.

Grandma, what makes the Southern men
Their prisoners so abuse?
I think Jeff Davis must be mean
To steal poor prisoners' shoes!"

"And now I want a slice of meat,
And a piece of bread,
To give those poor, sick, starving men,
Before I go to bed."
He placed a portion of the food
Around each meagre head,
And little Charley's heart was eased—
The starved ones had been fed.

"You shall not starve, poor soldiers,
For here is bread to eat,
And when the sun t-o mountain climbs,
In the morning, bright and glad,
Then you shall all go home again—
So do not look so sad."

"And now, I'll kiss you all, good-night;
Don't cry, but try to sleep,
And think how glad we all shall be
When the rebels all are beat."
And thus the little rosy lips
Were gently prest
Upon each famish'd picture'd face,
And Charley went to rest.

* "Little Charley" is a very beautiful and interesting little son of the editor of the Trinity Journal, published in Weaverville, California.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MARE," "REUBEN'S WAE," ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.—"EXHALATIONS OF THE DAWN" NOT "GOLDEN."*

ANTHONY and Sleuth sit at breakfast, the former showing a good deal of vexation, which, however, every now and then gives place to a shade of laughter; the latter doing his best to respond to Anthony's moods, but looking so haggard that the latter cannot help thinking of "the wild oats."

"Why, Dick, you look just fresh from an interview with a ghost."

"I—I had a bad night," replied Sleuth, with a sickly smile. "But, come, Anthony, we must determine what to do with your friends here, who are so very noisy that the servants threaten to leave us in the morning."

"Friends! Confound them, they're laying regular siege to the place. There's a man with a hideous head of red hair, calling in the street to get hold of me; there's a gentleman in black, who watches for me every time I go to the window, and makes me the most polite and insinuating of bows; and there's a dirty-looking blackguard sitting astride of one of the garden walls, as if to keep watch, and to give warning to his comrades outside the instant I move in that direction. Confound them! But—ha! ha! ha!—I can't but laugh, while I feel so doucely angry and annoyed."

"One very decent-looking person," said Sleuth, "with an earnest face and solemn manner, told me it was most important he should see you soon, and he pushed half-a-crown into my hands, to convince me his was a call of real and genteel distress."

"I hope you kept the money, Dick," shouted Anthony across the room, as he strode impatiently to and fro.

"There it is—I thought it would tickle you," said Sleuth, throwing down the coin on the table.

Anthony came to the table, took it up, set it spinning, and seemed to take an almost childish pleasure in contemplating how long it would keep up.

"Heads, I give that solemn rogue something—tails, I don't. See fair, Dick!" cried Anthony with glee. "Heads it is! I knew it. I know he'd victimize me."

"This is all very funny, Anthony; but if the doctor and Jem Pompous are coming—"

"They are coming, and I haven't the least notion how to prevent it, without making matters worse."

"Well, look you, Anthony; there's a big room the other side of the house, that used to be the dining-room, with a little room opening out of it, and there's a place in the wall like a window—the servants used to pass their meals out that way, I fancy. It's in a dark corner, and you may see from the little room everybody in the big one, and not be seen yourself."

"Capital, Dick! But I'm afraid they won't be content with that arrangement long."

"No, no, of course not. I only mean that you can look out when you like. Suppose you sit in that little room, and have them shown into you one at a time by me, and then we turn them out by another door into the yard, when you have satisfied them?"

"Satisfied! Ah, Dick, that's easily said. Hang me if I know what to say or do. Had they come singly, I might have plucked up courage to deal with them as they ought to be dealt with; but if I disagree with them there'll be a pretty row. They won't spare me and my past doings—not a bit of it!"

"I'll have some refreshment put in the room —"

"Some! Give them everything in that way that's in the house. I'm ashamed to look at a steed once they would find open house here if ever I became master. I must keep my word for once. So out with our arms, whatever and wherever they are, wines and all."

"What, the choicest?"

"To be sure. Hang it, Dick, when one does entertain friends for the last time, you wouldn't do it shabbily?"

"Very well. And now about the doctor and Miss Pompous?"

"Aye, there I am puzzled."

"I'll watch for them," said Sleuth, "and give you notice; then you can meet them directly. Amuse them, keep them this side of the house, and go off with them for a bit, if you can't get rid of them otherwise."

"Come, then, collect the distinguished party. Let's have a peep at them through the window before I begin the reception."

* * * * * *

A few minutes later, and Anthony was enjoying the shelter of a dark muslin blind, that answered all the purpose of a veil, in enabling him both to see and yet be unseen. What a hubbub! what a medley of people he saw coming in. There was a big, burly pugilist, with a pair of boxing gloves hanging from his arm. Behind him came the man with the bull-dog, and it would be difficult to say which of the two, man or dog, was the most hideous looking looking; the very look of that dog created a clear space for some distance round. But presently came tripping along, with an airy, fantastic gait, a very handsome young woman—a lady, and who was dressed in the richest clothes, and in the most decided fashion of the day. She held a fan, with which she managed to ward off the sight of the people about her with a lofty contempt, but which did not also prevent her from giving a rapid and searching glance into every part of the room, till the bright and beautiful, but bold eyes, rested on the very curtain where Anthony was—and then, however, only for a moment, and then she exchanged a peculiar glance with the next comer, who up to that moment had seemed a stranger. This latter was a young, gentlemanly, but most dissipated-looking young man, who answered her with a knowing leer; but then, as if conscious of the imprudence, turned away, and the two seemed as before, strangers. Anthony saw that look, and wondered.

Sleuth set chairs very politely for the pair at upper end of the room, while he left the pugilist and the owner of the bull-dog chatting together at a little distance, and standing.

Mr. Anthony Allgood was the most happy to receive you all by-and-bye. Please to sit. We will have refreshments in presently."

"And don't be stingy, young man," remarked the pugilist.

"You are to have the best of everything the house affords," added Sleuth, with a most deferential air, which Anthony saw, and which caused him to explode in stifled laughter that he was afraid would be overheard.

In the visitors' room, Jem Pompous, not of the true order, but of that vulture class, which scent their prey afar off; cockfighters, with their pets under their arms; men of every sort now and then they get up a half fight between the opposing powers, even in the room; bilked mariners; mysterious-looking men whose vocation it is impossible to guess; gamblers, jockeys, and so on—the whole tribe of parasites that some half century ago were always to be met with among young and rich heir, provided only they had a chance. It must be confessed they had a right to look upon Anthony's good fortune as a matter of personal consequence to them. Anthony has had dealings with most of them—has been very popular—has been treated largely, not only on account of his expectations, but because of his genial disposition, which has made him look upon the best side of everything, even of the most disagreeable of them. He is obliged to remind himself that he even owes money to some of them.

They had not long been in the room before they began, in the absence of anything else to do, to collect about the picture by Hogarth, which Sleuth had put up, and amuse themselves by commenting upon it.

"Checky that," said the pugilist, turning away to speak to the owner of the bull-dog, while he perched his thumbs at the picture. "See how much the heir cares for the goody stories o' picture books, as I calls 'em. He's a-tout us. He'll do; he'll make the guineas fly; just work't he!"

"And who may that work o' hart be made by?" asked the bull-dog man.

"Ogath, or some sich name. I say, d'ye see the fellow—a mounseer, of course—a playing with his fencing-fork, to show the heir how to fence? There's a beautiful specimen of humanity, aint there? There's legs! I say, frog-eater," he called out, as if addressing the fencing-master—"look here: if you wants position, and muscle, and bottom—genuine British bottom and pluck——" And the pugilist began to play as with an imaginary antagonist, giving Sleuth a terrible fright as he passed, by a blow that almost touched the skin of his nose; then, as every one roared to see Sleuth recoil from the attack, by, as he came to rest another evidence of the pugilist's skill in going so near the wind without doing any damage, the latter added, "Now, position, Ogath. There, Mr. 'Ogath; put that in your picter next time, and people will see summut worth looking at."

"Mr. Anthony Maude will receive you now," said Sleuth, addressing the new-comers generally, and unclean beasts, snatching, or swearing, breaking the glasses, knocking off the heads of bottles of champagne, and eating, drinking, talking, and quarrelling, all in a breath.

As Anthony waited to receive them, he heard quite an altercation outside as to which of two persons—one a man, the other a woman—should first enter.

"I was first, madam!"

"No, sir, you were not; and if you were, you ought to be too much of a gentleman to go before a lady."

"The gentleman, madam, is an old friend of mine!"

"And, perhaps, he's going to be mine."

Then there was an angry push, and then, a little flushed, the woman succeeded.

"Ah, Anthony! I've got to you at last, have I? and how are you? How are you, my dear old fellow? What a windfall! Quarter of a million, they say; personal property alone. But you deserve it. That I shall always say."

And as she spoke she sank down, half for some time vainly tried to recall who he was. At last he remembered him as a broken-down collegian—a young man who began life well at Oxford, gave promise of great things, fell into bad ways, got into debt, ceased to study, and then, after breaking his father's heart at the prospect of a load of debt which he knew his means could never pay, had sunk to be a companion of the worst collegians in all their worst excesses, and had ended by being expelled with disgrace from the University. Then he had continued to haunt the neighborhood, in spite of threats to have him taken up and punished as a rogue and a vagabond. And this had managed, by appealing to the sympathies of certain of the young men as an unfortunate gentleman, to pick up food, pocket-money, and clothes enough to keep him alive.

Anthony shook hands—how could he do less? but remembering Sleuth's warning, ventured to say:

"Well, Mr. Babington, is there anything I can do for you?"

"Anthony, my boy, let me put the question rightly. Is there anything I can do for you?" No —pardon me," he said, seeing Anthony about to speak, "you can't answer that question so well as I can. Let me see. Yes, I can do for you. That's it, I think. You are a rich and fortunate gentleman: I am a poor and unfortunate one: but still, Anthony, when you're not by, I'm your friend, and you're my friend. No friend of mine will forget I am a gentleman born and bred. What can I do for you, did I say? What can I not do? I can introduce you to the world, to society, to court—hem! I mean, I can show you how to proceed, even if I, with my humbler destinies, cannot always follow you. Anthony, my boy, life opens new page—bright, dazzling, glorious! Won't we enjoy it! The best of clothes, best of horses, best of equipages, best of racers! Then, too, the dear delightful, wicked Sleuth, what's become of him? Where is he? Why don't you make him your friend also? Valuable man in his way, no doubt; but, my dear Anthony"—and here the speaker came and lovingly interlinked his arm in Anthony's—"you don't mean to say you would ride in the park with him? Introduce him to the aristocratic circle, where I wait to show you the way? No, no, my dear fellow: I can do much for you, but I couldn't take him. Settle him off in a handsome shop, with big, colored bottles in the window, and whenever I have the toothache, or get out of order, I'll go to his shop to encourage him, poor man! But, my dear Anthony, as a man of the world, treasure the first piece of advice I'm going to give! Never be ashamed of your friends; and if you ain't to be ashamed, then you must pick your men beforehand."

"Mr. Babington, you are right. I thank you. I won't be ashamed of my friend. Dick Sleuth is my friend—my only one. You understand?"

"No, Anthony, confound me if I do! But as you like." Then Mr. Babington sighed heavily, and looked round on the dingy room, which, however, he evidently did not see. "Fortunate fellow! All this esténdon! Your pockets bursting with gold; while I——" And Mr. Babington turned both his trousers pockets out, and stood a perfect picture of forlorn hopelessness, but with a merry twinkle in his eye that Anthony could not resist.

"I don't think, Mr. Babington, I owe you anything, do I?"

"I—I—no not; at least, if you do, I really cannot remember how much. I was generous, Anthony, when I had money to lend, so I may——"

"Exactly: and if it wasn't lent to me, never mind, so long as I am the man to repay you all your many acts of benevolence. Well, would fifty pounds set you up again, and give you a new chance?"

"A hundred would, splendidly."

"A hundred then, be it."

"Anthony, king of men! how shall I sufficiently honor you?"

"By doing so well with this, as that I shall never again be able even to have the pleasure of helping you."

"Eh! Well, pon my life, that's a new idea. No, hang it, Anthony, for once, I do mean what I say. Hang me, if I don't think I'll think of it!"

"Good-bye, Mr. Babington," said Anthony, with extreme gentleness, after writing a cheque and handing it to the collegian.

"Good-bye! And hark—in your ear." He came close and whispered, "Don't you heed the handishments of that female who is just coming in. Most beautiful women I ever saw, and not a bad character; but what right has she here? Says she once saw you—I don't believe it. Be on your guard. I know half a dozen fellows who are mad to get hold of her—offer any settlement. But she says 'No' to all such offers. Dangerous woman I mean, because so seductive and so morally unobjectionable."

"I'll take care," said Anthony. An instant after, he was face to face with the lady in question. He handed her a seat. She took it, and blushed. Then Anthony blushed, not to be least knowing why, except in sympathy. There she sat, glanced timidly at him, and the blush vainly deepened. Anthony confessed to himself it was a lovely face, and not so bold-looking as he had fancied from his previous place of observation.

"I beg your pardon, sir, for troubling you; and—and for coming in such—company. I—I did not know, and have not been used to—to——" And the poor lady, becoming more and more affected, broke down; and though she did not sob, nor palpably weep, Anthony felt sure she was restraining herself with great effort.

"Do not be alarmed—do not hurry to speak—I can wait," said Anthony, in his kindliest tone, and striving, unnoticed, to get a better look at the face which had so charmed him.

"I am very foolish—very," she went on. "I came, thinking it was easy to tell my tale of misfortune to a gentleman who—who——" Again she stopped in evident distress and perplexity.

"And it shall be easy, my dear young lady, if I can help you to tell it. Pray, speak." And Anthony strove to satisfy himself if she really were as beautiful as he had lately fancied.

"I would you," she asked, with charming and touching simplicity, "not—not look at me, and I will try."

"There—I've turned my head away, and I can't see you at all. Will that do?" asked Anthony, unable to resist a kind of mirthfulness stealing over him, and which he fancied might help to relieve the agitated young lady, who more and more interested him.

"I am the daughter of parents—oh, so dear to me—but both now dead, and I am alone in the world!"

Anthony flushed a little at this, but he only said:

"That's sad—very sad!"

"I try to get my living by painting miniatures, but I have no genius, and I don't get on." The tears broke down, and Anthony could not resist the desire to dry them up, and to ask himself why so fine a creature should be miserable because she wasn't a genius. Anthony rises—these pictures forgotten—forgotten a thousand good resolutions. His voice trembles with sympathy, his looks glow with admiration, when he stops, and is caught by an unseen arm, and the sad young lady glances hastily aside to see what's the matter.

Anthony turns to a low, clear laugh—one he knows the meaning of, for he had suggested it as a signal to Sleuth, to use in case he should be unable to come to him, and yet wished to say the doctor was nigh.

It was astonishing how, as the sound of that tap-tap-tap did on the light of common sense began to steal into Anthony's brain; and the first shock given, other thoughts obtained sway. He remembered how the looks he had seen pass between the young lady and the collegian; and though he did not instantly resign, or like to resign, the pleasant vision that had just dawned upon him, he did at once put himself on his guard, and grew fortified in his resolve, no doubt, by the passing fear that Miss Pompous might, if he did not mind, see him and this fascinating stranger together. So, with an entire change of manner, that spoke only too plainly an entire change of purpose, he said:

"I assure you, I—I sympathize with what you have told me, and if you can show me how I can be of assistance to you, I shall be most happy."

The young lady looked at him, and as she looked,

* "Golden exhalations of the dawn."—Schiller.

the expression became such as Anthony found it impossible to face. Dropping his eyes, he said:

"Pray, speak. What can I do for you?"

Again the fair one looked, but only to see how he averted his gaze. Then there was a sudden lightning flash, fierce and deadly, followed by sudden thunder tones, even though from a feminine voice, and then the storm burst, and Anthony had his reward.

"What can you do for ME? Nothing. You a gentleman! Fool! you're a sneak—there!"

And with a gesture which it would be a pity to describe in connection with so charming a young lady, she strode out of the room into the place where the diners were assembled, and there made the place ring again with the mirth she evoked at poor Anthony's expense. Miss Pompess was avenged. Anthony tried to laugh too, but somehow, gave up the attempt, as he murmured:

"What an as I was! It's a lesson, anyhow. Pleasant, certainly!"

But he must pass through the crowd to go to the doctor. Unluckily, there is no other way, unless he were to get out of the window. Anthony can't do that; not even if he could be confident that modest beauty again. So girding up his loins, he walks out, and is instantly the centre of a noisy and ill-sounding circle. It was he says to them:

"Presently, gentlemen, presently. There are friends outside who don't understand this sort of thing. Let us respect their feelings and pocket. I am coming back. Pray, eat, drink, and make merry. It is open house, as I told you it should be. Sherlin, some wine!"

All this was very well, but they had eaten and drank their fill, and wanted to be doing business. They pressed upon him—a dozen speaking at once; but he broke away angrily from them, and got towards the door. There he saw the lady and the colloguing Sherlin in full intercourse, and eating cherries, his arm round her waist, and both looking impudently at him.

As he got outside the door—free at last and disencumbered—he found himself confronted by a different sort of personage from any in the room. A middle-aged, exceedingly respectable-looking man, with a slightly Jewish aspect, stopped his way, and put a gentleman's card into his hand, saying:

"My dear sir, anything in my way? Any little bills to discount?"

"No," said Anthony, with a laugh; "but if I myself go for—and he pointed to the house—

"I'll promise you beforehand any amount of business you like to fix on. There, get along!"

And Anthony, forgetting everything but his desire to keep Dr. Pompess and his daughter out of this discreditable scene, refused to hear warnings, and ran to the dining-room, where they were both sitting, waiting for him.

"Why, Anthony," said the doctor, "you keep strange servants. We have found it hard work to get anybody to hold our horses, and then we found the door barricaded as if you expected an assault. What's the matter?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing. Up late last night, Dick and I, talking, and so up late this morning; and the servants, perhaps, thought it best to keep things quiet, and let us sleep."

Here there was a ferocious bark heard, and a shriek, as of some one bitten or horribly frightened.

"What's that?" asked the doctor, hastily.

"Oh, somebody passing along the road. People are so fond of vicious dogs about this neighborhood."

Angry voices rising into shouts, and something that sounded like oaths, now followed; and what it was noticeable how coarse the voices sounded, both in tone and accent.

"Dear me! there must be something wrong," urged the doctor, looking round.

"Oh, dear no! It's such a population about here."

The noises changed. Oochs began to crow, and then there were clapping of hands.

"Quite a little exhibition outside Mr. Anthony's gates," said Sarah, with mocking irony, as she saw our hero's discomposed face, and knew he must be fibbing at a fearful rate, and wondered if that were among the young heir's accomplishments.

Anthony didn't like Clarissa's look, and he at heart respected it. But he was in the toils, and must get out. He quite laughed again at the momentary sense of relief as Phillis came in with a tray of cakes and wine.

"I'll go and see, doctor, what is the matter, if you will excuse me for a few minutes. People worry me a good deal by coming to claim acquaintance with me. Forbear—"

He waited to say no more.

He was stopped in his retreat by the blast of a bugle horn, plaintively played, and which was now executing one of the choicest bits of music from the latest popular opera. It came from the top of a coach driven by four grays, which stopped exactly opposite the conservatory window, so that Clarissa, her father, and Anthony all alike saw it. Mr. Anthony knew it now quite well. The young lady seemed to say; and Anthony was so angry that he wouldn't condescend to explain, and the more so that he felt expected to find, when he got out, that this "tour in hand" was really brought here for him. "The asses!" he muttered, angrily.

Perhaps the music may interest you till I return," he said, and then he forced out, with an intense desire to blow up the house, with everybody in it, to do some other equally effective stroke of business, to relieve him from his perplexities.

When he got back he found in the room more like a bear-garden than a place in a gentleman's private mansion, and one, too, as he remembered with pain and shame, that had been the scene of his uncle's violent death so short a time before. The cocks were fighting, armed with silver spurs, and blackguards on both sides were backing their favorites. The pugilist was giving lessons in his art, to an admiring bystander; a little bandy-legged jockey—a boy in limbs and weight, a wicked old man in face—was relating the particulars of a race, and how he (the jockey) had done all the knowing ones at the last moment. The bull-dog squatted on his haunches and took a general survey of things, while his master grew excited about the cock-fight; while the collegian and the young lady drank, and drank, and drank again, and seemed to forget all their disappointments.

"Gentlemen!" said Anthony with a loud voice. They all turned. Anthony looked very angry, but also embarrassed. As he began to speak these manifestations passed off, and a smile gradually illumined his dark face. "Gentlemen, have you all drank my good health?"

"Yes, yes, master, lots of that!" hiccupped one of the company.

"Very well; now let me drink yours, before we proceed to business. Sherlin handed him a cup of wine. Anthony took it, drank it, and bowed low, then to the general company, and again bowed not quite so low, but still with marked courtesy, and then drank off the whole cup, which, however, did not go down much, for that was the first wine he had drunk that day. "Now, then, friends to business. What do you all want here? To welcome me, of course. Thank you—thank you very much. But now, friends, for a few plain words. I must leave you directly; I cannot by any possibility give you more than a few minutes. Can't you, then, say all you have to say to me in that time? Ay, but stop!" he said to one who instantly began to speak. "Stop! no—no—you must keep me too long for the last to get at me at all. I wish to satisfy all reasonable expectations."

"Hear, hear!" cried a good 'un!" voices called out, maudlin with drink.

"Now I propose that each of you come up to me here, where I sit, at this end of the table, and say in a few words what you want to ask, and I pass on, and then I'll answer you altogether afterwards, as well as I can. Mind, I don't want to be bothered with anything beyond all that nonsense, now. Mr. Sleuth will pay in a businesslike manner, and all just claims, with interest, sent to him in a businesslike way. Dick, will you be master of the ceremonies, and see that no one takes a mean advantage of his companions, by trying to push in two tasks instead of one?"

There was a general roar of approbation. The man with the bull-dog first presented himself.

"Want me to buy him?" asked Anthony.

"Exactly."

"How much?" asked Anthony, gazing with admiring eyes upon the animal.

"Ten guineas."

"Too little. Take twelve, and he's mine. Let the next man come up."

This was the pugilist, who smiled and looked knowingly at Anthony, and pointed to the gloves.

"Want to teach me the noble art of self-defence! We'll see. Move on."

The bandy-legged jockey now pushed forward, and said something about his honor's racers, and that he had brought a fine bit of blood to show him, and that he was in the stable, and would his honor come and see?

"Not just now," said Anthony. "Who's next?"

A mysterious looking man now said he'd cannot, everybody, now advanced, and whispered, looking round—

"Awkward place and time to say what I have to say; but needs must when—drive. I am a scientific man—a practically scientific man. I have been studying the laws of betting and bookmaking for many years, and have reduced all the ordinary discoveries—reduced the chaos to order, to science, to absolute, certain success. Yes, I can guarantee success to any extent. Let me work with these people about, say more; but you will find me a most indispensable adjunct to your betting concerns. I have the whole system reduced into these few pages," and he showed Anthony some leaves of stained foolscap.

The cock-fighters now angrily pushed the scientific man aside, and, with much fury, set to work on the floor before Anthony, as if waiting only for his signal to begin. But a comedian, who wanted the room, to get up under the gas-lights patronage in the play of Hamlet, caused them to be pushed on, he again giving place to the crowd behind, who now made a rush. Then came on the tall, hard-marker, who wanted a place or a gratuity; and to the bulky carriage-builder, who had come, fiercely-bent, to suggest to Anthony how an unsurprising young gentleman might begin to make due sensation in the eyes of the world.

The last but one of the assemblage had passed, and that one was a dirty, ragged, ill-favored boy, a very man whom Anthony had seen astride of the garden wall. He came up close to Anthony, who drank bloody-minded, and who now seemed out of breath, and taking a pack of cards—or, possibly, a book with pictures—from his pocket, held it open for Anthony to look at.

He did look for an instant; then there was a tremendous blow, a terrible fall, and then a piteous howl out of distress. But Anthony, burning with indignation, said:

"Out with him! Put him under the water-pump. Five guineas to the man who first succeeds in cooling the dirty blackguard!"

In an instant the hapless wretch was seized by arms and legs, no one knowing what it was he had sworn to doing, but quite sufficiently near to understand that he was rightly punished for his profligacy.

That little incident put the last touch to Anthony's behavior. All the hesitation, the not ungraceful weakness of youth, passed away, and he waited, sitting on the edge of the table in grim silence, for the return of the delectable company, who thus vividly brought home to him the kind of life he had been expected to lead.

"Not one honest man amongst them—not one creditable fellow—come for no reason whatever but liking for me, and desire to shake my hands. Not one! I deserved, I suppose. Well, and I've got it. Never mind, I'll play the play out now."

They returned, most of them shaking off from their clothes the wet that had fallen upon them during the pump business, and all evidently fancying that Anthony was taking them to his side as friends, even by that appeal he had made to them. They were in capital humor, evidently refreshed by the sight of their unlucky brother's misfortune, since they were in no dancer of sharing it.

"Lady—I can't say ladies, I am happy to say; I am sure I am grateful for one needful instruction—lady and gentlemen, have you been hospitably received?" Anthony now asked.

There was a general response of satisfaction; for who was to know what additional good things might be forthcoming?

"And may I now ask one favor from you all?"

It was touching to see the earnestness of the reply to this appeal.

"Then may I ask that, when you leave this house, you will be good enough never to come within sight of it again as long as you live; for, by the lord! if you do, I'll have every one of you dragged into the pump, by Jove! I will now—what's your dog's name? Set him free—loose him! Set him at this precious company! I shall make your twelve pounds fifteen if you clear the house in two minutes. Now then!"

Wonderful was the speed, the outcry, the fight. Anthony rushed about, encouraging laughter. Sleuth did the same, though not liking to have his legs so often smelled at by the hideous brute, who instantly proved that he ought to go with the rest.

But, lo, while the stream of Anthony's visitors bursts forth to the air, the doctor and Miss Pompess, tired of waiting for his return, come out too, and see the proceedings. Anthony comes up, quite unconscious, still laughing, till, on turning a corner, he sees the two; and his mirth subsides as he doffers his hat to Clarissa, remarks:

"Hem! hem! If these are the young man's friends, I don't wonder at his behavior to us."

WOLVES AND BEARS IN SOUTHERN ITALY.

IT that part of the kingdom called the Abruzzi, are found wolves and bears, which must have remained unexterminated from ancient times. The country is mountainous, being in the Apennines, with the climate so cold in the higher parts, that snow is quite deep in the winter season. The inhabitants are few, and many of them poor. I was once traveling there in the month of June, when I stopped at a convent in a solitary place, and spent some time with the monks in the house, in which I heard during my stay was the following, which, although it may sound like a fiction, and I was at first disposed to reject it as such, I believe to be true.

The poor people were accustomed to resort to the convent, when in want of food, to obtain supplies, and the monks, who were very charitable, never sent away those who came. The monks then brought them bread, and sometimes a little spirituous. One of the bears, observing this, followed the example, and accordingly, one day, a monk, on hearing the bell and repairing to the door, found a bear waiting for food, was astonished to find a bear in waiting, instead of a man, a woman, or a child. A portion of the food was given to the bear, which he ate and then retired. This was occasionally repeated, until the monks became habituated to visits from the bears, although they were never, I believe, very frequent. Occasionally, and I understood, only when greatly pressed by hunger, one of those animals would venture within doors. I was in convent, pull the bell-rope, and receive his supply, then quietly retire.

The monk who gave me the first account of this remarkable practice, not only assured me, with great earnestness, that he had added something to it which appeared quite as wonderful. He told me that he was one day met by a bear, while walking at some distance from the convent. To his surprise, the bear approached him, and, when near, he recognized it as one to which he had given food. The animal expressed pleasure in seeing him, and, rising upon his hinder feet, seized him with his fore paws, and caressed him gently and affectionately, as an expression of gratitude.

The people of the Abruzzi tell many interesting stories of animals.

The proprietor of an estate was one day walking with his daughter, a child, in the country, near Scoppio, when he was overtaken by a shower of rain, and went to the skin, before he could find any shelter. At length he saw a cottage, and ran to discover a cavern, which he entered. He looked around him; and seeing some bits of wood, collected them, and made a fire to warm himself and dry his clothes. On penetrating into a more distant part of the cavern, with a large bear lying on the ground; and was at first struck with terror, and stood for a time motionless, looking at the bear and the animal. The bear, however, showed no signs of forcible. At length, however, recovering his self-possession, he drew near and slowly approached the place; when the bear, whose countenance was quite mild and gentle, immediately bent out in the shower. Placing himself near the fire, he dried himself as well as he could, while the bear, who had not quite recovered from his fears, took off from the fire, and looked at him as he dried his coat, and put them on again. Perceiving the fire getting low, he at once collected a few more sticks, and replenished it; when to his new surprise, the bear rose, walked out into the open air, and returned with a faggot, which he also brought and dropped into the fire. At length the rain, redoubled in violence, the bread and cheese, the one of his pockets, took them out, ate a little of each, and offered the remainder portions of it to the mute but friendly companion. The bear received these with great gentleness, and, after having eaten them, went going to a corner of the cavern, and brought out a basket, and there brought out a quantity of dry fruits, which he presented to his host. There were cherries, which he received in turn by the man, who, after the shower had ceased, left the cave, to pay his respects to the bear immediately rose and followed him, but with the same signs of gentleness and respect, and proceeded along a solitary region in company, the animal keeping at a short distance behind. Whenever the man shortened his pace, or made a stop, the bear did the same, keeping him constantly in view; and thus they went on, until they approached the town, when the animal turned back, and soon disappeared.

It was the opinion of the man, and of an honest old countryman who told me the tale, that the bear's object in following, was to act as his protection from any other bear he met might meet with on his way. I took pains to gain all possible information concerning this story, and found the people around me perfectly satisfactory, that I gave it full credit, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe it still.

AUGUSTA DOBBIN'S MISTAKE.

BY REBECCA FORBES.

AUGUSTA DOBBINS had reached a certain age; in other words, which are more expressive than agreeable to Indies of her class, she was an old maid! But that was not the only difficulty, she was homely; that is, if possible, to have a sallow complexion, covered with freckles, a square face, a "turned-up" nose, a large mouth, a pair of bright, watchful, light gray eyes, and a head of red hair, can be called homely.

However, she was not yet despairing about finding a man to suit her taste, though she was "wide-awake" to the fact that every day her chances were growing beautifully less. She must do something—marry, or work, and that quickly!

Looking over her Herald one morning she observed the following:

"A gentleman in good circumstances wishes to correspond with some lady who is matrimonially inclined."

"And that is me—it means me," she exclaimed, just as loud as if it had not. "Augusta Dobbins, Mr. Harold Montejoy wishes to write to you! I will reply immediately."

Suiting the action to the act about writing a letter. One, two, three, and four were written before she found one which suited her mind entirely. Here it is verbatim:

"MY DEAR MR. HAROLD MONTEJOY—Your very sensible, wise, and expressive advertisement in today's Herald has induced me to take my pen and introduce myself to you. Should I be a lucky one you will almost believe that I am lacking modicity in my feelings, my dear sir. But I hope that my brow is covered with warm blushes even now.

"Seriously, I am a lady, still young, who possesses a large property, considered beautiful (so my numerous admirers assure me), and exceedingly refined. I am fond of music, have a kind heart, and mind to mind, in our correspondence, and that many delightful, enchanting echoes will be awakened thereby.

"I shall live in agony until I hear from you.

"Your own, devoted,

"AUGUSTA DOBBINS."

In due time a reply was received, stating that the gentleman was just 28 years old, and all other particulars concerning him. He also wished to see "Miss Dobbins" immediately. But Augusta would not do that; she feared that what he would really see what "numberless" (because there had never been any to number) admirers found so charming in her, would stop short, and to him that he must not visit her at her parents, because they would object; and she was quite delighted with the part of his next epistle which referred to it:

"MY DARLING AUGUSTA—Nothing would suit me better than to meet you at Fifth street after dark, when no friends could spy us out. Then we could go and have the ceremony performed.

"Shall I come, my angel, at seven o'clock, Friday evening."

"So soon—so soon," she exclaimed gleefully. "Good! the match was made in heaven. How happy I am."

As this was such an extra occasion, she concluded to indulge herself. Accordingly she bought herself a new "waterfall," a box of "Allenheart," and a bottle of pink dye. She was going to paint.

When the eventful evening came she stood before the mirror admiring, with complete satisfaction, her blood-red cheeks and streaked brow. Then she tied on her "love of a hat," a nice little affair, with a yellow plume and a red bunch of flowers, and a blue cloak, which had belonged to her grandmother. The night was rather dark, and most unfavorable for a "elopement."

When she reached the spot, some one said:

"Is this you, dear Augusta?"

"Yes, dear Harold!" she murmured.

"Are you quite ready? Allow me to help you in," and he helped her into the carriage, managing to conceal his hand in quite a lover-like style, though it almost made her scream out with pain, for his hand was like a vice.

In a few moments' ride he stopped, lifted her out, and they both went into a house.

Here she still kept her two veils down, and persisted in keeping them down all through the ceremony, which, strange to say, did not seem to annoy her lover in the least.

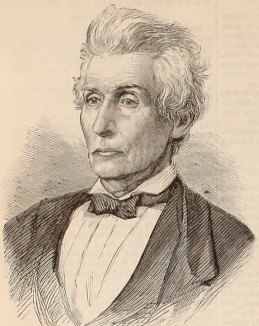
"My dear Augusta," he whispered, at the conclusion of the ceremony, lifting her veil. Her eyes fell on his face; she sprang backwards, leaving the veil in his hand, and shouted:

"Sir! sir! I ain't married to you."

"I ain't! I won't be! Did you dare," turning to the minister, "marry me to him?"

"I did, madam; you gave your consent in a pretty loud voice," he returned in a cool tone.

"Did I know it was him? Get out, you impostor, you vagabond! What right had you to advertise?"



"Just as good as anybody," was the response.

"I am as good as a white gentleman, and I never told you that I was!"

"You black scoundrel—you imp of satin," she exclaimed, making a rush for the door, "to impose on us unsuspecting girl in that style," and out into the street she went, flying homeward, and the great burly "nigger," "Harold Montejoy," following after her.

It was a race for life, but she gained it. However, he presented himself at her door the next morning, and she forced him to sell her "waterfall and paints," her "turkeys and chickens," which all amounted to fifty-two dollars and three cents, which she paid him to hindraw his claim. Glad of the exchange, he took the money and left for parts unknown.

Since then she has ceased to take "Herald," and looks upon "matrimonial notices" as traps set for the feet of innocent victims. But even now, she sometimes sighs when she thinks how splendidly "Mrs. Harold Montejoy" would have sounded had he only have been white.

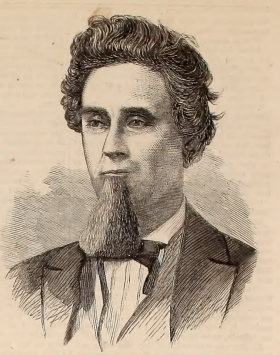
HON. W. L. SHARKEY, PROVISIONAL GOVERNOR OF MISSISSIPPI.

HON. WILLIAM L. SHARKEY,



Provisional Governor of Mississippi.

Gov. [SHARKEY is a native of Mississippi, and is about 60 years of age. For over twenty years he was Chief Justice of his native State, and as a jurist he has no equal in the South. In politics he is an old line Whig, but never sought political position or preferment. In 1851, when the "Union party" was in the ascendant in Mississippi, he declined to accept the office of Governor or United States Senator, both of which were filled by Union men. No better appointment could have been made by President Johnson than that of Mr. Sharkey, especially at a time like the present, when it requires the best talent, and the purest patriots of the land to manage the affairs of our country. In his private and public life, honor, integrity, kindness and generosity have ever characterized his actions. He is too well known to require further notice here.

HON. J. S. YERGER,

President of the Reconstruction Convention of Mississippi.

THIS distinguished gentleman is a native of Pennsylvania, but at an early day removed to Tennessee, and practiced law in Nashville. He went to Mississippi in 1839, and entered upon the duties of his profession in Vicksburg, and for a number of years was Judge in the Vicksburg district. He subsequently removed to Washington county, in Mississippi, where he now resides, and holds a Judgeship. In politics he has ever been an old line Whig, and a steadfast supporter of the Federal Union. When a delegate in the Convention of 1861, he opposed earnestly and fearlessly the ordinance of secession, and voted against it on its final passage always denying the right of a State to secede. Judge Yerger's name is mentioned favorably in connection with the Governorship of the State. In point of talent, and as a jurist he is one of the most prominent men in the State.

HON. J. S. YERGER, PRESIDENT OF RECONSTRUCTION CONVENTION, MISSISSIPPI.

JACKSON, MISS.

WE present, in this number, two faithful representations of the present appearance of this once beautiful city. Those who have visited it in the palmy days of peace, will not recognize in these pictures of ruin and desolation the once proud capital of Mississippi. Events in the recent war frequently brought Jackson before the public eye; and the movements of contending armies, in and around the city, were observed with deep interest and anxiety. And now that the people of Mississippi are assembled there in solemn Convention, agreeable to the President's Proclamation of June 13th, 1865, Jackson is once more made conspicuous in the eyes of the civilized world.

THE RUINS OF JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI.—FROM A SKETCH BY D. H. HUYETT.

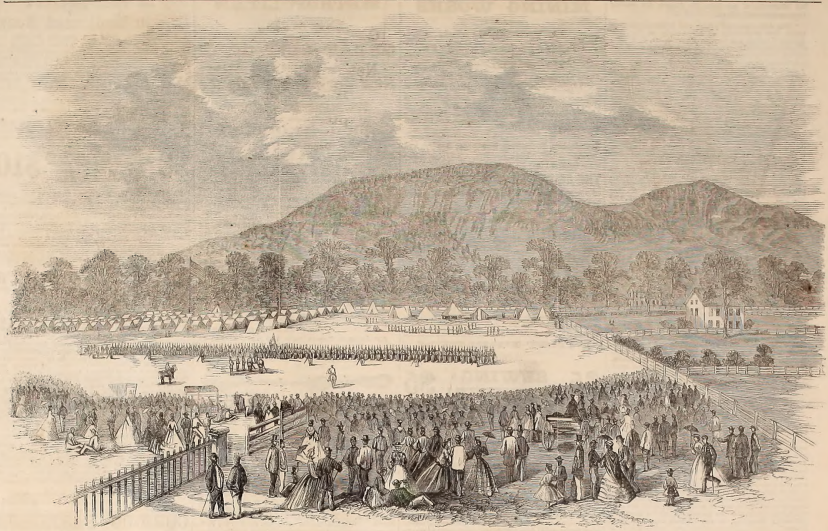
Jackson is situated in Hinds county, on the right bank of the Pearl river, 45 miles east of Vicksburg, on the Southern railroad, 183 miles north of New Orleans, via New Orleans Junction and Great Northern railroad, and 1,010 from Washington. It is intersected by railroads running east, west, north and south, and before the war possessed many elements of commercial prosperity. It has a population of about 6,000, and the value of its real estate in 1860 was estimated at $784,446, much of which has been swept away in the fortunes of war.

Jackson was first entered by the Federal troops on the 14th of May, 1862. Gen. Grant's army was then moving on Vicksburg. In his official report of the preliminary operations respecting his capture of Vicksburg, he says: "Sherman was left in Jackson to destroy the railroads, bridges, factories, workshops, and everything valuable for the support of the army," and this, he added, very truly, "was accomplished in the most effectual manner." Among the buildings destroyed at this time were the State Penitentiary, the factories of Phillips and Greene, the Confederate House (hot-1), the Catholic church, the railroad depot, and about four squares of the business portion of the city, with several handsome residences in the suburbs. The effect upon the non-combatants, as may be imagined, was appalling. On every side, where once stood splendid stores, warehouses, and magnificent residences, embowered in tropical shrubbery, naught remained but charred and smouldering ruins.



But it was in July following that the people of Jackson felt the full power of the Federal Government. In the latter part of May, and during the month of June it was the headquarters of Gen. Joseph E. Johnson, who was trying to collect a force to relieve Gen. Pemberton, then being besieged at Vicksburg, which place fell, and a few hours later Gen. Sherman was sent to occupy Jackson. Although the place was thought to be well fortified, no one presumed that Johnson would "make a stand." He did so, however, and held his position about seven days, when he retreated, leaving the city once more to be occupied by the Union forces. The 31st New York Volunteers, Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell comm anding, were first to cross the deserted works. So near were the residences of the city to the entrenchments, that the inhabitants were compelled to flee to the swamp, where they remained without shelter and but scanty subsistence until the contest was decided, then returned to find their homes in ashes. What remained of the business portion of the city, after the first conflagration, was now consumed. In this instance the fire was at urted by the retreating Confederates, in their hurry to d estroy the military stores left by Johnson; and although the fire commenced very early in the morning, it was not until noon that it reached its height. The beautiful residences and store that escaped in the morning were now fired, and disappeared before the devouring element. The city seemed to be in an u roken sheet of flame; the streets were crowded ith household goods, furniture, pianos, etc., weeping women sitting beside their perishing property, imploring God for protection, little children running in wild despair, calling upon father or mother to save them, the ringing of bells and shouts of the soldiers, as they marched along or dashed furiously through the streets with fire-engines, vainly endeavoring to save some building from the flames; while others, seating themselves beside the pianos and melodeons in less exposed positions, and, like Nero, "fiddled" while the city was being consumed. It was at this time the Episcopal Church, concert hall, and the Mississippian Newspaper office (the cylinders of the presses are still standing amongst the ruins), and whole blocks of buildings were swept away.

MISS JULIA DALY (MRS. WARREN EDGARTON.)

THE GRIZZLY BEAR CHAIR, PRESENTED TO PRESIDENT ANDREW JOHNSON, BY SETH KINMAN, THE CALIFORNIA HUNTER, SEPT. 6. PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.

CAMP RUSSELL, NEW HAVEN, CONN.—REVIEW OF THE 2ND REGIMENT, CONNECTICUT, N. G., FRIDAY, SEPT. 15.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. C. CURTIS.

Soon after Taylor's surrender to Gen. Canby, the place was garrisoned by two white regiments, which in a short time, however, were removed, and their place supplied by colored troops.

The municipal and civil officers of the city and State have again entered upon the discharge of their duties; and all matters of a civil nature transferred from the military to the civil authorities, and under Governor Sharkey's wise and judicious administration peace and prosperity will again return to this once beautiful but now desolate city.

THE BEAR CHAIR.

Most of our readers will remember the name of Seth Kinman, the California hunter, and the walkers upon the streets of the principal cities will recall the stalwart form, dressed in full backwoods toggery. He has just presented to President Johnson a chair, made by his own hands, from the furs of the bears killed by himself. The chair would appall almost any one with a less firm seat than Andrew Johnson, but, putting looks aside, will, without doubt, make a warm and comfortable seat in the coming cold weather.

REVIEW AT CAMP RUSSELL,

New Haven, Conn.

Four o'clock in the afternoon of September 15th was an eventful time at Camp Russell. At that hour the 2d Regiment Connecticut National Guard held their grand review, preparatory to breaking camp, in the presence of many thousands of spectators.

The regiment was reviewed by Major-General Russell, and, it is needless to say, looked splendidly.

At six o'clock the dress parade took place, and at a grand supper the regiment celebrated its forty-ninth anniversary, after which came bonfires and general enthusiasm, and on the next day they broke camp and marched into the city of New Haven, thus ending a most gratifying period of enjoyment.

MISS JULIA DALY (MRS. WARREN EDGARTON.)

The name of the lady whose portrait we present this week is almost a household word in the mouths of the people, and the counterfeit presentment of the good-natured and versatile actress will, we make no doubt, be heartily welcome. As an accompaniment to our own endorsement of her powers, we copy the following biography of her from The Players, the leading London theatrical journal:

FORT SMITH, INDIAN TERRITORY, ARKANSAS, THE PLACE WHERE THE GREAT INDIAN COUNCIL WAS HELD, AND TREATY OF PEACE SIGNED, SEPT. 14.

"Miss Julia Daly, the young and brilliant American actress, now performing so successfully at the New Adelphi Theatre, was born in Philadelphia, U. S. She Adelphi Theatre, was born in Philadelphia, U. S. She adopted the theatrical profession at a very early age, adopted the theatrical profession at a very early age, adopted the theatrical profession at a very early age, adopted the theatrical profession at a very early age, having from a child displayed great aptitude for music. After leaving school with great credit she engaged with Philadelphia Philharmonic Society, and performed the Queen in the operatic version of Hamlet, and performed in the principal cities with gratifying success. Her early training with this talented lady stood her in good stead parts in afterpieces; and after having concluded her operatic engagement, turned her attention to the drama. After performing in melodrame and eccentric comedy at Burton's Theatre, New York, Howard Athenæum, Boston, and other leading theatres, we find her starring in the provinces in the popular specialties, the Yankee girl. In this style o character she displayed great originality, combined with the power of rendering ballads, as well as Yankee comic ditties, with an effect unequaled by any other representatives of Yankee peculiarities. We know of no singing actress at present on the stage who can compare with her as a vocalist. 'Our Female Cousin,' a comedy, written expressly for Miss Daly, by Mr. Charles Gayler, of New York, was first played by her at Burton's Theatre, New York, and though stamped for failure by a fortnight, her success was so great that she continued playing the piece until the end of the season, the comedy having been presented a greater number of consecutive nights than any previous native production.

"The 'Cousin' has had the extraordinary run of seventy consecutive nights at the New Adelphi. Miss Daly was engaged for two weeks, but has already played one hundred and four nights. She is mightly received with enthusiastic applause by crowded houses, her scenes and songs are invariably encored, and her presence mightily demanded before the curtain."

The London press received the young stranger with cordial, but not extravagant appreciation. The Morning Post thus alludes to her debut:

"Miss Julia Daly, an American actress, who, with a rich fund of animal spirits, originality, combines singular versatility, made a very successful debut at the New Adelphi last evening, in the fun is of the rollicking sort. Her style in every particular so original and racy, that her whole performance more than a high claim to the merit of novelty. She not only acts, but sings and dances with great excellence. She sang a variety of songs, after a droll fashion of her own, and she 'reads her triumph,' if not in a 'natural way,' at least in the hearty laughter of a crowded theatre."

From the London Times:

"Her 'Yankee Gal,' while exhibiting all that independence of social observation which belongs to the genus, is comparatively quiet in the expression of her fun—more shrewd than impudent, more merry and shrill than boisterous. All the details of behavior, that so much distinguish the sodden and noisy mob of Yankee peculiarities on the English stage, she executes in an artistic way. Her gifted mimicry never exhausts, makes its way with the public. And her singing talent, coupled with her comic powers, is of no slight account. is quite sufficient to obtain popularity for a new set of melodies. Miss Daly's style was a thoroughly new one, most original specimens of solemn rapture it was ever our fate to laugh at. Herein, she is most unquestionably deserving, in the highest sense, of great praise."

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

The author of "Tristram Shandy," who knew human nature pretty well, says a sober man when drunk has the same kind of stupidity about him that a drunken man has when he is sober.

BARNES resemble wheat in many respects. Firstly, neither are good for much till they arrive at maturity; secondly, both are bred in the house, and are also the feazer of the family; thirdly both have to be cradled, too-thly, both are generally well thrashed before they are done with.

A LITTLE fellow going to church for the first time, where the pews were very high, was asked, on coming out, how he liked it church, when he replied: "I went into a cupboard, and took a seat on the shelf."

"Doctor," said a lady, "I want you to prescribe for a cold."

"There is nothing the matter, madam," said the doctor, after feeling her pulse, "you only need rest."

"Now, doctor, just look at my tongue!" she persisted, "I think it—look at it! Now, say, what does that mean?"

"I think that needs rest, too," said the doctor.

WHEN may two people be said to be half-witted? When they have an understanding between them.

"I am astonished, my dear young lady, at your sentiments," said a young gentleman; "you make me start."

"Well," said she, "I have been wanting you to start for the last half-hour."

"PA," said a fashionably-educated farmer's daughter, "what is it I should marry a farmer, what shall I do with my Greek?"

"Call the cattle, Betsy; call the chickens!"

AT an agricultural exhibition in Massachusetts the following toast was given:

"Our fair sisters—may the language of the orator, the best friends and most elicited patrons of the farmer, for they would have all men to be the best mademen."

WHY is an equestrian like a Norwegian? Because he's a man on horseback).

WHAT is that which every one wishes to possess, and which every one wishes to get rid of as they have got it? A good appetite.

On account of the rapidity with which oil companies are formed, and order their engines, together with the facility they experience in procuring a good title for their company, as well as for their land, we respectfully suggest the following names. The great has said that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet," but as it is artful; but then it don't want to appeal to any sense of smell in an oil company, nor, indeed, in any other; consequently, either for a good dinner or a good name, give us a good mouthful—Ile-and-Water Company; Ile-and-sorrow Company; Horse-and-buggy Company; Whence-and-whither-away Oil and Mining Company; Who-what-when-where-and-how-and-why-and-wherefore Company; Hi-and-cock-a-hoop Company; Hi-and-cock-turn-and-look Company; Hi-and-hoop-la-and-hope-to-die-we-fly Company; Hi-and-hoop-la-and-look-out-below Company; Hi-and-cock-turn-and-look-out-below-and-hoop-la-and-hope-to-die-we-fly Company; Hi-and-cock-turn-and-look-out-below-and-hoop-la-and-hope-to-die-we-fly-and-Sandy Company; Athens'-oil-and-crete Lubricating Coal Company; Jonah's-gourd-burning-and-mouse-Pumphius Oil Company. The origin of the latter name may need some remarks by way of explanation, and especially to parties who go in on "ground floors," and are not prepared to be acquainted with the work from which this short biography is taken.

WHY is a bank-note torn by a dog sure to pass?—Because it's current (current) money.

MINING WORKS

FOR SALE BY

D. Van Nostrand,

PUBLISHER AND IMPORTER,

192 Broadway, New York.

Kustel's Processes of Gold and Silver Extraction.
One volume, 8vo, illustrated.....$5 00
Ward's Mines of Almaden.....50 cents.
Stewart's Mineral Resources of the Pacific States..25
McCormick's Mexico.....50 cents.
Hoskold's Mine and Land Surveying, Greenwood's Mine Engineering; with many other, rare and valuable works. Send for circulars.

Newsdealers, Booksellers, Newspaper Readers and Book Readers,

Are informed that

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY,

Of New York, is ready to supply at the earliest moment, and on the very lowest terms:

Newspapers, Daily and Weekly,
Periodicals, Books, Dime Novels,
Cheap Publications,
School Books, Envelopes,
Pens, Writing Papers,

And everything wanted by a Newsdealer or Bookseller.

PRINTED TRADE LISTS

describing the above articles, with prices, how to do it, names of Papers and Magazines, with their prices, etc., will be sent FREE to the trade on forms. Address

THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY,
119 and 121 Nassau street, New York.
Successors to Sinclair Tousey and H. Dexter, Hamilton and Co.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. THE CHEAPEST AND BEST SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; a machine that accomplishes more than ordinary NEEDLE, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity. Will Gather, Hem, Baffle, Sheer, Tuck, Quilt, Bind, Braid, &c., &c.; requires no Lubrication or Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and is Noiseless. This is NOT A SMALL POCKET MACHINE, like several others advertised; and it does not require the whole of WOMAN ON A TABLE, and all its work must pass through it.

"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Household it is a treasure."—Ladies' Friend Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf Office, 103 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Rose Seymour,

The Story of a BALL DRESS'S LIFE. Just issued. Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

HILTON & CO., Publishers, 120 Nassau st., N. Y.

521-23

The True Art of Producing a Lifenose

of your future Wife or Husband. Madame Le Grand, Clairvoyant, by the aid of the Psychonoscope, a newly invented French instrument of immense power, can produce a perfect likeness of your future partner, with name, residence, and every circumstance relative to the marriage. She will also tell you whether your married life will be happy or unhappy, what kind of temper, eyes, and eyesight, complexion, &c. Persons of both sexes should consult MADAME LE GRAND, P. O. Box 363, Cohoes, New York. 522-23

Spanish Curling Cream, Warranted to Curl the most Straight or Silf Hair. Mailed for $1. Address GEO. BLACKIE & CO., 713 Broadway, N. Y. tf

Comic Card Photographs of the latest and most taking subjects constantly on hand. Catalogue of prices and quick sales. Send 10 cents for sample and catalogue to H. RIVINGTON & CO., No. 669 Broadway, New York.

Economy, Simplicity, and Luxury are secured by the use of THE SLOW ELEKNA COFFEE POT, which saves the aroma and flavor of the best Tea and Coffee. Try it. GEO. B. MORSE, Agent, 369 Broadway, N. Y. 522-24

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address
SHAW & CLARE,
521-23 Biddeford, Maine.

AGENTS!!!

$10 Per day made selling the Sixteen entitled a HISTORY OF THE PERSONAL ACTS OF UNITED STATES SOLDIERS and Scenes from Life as PRISONERS of WAR, and Battle Fields. It is decidedly the best ornamental, historical work that has ever been presented to the public, and will be purchased by everybody. Copies sent free to agents on receipt of $1.50. Call on, or address with stamp, HOPKINS & CO., 74 Brocker street, New York.

1,000 Agents Wanted,

Both Local and Traveling. $10 a day clear; no capital or peddling. Full particulars by enclosing stamp to J. W. STEPHENS, 239 Broadway, New York.

Stop and Read.

Your future destiny revealed by MISS LIZZIE MORRIS of Albany, the only American Gipsy on the continent. Upon receipt of 50 cents, and a postpaid addressed envelope, I will send the picture of your future wife or husband that is to be. Address MISS LIZZIE MORRIS, Drawer 126, Albany, New York.

METROPOLITAN ENTERPRISE

GREAT GIFT SALE

OF THE

New York & Providence

JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.

Capital--$1,000,000!

Depot, 550 Broadway

An immense stock of Pianos, Watches, Jewelry and Fancy Goods, all to be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you see what you will receive.

CERTIFICATES,

Naming each article and value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents; five for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 65 for $10; and 100 for $15.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to pay the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, Sewing Machine, or any Set of Jewelry or one Ink, for $1; and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as that amount is the lowest.

C. M. DUNN & CO.,

558 Broadway, New York.

N. B.—Immense Depots have also been opened in Chicago, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, under the management of Messrs. DUNN & CO.

Greatest Convenience of the Age!

ASHLEY'S

PATENT SCREW EGG BEATER.

The only one that can be used in a small vessel, or that will beat from one egg to any required number. All other beaters must be attached to some place to be used; this needs only to be held in the hand. Will do the work thoroughly in less than a MINUTE. Durable, simple and cheap. Warranted to give satisfaction. For sale by all Hardware Dealers and Hardware stores.

Sample, post-paid, for 50 cents. Circulars free. Address Ashley Manufacturing Co.,
520-23 Office 95 Maiden lane, (Box 5,646 P. O.) N. Y.

Writing Paper, Envelopes,
Blank and Memorandum Books, Cheap, at
LEAKE'S, 74 Nassau street, New York. 522-23

Agents WANTED Agents

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 521-25

Booksellers, Stationers,

And General Dealers, send for our great Catalogue of Books, Prints, Albums, &c. HILTON & CO., 120 Nassau street, New York. 521-23

GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION

BY THE

NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION,

509 BROADWAY, N. Y.

12 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from $200 to $800
50 Melodeons, Cabinet Organs.....125 to 225
150 Music Boxes.....15 to 45
250 Silver Tea Sets, Desert Castors.....15 to 40
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets.....15 to 35
100 Gold Hunting-case Watches.....15 to 75
100 Gold Hunting-case Watches.....75 to 150
100 Diamond Rings.....50 to 200
300 Gold Watches.....60 to 100
300 Ladies' Gold Watches.....60 to 80
600 Silver Watches.....25 to 50

Diamond Pins, Gold Bracelets, Studs, Pencils, Sleeve Buttons, Lockets, Gold Pens, Cameo Ladies' Sets, Gold Pens, with Gold and Silver Extension Holders, Silver Thimbles, Sets of Studs, Gold Lockets, Pearl, Coral, Pearl and Enamel Gold Rings, Gold Thimbles, Silver Baskets and Castors, Gold Chains, &c., &c., &c., of every description, of the best make and latest style, valued at $50,000!

To be Sold for One Dollar Each without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you receive what you will receive.

Distribution is made in the following manner:

CERTIFICATES, naming each Article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these envelopes containing the Certificate or order for some Article, worth at least One Dollar at retail, will be sent by mail or left for or sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, on receipt of ONE DOLLAR. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it owns, and its value, which will RANGE FROM TEN TO FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and can then send ONE DOLLAR and receive the Article named, or can choose any other one Article on our List of the same value.

Six NO BLANKS are sent out. Every one gets value. Parties dealing with us may depend on having prompt returns, and that the Gift they choose will be immediately sent to any address by return mail or express. Entire satisfaction guaranteed in every case. Set Certificates for Distribution for $2.

AGENTS WANTED. Send a stamp for a Circular. All letters should be addressed

T. BENTON & CO., Box 5567, P. O., New York.

$3.00 ALBUMS. $3.00

A Fine Album, two Gilt Clasps, Relief Sides, finely Polished, for the Pocket, with a Choice Collection of Photographs. Sent by return mail for $3.00. The neatest and cheapest Album in the market. Trade and Agents supplied. $24.00 per dozen, NET. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. Ladies and Gents, please send your address for interesting catalogue.

Cabinet Organ Instruction and Music.

Wisner's Perfect Guide for the CABINET ORGAN; containing Easy and Progressive Lessons, and New and Attractive Music, with a Choice Collection of Popular Vocal Music adapted to the instrument. Seventy-five cents, postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Tin Type and Ferreotype Albums.—For colors, 50 pictures, $1.50; 40 pictures, $1.25. Sent postpaid. TRADE PRICES $12.00 and $9.00 per doz. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York.

$60 A Month.

Agents wanted for six entirely new articles, just out. Address O. T. GAREY, City Building, Bid leford, Maine. 521-25

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chaps, Tender Flesh etc., beside being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE removes superfluous hair from the face or any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. EXQUISITE TOILET for pale lips and cheeks. GOURAUD'S ORIENTAL for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established office, 48 Bond street.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been acknowledged by the fashionable for the last twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Colleton, Philadelphia; Bates, Goldwin & Co, Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$8 IMPORTED $10 WATCH.

Fine European Watches, direct from our own manufactory, Serviceable, Correct and Warranted, at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

An ELEGANT WATCH in Fine Gold-Plated, Double Cases, Hunting, Open Face, English Full Jewel Movement, adjusted Regulator, Pallets and Balance Bridge, Fine Enamel White Dial and Fancy Hands. Correct Timekeeper, with Key, Case, Gem's FINE VEST CHAINS, with Beautiful GEM LOCKET, Double Hunting-Case for new Likenesses, to match, all complete. Sent to any part of the country, free, for only $10.

A HANDSOME SILVER WATCH, Serviceable Pattern, Open Face, Hunting, Reliable Movement, same as the $10 Watch, with Key, Case, Chain, Gold Locket, &c., sent free for only $6.

The Great Imperial Watch,

containing a Rare and Wonderful Combination of Mechanical Effects, a beautiful and correct working Thermometer, an accurately adjusted Movement Compass in miniature, sunk in Dial, and a Sizable Calendar, indicating day of the week, etc., reduced to $12. Which a perfect STORM, HEAT and TIME INDICATOR, and of great value to the Traveler, Sportsman, Farmer, and every one who desires a RELIABLE and VALUABLE WATCH. This valuable Watch is in Fancy Gold-Plated Hunting Case, with MAGIC SPRING (the outer cases being of fine 18 Carat Gold, inner cases of Solid Gold Composite), Richly Engraved, with Panel for Name, Genuine English Improved Jeweled Movement, 7 Time movements, Polished Cap, Self-acting Steel Polished Click, Equal Balance, Independent Seconds, Polished Steel Cut Hands, and with an Extra Imitation of a $200 watch, used by the ROYAL ENGINEERS and Officers of the 10th Hussars, and other standard timekeepers. Genuine unless bearing our private trade mark. Price per single case, all complete, $12.00, sent to any part of the country, $20. Fine Silver Duplex Watches, $20. Genuine Swiss Watches, $20. Fine Gold Watches, $25. Solid Gold English Levers, $20. Ladies' Gold Enameled Watches as low as $30.

CATELY BROTHERS, Sole Importers,
103 NASSAU ST., N.Y. ESTABLISHED 1855.

CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERYBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without string. 25 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 521-25

DURYEA'S MAIZENA

Try One Pound!

Was the only "Preparation for Food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners at the Great International Exhibition, London, 1862. Under Prince Albert's Patronage. Can be used in Custards, Blanc Mange, etc., without isinglass, with few or no eggs. It is also excellent for thickening Gravies, Groves for fish and meat, soups, etc. For ice cream it has no equal. Sold in 1 lb. tin packages, and 1 lb. tin packages, under the trade-mark "Maizena," with directions for use. A delicious and wholesome food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere. WM. DURYEA, 166 Fulton street.

WM. DURYEA, General Agent.
523-24

Try One Pound!

Prepaid by First Mail to any Post Office for $4 00.

The New Illustrated Encyclopedia.—ENCYCLOPEDIA contains nearly 1,500 pages, illustrated with more than 300 engravings, with index, illustrated catalogue, and address, FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

"Of all the publications which have attained such a wide popularity, as issued by FOWLER & WELLS, none are more adapted to general utility than this neat, comprehensive, and well-arranged Encyclopedia."—N. Y. Tribune. 523-24

New Patent Snip and Cinch on Fish Hook. Every one who loves to fish that bites. Sprigs open on Jo's mouth. Agents wanted. Sample by mail, 25 cents. Circular and terms, to JOSEPH BRIGGS, 335 Broadway, New York.

Very Powerful Microscopes.

No single lens instrument can be made to magnify more than three times. Free by mail on receipt of stamp. Instrument powers for $1.00. Address T. EDWIN KING, Box 2,853, Boston, Mass.

All who want to know a sure way how to make money rapidly, send 25 cents to W. C. WEMYSS, and 20 other Secrets, address H. B. WILLIS, 84 Nassau street, New York, who will inform them by return mail. 521-24

The West Indian Hair Curler, warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair, on the first application, without injury or waving unnaturally. Sent to any address on receipt of $1. Address
THE HEADLEY MFG. CO.,
Box 5,351, New York Post Office.

Hume's Parlor Hair Curler for ladies and children. The easiest preparation in use. Send 50 cents to the HUME TOILET CO., Jersey City, N. J.

Why squander Money on useless articles claiming to curl hair, when you can purchase it STOCKTON WELLS' preparation for that purpose for $2, which will curl the hair of male or female immediately, and will not injure? Prepared at the Chemical Laboratory, New York city. Address me at my Residence, E. STOCKTON WELLS, Jersey City, N. J.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.
THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,
TO BE SOLD, REGARDLESS OF COST, WITHOUT RESERVE, TO THE HIGHEST BIDDER, COMMENCING ON MONDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1865,
AND CONTINUING, DAILY, UNTIL THE WHOLE IS DISPOSED OF.
100,000!
To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be sold for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Three edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address
M. T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

Something New.
For Agents—Leaders to sell, in Novel and Useful Articles; prettie large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICH & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

LADY AGENTS WANTED
To sell valuable articles wanted in every Family. Catalogues sent Free. Address
CHAS. MANCHES, 688 Broadway, New York.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MADAME M. H. FERREGAULT,
Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, and been enthusiastically located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Ferregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the inquirer, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what is purported to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. FERREGAULT,
511-23 P. O. Drawer 292, Albany, N. Y.

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of
PROF. DE BERT'S
FRISER LE CHEVAUX.
One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does not injure the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

"How 'Tis Done! or, The Secret Out." The original and only "BOOK OF WONDERS," containing a perfect secret of a Mustache or Beard in Whiskers in 42 days—Gambling and Marked Cards Exposed and Explained—Sleight Perform-Deling, Ventriloquism, Fishing Secrets, Imitation Liquors, and 100 other Secret Arts never before published. This is the only genuine BOOK OF WONDERS. All others are imitations of this book. Price only 25 cents—1 for $1. Mailed free. Address HUNTER & CO., 521-24 Hinsdale, N. H.

The Great Money-Making Article.
Everybody wants it. Agents or Salesmen can make $10 a day. Sample, with particulars, sent free by mail, for 25 cents. Address
000 E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.
You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine or send for urgently needed Oil Lamp—no; also Patentees of the CELEBRATED
SAVAGE AND CO. NO-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted immediately. Send for circular.
522-23 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N. Y.

SAVAGE & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS of LANTERNS AND BURNERS,
286 Greenwich St., New York.
Fifty varieties of the latest improved Kerosene Oil Lamps—no; also Patentees of the CELEBRATED
SAVAGE AND CO. NO-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted immediately. Send for circular.
522-23 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.
The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
tf 343 Broadway, New York.

$1. WHISKERS. $1.
For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
F. D. Ira, 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburg, N. Y.
512-24

GEORGE L. CANNON'S
AIR WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS, KITCHEN RANGES, &c.)
614 BROADWAY, NEW YORK. BETWEEN HOUSTON & BLEECKER STS.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. White French Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, etc., without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 193 South Seventh st, Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. 1,000 different kinds. Send stamp for Catalogue 000 VICTOR DELAFO, 89 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIDON, 37 Ann St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
AND PUBLISHERS OF
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.
In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are largely engaged in the following lines:
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Of these we have over 10,000 subjects, including
VIEWS OF THE WAR,
Obtained at great expense by our own corps of complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT UNION CONTEST
Bull Run, Dutch Gap, Yorktown, Pontoon Trains,
Gettysburgh, Hanover Junction,
Fair Oaks, Locust Mountain,
Savage Station, Chickahominy,
Fredericksburgh, Fort Powell,
Fairfax, Nashville,
Richmond, Petersburgh,
Fort Bonham, Belle Plain,
Monitors, Chattanooga,
Fort Morgan, Atlanta,
Charleston, Mobile,
Florida, Strawberry Plains,
Kingston,
American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, &c., &c., &c., Revolving Stereoscopes, for parlor or public exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.

Photographic Albums.
We were the first to introduce Albums into the United States and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $25. Our Albums have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any other.
They will be sent by mail, or express, free of charge.
FOR ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER
The Trade will find our Albums the most Salesable they can buy.
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.
Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects (in which addition we have the sole supply of Eminent Americans, &c., viz.: about Actors, 250 Copies of Works of Art,
Authors, 200 Groups,
Clergymen, 75 Navy Officers, 125 Authors,
Artists, 100 Female Beauties,
2,000 Copies of Works of Art, including representations of the most celebrated Engravings, Sculptures, Groups, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of Stamp.
An order for One Dozen Photographs, or more, may be filled on receipt of $1, and upwards.
Photographers and others retiring goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. on account, to secure attention.
The prices and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

Will force a beautiful set of Whiskers or Moustache on the smoothest face in four weeks. This, without stain or injury to the skin; or hair on bald heads in eight weeks, and no humbug. I receive recommendations every day from persons who have used it, and found it genuine. Read testimonial:

"DR. BRIGGS.—Dear Sir—As I have personally experienced the benefit of your Golden O'dor, I cannot refrain from giving you my testimony as to its merits. My face was entirely smooth, and my whiskers to be seen. I commenced using your Golden O'dor, and in six weeks I used a crop of Whiskers and Moustache curlers, and they are now growing finely. I sincerely trust that this testimonial may prove of as much benefit to you as has O'dor has to your humble servant and well-wisher.
GEORGE TAYLOR."

I will send my Golden O'dor by mail, sealed and postpaid, for $1.50 or 24 cents for Stamp. In order to obtain the genuine article, all orders must be addressed to
DR. C. BRIGGS,
521-24 P. O. Drawer 56, New York City.

Albums for the People.
Holding 24 Pictures, and sold at 75 cents. Albums of all descriptions. Send stamp on receipt of the price.
C. HUGHES,
Album Manufacturer,
102 Centre St., N. Y.

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,
A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years and contains no deleterious matter. Price $1. 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO., Perfumers,
000 138 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

New Books, New Books, and Sporting Goods. New Styles Curled Hair Cloth. Sample 25 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. F. MANCHES, 688 Broadway, New York.

Magic! Magic!!—A beautiful Morocco MAGIC PORTFOLIO, which will please just you and me. This is an ingenious invention, which every man of wit and fashion should possess. Sent, postpaid, for $1. Address C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.
521-24

To Beautify the Complexion,
USE SHULTS' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.
The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a freshness and transparency to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. No toilet is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents.
C. F. SHULTS,
511-23 386 River street, Troy, N. Y.

The Matrimonial Guide made easy.
How to Win a Sweetheart or Lover.
If any young gentleman or lady wishes to know how to begin a love correspondence, or if they wish to speak their mind in a tender, humble or careless way to their lover, this book tells exactly how it should be done. It tells you how to write love letters, and how to woo your sweetheart every time. It tells you how you can marry whoever you wish, and how you can become rich in a very short time. Handsomely bound in full muslin. Sent by mail, pre-paid, for $1. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, Publisher, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.
521-24

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to their happiness. Sent free. Address Confidential Medical Advisor, by W. M. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.
Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.
Treating on "Psychologic Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate, win the undying love, and marry any one they choose, irrespective of age or personal appearance. Sent by mail for 50 cents, by F. D. LOCKE & CO., Box 1529, Portland, Maine.
522-25

Wanted! Attention!—(Something new.) I will send by mail, postpaid, a beautiful MILITARY ALBUM, with four fine pictures of our Union Generals for 50 cents. Agents wanted immediately. Price per dozen, $3; per hundred, $25; per thousand, $200. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.
521-24

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.
Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postage stamp, with your address, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y.
tf

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS of great value to families; all pay great profits. Circulars sent free on application; or 35 cents and get 80 pages and a sample gratis.
511-29 EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

6 CHANCES FOR $1
In the greatest sale of Jewelry in this country. $1,000.00 of Watches, Ladies', Gents' and Silver Watches, to be sold for $1 each; not to be paid for till you know what you get. Send a stamped envelope, calling for one of the Circulars, and a full description of the immense stock of Jewelry, Watches, &c., to be sold for $1 each; not to be paid for till you know what you get. Send a stamped envelope, calling for every article in this immense stock of a manufacturing house, are mixed, and sent when ordered, one for 25 cents; six for $1; twenty-five for $2; and a Watch will be presented to every agent. Agents can make $25 a day, and are wanted in every town in the United States and Canada. Address
J. TOWNSEND & CO., 15 John St., New York.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the inquirer, together with the date of marriage. This is no humbug, as testimonials without number can assert. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, and enclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Miss Franklin has no connection with any other person of the same name. Address Miss JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 95, West Troy, N. Y.
522-23

Royal Havana Lottery.
Official Drawing of September 5, 1865.
No. 13395..... Prize, $100,000
No. 16939..... " 50,000
No. 4607..... " 20,000
No. 9746..... " 10,000
No. 21631..... " 5,000
Being the five capital prizes.
Prizes cashed. Official information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

Use PERRY'S Moth & Freckle Lotion, which is prompt, infallible & harmless. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all Druggists. Price $2 a bottle. Send for Circular

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunker's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Ointments and Curing Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to the Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 2057 P. O., New York.
522-25

WHISKERS
AND MOUSTACHES
Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using
DR. SEVIGNE'S
RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.
The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost marvellous manner. It has been used by the elite of Paris and London with the most flatt-ring success.
The name of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed Free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

The Great New England Remedy!
Dr. J. W. Poland's
WHITE PINE COMPOUND
Is now offered to the afflicte throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of de ca years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the Pine which is its parts. It derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.
For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would realize the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.
Dr. J. W. POLAND, Proprietor, Boston, Mass.
Burnhams & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Fuller F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?
MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed
From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1. Sold by A. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia.
512-24

Freckles, Tan and Pimples
REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S RECIPE FOR BEST AND PURE BENZOINE." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by A. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia.
512-24

Asthma Cured.
Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,
and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid by A. C. UPHAM, Druggist, 25 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free.
515-24

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Sore Legs, Wounds, etc., etc. The supreme aim of these medicines is to subdue all irregularity in the cure of diseases. Thousands of persons suffering from dreadful maladies have been cured by their use after all other means had failed. Let none despair of success. Sold everywhere.

OFFICERS, SOLDIERS AND CITIZENS!
Grand Gold Rings
All the Army Corps Rings in 16 Karat Gold, (Stamped and Warranted) $4 and $5 each. A liberal discount to dealers. Sent by mail. Address
E. P. BEACH,
511-24 Middletown, Conn.

Stereoscopicons and Magic Lanterns for Public Exhibitions, with Photographic Views of all prominent places, and events, for sale by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Priced and Illustrated Catalogue sent gratis.
517-25

Just Published.
FUN! FUN!!
THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JEFFERSON DAVIS, prize 25 cents. Sent by mail. Address C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.
521-24

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents—32 Copies of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 12 Photographs of Prominent Rebels for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address
C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.
571-24

Every Man his own Printer.
CHEAPEST AND BEST. Press of Presses, $10, $16, $22 and $30. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, $26, $40, $54 and $71. Send for a Circular to the LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 23 Water street, Boston.
tf

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.
MATCH-MAKING;
OR,
FAMILY MANŒUVRES.
BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE RENEGADE HUSBAND," "THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW," "THE MARRYING MAN."

"A perfect picture of manners and morals in that class of society in which we live. Every one of our daughters and match-making mothers will all the while be diplomacy of the female ingenuity for gaining a settlement, are admirably daguerreotyped. The work is brilliant, and full of interest."—Saturday Gazette.
Price 50 cents. Mailed, free of postage, on receipt of price. FRED. A. BRADY, Publisher, 32 Ann st., N. Y.

A CURIOSITY!!
Free to All. A Rare Treat.
Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a VALUABLE PAPER, replete with the choicest literature. Sent Gratis. CHARLES E. MAURICE,
267 Broadway, New York.

COMPLETE OUTFITS
Of TOOLS and STOCK for persons wishing to commence the STENCIL NAME PLATE business. Also, BRASS STENCIL ALPHABETS and all Stencil Goods, cut at Wholesale. Address, M. J. METCALF & SON, 101 Union street, Boston, Mass.

Notice.—Those wishing to become rich or successful in anything they wish, should send for one or all of the Golden Secret Mystic or Secret Counsels, as they are important to success. For further particulars as to their price, send a two cent stamp, and for a postage stamp to Prof. DAVID, Ballston Spa, New York, and get full explanation.
522-25

STRASBURGER & NUHN,
65 Maiden Lane,
Cor. of William Street.
Having imported the Largest Assortment of TOYS,
CHINA FANCY GOODS,
BEADS,
Now offer to buyers superior inducements from an entirely new and most carefully selected stock bought for cash, AT THE LOWEST PRICES. 522-23o

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.
Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $20 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gold and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. County rights free, sales immense, demand increasing, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.
M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers,
102 Nassau street, New York.
o

SMOLANDER'S
COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF
BUCHU,
Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, DEBILITATION, DROPSY, &c. PRICE ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. BARNES & Co., and P. C. WELLS & Co., New York. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents.
520-33o

ITCH! SALT RHEUM.
Cured by Reide's Crimean Ointment. Price, 35 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents.
520-33o

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.
Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-33o

PARLOR ORGANS!
Church Organ Harmoniums, School Organs, and Melodeons. We have just completed improvements which render our instruments far superior to any manufactured. THE PARLOR ORGAN, with new combination swell, no person should be without. Send for illustrated catalogue. CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., o311-23 No. 97 East 23d street, N. Y.

BALLOU'S
PATENTED
FRENCH
YOKE SHIRTS
Warranted to FIT, and to Last
CHEAPER

for the same QUALITIES sold MARK than those of any other Shirt House in this city.
Circular containing drawings and prices sent free.
For sale by all the principal dealers throughout the United States.
BALLOU BROTHERS, 403 Broadway, N. Y.
o

ERITON OF FRANK LESLIE'S: DEAR SIR—With your permission I write to say to the readers of your paper, that I will send, by return mail, to all who wish it (free), a recipe, with full directions, for making and using a simple VEGETABLE BALM, that will effectually remove, in ten days, Pimples, Blotches, Tan, Freckles, and all blemishes of the Skin, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth and beautiful.
I will also mail free to those having Bald Heads or Hair Faces simple directions and information that will enable them to start a full growth of luxuriant Hair, Whiskers or a Moustache, in less than 30 days.
All applications answered by return mail, without charge. Respectfully yours,
THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
No. 831 Broadway, N. Y.

A New Publishing House—The cheapest place to buy books in this country. Have you seen Dawley's new publications? You can buy your books cheaper of this house than at any other place. T. R. DAWLEY, Publisher, No. 13 & 15 Park Row, N. Y. o

SAFETY LAMP.
No smoke, no chimney. Portable, not dangerous. Free from smell and has all the advantages of gas without the expense. A great LIGHT, all for a penny per six hours. Send for full description. For sale, Wholesale and Retail, by the LIG-HO-INE FLUID and LAMP CO., 12 Gold street. o

Sewing Machines
FOR FAMILIES AND MANUFACTURERS.

THE HOWE MACHINE COMPANY,
No. 629 Broadway, N. Y.
o

SCENE IN "THE O'MAHONY CENTRE", STREET.
MRS. O'CALLAGHAN—"Arrah, aure, and is it the Kings of Ireland you're descended from, Mr. Michael Mullooney. Fait, I hope you'll do something for my boy Tim, when the Fenians put you on the throne of Erin's Borroloree."

AGENTS WANTED
To canvass for our new, beautifully illustrated, and thrillingly interesting volume of army experience, CAMP FIRE, AND COTTON FIELD, by Thomas W. Knox, Herald correspondent. Full of startling Incidents, Amusing Anecdotes, Ingenious Stratagems, Life in Camp and Bivouac: together with ample and reliable directions to those who design engaging in Cotton culture at the South. Send for circular.
o BLELOCK & CO., 19 Beekman street, N. Y.

Self-adjusting Enamelled "Linen White" Linen Finished, $1 and 1½ per doz. Fancies mailed, 75c. and $1. Bluchers Stitched, $1.25 and $1.50. Byron, with book, $1 50. Gents' Stiff Short Bosoms, $1 50 per doz. Ladies' Linen Cuffs, $1 per doz. Ladies' "Gold Collars", $1 00; Cuffs, $1 00 per pair. Send "circular" for prices. Trade supplied. BILLOU & POMEROY, Inventors, Patentees and Manufacturers, 79 NORTH 5th, St. N.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after suffering several years with a severe lung affection and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted and spread information, which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address
Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburg, Kings County, New York.
o

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 10 cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
000o

The Brazilian Hair Curlers. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1. Address
513-39 S. S. CHASE, Cohoes, N. Y.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,
Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Three of different powers for $1. Address
0000 F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

STEINWAY & SONS,
Manufacturers of
Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,
Warerooms, No. 71 & 72 East 14th St.,
Between Union Square and Irving Place,
NEW YORK. tfo

Vineland Lands. To all wanting Farms.
Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, unsurpassed for fruit growing. Acres for sale on long credit at from $25 to $30 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most promising place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.
From Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune
"It is one of the most extensive, fertile tracts, to an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Unsettled Claims of Officers and Soldiers,
Of every nature, should be presented at once at the United States Army Agency, No. 64 Bleecker Street, New York. Back monthly pay, unpaid bounties, clothing accounts, etc. Applications by mail should be accompanied by the soldier's discharge, and a full statement in writing of what is still claimed. Special attention paid to all claims of deceased soldiers, for pay, bounty, and pension.

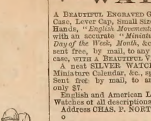
GOLD ENAMELED $2 EACH.
B. T. HAYWARD,
202, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
I have now the Regulation Badge for every department of the army. I will send a sample (coin silver) with your name, regiment, and company, engraved thereon, on the receipt of $1.50, and the style as represented above for either corps, on the receipt of $2. Local Agents wanted everywhere. A liberal discount to dealers. o

AGENTS WANTED.
$10 A Day can be Easy Made $10
By selling Engravings, Card Photographs, and Stationery Packets. Our Stationery packages exceed all others. Each packet contains Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencil, &c., and Jewelery worth a dollar at retail, price only 20 cts. We will send Agents 100 Packages and a Silver Watch for $17. We have a fine assortment of SPIRIT ENGRAVINGS and PORTRAITS, very popular and saleable; will send 100 assorted kinds for $15 that will realize $30; will send a sample lot for $3 that will sell for $10. Send stamp for catalogue, terms, etc.
o HASKINS & CO., 30 Beekman street, N. Y.



Philadelphia Photograph and Album DEPOT, best and cheapest. Send for catalogue. HAHBACH BROS., 28 N. 8th street, Phil. 522-29o

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,
One Dollar Each.
(Patent applied for June 20th 1865.)
AN EXACT AND RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the first time. A durable, elegant, unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to perform its task true, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Just introduced into this country from Europe, where it is protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. All orders must be addressed to
J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.
o
For a Fortune
Address HABERS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-30o

Shooting, Fishing,
AND Sporting Tackle
of all kinds.
ALFRED WOODHAM,
401 Broadway,
Bet. Canal and Howard Sts., N. Y.
Repairing done well. tfo

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.
o

$7 ARMY WATCH. $10
A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Cut Hands, "Breguet Movements," and Correct Timekeepers, with an accurate "Miniature Calendar," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat case, with a DUPLICATE YEAR CHART, for only $10.
A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Miniature Calendar, &c., specially suited to the Army. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.
English and American LEVERS from $25 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.
Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers.

THE ARCANA WATCH.
Ladies' Size, $20. | Gents' Size, $25.
Elegant as an 18 karat Gold Watch—Fire-Gilded Timekeepers. Sent by mail, free of charge, on receipt of price. ☞ Case of six for $105. Will sell for three times their cost. GERALD W. HAZARD & CO., Sole Importers, No. 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

250 RARE RECEIPTS
Containing many Secrets and much valuable information never before made public, including over 100 Receipts now in exclusive use by the celebrated Metropolitan Hotel of the city. Price 20 cents; mailed, postage free. Address HUTCHINSON & CO., Publishers, 569 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

GROVER & BAKER'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, N. Y. otf

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20
$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and putting up the Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions cost $20. L. L. TODD & CO., 39 Nassau street, New York.
SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.
513-39o

The National Park Bank
of New York.
Capital,...$2,000,000 | Surplus....$1,200,000
This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.
J. L. WORTH, Cashier.
New York, August 21, 1865. 519-31o

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harrison's Landing, Newbern, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Letters charged low rates. 0000 Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

512-24

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S
PIANOFORTES!
99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money is the JOHNSON PEN, warranted for one year, 14 carats fine; also every variety of Pencholders on hand. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. E. S. JOHNSON, Manufacturer and Office, No. 15 Maiden lane. 519-31o

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York.

Try Ward's India-Rubber Enameled
PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS.
ALSO, WARD'S FRENCH PRINTED
PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS,
AT ALL GENTS' FURNISHING STORES.
The Trade supplied at
№ 387 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

1,000 Purchasers Wanted.
Articles sold to everybody. Catalogue sent free. W. C. WEMYSS, 375 Broadway, New York. 522-21

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 524 Vol. XXI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 14, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

TRAVELLING THROUGH FIRE—FEARFUL PERIL OF A RAILWAY TRAIN, AT CEDAR SWAMP, ON THE EASTERN RAILROAD, MAINE, SUNDAY, SEPT. 17.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY PAPER

Circulation over 50,000.

This valuable Family Paper has now reached its Seventeenth Number, and a circulation of upwards of 50,000, showing in its unprecedented success, that it meets a great popular demand, and a thorough appreciation in the Family Circle.

Each Number contains a variety of short stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Directions, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Comic Pictures and Portraits.

The Chimney Corner has a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience.

In addition to these literary attractions The Chimney Corner is the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent artists.

Every number contains a striking portrait, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of the Chimney Corner was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every Family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

The Chimney Corner is issued every Tuesday in New York. It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Terms for the Chimney Corner:

PRICE 10 CENTS EACH NUMBER.

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 50
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)
One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year	7 00

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Barnum's New American Museum,—BROADWAY, between Spring and Prince streets. Engagement for a limited period of MISS SALLIE PARTINGTON, the charming and brilliant Comedienne, Danseuse and Vocalist, who will appear after the absence of four years. Afternoon at 3. The Musical Drama, in two acts, of ASMODEUS. To conclude with the elegant Comedietta IS HE JEALOUS. Evening at 7¾. A Romantic Military Drama, the ROLL OF THE DRUM. To conclude with the excellent Farce of OUR SALLIE. After Drama, Afternoon and Evening, Songs, Dances, etc. W. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer; Over 100,000 Curiosities; the identical LINCOLN LOG CABIN built by ABRAHAM LINCOLN in Macon county, Illinois, in 1830, and in which he resided for two years. Three of the Tallest Giants in the World, the largest Fat Woman Living, and prettiest Circassian Girls ever seen. Bohemian Glass Blowers; two Glass Steam Engines in motion. Professor Hutchings, Lightning Calculator. Cosmoramas, Stereoscopticans, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquaria, Mammoth Turtle, &c.
Admission, 30 cents; children under ten, 15 cents.

The Red Jacket Bitters are the safest and mildest stimulant and best appetizer yet discovered, as all who have used them will testify. They are sold by all druggists and dealers throughout the country.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 14, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to Frank Leslie, 537 Pearl street, New York.

Notice—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the leaf only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

Suffrage a Basis of Representation.

Who shall vote and what shall be his qualifications, are questions, the decision of which has been left hitherto exclusively to the several States. The Constitution interferes in no way with their determination, and only stipulates that persons qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, shall be privileged to vote for Members of Congress. The States have been governed by no fixed or general rule in defining who shall vote or what shall be his qualifications. These vary in all the States. Probably no two have precisely the same regulations in these respects. In some, as in Massachusetts, the negro may vote on reaching his majority, on precisely the same footing as the white man. In New York, he must have the same qualifications as the white voter, with a property qualification added. As regards foreigners, the policy of the various States is equally various. In some States, as in New York, he must have resided five years in the State; in Illinois and Missouri two years is sufficient; while in Wisconsin (we believe) no probation is required. The possession of property to a certain amount was, in South Carolina, a condition to the exercise of the suffrage, as it was, until lately, in Connecticut, where a voter was required to be a freeholder. Probably, by general acquiescence, precedent and practice, no right or power of the several States was or is more thoroughly established, or less disputable, than that of deciding who shall vote and under what conditions.

The Constitution of the United States established representation on the basis of population, with a proviso that only three-fifths of the slaves should be counted in the apportionment of representatives. It in no way provided for direct interference with the States in fixing who should be electors, and it was, without doubt, in the competence of the original States to have conferred the franchise upon any class of men, however small, and established a practical oligarchy, subversive of the spirit and ends of Republicanism. The only ground of interference by the general Government would be under that clause of the Constitution, which guarantees to the States "a Republican form of Government." Any new State applying for admission into the Union may be rejected by Congress, if there appears anything derogatory to "a Republican form of Government" in its constitution.

In view of the development of the President's plan of reconstruction, about which the public mind is deeply agitated, it becomes interesting and important to inquire—

1st. Whether the new Constitutions of the rebel States, owing their origin to the initiatory action of the general Government, and framed under its direction, will, or must come before Congress as if from States seeking admission into the Union?

2d.—In case they do not, and it should be found that there is contained in them, or in the laws framed under them, anything which shall be repugnant to, or subversive of republicanism, or inconsistent with "a Republican form of Government," will it not be the duty of the Congress of the United States to refuse those States representation in Congress, or readmission into the Union?

3d.—Congress is the exclusive judge of the qualifications of its own members, and when the representatives of the late rebel States shall come to take their seats, will it be competent for it to inquire if the form of government under which they claim to be elected, is republican within the meaning of the Constitution?

These questions may, and probably will arise, apropos of the action that may be taken by the several States on the question of negro suffrage. It may well be doubted if South Carolina or Mississippi, whose representatives will come up to Congress, claiming to represent a population—more than half of which have no voice in their election—have a Republican Government in form or principle. It is clear that the power to determine, or fix the qualifications of voters in the several States, cannot be allowed to be so interpreted or exercised, as seriously to interfere with, or entirely defeat the very principles on which our Government is founded, and the objects for which it was organized. The States are undoubtedly bound to conform their action in all respects to the general welfare; they cannot set up a power, or do acts under the protection of the general Government subversive of its interests. And it is to the interest of a large majority of the States, and indeed of all of them, that the political power of no State shall be concentrated in the hands of a few, or exclusively exercised by a privileged class. It is neither right nor republican that a voter in South Carolina shall be clothed by State legislation with a political power nearly, or quite three times as great as that of the voter in New York, or that 8,000 voters in that State shall have one representative in Congress, while 21,000 in Ohio have no more. It is neither right not republican that the voting population in the late rebel States shall have thirty more members in Congress, than a corresponding number of voters in the loyal States, north of the Ohio.

We are not now advocating negro suffrage, which is a question apart. It may well be said that the suffrage has been by far too widely extended, and inconsiderately put in unworthy hands, and we are quite ready to admit that it should be qualified by more rational conditions than now exist. It seems to us that a remedy for the existing wrong of having Congress invaded by thirty men, who represent nobody, and thus subvert the very idea of republicanism, may be found in having representation based on suffrage, on the number of voters and not on population. This would reduce the Congressional representation from South Carolina one half, and make its political influence in the nation a just and absolute reflection of its voting strength in the State. It would give additional political strength to some of the Western States, where the voting population is relatively greater than in the Eastern and Middle States. There would be no wrong or injustice in this; for if we fix upon certain men as the only proper persons to exercise the franchise, then they should exercise it as peers, and their votes have an equal weight in all parts of the country.

An amendment of the Constitution would probably be necessary to this end, but there is no man who does not admit the necessity of several changes in that instrument, to make it conform to the altered conditions of the country, and the new requirements of the people. The necessities of the nation have, on more than one occasion, torn through its ancient parchment, and it stands to-day a tattered instrument, unequal to control the exigencies of the times, and only vital in its principles. Its regulations are no longer applicable, except in part, and it may be doubted if their strict observance is either desirable or useful in promoting the end and aim of all good Government, "the greatest good to the greatest number." It is certain that, unless it may justly be so interpreted as to exclude a representation from the late slave States from Congress, which is neither founded on the will of those pretended to be represented, on worth or wealth, but upon arbitrary local regulations, reflecting the spirit and embodying the facts of barbarism, then the time has come for its radical modification. Fortunately its wise framers contemplated the necessities that might arise for its alteration, and wisely provided for effecting it peaceably, and without convulsion. The world is a witness that it cannot be subverted by violence.

Negro Emigration.

During the early periods of the war, when many thousand negroes took refuge within our lines, and before public opinion was sufficiently advanced to permit of their enlistment as soldiers, it became a matter of some moment to know what to do with the "contrabands." A certain proportion could be employed in camp and fatigue duty, but there was a larger number utterly dependant on Government charity. The scheme most popular for disposing of these was that of colonization, and for once the good sense of Mr. Lincoln was at fault. He fell into the scheme at once, without apparently reflecting that labor has been, is, and will long continue to be the greatest need of the country, and that its exportation would be a fatal subtraction from its productive wealth. Without reflecting, also, that its exportation to the territories or colonies of other and rival nations would be to build them up at our expense. Of course the British, French, Danish and other Colonies and States, in and around the West Indies, were ready and eager to accept the wealth that we proposed to throw away, and Washington was invaded with propositions to establish the "contrabands" at a hundred points each more desirable than the other.

Congress, yielding to the presidential crotchet, rather reluctantly voted a considerable sum of money, to be disposed of by the President, in carrying out his scheme of colonization. Part of this was spent in a futile and, as far as the colonists were concerned, fatal attempt to establish a colony on a Haytian island. Another considerable sum was spent in explorations on the Chiriqui isthmus, and a portion of the appropriation set apart for establishing a Colonization Bureau or Commission in Washington, with a Rev. Mr. Mitchell at its head.

In due time, with the advance in public opinion, the surplus "contrabands" found ample employment in the Union armies, and, with the gradual conquest of the South, on the abandoned or recovered fields of its inhabitants. The reason for colonizing them, if there was ever a good one, ceased to exist, and his natural good sense coming to his rescue, the President seems to have given up his crotchets, and contented himself with the belief that the future of the negro was to be worked out on the soil he was fighting to recover to the Union. But he forgot to dissolve this Colonization Commission and dismiss Mr. Mitchell, who still sits in some departmental chambers, spinning cobweb theories and devising moonshine plans for disposing of that very labor for which all parts of the country clamors, and of which we have most pressing and increasing need! With all the devastations of the war to repair, and with the development of a vast country rescued from slavery to accomplish, there is one man so far behind the intelligence and movement of the time as to sit, and crow, and patter, and cant about sending away the strong arms and the vigorous muscles, through which the South is to be revived and made to pay rich tribute to the supremacy of free labor! We do not object to individuals, if they have time and can afford it, wasting both in advocating visionary schemes of doubtful humanity, and wearying the public ear with canting appeals for objects neither practicable or desirable, but object to furnishing them with apartments or stationery. Above all, we object to paying them a salary, especially when they publish such arrant rubbish as we find in a late pamphlet from the Colonization Commissioner. Listen to him:

> "In opposition to the labor-monger, North as well as in the South, and as formidable now in the former as in the latter, we ask nationality for the African race, and finally their undisturbed rule in the Tropical Belt."

Does Mr. Mitchell assume to speak for the negro as well as himself, when he says "we?" If so, all we have to say is, he speaks without authority. The negro neither wishes nor asks for "undisturbed rule in the Tropical Belt." He is just as near the Tropical Belt as he wishes to be. What he wants is, to live and die in the land, and as near as possible the spot where he was born, to have the disposition of his own labor, and protection in the enjoyment of his rights and privileges as a freeman. We should like to see the proposition for "undisturbed rule in the Tropical Belt" submitted to the vote of the freedmen! The result, we think, would close the Colonization Commissioner's Bureau, and set Mr. Mitchell free for some useful employment.

It seems there was, on the 31st of July of the present year, $205,980 in the Treasury, subject to requisition, on account of the Colonization scheme. So long as it remains there, disinterested adventurers will not be wanting to urge its expenditure in some philanthropic plan, of which they will be the disinterested advocates and promoters. It would be well for those in authority to inquire what are the net results to the negro of the very considerable sums already expended from the amount authorized by Congress.

Major-Gen. Hancock, although alleged to be a relative of Gen. McClellan, and one of his most esteemed officers, has nevertheless escaped the odium which has attached to the Fitz John Porters, the Franklins, and others of "Little Napoleon's" favorites. His personal character, energy, ability, and steadfastness of purpose, and above all, his cheerful subordination, have made him a marked public favorite. He has seldom said or done anything which has not been approved and accepted as just and pertinent. He was present at the inauguration of the great banquet given to the Odd-Fellows of the United States, at Baltimore, a few days ago, and made a brief and most sensible speech, which proves that men of action are not always incapable of expressing their ideas in clear and intelligible, if not eloquent language. Gen. Hancock touched a responsive chord in the American heart, and correctly indicated the universal sentiment of the American people, when he said, in moderate but explicit language:

> "The power of the government, as shown in the late contest, is a star in our escutcheon whose rays extend sufficiently far to give light even to London and Paris. The Rio Grande is but a short distance in comparison, and I firmly believe from my own knowledge of the country, and experience therein, that the Emperor of the French will be glad to vacate Mexico, if he is allowed time to do so with honor. We paid some millions to get out of that country, after capturing its Capital, and it is thought that it will not cost France less than it cost us, and every day's delay will add to the expense without a chance of compensation; for I consider it as certain as fate, that the continued occupation of that country by a foreign force, which entered it in hostility to our interests and prejudices, will certainly lead to war. It is now, however, time for us to cultivate the arts of peace, and bind up the wounds made by the late rebellion. We may defer the day of retribution until we are strong again, without resting under the imputation of fear. The Emperor of the French went to Mexico when it was convenient for him. We can defer meeting him there until it is convenient for us. But it may not be necessary, and in such case we shall have done enough in our day for the honor of the country's arms."

Dr. Francis Lieber, formerly Professor in a South Carolina college, lately one of the most active members of the "Union League" of this city, and now in charge of the captured rebel archives in Washington, has written a very able and suggestive letter to the Secretary of State, on the proper mode of settling international differences. He, of course, favors arbitration, instead of the ultima ratio of force, but by no means recommends the reference of differences to crowned heads or governments which may be interested in establishing precedents, or who may yield an undue deference to such as have been established. He thinks that the Faculties of Law in the Universities of the more advanced countries of the world, would be the ablest, as well as the most impartial bodies to decide on international differences. He remarks:

> "Who would doubt that such a Faculty of Law as that of the University of Berlin, with the international jurist Hefter in it; or if Prussia were considered too much of a great power, the law faculty of Heidelberg, or of Leyden, would be a fitter body to decide our differences than any Emperor or any Republic. A republic could not decide the case as a republic, but must hand it over to some commission. A law faculty, especially that of a renowned university in a minor State, seems to form a tribunal fitter than any other that can be imagined, for many, perhaps most, of the great international cases. It would seem almost made for so high a function, and the selection of a law faculty as a court of international arbitration, would be a measure worthy of being inaugurated by the two freest large nations, and whose governments are to be numbered, in diplomacy, among the least unreasonable and uncandid ones."

The Tribune, in an article on the Fenian fright in England and the prospects of a Fenian fight, takes ground that as England will not give up Ireland without a fight, and that as "the Lord is on the side of the heaviest battalions," the chances of Irish independence are extremely small. It tabulates its argument thus :

England and Scotland have, souls	22,268,251
Ireland has	6,000,000
Which leaves, after every Irishman shall have kill one Saxon dead entirely, still left to slaughter	16,268,251

As Jeffrey said of Wordsworth's Excursion, "this will never do."

The editor of the Louisville Journal says of his journalistic opponent :

"Our neighbor of the Democrat couldn't wash himself without having a fuss about the soap."

Our English playwright is said to have written to another as follows :

"Dear Bob,—You really must show more caution in constructing your plots, or the Governor will be sure to discover the dead body of Grimalkin in the cellar, and then your secret will be out. You consulted me about the strychnine. I certainly think you are going it a little in rather large doses, and if I were you I would not have two illegitimate children. One is quite sufficient. Let Emily put her mother in a mad-house. It will answer your purpose well to have the old girl out of the way. I think your forgery is far too small a sum. Make it three thousand. Leave the veil of your particularly nice family circle in me. I will finish them off, and settle with Jack the 'fatal dagger' afterwards by book-post. Yours, etc."

Bella's double comet, which once excited apprehensions of a collision with the earth—a panic which was allayed by the publication of Arago's theories—is again approaching. A western writer says :

"The comet is not yet sufficiently near us to be discerned with the telescope, its present distance being about 150,000,000 of miles, and its position near the left arm of Andromeda. It is slowly creeping into the adjoining constellation, Pegasus, and on the first day of November next it will be close to the bright star (Alpha Pegasi) Markab, one of the four bright luminaries which form the well-known figure of Pegasus. It will then pursue a southerly course, crossing the celestial equator about the middle of December, sufficiently enough, it then crosses the old path followed in 1846, and near a point where it will be seen observed to separate into two comets. It will continue to approach the earth till the end of December, when its distance from us will be only 18,000,000 of miles. At that time it will probably have attained for the first southern heavens and disappeared from view here and a higher latitude.

It is not often that professed politicians own up frankly that they are animated by pelf rather than principle in their efforts to serve the party. The naïve confession of Mr. Purdy, the Grand Sachem of Tammany is, therefore, refreshing. He says, and he ought to know :

"What the Democratic party chiefly needs is power. It is a very thankless and cheerless office to be confined to the minority, and finding ourselves in the fat fences and finding fault with those who are in possession of the loaves and fishes. Unite and vote together, stick, pork and provisions. You may talk more sense, know more and be, in the abstract argument, and have the most solid conviction of your own wisdom, personal interest and abstract right, but if you don't get in and get the other fellows out, it is all vanity and vexation of spirit."

Special interest attaches to the views and purposes entertained by President Johnson, and his opinions on a subject now occupying the public mind, as contained in a letter to the late Gen. Wadsworth, will arrest attention and have merited weight.

"You desire to know, in the event of our complete success in the field, how we may best achieve a lasting and cheerful submission on the part of the South, if universal amnesty should not be accompanied with universal suffrage.

"Now, since you know my private inclinations as to what terms should be granted to the South in the contingency named, you will here admit that if our success should thus be realized, followed by such decreed results, I could not, without manifest inconsistency in good faith, under the circumstances, I can avoid exacting universal amnesty, and also universal suffrage on the basis of intelligence and military service.

"How to better the condition of the colored race has long been a study with me, and to me the most interesting and earnest question. I think I am clear and decided as to the course I shall pursue in the premises, regarding it a religious duty, as the nation's guardian of the blacks, and hope that I may be directed wisely and unbiassed on the battle-field, where, in resisting to save the life of the nation, they have demonstrated, in blood their right to the ballot, which is but the humane protection which they have so fearlessly defended."

The President of the British Association, in his late anniversary address before that body, dwelt on the important part performed by our atmosphere and the aqueous vapors suspended in it, in checking and moderating the radiation of heat from the earth, and its consequent loss in space. The atmosphere is, to use a homely illustration, a blanket which not only shields us from cold, but retains its warmth, and without which the temperature of the globe would probably be so reduced as to make it uninhabitable by man. The planet which is known to be surrounded by a very dense atmosphere, and although it does not receive half as much heat from the sun as the earth does, yet, it may enjoy, as in fact it seems to enjoy, nearly a similar climate, with snows alternately gathering on one or the other of its poles, and spreading over large spaces around, but not, apparently, beyond the latitude of 50° or 60°; the equatorial band of 50° or 60° North or South being always free from snow-masses bright enough and large enough to catch the eye of the observer. Mars may, therefore, be inhabited, and we may see reason to pause before refusing the same probability to any life to Jupiter and even more distant planets.

All England is agog about the "Fenian movement." The channel fleet has been sent to the Irish waters, and, it is said, 75,000 men have been put under arms in the Irish soil. Arrests are numerous—"arbitrary arrests," something similar to those that were made by "Lincoln's minions" during our civil war. Newspapers have been suppressed, and the law of force inaugurated. We are astonished that Great Britain should strive to keep "a brave people" in a relationship they do not desire. What has become of the "right of revolution?" Are the Fenians in a position to be regarded as "belligerents?" We shall soon have to begin a policy of "strict neutrality." To this end let our Lords, Tremholme, Spenser and the like, step to the front, and there start out the "Lifey" and the "Shannon" as counterparts of the "Alabama" and "Shenandoah." Parrott may send over a "neutral" gun, two, as a recognition of what Armstrong did for our erring sisters. But let us always be "neutral."

Among the enactments of Congress, July 2, 1862, was one requiring every person elected to office, or appointed to any office of profit or trust, under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, except the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath :

I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority, or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded any voluntary support to any pretended Government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all its enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

It has just been decided by Judge Underwood, in Alexandria, that no man can practice in the United States Courts whose name is in this oath, notwithstanding he has been pardoned by the President. It is clear that no man can take his oath who has ever in his life violated it, or who will if, having in any way participated in the rebellion or abetted it, he does take it, he will be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury. The consequence is, that quite a number of candidates for Congress in Virginia and elsewhere decline to run, as no ground of action have already been taken for this oath. Application was lately made to President Johnson to know if he thought the law would be repealed or waived by Congress. The President replied that he could not advise them of them all the action of Congress, nor did he know more than any other citizen, what course it might take, but recommended that resolutions should be at once sent to Congress from the Southern States, viz., men who could take the oath. We rather suspect that a man cannot be elected to the House of Congress in one of the Virginia districts, will find his oath challenged, if he presents himself in the hall of Representatives. It is a necessary, though wholesome specimen of Virginia loyalty spoke as follows of our patriot dead :

"Your Yankee Generals—Wadsworth, Morrow, Robinson and Lincoln—have fallen victims to the bullets of sister before last; and, although I don't exactly believe in the assassination of any, I say that three of them fell dead at the Widdo-ness, the day after they crossed the Rapidan, looked like a special dispensation in my behalf."

Probably this same Pendleton belongs to the same school of reconstructionists, with mental reservations, that Judge Andrew Aldrich, representative from the Barnwell district in the South Carolina Convention, and author of the following resolution presented to that body :

"Resolved, That, under the present extraordinary circumstances, it is both wise and politic to accept the rebellion in good faith, and that we will not succeed in the evils which we cannot avert or correct; and to await and say the best means possible to elect our delivery since from unconstitutional rule."

In other words, Pendleton will go into Congress with the view of "seceding" when the "opportunity" offers.

In the South Carolina Constitutional Convention, there was a resolution which proposed the practicable and indisputed persons, the case of Thomas Wallace by name, representing the city of Charleston, the following resolutions, which, however, were disposed of by appointing a committee to memorialize the President in favor of the pardon of Davis. The resolutions were :

"Whereas, By the fortunes of war, our former noble and beloved Chief Magistrate, Jefferson Davis, is now a prisoner, and has already suffered for two long months; and

"Whereas, The fanatics of the North, not satisfied with the wide-spread ruin and desolation which they have caused, are shrieking for his blood; and

"Resolved, That it is the paramount duty of South Carolina, who has been the head and front of secession, and for which struggle he is now suffering, to use every lawful means in her power to save from doom which threatens him.

"Resolved, That to that end, a deputation of members of this body be sent to the city of Washington, in behalf of the people of South Carolina, to plead with Executive, the President of the United States, to extend to him Hon. Andrew Johnson, which he has already shown to us, who are equally the sharers of his guilt, if guilt there be, and which we sincerely believe he is worth restoring the peace and harmony of the Union."

An attempt to hold a public meeting in Lynchburg, in favor of Davis's pardon, was prohibited by Gen. Curtis, for the following reasons, as set forth by the Lynchburg Virginian :

"The General appreciates the natural sympathy felt by the people of the South for Mr. Davis in his misfortunes, but does not think it proper that any demonstration in his interest, or for other purposes, calculated to excite and increase the feeling, should be made, besides, he says under orders which are imperative."

Kentucky and Delaware are the only States in the Union in which slavery has an existence. In all others it has been abolished by State action, or Executive Proclamation. In Kentucky the system dies hard and not gracefully. It seems that a Grand Jury has been found to indict Major-General Palmer and Brigadier-General Hamilton for abducting slaves and otherwise interfering with the slave laws of Kentucky. A Louisville paper suggests that President Johnson and his Cabinet be included in the indictment.

In the Convention for revising the Constitution of South Carolina is Mr. Orr, formerly Speaker of the House of Representatives, in Washington. He made a speech recently, in the Convention, in which he thus briefly defined the purposes of the rebellion and the present duty of the lately rebellious States :

"Gentlemen were upon the people of this State came to the conclusion that slavery could be no longer safe in the Union, and determined to withdraw. Eleven States withdrew, and slavery was the corner-stone on which the Confederacy would formed. War, of necessity, ensued, and the whole question was submitted to the arbitrament of the sword, which has decided against us, and it becomes our duty as men to prohibit slavery in future."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Mr. Stephen Massett (Pipsa) is reaping a golden harvest in his western trip. "Drifting About," is his theme of delight; we should not be at all surprised if he were to strike oil at any moment. "Piper" has to be called upon for an encore at every lecture.

The largest peach-grower in Delaware is Mr. Anthony Reybold. He has a peach orchard of 1,000 acres, of which one-half comes off a bearing age. His crop last year amounted to 60,000 baskets, of which the average price was 2 per basket—$40,000. The aggregate profits of his peach culture for the three preceding years amount to $100,000, or the average sum of $150,000.

Mr. Bergh, arraigning a well at Leicester, Mass., last week, Mr. D. W. Kent found a living rag at the depth of 25 feet below the surface. His fragship had taken up his quarters in the cool, damp clay, 25 feet from the top of the clay stratum. He was dormant at the time of discovery, but after a few hours he speedily revived him, and he hopped away in the most lively manner.

A cargo of corn arrived at Providence, R. I., on the 14th inst., from Chicago, the first that had been received from that section for nearly five years.

The tax list shows that there is over $4,000,000 invested in Rhode Island property from abroad, who usually reside here but a portion of the year. This sum is exempt from taxation, and the entire taxable property, including both personal and real estate.

A Georgia correspondent says: "There are no guerrillas in Kentucky, except those in duress and on their last legs. The rich Bluegrass region no longer feels the devastating tread of armies, but the hills and hollows of the eastern border no longer resound to the shouts, whoops, and wild halloo-places for their forfeited heads. The military tribunals of the State have done their work, and restored to and banned life, and foes of law and order."

The annual report of receipts of internal revenue in Georgia give gratifying evidence of the abundance of crops. The assessment of manufactures and occupations process it has been subjected to within the last four months. The collections reports having collected $200,000 within the last three months, and the collectors in this district report $100,000 in the same period, all of which are from taxes on cotton.

—Mr. George P. Marsh, our Minister at Turin, has forwarded to the Secretary of State a specimen of a cocoon of Italian silk and grape-growers and wine manufacturers, which has been produced in many in rural districts would suffice for the cultivation of 1,000,000 of grape vines and 500,000 mulberry trees.

—The finest fruit garden in America is that belonging to Mr. Charles Downing, of Newburgh, New York. The soil and climate are favorable, but it contains the greatest variety of choice fruits to be found anywhere. It has upwards of 1,000 varieties of apples and pears, also all the European and native varieties of raspberries, and 200 varieties of grapes, and every kind of which have measured 2½ inches in circumference.

—A train, consisting of 30 heavy wagons, two ambulances and six forges, under the direction of Captain Smith, Quartermaster, arrived at Cleveland, passed through Columbus, Ohio, on the 23d ult., on the National road, and reached Zanesville on the 24th inst. Each wagon is drawn by six mules, and in addition there are five extra mules in the train, making in all 3,250.

—The widow of Capt. Lawrence, of the Chesapeake whose last words were "Don't give up the ship!" died at Perth Amboy, N. J., on the 24th inst., aged 78 years. Her remains will be taken to New York, and buried beside those of her husband. Family churchyard where rest the ashes of her brave husband. The death of the widow of one of such rare personal worth, should not pass unnoticed.

—Mrs. M. L. Longstreet, wife of the rebel General, of that name, has been released from Fort Delaware. She came within the $20,000 exemption list.

—A fire occurred on board the ship of North Eleventh Maine, the other day, with a musket that was supposed to be loaded. The ball struck a man named N. S., in 1755. It was used in the battles of Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, in the siege of Canada, and in the war of 1812 with Great Britain. Its history is traced back to 1745.

—The venerable William J. Duane died Sept. 26th in Philadelphia, at the age of 85. He was a Secretary of the Treasury under Jefferson and Madison, and stubbornly refused to "remove the deposits" of Government money from the United States Bank. "Old Hickory" promptly removed Duane and gave the place to Roger B. Taney. The removal was made, and Taney's name in date was rewarded by the place of Chief Justice of the United States.

—It appears, from a showing in the Fourth Auditor's office of the Treasury, that over $3,000,000 in commutation of rations has been paid since 1776. This sum is made up of unclaimed balances due persons who died in the service, of all kinds and grades, and from fines for desertion, &c. It is proposed to fund this accumulation, and thereby prevent the pressure of an act establishing a home for those who have been injured in the service, and also for the widows and orphans, fund to be supported upon the interest of the money thus invested.

—It is reported that Gen. Ortega, who will be the Conservative candidate for Presidency of Mexico a few months, has succeeded in effecting a very large loan for the Republican Government of Mexico, based on the security of confiscated property.

—The shoe business of Lynn, Mass., for the month of August was the largest in the history of any previous month on record. The total value of the boots and shoes dispatched was nearly $2,000,000.

—The Secretary of the Treasury has directed that no more of the old 90 cent currency shall be issued, and it is about to be withdrawn. The new note somewhat similar, bearing the vignette of the United States Treasury, Hon. Hugh McCulloch, the plate for the printing of the new currency are nearly ready, and will soon be issued. The old 90 cent currency will be redeemed as consequence of the number of counterfeits on that denomination of the currency.

—Gen. Monroe M. Parsons, of Missouri, late of the rebel army, has been made Consul-General Canada, vice Sanders, in a fight between the Liberals and Imperialists. After the surrender of Kirby Smith he went to Mexico, with several of his men, and joined the forces of Maximilian.

—Five Catholic priests have been arrested in St. Louis for preaching without taking the oath, and several ministers of other denominations, in various parts of the State, are now under bonds to answer for the same offense. Father Cummings, of Pike county, who was called to obtain bonds to pay his fine and was lodged in jail, has thought better of his conduct and given bonds, and will appeal his case to higher court for decision.

—Brig.-Gen. Revere, formerly of the 10th Maryland battery, and latterly in command of the 107th United States colored troops, stationed at Moorehead city, died there a few days since. Gen. Revere entered the service as a 1st Lieutenant in the New York Fire Zouaves.

—At a late meeting citizens of Norfolk lately held an important meeting for the purpose of starting a line of steamers between it, Nassau (Bermuda) and Norfolk. Some $300,000 are already subscribed—the sum of $1,000,000 being needed to carry out the views of the projectors.

—A number of the most prominent clergymen of Philadelphia met the other morning in an open lot on the outskirts of the city, and engaged in a game of ball. They exhibited much agility and appeared to engage in the sport with zest. Their presence was due to the ground was the means of attracting thither a number of the curious. No class of persons, however, are more in need of just such exercise, and it would be well if practiced oftener than it is.

—Col. Samuel Thomas, Assistant Commissioner for Freedmen's Affairs, in an official communication, states that 118 plantations are leased in Louisiana; 97 of them by whites, and 58 by blacks; also 126 in Mississippi, 113 leased by whites, and 13 by blacks. There are 18,936 acres in 81 plantations in Louisiana and Mississippi leased to whites, and 2,360 acres in the same States, in 170 plantations, leased to whites.

Foreign—The Conciliatore, of Naples, states that the total number of Sicilians who have emigrated to Australia since the commencement of the year amounts to 2,000.

—Railway trains are now run between Glasgow and Edinburgh on Sunday, and great is the commotion which this "desecration of the day of rest" has caused in Scotland.

—A memorial chapel is to be erected at Constance, near the spot where John Huss was burned. A bust of the martyr, a friend of Jerome, Hieronymus, will be placed in the chapel.

—An Irish Registrar-General's return for the quarter ended September 30th shows a decrease in marriages as compared with the similar quarter of 1864, of 11,314. The total number of births is called, for April, May and June, was 48,962. Adding together the emigration and excess of deaths over births, and deducting from the number of births from the sum, it appears that the total population of Ireland continues to decline at the first six months of the present year the diminution has been 40,000.

—The remarkable tenderness of sentimental England for the animals has found its climax recently at Leeds, where a lady, after happening to see a sheep while a lamb was being killed, died a few hours afterwards from the effects of grief and horror. Consequence—so that the Leeds butcher is responsible for two murders.

—Rev. Mr. Hill, and other magistrates of Shoreham, Sussex, have committed a woman of 70 years of age to prison for 14 days, with hard labor, for pucking a handful of wood from the hedge of a field.

—The wife of Gov. Kossuth, the illustrious Hungarian patriot, died on Sept. 1, at Turin, of the illness from the effects of grief for the death of Emilio. On account of her failing health, her husband several years ago left Turin for Genoa, to Italy, where she has since been cared for by him with the most exemplary devotion. Madame Kossuth, at the time of her death, was 55 years old.

—Bessie, the widow of Tom Moore, is dead. She was one of the most charming of women, and self-sacrificing of wives and mothers. Moore's private correspondence published by Lord Russell, is one of the most loving and grateful tributes to her excellences, and the noble heart that lies in the grave by his and oft-sex'ed her long, fully confirms the poet's praises. Her place in Ireland will not last as long as man or woman preserve any remembrance of Tom Moore.

—The Montreal Herald says that Canada is being depopulated. The Montreal Witness further says that it is estimated that the number of people which his diocese has lost through the Bishop of Montreal, Dr. Bourget, St. Patrick's church at present. He said: "The young men are leaving the country in every direction." His clergy, at the last retreat had given him a census of their parishes. At the last census taken, prior to 1861, the Catholics of the Diocese of Toronto numbered 49,500 souls. At the time of the census mentioned, it was found to contain only 30,000. In Toronto city alone, 10,000 have gone away in search of a certain employment to the number of 4,000. We have, therefore, lost 9,500 Catholics in Canada in a few years the same. The people were leaving it in tens of thousands. Similar statistics of the Protestant people in Canada have appeared in all the French Canadian papers.

—It is reported that the Italian Government, encouraged by the success of the Prussian Government in the indemnity accepted by Austria for Lauenburg, is on the point of opening negotiations with Denmark for the cession of Venetia for a sum of money. The project is said to be suggested by Count Bismarck.

—Jamaica has a Black population, according to the census taken four years ago, of 346,000, being nearly one-half the entire population of the British West Indies. The same census returned the Brown population at 243,000, the Whites at 15,000, the Asiatic Africans blood, at 81,000, and the Whites at 14,000—we quote in round numbers. The Black race, it would be seen that the Blacks form 79 per cent. of the population of Jamaica, the Mixed race 18 per cent., and the Whites, 3 per cent.

NEW BOOKS.

Artemus Ward, His Travels. New York: Carleton, 413 Broadway.

The name of Artemus Ward has become so much of a household word that the last announcement that could be bestowed upon his flights and flickerings would be that he had written a book. He is dead, and nobody else, and his little careless quiddities can be only collected by the most assiduous search, like gold diamonds from the sand that would seem to cover them. But here is a volume of all his wild and weird travels, especially those that led him among the Mormons, and the style of funny reading as can well be got hold of in these days of humoristic pen work.

Recollections of Seventy Years. By Mrs. John Farmer. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

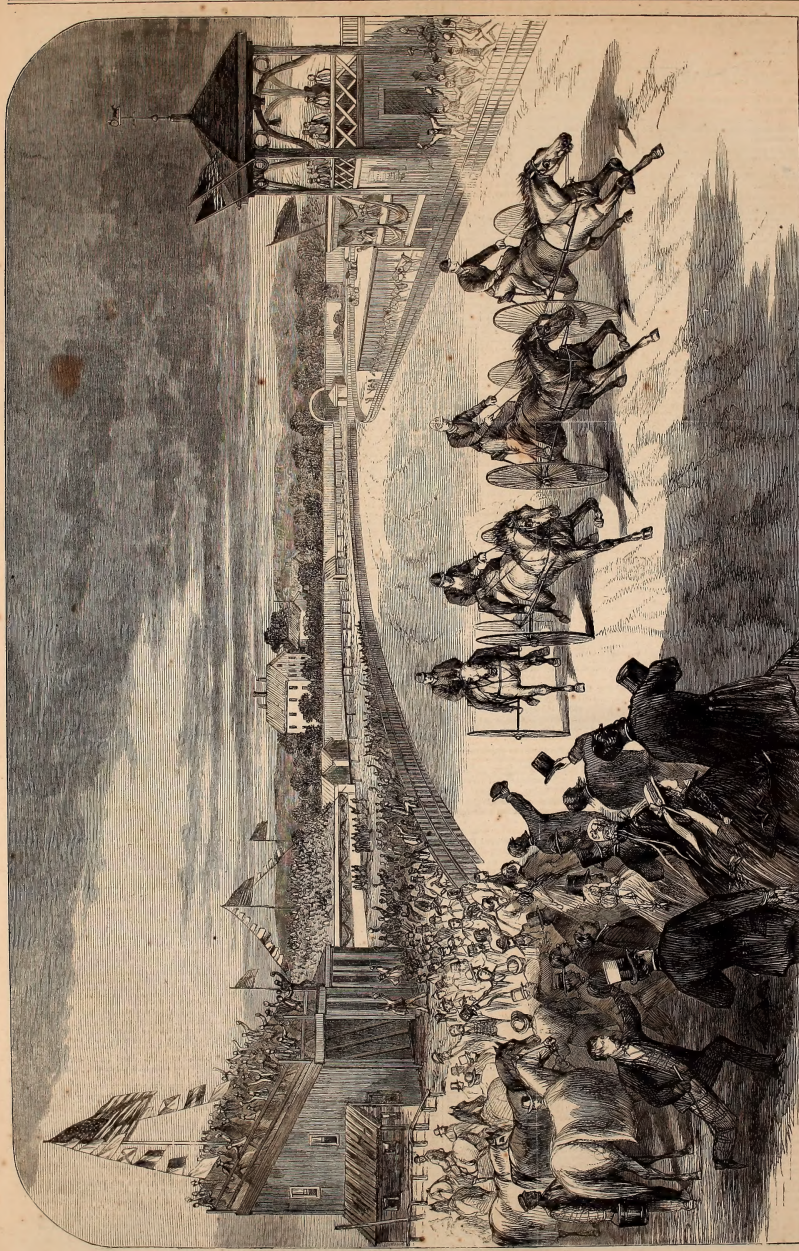
A pleasant collection of reminiscences of celebrated persons and places in Boston and vicinity, a book that can be taken up at any time with pleasure and profit.

Our Artist in Cuba. New York: Carleton.

A lively series of 50 sketches on wood, well printed and got up.

GREAT NATIONAL HORSE FAIR,

At Riverside Park, Cambridge, Mass.



This great and famous fair, which annually attracted people from all parts of the country, commenced on the 10th Sept. and ended on the 23d.

The first day dawned with thousands, from the unfavorable state of the weather; but the succeeding days were beautiful, and everything passed off splendidly and with great success.

The competition for prizes was brisk and decisive. The opening race of the fair was won by Sorrel Dan, a race which was followed by strong efforts on the part of owners of family horses to establish their claims.

These fairs should be encouraged, especially by the rural population, as they tend more to the improvement of stock than any other effort that can be made.

Any work whereby men and women honestly earn their bread, is neither to be despised or ridiculed.

THE NATIONAL HORSE FAIR AT RIVERSIDE PARK, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—EXCITING CONTEST BETWEEN THE CELEBRATED HORSES EMPRESS, FRANK VERHAN, DAN MACE, AND CAPT. McGOWAN, SATURDAY, SEPT. 23.
From a Sketch by Rost. D. Wilcox.

THE GREAT FOUR-OARED BOAT RACE FOR TWO THOUSAND DOLLARS AND THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF AMERICAN WATERS, BETWEEN NEW YORK AND NEWBURGH, ON THE HUDSON RIVER, N. Y., MONDAY, SEPT. 25.—[SEE DESCRIPTION OF THE CREW, ETC., ON PAGE 52.]

PRAYER OF THE CONTRABAND.

Poor Peter was a "Contraband"—
A man of low degree,
Who all his life had been a slave,
And now, at length, was free:
"Bress de dear Lord!" poor Peter cried,
For he is good to me."

His children had been sold from him,
His home-ties rudely torn,
And nothing could he call his own,
This sad soul and forlorn,
Till he awoke to Liberty
One bright and glorious morn.

Blue-coated strangers down the street
Marched in a glittering line;
The bayonets glittered in the sun
Till they seemed, themselves, to shine,
And a joy arose in Peter's breast—
A joy almost divine.

He knew them—they were "Linkum's men"—
He'd waited for them long—
Had prayed for them in midnight watch,
Sang them in plaintive song;
And now he saw them as they marched,
And his heart beat high and strong.

He sought them with a simple trust—
A leal and loyal love;
To him the blare of the bugle-call,
Like voice from one above,
Rang with strange joy, and life, and hope,
His jaded soul to move.

His master called him where he stood,
And bade him not to flee,
But the Man arose in Peter's breast—
Ah! who so proud as he?
"Oh Massa, dese is Linkum's men,
An' dis poor soul is free!"

He led our men for weary miles
Through tangled swamps and drear;
He found them pathways through the maze,
And made the doubtful clear;
He served us well for many months,
And now the end drew near.

The cruel war was drawing on
To swift and sudden close.
We hemmed them in, we beat them back,
We triumphed o'er our foes,
And a mighty joy and thankfulness
In the Negro's heart arose.

He lay upon the crimsoned sod,
A bullet in his breast,
And torture cramped his stiffening limbs,
But his calm soul was at rest,
And a prayer arose to God on high,
And this was his request:

"Oh, God, our Father, in thy love
For all men 'neath the sky,
In whose true sight the black and white
Bear equal destiny,
Bend down and listen to the plea
Of one about to die.

"Raise up that race whom Thou so long
Hast kept of low degree;
If we are worthy of the boon
(As we have striven to be),
Oh, make us—in thy mercy, Lord,—
Oh, make us truly free!"

The Lord has heard that Negro's prayer,
Who died for all his race,
And from the poor and the oppressed
He will not hide His face.
Proud men may crush them in their scorn;
He'll raise them in His grace.

BROKEN PROMISES.

A STORY IN THREE PARTS.

BY KARL DRURY.

PART I.

Philip Burke had sailed or Europe. I sat by my window that overlooked a pretty stretch of wooded lawn, and a glimpse of the distant beach, thinking over his departure. Philip and I had been engaged three months.

I loved him in a quiet, unenthusiastic way, but I loved him dearly. Perhaps there was little about Philip Burke to excite the enthusiasm of so romantic a young girl as myself. We were opposite in everything—seldom agreeing upon any one point, and for ever arguing with each other, though we never quarrelled.

This was entirely owing to Philip; the incredible fact, I mean, of our never having quarrelled.

WAITING ON THE SEASHORE.

When our discussions began to grow warm, and I would answer sharply, or look piqued, he would be sure to kiss me and acknowledge I was all right, though he were perfectly convinced to the contrary long before. I knew he was very obstinate with other people, and spoke his mind very freely to them, and that his severity with their misdeeds was something quite puritanical. He was indulgent to me alone, and would have knocked any man down, I am sure, with one blow from those strong, sunburnt fists of his, who had dared to whisper that I possessed as much as a single fault.

We had lived together, Philip and I, since we were children. Mrs. Burke, Philip's mother, had been a friend of papa's for a great many years before he died, and had taken me as her ward when I was only ten years old, to live with herself and son. She was, and still remains, a sort of oracle in my eyes, and the eyes of many other people. She was a strong-minded, conscientious woman; keen and shrewd in money matters; business-like and precise in her household-affairs, and thoroughly educated, too, for one of her sex. I had learned from her, three years before this history opens, the sad, sad story of my mother's life; I had heard from her lips the whole tale, imperially and truthfully told, of poor mamma's sin. She must have dealt very tenderly and skillfully with my young feelings, for it was not until some time afterwards that I had realized how dark was the stigma resting on my name.

It reached my ears somehow, I scarcely know how, that Philip Burke was very kind to make no big wife, that his love must be passing strong to take up with my mother's daughter. We had a stormy time when I heard this; I was quite hysterical and unreasonable. Philip, I believe, lost his self-control at first, and ground his teeth with anger at the gossips and backbiters. But I suppose my weakness made him strong. I can remember, oh! so distinctly, how he wrapped me in his arms, while I lay sobbing on his great, honest breast, and whispered these words in my ear:

THE MEETING BETWEEN PHILIP AND DR. EMERSON.

"It is only my love for you, Alice, that makes me what I am. It is only that which makes my trust in God and my fellow-creatures. If it were not for your sake, my world would be dark—this world and the world to come. Do you believe now that I can stoop to one who can rouse feelings like these? No more, dear darling, than he can fly. I stoop to men. For you are an angel, let them say what they please about you."

Philip had gone to Europe to settle up the property of my mother, who was a French lady. There had been a great deal of trouble about my inheritance, as well as it was, immediately after mamma's death. I have never discovered the precise year of her death; I only know that it happened before my father's. It was the will of God that I should never see my mother in this world. I remember that I often questioned papa about her when I was a little girl, but he would grow so gloomy and sad in a moment, and silence me so abruptly, that towards the latter part of our life together, I gave up questioning him, and took to picturing her to myself in my child-fancies.

I was quite anxious to be married before the appointed time, and accompany Philip abroad as his wife. I had, from the very first, made suggestion in her odd, imperative way, the moment it was delivered. There was no resisting Mrs. Burke's vetoes. Even Philip succumbed quietly under them.

There is nothing half so endearing as absence, to be guilty of a very trite truism. I am sure that I never thought half so much about him in the life-time as on the night of the day he left us. I sat by the window, watching the view, as I have told you, and thinking as much about the steamer, and a great deal more, perhaps, that I cannot now remember.

I knew he was watching this beautiful evening (for I had taught the matter-of-fact fellow to love sunsets), and wondering whether it were as pretty where I was. Then, I remember, I left him to be somewhere beyond the hazy headland, that rose up out of the blue bay, as if that were the broad Atlantic and not the shore opposite the shore of Long Island Sound. I was growing incorrigibly dreamy, in short, when Mrs. Burke tapped me sharply on the shoulder.

"Wake up, Alice, dear." (She called me "dear" then, in strict contrariety to her usual custom, and I felt the adjective to be a wonderful exponent of Mrs. Burke's sympathy with my loss). "Wake up, child, and hear the news."

I answered quite briskly:

"I am listening, Mrs. Burke. Pray, what is it?"

"Dr. Bridgham is going to New York, and a new doctor is to take his place. I am afraid you don't thoroughly appreciate the importance—not to say the ingratitude of such a step," she went on to say, seeing I was little affected by the news.

"How so, Mrs. Burke?"

"Hear the child!" said Mrs. Burke, spreading to an imaginary third party, and making a crescent of her mouth, as usual, at my indifference. "Did six people ever drink tea within six miles of this neighborhood, without Dr. Bridgham was asked? Hasn't he lost a friend with attentions and kindnesses by every resident of the place, not to speak of exorbitant fees, and gifts by dozens. Doesn't he know the constitution of every child in the place? Hasn't he learned Mrs. Grumble's symptoms by heart, and reduced my headaches to a positive science? And now he leave us in the hands of the next quack that chooses to take us up. It would be dietary to call him ungenerous."

I do not think Dr. Bridgham, had he responded with the whole United States treasury in his pockets, could have suffered more in Mrs. Burke's opinion for the villainy, than he did at present. I was in no endeavoring to plead the culprit's cause. Her feelings, borne along on the popular current of invective, refused to be comforted.

"I believe so," she answered, rather snappishly, a little annoyed by my opposite views.

"Do you believe so, Alice?"

"Emerson," said Mrs. Burke.

If Dr. Bridgham had made himself popular with our little community, I soon found that Dr. Emerson was destined to become no less so. People were inclined to frown upon him at first, and the village authorities, with the customary amount of home-made prescriptions to attend to, employing, so said tradition, an extra ground-boy for the purpose, as the new doctor bided his time, awaiting for the first serious case of illness. I do not remember how gradual was the transition from total neglect into enviable popularity; I only know, that when his skill had become almost universally recognized, and his manners universally approved, Mrs. Burke invited him to tea.

I believe I made rather an elaborate toilet on the evening of his visit, influenced, no doubt, in his favor by the encomiums I had heard. During the first week of Philip's absence my own visits had been few, and, save an evening or a morning walk, my absences from home rare. As a consequence of this retired mode of life, I had not yet met the new doctor.

He was standing by the fire-place as I entered the dining-room, with one arm resting on the mantel, engaged in conversation with Mrs. Burke. I was prepared to be rather skeptical concerning this gentleman's beauty, which had been described to me by not a few young ladies as something quite transcendent. I felt greatly disappointed, even at a first view. There was nothing in his face that the most critical could cavil at. It was a face that struck me on the moment as one of extraordinary, almost wonderful beauty.

I exerted myself in the chatting line while tea lasted. Dr. Emerson was not as talkative as I supposed. Once or twice I caught his eye fixed on myself with a scrutiny that was far from agreeable. He did not remove his look from my face when I discovered it, but continued, rather rudely, I thought, in his own investigation.

After tea he again fell into conversation with Mrs. Burke, and I feeling, it must be owned, a little piqued, seated myself at one of the large bow windows of the dining-room to read a few pages by the fast deepening twilight.

I do not know if I succeeded in myself to Mrs. Burke, but I had not been reading over five minutes when he came forward to where I sat, and said, rather abruptly, facing me:

"It is a beautiful evening. Will you take a walk on the lawn, Miss Coolidge?"

I said "certainly," and closed my book. We walked out of the dining-room together, through the long, old-fashioned hall, pausing for a moment on the verandah, to watch the fine view of the Sound by sunset.

I hardly remember our topics of conversation during the walk. It was in a talkative mood that evening, and I rattled off a great many speeches, around which there still clings an aroma of nonsense, though I have long ago forgotten them. He listened to everything I said, seemed to encouraged my flippancy, I thought, by an occasional short laugh, as if what I said amused him excessively.

I remember noticing that he grew more talkative himself as our acquaintance grew older. He told me a few comical stories about his first practice that made me laugh merrily, more from his odd, inimitable style of narration than any actual fun in them.

We continued our walk until dark, when Dr. Emerson, looking at his watch by the light of the cigar he was smoking, said suddenly:

"I am going to the house to say good evening to Mrs. Burke. Would you mind waiting on the verandah until I return? I have something I want to say to you."

Rather surprised, I consented to the agreement. He soon returned.

"Will you excuse my being friendly on a first meeting?" he said, holding out his hand for me to take.

I gave him my hand and he shook it warmly.

"Now do you care to hear what I want to say?" he questioned, looking at me very intently for a moment.

"Yes," I answered, half-turning my head in preference to confidence. "Yes, if you choose."

"It is only that you are more accessible than any young lady here—if that is a compliment. I like you very much indeed. Let us be friends?"

He was still holding my hand (I had forgotten to withdraw it), and was looking at me with the same scrutiny he had used at the tea-table. But his voice had changed wonderfully in the space of a moment. It was a great deal softer, I thought

More than I fancied him capable of expressing. He had struck me as a little world-worn at first, a little bit cynical, and very blase to a degree with men and things. I had even conjectured that he might be a woman-hater, or perhaps a misanthrope, and had been speculating on many whether he were laughing in his sleeve at my puerilities in the way of conversation. Somehow, my opinion of him changed suddenly, underwent a very sudden change. From that moment he interested me, and I think I told him so in rather roundabout terms. He said: "I am very glad," and, adding his hopes (as I then thought) that I should find smile, wished me good-night again, and disappeared in the darkness with a nervous and hurried step.

I found Mrs. Burke quite charmed with Dr. Emerson, and inclined to slight our former physician in comparison.

"Have you any idea how old he is?" I asked.

"How old would you suppose?" Mrs. Burke answered, looking at me inquiringly.

I hesitated for a moment, and then said, with an air of conviction:

"Not more than five and thirty, if that."

"Older," said Mrs. Burke.

"Not forty?" I exclaimed.

"Every day of forty."

PART II.

"HAVE you a likeness of mamma, Mrs. Burke?"

The breakfast things had been cleared away, and we were sitting together in the cool dining-room, odorous with the breath of spring flowers, that was wafted through the open windows. Mrs. Burke looked up from her housekeeper's book, startled at the question.

"I know it's a strange thing for me to ask," I went on, not waiting for a reply. "But I dreamed about her last night. I dreamed that a lady in white, with dark hair and eyes, and the sweetest, tenderest voice in the world, spoke to me, and called me her daughter."

Mrs. Burke's face was turned away from me, but I could see that it was very pale. She had engaged a moment before in writing down orders for the day, had ceased to move, and that her pen-shook in her hand as I spoke.

"Yes, child; I will show it to you in a moment."

Then the pencil began again, working as rapidly, though not quite so steadily, as before. In a few moments she left the room, returning soon afterward with a picture in her hand.

It was an oval-fashioned miniature, studded round the frame with brilliants, and attached to a faded blue ribbon. The face seemed very like the one which I had seen in my dream. The same calm, white forehead, the same exquisite throat and chin, the same dark, almond-shaped eyes with their long curly lashes, that left a shade on the soft cheek.

"It is very beautiful," I said, bursting into tears. "She must have been better than you think, Mrs. Burke, to have been so beautiful."

I am sure there was a tear on Mrs. Burke's cheek when I looked into her face, as she stood, holding the miniature before me. But she wiped it away quickly, and spoke in an odd, husky tone.

"She sinned, Alice, and the world condemned her for ever and for ever. We all hoped that God was more merciful."

"Do you know his name?" I asked, in almost a whisper.

"I do not. Your father did; but kept it a profound secret."

"And were they living together when she died?"

"Yes. That was why your father would never speak to you concerning her."

"And have you nothing that belongs to her, Mrs. Burke? No letters? No——?"

She handed me an envelope while I was speaking—an old dingy envelope, with a foreign postmark. It contained only a short note, written in a feeble, cramped hand. It was addressed to my father, and ran thus:

PARIS, May —, 18—.

"I am dying; when this reaches you I shall be dead. We are always kinder to those that have gone before us, no matter how deeply they have sinned. Forgive me, if God bless our child. Do not teach her to hate me. ALICE."

Dr. Emerson came that evening after tea. I remember thinking with a sort of resentment, the circumstance of the morning having affected me so deeply. He noticed my pale looks almost immediately, and, without inquiring my pulse, and asking my symptoms, though I declared myself perfectly well. He poured out some drops of a dark liquid, which he carried in a tiny phial in his pocket, and made me drink it, promising I would be better in a few moments. It is certain that I was immediately quieted by the long, and found myself laughing in the middle of a humorous story that he was telling Mrs. Burke.

He left rather early on that evening, being called away by professional duty. Somehow we fell into a tete-a-tete together before he took his departure. I think Mrs. Burke must have brought us together with the hope of bundling my nerves by a sober talk with a medical gentleman. Just before he rose to go, I asked him suddenly, and with a great deal of gravity, if he have since wondered, "how old he really was." The fresh, youthful smile with which he received my question, made his answer to me quite unusually true. He certainly did not look over thirty, as he said: "I am old enough to be your father."

I am relieved, now that the point is settled," I said with a laugh, "that we have been the subject of universal conjecture to a great many people since your arrival. And now I am going to put another question, which I promise to be impertinences. Have you ever been married?"

There was a sudden rush of gloom over his face, and a deep lowering of his dark eyebrows, from under which a keen, unpleasant light seemed to flare up and then go out again. He turned his head upon me with a sternness, I thought, that, who was too much engaged in her book to notice us. I crimsoned at my own impudence, and was about to stammer out a few words of apology, which would, no doubt, have made matters worse, when he turned quickly round again, and said quite calmly:

"Never!"

"You are annoyed at me."

His face lighted up in a moment with its rare, fascinating smile.

"Not at all; what led you to think so?"

I said, "Fancy, I suppose," not daring to mention Mrs. Burke's opinion, lest it might reappear. It may have been because my nerves were in a weak state, and my incinations rather hysterical, but I thought that I should have been greatly terrified at his agitation, had it occurred a second time.

By degrees Dr. Emerson grew to be an almost daily visitor at our house. We often met in the evening, too, during my walks by the shore. I had grown rather thoughtful of late, owing, as I told Mrs. Burke, to the separation from Philip and the infrequency of his letters, and preferred a walk on the sand, or a clamber on the rocks at sunset, to all the sporties in the village. Of course, I can distinctly remember what a kind kiss she gave me when I told her this. I think it had been the fat-chuckling sporties in the village. never since did I succeed in bringing her to love me—that Philip and I should eventually be married.

It was on one of these Dr. Emerson on the shore, very, very often—oftener than I ever thought about then. At last I grew to miss him when he came, and was quiet until late on the rocks, in the hope of seeing him.

Mrs. Burke did not know of these meetings; nobody dreamed of them, except ourselves. The shore was always lonely at sunset, when the last yokes of oxen had gone home with their load loads of dripping seaweed. It was an easy matter to slip out after tea, over the lawn, through the wicket-gate, and down the little hill to the quiet, peaceful rocks, where only musical waves broke the stillness of nature, and a rosy mist, very pleasant, I used to think, to have a companion who loved the water-side as much as I did. We had some very "flirty" about it, and spoke them with the cadence of the waves themselves.

It did not dawn upon me gradually—the consciousness that I had never loved Philip Burke as I should have done, and that I loved Hugh Emerson better than any one in the whole world. It rushed upon me suddenly, it flared upon me like a lightning flash in a storm, and showed to me vividly the whole of the dark gloom of deportment-ness, the wreck of my fancied passion. Forgetfulness! that is the word. Philip had been forgotten, or had rather been ranged into a brighter fairer creation—Hugh Emerson.

It was a letter from Philip that awakened me—the last I ever received from him. I found it on my dressing-table one evening, after having returned from a walk with Dr. Emerson. He had said many things that evening which had confused and bewildered, though they filled me with a delight there was no resisting. I had passed through the hall on tip-toe, lest Mrs. Burke should call me into the sitting-room. I wanted to be alone. I wanted to try and remember all that he had said; why, I never thought to ask myself.

When I reached my own room, I bolted myself in, and sat down by the window. My heart beat very fast, and there were tears in my eyes. I tried to recall the sweet sound of his voice, but could not. Everything seemed a delightful confusion to my bewildered senses. The soft plash of the water against the rocks, the moonlight and holier to my young heart. The glorious sunset furrowing the fair sky, and dappling the broad waters with pink and silver, seemed a reflection of my own happiness. I loved for the first time. A glittering parodise had opened to my view—a paradise that I had not dreamed of a moment since. I wondered now that I had ever lived without it.

When my eye rested on Philip's letter, which had lain neglected on the dressing-table since I had entered the room, I turned a trifle paler, that was all, and proceeded to sip quickly, through the seal in a sort of nervous haste. I do not think the great change came on me—the great change that was to make me cold and dull, and stupid—until I had read it all through, and knew what it contained. He was coming home soon, to make me his wife. He called me darling Alice, again and again. He had been very beautiful when abroad, but none so beautiful as I. He had seen many wonderful sights, but none pleased him, since I was not there to enjoy them. A single sentence from my lips was worth all the melody of Tietjens; a walk by my side upon the quiet beach, was preferable to all the Alps in Europe. He loved me then; every tender word a fresh reproach; every allusion to his pure, faithful love, a new stab in my miserable heart.

I cannot for forget the agony of that hour. I shall never forget the long struggle of pity, and pride, and remorse against the one invincible passion that consumed me. I had never loved Philip, I had deceived him, without the knowledge of my own duplicity. Was I, therefore, guilty? Was there any thing against my will, my sense of right, and truth, and honesty? Could Philip, gentle and considerate as he had always been, forgive, if I told him all? Again and again his words rung in my ears—words that I had once thought the strongest bond that held us together:

"It is only my love for you, Alice, that makes me what I am. It is only that which makes me trust in God and my fellow-creatures."

Now, the bond was broken, and we were to be separated henceforth to each other. I had been false to him—falser than Imogen or Tristam. I had ruined a noble man's life. I had won his love—he loves how many months?—and have worn with pride—and tossed it away, like a worthless trinket, instead of the priceless gem it was. I was a traitress. I wanted to die before Philip came home. The grave would hide my guilt then, and no bitterness should mingle with his noble tears.

That night was passed wretchedly. The next day was dull and rainy, and I sat with Mrs. Burke for hours reading aloud. I am afraid there was little of the expression in my tones to make me or her interested. I hated more to hear the sound of my own voice—more to cry down the shrilly voice of conscience that seemed to ring in my brain, than for any hope of interest or amusement.

The storm cleared off at five o'clock. I sat on the verandah alone, after Mrs. Burke had gone, and the fresh landscape that sparkled with myriad rain-drops, and watching the huge bank of cloud slope slowly to the eastward. I saw the few glimpses of the shore that I caught through the thick trees of the lawn, it had never looked more enticing. But my resolution had been sealed since sunset; there must be no shrinking now. The mists of bewilderment had cleared away. Philip should know all from my own lips. Though I growled at his fee with a bitterness of self-reproach for his look should strike me dead the moment after—he should hear that I had wronged him from my lips alone. If he still clung to me—if his great love would consent to fill the place of mine, I would be his wife, and honor, and obey, and trust him. If not—but I never went further. I never dared to ask myself what would happen then. I knew that I had been, cruel, and treacherous, and faithless as I had shown myself, I still scorned to build upon the wreck of his noble love a single stone of my own.

It was rather late when I heard Dr. Emerson's step on the graveled path that led to the verandah. His coming was no surprise. I had expected, and was prepared to meet him.

"You were afraid of wet feet, Miss Alice, and so gave up your walk? How cruel," he added, as I made no reply, "how cruel of you to deprive me of my evening walk, and keep me watching on the rocks instead of enjoying the fresh sea-air."

"I am sorry," I said, quietly, though my heart was fluttering at the mere sound of his voice, and my notes were tremulous from the effort I was making. "Was that the word you used, Dr. Emerson, or did I misunderstand?"

He chanced color—I saw this, even in the gray dusk of evening—and answered quickly:

"I used the word—foolishly, perhaps. Will you substitute another?"

"If you are not yet defined," I said. "If it had not ruined I think I should have stayed away."

"You are unwell?"

"Not at all. But one tires of everything after a while, you know. Shall I call Mrs. Burke, Doctor? I think she wanted to see you if you came."

"Is she in the sitting-room?"

"Yes."

"Thank you. Then I—I will go to her."

I looked up into his face from where I sat, as he hastily crossed the verandah and entered the hall. There was a look of such acute suffering upon it that I shuddered. The evening faded slowly into night; the late harvest-moon rose high in the heavens, and reddened the calm waters that lay beyond. It must have been an hour afterward when he returned, and found me sitting where he had left me. I had not stirred. It was a willful, premeditated sin, but I had not stirred.

"Your aunt is not very well this evening, and has gone to bed," he said, quietly.

"I shall have to follow her example shortly," I answered, not thinking of the rudeness, bent only on conquering myself. "These rainy days are very fatiguing."

There was a long silence. Dr. Emerson had taken a chair, and was sitting at some distance from my side. At last he spoke:

"You are annoyed at something. What is it?"

There was no petulance about his tones. At another time I should have called them reproachful; now, I trembled with agitation, and rose to leave the verandah. I dared not trust myself to speak. I dared not listen to his voice a moment longer. I was afraid of him. I was more afraid of myself.

My foot was on the threshold, when he caught my hand, holding it with a passionate force, and murmuring some wild words in my ear. I did not try to free myself; I only bowed my head, and prayed for strength, and listened.

The echo of his eloquence, the sound of his low, pleading tones, came back to me through a long vista of years, unchanged as when I heard them for the first time. I think God must have given me a holy strength in that most trying of moments, changing my weakness to a mighty, unconquerable power. All the flutterings of my heart were still—all the throbbings of my brain were calm. There was great suffering in my soul, but no irresolution, no feeble swayings from wrong to right, no wicked groanings after the unattainable, the forbidden.

I heard him through. I waited till the first outburst of passion had quieted, and then I spoke:

"It is a sin, Dr. Emerson—the sin of treachery in you—of falsehood in me. Thank God, I am strong enough to cast it out, and school my wicked nature under nobler maxims. Try and do the same yourself. You know the way; every man and woman knows it. Duty is the mile-stone."

"Duty!" he repeated, with bitter emphasis. "Can you talk of duty, Alice, to one who loves as I love? Can——"

"Go!" I said, pointing out into the darkness. "You tempt me, and it is unmanly. Every moment we are together injures me no less than yourself."

I broke from him, and fled to my room, afraid of his agonized look, and the rash words it might wring from me.

PART III.

The next morning, before breakfast, and while I was still dressing, Mrs. Burke entered my room with a letter in her hand. Her smiling, happy face, told me all. It was a telegram from Philip. He was now in New York, and would return home by the earliest train.

It was well for me that the joyful news dulled her perceptive faculties and diminished her observation, usually so keen. She would certainly have noticed my haggard face, my look of agony, when the intelligence was delivered, had it been otherwise.

I grew calmer when ten o'clock came, which was the hour for Philip's arrival. I had resolved to tell him the truth—and quickly—though not the entire truth. My courage failed me at the thought of revealing the secret of my love for Dr. Emerson. I knew too well Philip's hot, passionate nature, not to fear for the consequences of such a disclosure. Though an insurmountable barrier stood in the way of my happiness, the love which might have yielded that happiness should at least be sacred. The guilty tale should reach no ears but my own and his. To Philip—to the world—I should be only a false and fickle girl; to myself I should appear the traitress that I was.

He came at the appointed time, looking little changed from when I last saw him, except that he seemed a hundredfold happier than I could ever remember. I cannot recall our meeting. There is a confused recollection of trying to act a part—a shallow, feeble part, in which I broke down, turning my head away and shedding hysterical tears. His sympathy and Mrs. Burke's kind attempt at soothing me, only provoked it more. They left me quite calm after a half hour had elapsed, and as the door of my room closed on the forms of mother and son, I heard Mrs. Burke telling him of my deep, deep love, and the suffering I had passed through.

It was evening in the sitting-room. There were no candles; neither Philip nor I had thought of them. There were quaint, ghostly shadows flickering and dancing on the walls, in the silence of an awful pause. Neither of us saw the other's face. Philip had been holding my hand in his, but he had dropped it long ago, even since I had begun the cruel story that was to blight his golden hopes and ruin his young life.

I had told it. I had spared myself no accusation—I had told the bare, unadorned truth—everything but my love for another. And now I was waiting for an answer, and none came. Had the words I uttered stunned him? Had he no answer to make?

At last I heard him start suddenly in his chair, and then I saw his dark, dusky figure rise, and then his calm, even tread fell upon my ear. He walked to the door and stopped and walked back again to where I sat. Then I felt a burning kiss upon my forehead, and, dizzy and confused, I tried to find his hand, half-rising from my chair, and sinking back unconscious a moment after. When I awoke the room was brighter, for the moon had risen, and a stream of reddish light poured into the chamber. But Philip had gone.

A sort of apathy succeeded my swoon. I remember noticing the strange appearance of the night—the red angry look of the moon—the dark shadows of the old trees on the lawn. I could hear the crickets chattering on the verandah—the low howl of a dog at one of the distant farms, the sound of a step on the path outside. I thought the step paused in front of the window where I sat, and then, straining my eyes a little, I saw a dark form in front of the darker trees. There was no mistaking that form—it was Dr. Emerson!

The recognition no sooner took place, than I rose to my feet, endowed with a sudden desperate strength. All my brave resolutions were gone now. I was ready to hear his passionate words repeated a thousand times. God forgive me! many another woman has done the same under the influence of an excitement like mine. Philip's horrible calmness had filled me with a sort of insanity. I had broken the bonds, but I had not hushed the wild cry for sympathy that went up out of my agonized heart.

It all seemed like a beautiful dream; the thankful words of Hugh Emerson, as he drew me to him and stroked my head, and pressed his burning kisses on my forehead; the throbbings of my heart, and the deep pulsations of his own; the bliss of being near him, of hearing his voice, and feeling that his love sheltered me.

He drew my arm in his after a moment, and we walked down the graveled road towards the gate. I was reckless, and willful, and headstrong now. I did not care for Philip—I did not care for the whole world. We were together, and I was happy.

The moon, which had been under a deep black cloud, came forth again as we reached the gate, and lighted the whole lawn with her rays. I saw a man standing by the gate, looking at us as we approached him. I recognized Philip instantly. We both paused, but Philip came forward.

I trembled with fright, and tried to speak, but the words refused to come. Dr. Emerson did not move, or even change color. I covered my face for a moment, shuddering. When I looked up the two men were standing together, facing each other.

Philip spoke first, but his tones were very different from those I had expected to hear.

"This explains all to me. God knows I never forced Alice Coolidge to the falsehood she has used. I only said that her love was all I cared for in this life, or any life." Then facing me with a suddenness that made me tremble and gasp for breath, "You did not tell me of this—this new love, an hour ago?" he said.

He saw that I could not reply, and turned once more to Dr. Emerson, with a fierce, dangerous light in his eye, saying:

"You are a thief of the worst kind. You have stolen a treasure that makes you mean by contrast with herself. You are one of those villains that men shrink from with more loathing than terror."

He paused a moment, and still searched the doctor's face with his wicked, glittering eyes.

"Oh! my God!"

The exclamation had burst from Philip, who was now gazing with an expression of horror impossible to describe, upon the doctor's features. Once more I covered my face and murmured a prayer, stung with remorse at my own rashness, terrified by Philip's look, dreading every fresh moment they were together.

As I raised my eyes something flashed in Philip's hand, which was extended towards Dr. Emerson. It was a miniature resembling that of my dead mother.

"Do you know that face?" he asked, in a voice of terrible calmness. "The miniature was given to me by the relatives of Alice Coolidge's mother."

"I have never told a lie in my life," said Dr. Emerson, simply; "I shall not tell one now. I do know the face."

"You acknowledge it as your own?"

"I do."

"Alice," cried Philip, turning towards me, "this man, according to his own statement, has never lied, and never will lie. He is bound to answer the question I shall put. Now listen to that answer. Are you, or are you not," he went on, "the man who eloped with Alice Coolidge, the mother of the girl before us?"

"I am."

A sound like the rush of many waters filled my ears, a glare as of a thousand lights blinded my gaze, and then came the darkness of death and the silence of the grave.

I had been very sick, they told me. For a long time the skillful New York physicians had wondered how I could live on so long with leaping pulses and fevered, throbbing brain. But God was merciful, and I recovered.

Mrs. Burke, in spite of the knowledge which she held of my faithlessness to Philip, a knowledge imparted before he left home for the last time, had nursed me through the long and wearisome illness with a care that no sacrifice could repay. I once tried to thank her. It was just after the fever had left me, and while I was lying weak and feeble as an infant, and there was still danger of my life. I remember she turned away and said, "Hush, Alice!" so firmly, and yet so gently, that I never had the courage to renew my thanks.

Long before I was well enough to go out, the plans of my future life had been decided upon. Philip's home was no home for me. I felt that my presence in the house would for ever stand between the meetings of mother and son. With great difficulty I impressed the necessity of this step on Mrs. Burke, and succeeded at last in gaining her consent. I was going to New York, to live with one of my father's relatives, whose declining years needed my companionship and attention. It would be a happy task, that of caring for the wants of another, and would, perhaps, deaden the poignancy of my own sufferings.

As soon as my health was restored, and just before I took a final leave of my loved guardian, Mrs. Burke gave me two letters. The first which I opened was from Philip. This is its contents:

"I think that the worst of my trouble is over; I am better and nobler than when you knew me. I have learned to consider more wisely the ends for which we were created, and to draw a boundary between happiness and duty. Around the memory of your real or fancied love there shall ever cling an odor of heavenly joy. I can now work for eternity, since I have tasted its pleasures on earth. Farewell! I shall never see you again; but I shall always pray for you, and think of you, and love you the same. PHILIP."

I have this letter yet. It is tear-stained and yellow, and the characters are pale with age, and I shall never destroy it, until I know that I am going to die.

It is needless to say from whom the other letter came. I tore it up as soon as I had read it, and wept bitterly over the fragments. I have tried to reproduce in the following, a resemblance to the original:

"You have learned the secret of my life—a secret I dared not withhold from you by falsehood, but one which I would rather have died than divulge. With its disclosure perish my hopes of happiness—the fair dreams I was unworthy to cherish, still more unworthy to realize. I do not believe that your love for me is gone, however vast are the obstacles between us. I know your character too well to believe this; my faith in your constancy—the birthright of all noble minds—is too firm and lasting. Your nature revolts against me, your body shrinks from me, but your heart, your love, is still mine, and now for my story; a plain, unadorned statement of facts, with no self-exculpation, no excuses to palliate the crime.

"It was a crime, and I acknowledge it as such. Your mother and I had known each other long before her marriage. Our love had been often breathed in each other's ears, our troth had long been plighted. It is the old story. She was the daughter of a French gentleman of considerable means, and one of many children. It had long been the aim of her father that his daughters should marry well, and that the property of which he died possessed should be inherited by his sons. I, young at the time of my father's death, had received little inheritance, and had been sent, at the early age of eighteen, from my native England, into the banking-house of Alice's father.

"I shall not speak of the many struggles that attended my early career. I shall not dwell upon the bitter trials that surrounded our love. Enough that I was rejected by the parent of my betrothed, and, stimulated by the promise of Alice's constancy, I left for England. There, success crowned all my efforts. It was not long before I found myself rich enough to hope for favor at the hand of Monsieur Dupois, and with a happy, trusting heart, I returned to France.

"I found your mother married to another man, and the queen of fashion in her Parisian sphere. I was rash enough to write to her a letter full of reproach, and to speak of our love as if it were still an unforbidden subject. Her reply to my letter soon reached me, appointing a meeting, and promising an explanation.

"I found your mother unchanged in her affection—the wife of a man whom she did not love—the victim of a heartless marriage de convenance. Then followed many more meetings. My passion blinded me to all sense of honor or right, and urged her to the fatal step. We fled, and the woman I loved was for ever dishonored.

"She died loving me as she had always loved, and with only a single wish ungratified. That wish concerned yourself. She drew from me a solemn promise that I would seek you out—that I would stand in the way of your misfortunes, and save you from a fate like her own.

"How have I fulfilled that trust? By loving you with a passion that was but the continuance of my passion for herself. By finding the daughter a sweet reproduction of the mother. Finally, by disgracing that daughter with an unholy, almost illicit love. God forgive me! Till I have conquered my own heart, Alice, I need never hope for peace. Farewell.

"HUGH EMERSON."

The next morning saw me depart from a home where sorrow and happiness had so strangely chequered my life. In the long years that have followed, I hope some rest has come to those I love. I know that I am more peaceful—that the grace of heaven has reached me, and the boon of pardon is gained.

THE GREAT FAIR.

There is something connected with the great Fair of the American Institute that appeals to all our memories, and touches a chord that carries us back to our child days, awakening recollections of our early wonder over the vast stores of every product of art, science and agriculture, brought together in one little spot to awaken the intellect of the people and bring home to them their onward progress.

The fair of the American Institute which is now being held in the rooms of the 22d Regiment N. Y. S. N. G., is an epitome of the nation and its onward march. Each year shows our progress in the mechanic arts and in agriculture by its exhibitings. The wonder of 20 years ago is changed to an every day tale, and the exhibition of this year gives to us new marvels that seem almost like a fairy tale. We enter the great hall as in the olden time, and the casual observer would say, at a glance, that it is but the old stereotyped story of his youth. But as he goes on amid the roar and clatter of machinery, and the rush of a thousand people, his attention is every moment drawn to some new step in the world of advancement, or some stroke of genius calculated to smooth and lighten labor, or produce "two blades of grass where only one has grown before."

We look upon the Fair of the American Institute as an integral part of the great machine of the country, and the people would miss its quick work, were it to cease, as much as the human frame would miss any one of its members. Once a year the Institute emerges from its rooms, where for the 12 months it has worked through the length and breadth of the land, and shows the result of its labor in this festival. There are gathered all the new inventions in machinery and household comforts; all the agricultural varieties and beauties, from a huge potato to an elegant dahlia, with heaps of luscious fruit tempting the eyes and making the mouth to water.

This week at the Fair has been one of uncommon interest. Prominent among the distinguished visitors was General Joe Hooker, now commanding the Department of the East, and the rumor is that the General is to deliver the closing address. If this be true, the vast rooms will be too small to hold his audience.

THRILLING RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

One of the most singular accidents we have ever been called on to illustrate came off on the Saratoga and Rensselaer Railroad on the night of the 23d of September.

At about 7 o'clock the sleeping car train was on its way from Green Island at about the time that the draw near the Troy shore was opened to admit the passage of the steamboat McAllister towing a raft. The red light was lowered to indicate that the draw was open, but still on rushed the train. As it passed the opening between the bridge on Starbuck's Island, Joseph Lawrence, of the Central Road, saw that the draw was open, and shouted to the engineer to stop. He did not do so, and Mr. Lawrence, jumping on the last car, put down the brake, but could not prevent the result. He partially checked the train, so that the engine did not take the leap it otherwise would have done through the open draw. The passenger car followed, and in the fall was turned completely around, while the sleeping car hung half way, suspended like Mahomet's coffin.

It was very dark at this time, but the woodwork of the engine caught fire and lit up the scene with an unearthly glare, while the escaping steam made a deafening noise, suggestive of explosion and danger. River street was filled with people, and there was a general rush down the dock to the scene. Fortunately, the raft had floated down to the wreck, forming a bridge by which it could be reached.

An alarm of fire called out the people, who came to the dock by hundreds and thousands to gaze at the ruins amid the darkness. Efforts were immediately commenced to raise the suspended car. This was accomplished by jacks and tackles from the bridge, when the draw was closed, and travel was resumed.

The most remarkable part of the occurrence is that no lives were lost.

A TRAIN OF CARS RUSHING THROUGH FIRE.

One of the the most thrilling scenes we have ever been called on to portray occurred in the woods at Cedar Swamp, Maine, on the track of the Eastern railroad, Sunday, Sept. 17.

The train was on its way to Augusta, conveying the 14th Maine regiment, when suddenly, without knowing it, they dashed at full speed into a piece of burning woods. Once in, there was no retreat, and on the train flew through the flames that reared themselves forty feet above the locomotive and cars. The oil of the wheels took fire, and for a few minutes it looked seriously as though the whole convoy was gone. The soldiers were smothering from smoke and roasting from the flames, and the engineer only kept his post by almost superhuman command. The roar of the flames completely drowned the shrieks and cries of the human cargo, and for a few minutes it was a perfect pandemonium. Fortunately none of the brave fellows threw themselves from the hurrying train, and the gallant locomotive, Cape Ann, sped them at lightning pace through the fiery ordeal, and dashed them into fresh air and life, sound, save and except a little scorching, which time will remove.

THE GREAT BOAT RACE.

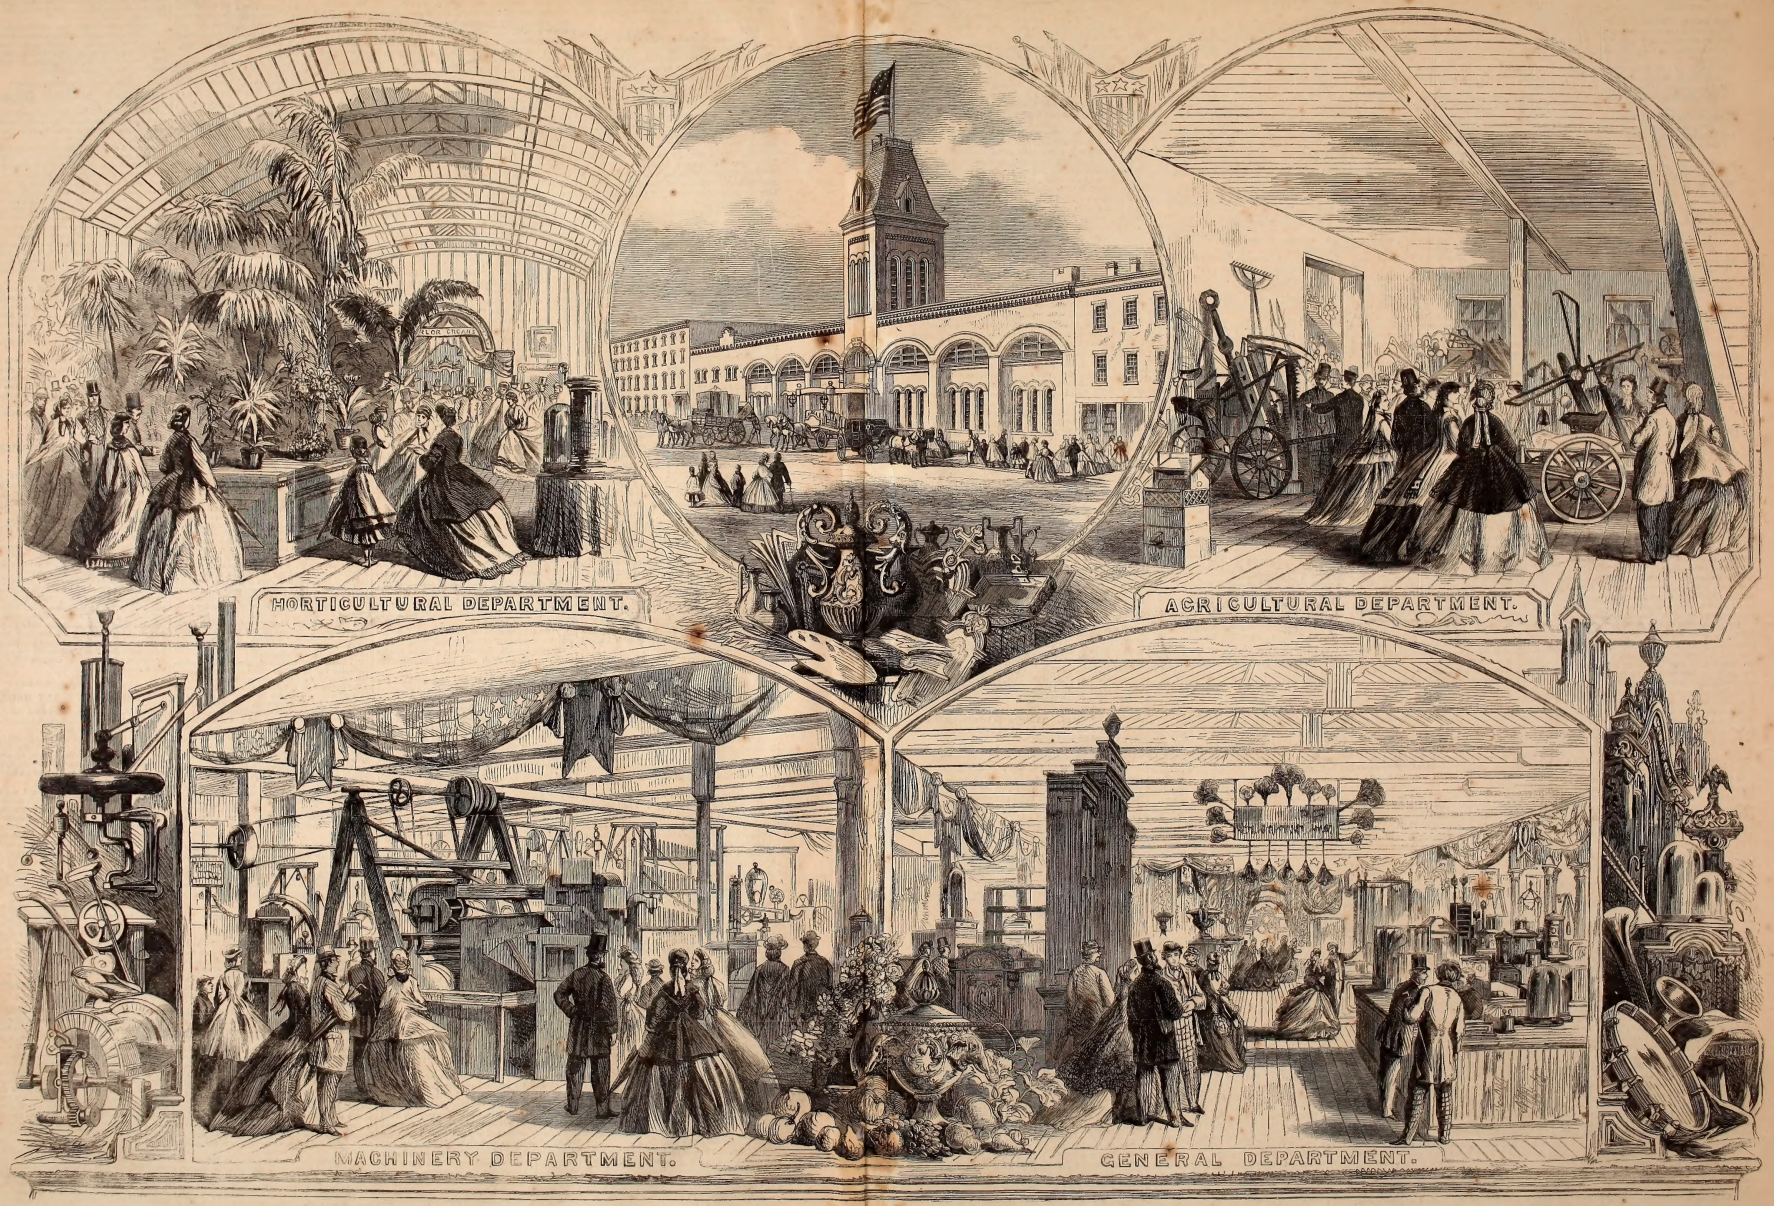
Monday, Sept. 25th, was a great day in Newburg, when the long talked-of match between that city and New York came off at Sing Sing.

The New York boat was called after the city in which it was built by Mr. Charles E. Elliott. Its length is 42 feet 3 inches; width, 22 inches; depth, 8 inches. The Newburgh boat is called the Robert Earle, built by Stephen Roberts, of Harlem. Her length is 46 feet, 20 inches width, and depth 8 inches.

The crew of the first boat was John A. and Bernard Biglan, John Blue and John J. Eckerson. The Newburgh boat was rowed by the well-known Ward brothers.

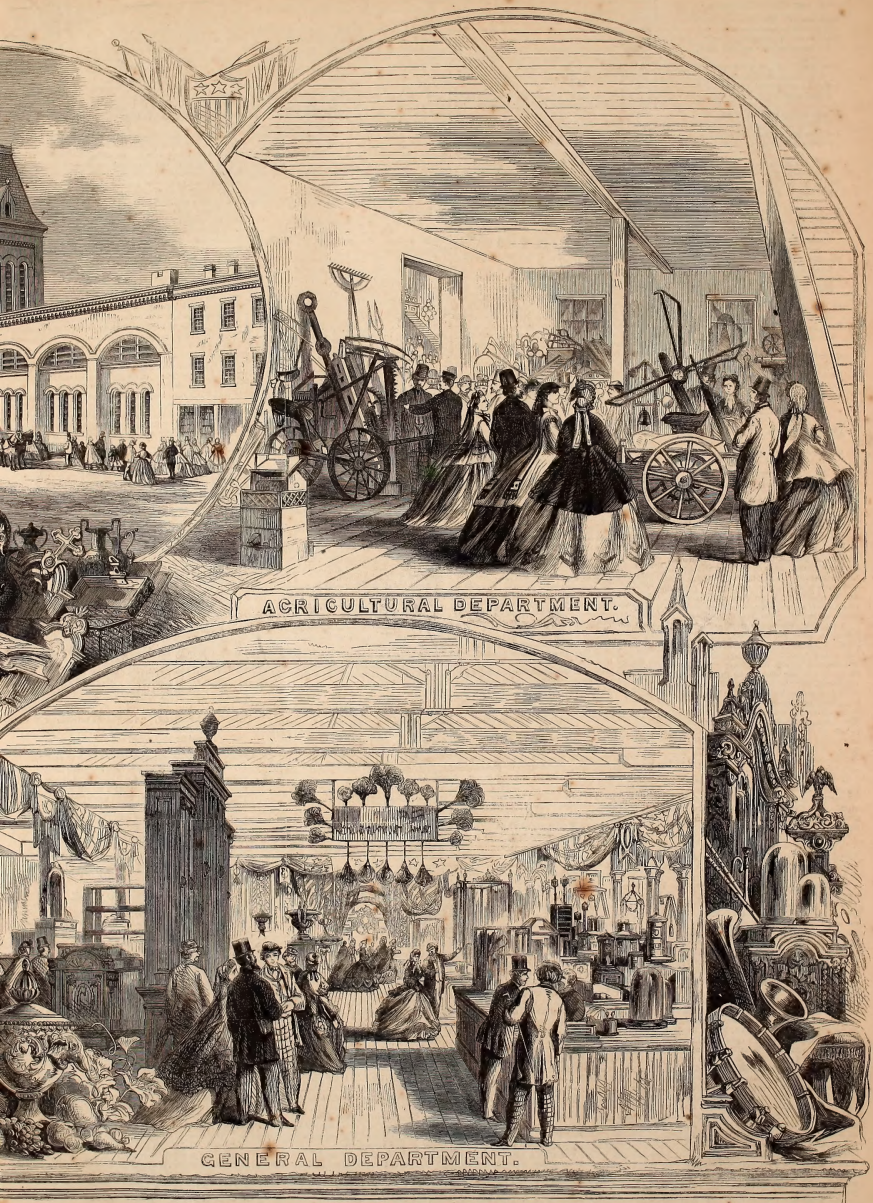
The New York boat was the favorite, and odds of $100 to $60 were freely offered on her. At the start the hills and every available point about was covered with spectators, and the waters studded with innumerable small craft. In consequence of some dispute as to which side of the river they were to row on, the boats did not start until about five P.M.; but at the words "Are you ready?" the men bent to their oars, and when "Go!" was given, the two beautiful boats shot forward to the music of ten thousand cheers.

The pull was five miles, and at the start the New York led, but was soon lapped by the Newburgh, which at the turn was eight lengths ahead, which distance was widened until the arrival at the winning post, when 20 lengths was the distance by which she won. The time was 32 minutes 59 seconds. The losers heartily kave in, and testified it by three cheers for the victors.



THE DISPLAY OF COLORS AT BOSTON.

There is nothing that lies nearer to the hearts of our people than the relics of the great rebellion, and especially the colors borne by the different regiments through their mission of blood and bravery.



Massachusetts, recognizing this fact, has set aside a fine hall in the State House, at Boston, for the reception of the battle relics, and under its sheltering roof hang the banners borne by her regiments, or what is left of them, and there they are visited by hundreds daily, who gaze with veneration on the remains of what has dared the battle and the breeze, and been borne unflinchingly through years of terror and slaughter.

Many of them are merely remnants of the original; some perhaps denuded of their fringe, or with great gaps in their silken folds; some with shivered staff or riddled with the foeman's bullets; and some with only a bare remnant clinging to the staff, while the balance lies rotting among the debris of the battlefield.

Each flag is marked with the number of its regiment, making it an easy matter for each veteran to find the banner that waved him on to victory and liberty, a privilege he will esteem the more as the years go on, and he can lead his children and grandchildren to the sacred spot, and tell them the ever true tale of the great war, and of the relics that hang in the old hall to perpetuate its memory, and teach a lesson to all coming time.

THE THIRTY-SIXTH ANNUAL FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF NEW YORK CITY, HELD AT THE ARMORY OF THE 22ND REGIMENT, WEST FOURTEENTH STREET, NEAR SIXTH AVENUE, N. Y.

THE ARMORY OF THE 22ND REGIMENT, WEST FOURTEENTH STREET, NEAR SIXTH AVENUE, N. Y.

CONE HOME

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

"Gone home!" Two little, simple words
Engraven on a marble stone,
Beneath a nest wherein two birds
Are mourning for a nestling flown.

Gone home! Ah, me! the tears will start
While looking on that empty nest
I miss a nestling from my heart—
A little song-bird from my breast.

At used to sing at break of day
The sweetest songs I ever heard;
But since the nestling flew away,
I miss my little singing bird.

It sang one eve upon my breast
A plaintive and a tender lay,
And in the morn an empty nest—
Our little bird had flown away.

We missed the music of its song,
The flutter of its unfledged wings,
And all the hours seemed slow and long—
The lonesome hours that sorrow brings.

We called it in the evening's calm—
No answer echoed through the air;
And when the morning gave its balm
To all the flowers, it was not there.

Oh, little bird, come back to me,
And sing your songs upon my breast!
Come back, and fill with melody
The silence in the household nest.

Come back! Come back! I cry in vain.
Gone home! Sad answer to my call.
Once there, they never come again—
Gone home seems written over all.

Ellington, Wis., Sept. 15th, 1865.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "BRUNER'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.—A FARTING SHAFT.

IT was no wonder the doctor did not get any very accurate idea of Anthony's conduct from the aspect of the scene before him. He saw a set of vagabond-looking people flying in confusion across the court-yard, pursued by a ferocious dog, who, though held in a strong collar and leash by his former master, and thus restrained from doing any serious damage was creating a terrible panic. He saw Anthony enjoying the fun; Sleuth looking—as he very well might—anything but pleased; and he could come to no other conclusion than that Anthony was amusing himself in a somewhat rough fashion among his old associates.

"I beg your pardon, doctor—" began Anthony, looking a little embarrassed; but the doctor muttered something about wanting horses, and marched off hastily towards the stable. Anthony was annoyed by this discourtesy and injustice. He could not help fancying he had managed to get through an embarrassing position with reasonable spirit, and he had thought to have enjoyed a laugh with his new friends over the story of the reception at his old ones. After a moment's reflection he determined not to speak to Clarissa, but to go after the doctor, and try to make him understand what it was he (Anthony) had been doing.

This proved, as we shall see presently, to be an unlucky step.

"I beg your pardon, doctor," began Anthony a second time, "but I wish to explain—"

"Explain! explain! Mr. Maude forgets he did explain. Up late last night—estimable servants trying to keep things quiet, and let you sleep this morning—eh?"

"Here? yes—I mean, doctor—"

"I know what you mean, young man. There! there's the dog again! Don't let him come near me, or he'll turn mad. As you say, people are so fond of vicious dogs hereabout."

"Well, doctor, don't be too hard on me, for I must confess that—"

"That you like these things—pugilism, the fancy, cock-fighting, and all the rest. Very well: you may like them, but I don't, and shan't."

Anthony felt his temper giving way, so turned on his heel, and left the doctor to go to the stables alone. And then where could he go but to the doctor's mother? Something, however, had happened in his absence which he did not know of, nor was likely to be told about by either of the parties concerned.

While he had been enjoying the suddenness of his "friends' going," he had not noticed that the agreeable young lady who had for the present cast her fortunes, fascinated him, had, in her fright of the dog, slipped in at the open door of a little wash-house, and shut it after her, and then amused herself by looking out of the window. She thus caught a sight of Clarissa; and the appearance and beauty of that young lady so much interested her (for they seemed to explain her own failure with Anthony), that the instant she saw the courtyard clear, and Clarissa standing alone, waiting the return of her father, she went straight to her, made a polite curtsey, and said, while throwing an ostentatious kind of glance in the direction Anthony had gone—

"Your friend, miss, is a nice gentleman; he wanted me to live with him, and I slapped his face, and that's why he became so angry all of a sudden. You're a beautiful creature, and I wish you well, or I wouldn't have told you."

"Mr. Maude's doings are nothing to me," said Clarissa, haughtily, and turned away.

The woman also turned to make her escape before Anthony's return; but she could not but look back to luxuriate in the effect of this her parting shaft, and to smile in anticipation of its effect; though the smile disappeared very suddenly, and a shriek rang through the air; for while she was thus gloating over the trouble she fancied she might have made for Anthony, the dog, returning from the pursuit of the vagabonds on one side, caught her by the leg, and was only made to let go after receiving a squeeze of his windpipe that would have killed any more sensitive creature.

"You're not hurt?" asked Clarissa, who stepped quickly to her, as the dog was removed. "I hope—"

But the words of pity were stopped by the evil looks and words that broke from the "pretty creature," as Clarissa could not in her own call her; who, however, after a moment or two of fierce display, checked herself, smiled, and said:

"No, thank you—a thousand times! Thank you for your condescending goodness. I'm only frightened, not hurt. Forgive me, and don't think hardly of me for being here. I was sent to plead for those who are dear to me. I—I—was obliged to confess myself poor and friendless; but I—I—" here she began to weep—"don't think I ought to have been insulted, and then treated like—like—like this!"

The speaker now gave way and sobbed with grief.

Clarissa hardly knew what to think. She shrank instinctively from the woman, but she felt her face color assuming a ruder tone towards Anthony, and then she grew hotter as she reminded herself that Anthony's doings ought not to trouble her. Thus, hesitating between her desire to say something to the woman, and her repugnance to the general theme that alone engaged them, she paused, looking in the woman's soft, tearful face, positive then, till the latter, giving a hasty glance aside towards the gate, through which a man was advancing, turned without a word entirely, and walked rapidly away, this time without being molested, and then she disappeared through the gate.

Had Anthony been but a half minute sooner in his return he would have seen her, and guessed how amiably she might have been using the time. But as it was, he was unconscious of every thing or thought in Clarissa's mind but that in which her father shared, and on which he knew he could give ample explanation, if he could only get either of them let him speak. He had no doubt Clarissa would hear what he had to say, and then, of course, she could speak to her father. Certainly. That was all clear enough. But the subtle words he had been going to say, so as to guide talk into a safe channel while getting to the question in an indirect way, as he saw Clarissa's look of scorn, and the way in which she drew herself up as he approached. All his genial expansive manner seemed frozen in an instant. Anthony returned her glance with interest, and for a minute or two the pair walked about the court in dead, waiting silence, busy with their own thoughts, both showing in their countenances, bearing, and walk, the strange antagonism that possessed them. Then, as Anthony drew while Clarissa's walk was short and rapid—two or three yards only, and then a turn—Anthony moved with a studied deliberation, that kept him across from corner to corner of the place, but in such a way as neither intentionally to meet or intentionally to avoid her; though, of course, he could not be supposed always to look at her in a provoking manner, as if to say:

"What is the dence is the matter with you?"

But though Anthony did not know what his pretty young lady-visitor of the levée had done for him, Clarissa did; and so admirably had that lady's affairs been very much in the same state of disturbance and difficulty, whether he proposed to "explain" them to the doctor or to his beautiful daughter.

Unexpectedly he was relieved by a new incident connected with the man whose appearance at the gate had brought Anthony's return to such a sudden pompess and the fair stranger who had so kindly warned her. But this we must reserve for a new chapter.

CHAPTER XX.—ANTHONY FINDS ONE VISITOR TO HIS LEVEE THAT HE CAN INTRODUCE TO GOOD SOCIETY.

TIRED of packing up his own and Anthony's canvas clothes, they both stopped, and, both seeking for an object to divert attention, gazed out silently on the garden, and on a portion of the private grounds beyond. Clarissa's eye wandered from the broken statue on the lawn to the trampled geranium beds, the disordered gravel, and the fragments of rustic seats on which the statue had been pelted; and then, as her glance returned to Anthony, he fancied he saw something like disgust mingled with its kindness. Then the fresh cheek burned, and he was near speaking some not very repentant or humble words, when he heard footsteps in the room behind him, and as he looked round, a servant met him, and said:

"If you please, sir, this person wishes to see you; he came before, but I suppose you were busy again when he found you were engaged."

Anthony looked past him into the room, and Clarissa drew her skirts round her with a quick, nervous movement, as if to make her escape, when, her eye turning involuntarily towards this last visitor of Anthony's, she dropped her skirts and stood still.

A man, dressed in working clothes, scrupulously clean and neat, stood in the middle of the room, holding a little child in the hand, and looking eagerly but bashfully towards Anthony. A girl stood just behind him with a great basket, and two little boys, and they, too, stared at Anthony as if he had been some renowned wonder they had come from the farends of the world to see.

"Well, my good fellow, what can I do for you?" asked Anthony, scanning the group with some surprise.

To his still greater astonishment his question was met by a loud laugh.

"Ha! ha! that's a good un, that is, sir! The missus said you wouldn't recollect me."

The last words were said with a touch of disappointment.

"That I certainly do not," answered Anthony. "Surely I have never seen you before?"

He looked fit the man, and the man returned his look with a shy but bright and wistful gaze.

It was a long, irregular face—the face of a man who was, or had been, very poor. The cheeks, though the country air had set a faint color on them, had been sucked in too long by the vampire poverty ever to fill out entirely; the sandy beard was scant and straggling, as if there had been no strength to spare for it. There was brightness and hope in the blue eyes—a feverish hope, as uncertain of life as a soldier in the midst of battle, for underneath the eye the death of many of his brethren was inscribed in those deeply scored lines. The hope now was evidently that Anthony should remember him.

"Is it a comin', sir?" he asked, after a pause; "is it a comin' to you at all sir, where you've seen my face before?"

"Not in the least," answered Anthony.

"Beg-by, now, sir," said the man, in a tone of disappointment. "Think again, sir—Harris, by name, sir."

"I am none the wiser," answered Anthony.

The man seemed to grow more and more nervous. He wiped his face, and turned to his children, who stared at him, one and all, with a look of amazed disappointment. His eye rested on the baby child, whose hand he held, and lifting it in his arms, he said:

"It seems odd, sir, as you don't know us. This ere little 'un, as wasn't born at the time, knows you, sir, almost as well she knows her own mother. Who's that gentleman, Beas? Who is he, eh?"

The child looked at Anthony from the depths of her cotton bonnet, then at her father, then pointed to the great basket her sister held, and smiled, and showed two small new teeth.

"You had the fever three years ago, sir; perhaps you'll remember that?" and the man. "And then, sir, going back a little way, perhaps you'll remember how you—you—"

"Yes," said Anthony, "I remember that perfectly."

"You was passin' along the top of a street where the fever was bad, sir, you and some more gents," continued the man, looking away from Anthony as in shame, and wiping the sweat from his brow. "And—and a person in the street went up to you gents, and begged a little help."

Anthony looked at his several face, and by its sad expression vividness the picture of a poor, distracted wretch, who had come rushing up to him and his companions that night, almost distracted with grief, and telling a wild story of distress they none of them believed.

"Begged a little help," went on the man, "and some of you gents—I ought to a spoke. One o' you gents hit him with his cane, and—and the person, not being exactly of his right mind, through fever and distress, sir, hit the gent back, and then the others fell on the person, sir, and knocked him down."

Yes—yes, I remember," said Anthony, glancing at Clarissa nervously, as he recalled the scene which the watchman's lantern revealed that night.

"Say no more about that, my man. I remember all perfectly now."

"I won't say no more about it, sir," answered his visitor, "except that, when the person came to, he found himself in a cell—you was with him, and you kindly let him prove to you as my tale was true, and I showed you where they was—and you promised nothing 'cause I slaved out o' the house because o' the fever, and not being able to make up the rent; and you called a coach, and lifted 'em into it yourself, took 'em to a clean, airy house, and carried 'em upstairs in your own arms, sir, and left that with me as 'as been the making of us all. I've a good business now, sir, and a comfortable home, or perhaps you'll remember, sir; and I should have returned it before, sir, but I lost all trace of you till I heard some parties in our street speak as Mr. Maude was coming down to-day, where you was. And I hope you'll excuse me bringing the children down, sir; their mother thought as the country 'ud do 'em good. Besides, they've all along been promised they should come and see you when I brought the money back, sir, and—and—and a thought, I couldn't a know'd much about it; but, bless you, sir, she roared a good 'un when we talked o' leaving her behind."

"Indeed!" asked Anthony, taking the hand of the tiny maiden in the great sun-bonnet.

"Yes, sir," answered the father. "Elizabeth Jane, sir, she's eight months next Sunday, sir."

The hot little hand, crushing a few field flowers, let go its treasures to clasp Anthony's, as the little face turned from the horizontal to the perpendicular in the efforts of its wearer to look up in Anthony's face.

He had been in Clarissa.

"Miss Pompess," said he, "allow me to introduce to you one irreproachable acquaintance of mine—Miss Elizabeth Jane, eighteen months old next Sunday."

Clarissa lifted the child to her knee, gently pulled back the bonnet from the flushed face, making a pleasantable dash towards them with his handkerchief, but failing in his intention, and returning to his chair with his treasure in his arms.

His embarrassment was increased by one of the shy little boys behind him whispering something in his ear, and he answered:

"No—no! be quiet, can't you?"

"What does he say?" asked Anthony; at whose voice the whole group behind shrank close together, and bent their eyes on the floor.

"Lor! sir," said their father, looking round at them severely, "it's nothing particular, sir; but they make such a fuss about it—a little trifle, sir, to show I hadn't forgot you. But you'll excuse 'em, sir?"

There was a rush to the great basket; the crackling lid was raised, a heap of sandwich-papers, bread-crumbs, and buttercups turned out on the floor, and then a parcel was handed tremulously to the cabinet-maker, who opened it, and then rose and approached Anthony.

"It's mercy a trifle, sir—a thing as I've worked up at spare times; but the missus thought as it 'ud be a pretty idea to return the money in, which I think you'll find correct inside it, sir. I haven't been so sure about ofterin' of it since I heard of your good fortune, which nobody was happier to hear of than we was; and I hope you'll accept it, sir, with my dooty, and all our wishes and all our thanks."

The rough hands were not quite steady as they placed in Anthony's an exquisite little box, elaborately inlaid with different-colored woods. Anthony was conscious, as he took it, that this presentation, which the children crowded round to see, had been a long thought of for years. He felt their eyes upon him—he knew that Clarissa and he been obliged to yield to the tugging of the little one, and bring her close, that she, too, might see the realization of the dear household dream. Even the odor of the bruised flowers on the floor seemed to remind him that in this minute had been all they talked of as they ate their simple meal in the fields. He knew his every look was watched—his every word would be remembered, to be recorded to the mother, whose wasted form he had carried in his arms, and from whose breath he had taken the one serious illness of his life. Like a rush of sunset, which he had heard unmoved in his tiresome early morning chapels at college, swept through his heart—"Cast thy bread upon the waters," etc.

He put the little casket down on the table, and held his hand out to the cabinet-maker.

"Will you tell your wife," he said, in a voice so low and tremulous hardly knew it as his, "that I shall not rest till I have been to see her, to thank her for suggesting this charming little present? And her, too, that I wish her good wishes and yours more than any I have yet had; and I look on this visit as part of the good fortune you speak of. Mind, tell her I am coming to see her very soon."

"She will be a proud woman, sir, that day, sir," answered the delighted man, the cabinet-maker—"a proud woman, sir, bless her!"

A minute or two later, when Clarissa, after seeing the visitors seated outside the servant's table, was left to herself, she returned to the room where Anthony was, she found him looking at the casket still. She smiled as she met his eye.

"I see that you are well provided for," she said.

"Your Elizabeth Jane is making away with your preserves at an astonishing rate."

"Here is an inscription! I think I did not notice before, in carved flowers," said Anthony.

Clarissa looked over his shoulder, and read:

"To Mr. Anthony Maude, a token of grateful remembrance, from his humble servant, John Harris."

"You ought to prize this very much," she said.

"I do," answered Anthony, looking seriously at her, "for it is a gift of his simple, more than anything I have in the world, and, therefore, I am going to ask you to accept it of me."

"I?" said Clarissa, drawing back.

"Yes, as the one good memorial of my past life, which has shown itself in such unflattering colors to-day. You will not refuse me?"

"Very well," answered Clarissa, taking it with some embarrassment. "You put me in mind of when I was a little girl, and was always sent away when I cared for very much, and was afraid of injuring, to my mother. I will take charge of this for you in the same manner."

"Or as the mother used to take charge of treasures poor men were afraid of having in their own keeping," said Anthony. "But I do not ask for this back again, sir, only as a sacrifice to appease your anger at what you have seen to-day."

"Then, in accepting it," said Clarissa, holding out her hand, and smiling, "I promise to forget all your visitors I have seen to-day, except those now sitting at tea with Mrs. Milton."

"That is more than I dare say," answered Anthony, pressing her hand fervently, "and I thank you from my heart."

Clarissa turned away.

Then, leaving Anthony to himself, "I'll now have another fling at the doctor."

But the doctor was in no mood to facilitate Anthony's approaches. Like many angry men, he had got unreasonable. At first he had been offended by Anthony's trying to speak. When Anthony ceased to speak he was more still more offended at finding himself left alone to seek his horses and his groom—a not very easy task during the confusion that prevailed in the household.

He returned at last, followed by his groom leading the two horses, he looked so black and fierce that Anthony was half inclined to leave menacing that Anthony was half inclined to leave him to his humors, and think only of his success with Clarissa. But big drops were falling upon his face and hands; a strange and lurid light pervaded the atmosphere; and there was a close, stifling feel, that suggested a coming thunderstorm.

"Look, doctor," said Anthony, raising his hand.

The doctor did look up at the gloomy sky, and in such a gloomy kind of way, that Anthony was reminded—not exactly, though he pretended to keep a serious countenance about it—of "deep calling to deep," but the doctor merely said:

"Make haste, sir, Clarissa!"

"Surely, doctor, you will stay till the storm is over. The young lady—"

"Good-morning, Mr. Anthony Maude," said the doctor, as he settled himself in the saddle, making a low bow, and then hurrying off, in his anger, so fast, that he forgot Clarissa might not be ready.

Her horse, seeing its companion go, started just as Anthony was holding the delicate foot, and looking up in the hope of getting a smile, and Clarissa had nearly been thrown down.

(To be continued.)

held her so firmly, and kept so close to the horse, while the groom was engaged in quieting the fearless animal, that no harm was done, and just when the doctor came nervously back, more enraged than ever at Anthony for having made him so forgetful, he met Clarissa riding as buoyantly and fearlessly as ever the high-spirited, curveting horse; and then Anthony, seeing his opportunity, with some malice, answered the doctor's previous bow by one quite as low and significant.

Another minute, and Anthony saw them no longer. He paused, however, still standing where they had left him, listening to the harmonious beat of the horses' feet as they fell constantly together, and when he could no longer distinguish the sound, muttered:

"What a fool I am to get wet through in this fashion!" And then he went into the conservatory.

CHAPTER XXI.—ANTHONY FINDS GOOD, AFTER ALL, EVEN IN STORMS.

Pitilessly sweeps down the rain—no longer in drops, however, large and close together, but in an almost unbroken sheet of water. Anthony paces to and fro in trouble, looking out, and fretting himself that he can see nothing in the world to do just now but stand there watching the downfall, and thinking of those who are exposed to it.

As he gazes up, wistfully seeking for a break in the awful gloom of sky, a flash of blinding light seems to fill the whole place, and then comes in quick succession clap after clap of thunder.

"What madness it was to go off in this weather! How near the lightning is! Such a horse, too! I must go after them. Let the doctor play the fool if he likes—let him say what he likes; but he has no right to treat me in this fashion, and risk his own and his daughter's life. Here, Gibbs!"

The groom, a fresh man just engaged, came to this call, and Anthony said to him—

"Is the new mare saddled?"

"Yes, sir; but the weather's awful, and she seems very queer about the lightning."

"Don't chatter. Bring her! Quick!"

"Beg pardon, sir, but it's a werry temptin' of Providence to mount that mare—she ain't four year old, and is thorough-bred."

"Confound you! get out of the way!" So saying, Anthony strode past the man, evidently intending to fetch the mare himself. On his way he was arrested by a new object,—Esau standing before him, dripping with the rain, touching his ears repeatedly, as if to express his respect for the new owner of the grand place, and as if he thought he had a claim to a hearing.

"Oh, you are here, are you?" said Anthony. "I forgot you. Were you to come to-day?"

"Why, you told me to, didn't you?" answered Esau, looking up from under his drenched hair.

"Oh, well, I'm—I'm busy now. I'll see you to-morrow," said Anthony. "I suppose you can come to-morrow, can't you?"

"Can? Of course I can, if I like."

Anthony hurried past him, but some thought making him turn his head to look back at the vagrant, he saw him climbing one of the great elm trees that darkened that side of the house. The hands grasped a bough, while the feet made their way up the trunk, and in this position Esau threw back his head until he could [illegible]thony, and, observing that he watched him, shouted—

"I say! I don't know as I shall come to-morrer. I shall have to get a lodging to-night if it pelts like this, and then I shall have to work all day to pay for it."

"What are you going up there for, you little rascal?" shouted Anthony. "Go into the house, and get yourself dry."

"No, thank yer. I want a wash, and I likes dryin' in the wind. Go in yourself; you're wanted. Don't yer hear?"

Anthony turned impatiently round the corner, determined to send the groom after the little vagabond.

Hark! What fresh sounds are those which Anthony hears as he reaches the stable, and where the mare is plunging about and threatening to injure herself by her violence. Horses' feet! Surely the same that he heard but a few minutes ago. Can Clarissa have spoken to her father and brought him back, ashamed of himself? asks Anthony.

He runs to the courtyard, and there, truly enough, are the doctor and Clarissa re-entering, the latter in advance, looking rosy through her wet face, but also a little uncomfortable—the doctor grim and silent.

"We have returned, Mr. Maude," said Clarissa, shaking her head with a laugh at the trickling streams that were running down her hat and pouring over the brim, "to ask your hospitality for a few minutes more. We didn't get far, the storm was so terrible, and there was no near place of shelter but this."

Anthony wanted to hear no more. His face brightened with pleasure. In a wonderfully brief space of time the visitors were relieved of their horses and their wet garments, and were sitting by a fire which Anthony soon raised, as it happened to be laid ready. All this was accomplished before the rather slow doctor had been able to settle how to explain their "unseemly" change of purpose, as he had called it to his daughter, and which she had wrung from him, partly in her real fear of the storm, partly in her sympathy with Anthony's annoyance—perhaps, also, in the vague desire to hear some sort of explanation about those disreputable visitors, one of whom Clarissa could not forget, in spite of her disbelief in that particular person's veracity.

But Anthony evidently didn't want any explanations. He was only too glad to see them back, though, with admirable tact and delicacy of feeling, he veiled what he felt under a show of respect and courtesy that the doctor could not possibly quarrel with.

But the latent earnestness of Anthony's feelings would reveal themselves, and it was in a characteristic way. Before the doctor had determined on the kind of conversation he should adopt, he found a great big book, a vast folio, richly bound in red morocco, pushed gently before him by Anthony. He looked sternly at Anthony for an explanation, who merely said:

"From my uncle's library. There are many capital books there, much too learned for me. Uncle bought the library all together—a great bargain—saying I should want these books some day. Ah! I fear that day will never come. But you, doctor, will, I am sure, like some of the books, because you can understand them. I wish I did."

"Hem! hem! hem!" The air seemed to clear a little after those resonant "hems!" and the doctor turned back the ponderous cover. "Hem! hem! 'Bayles' Dictionary.' Old favorite of mine. Never yet came across a copy for sale."

How Anthony wished he might say: "Take it, doctor; do, to oblige me; put it in your pocket, or under your arm, and take it home with you;" but he had too much good sense to offend so idly. He ventured only to remark:

"I should take it as a personal favor, doctor, if you would let me send you the whole set for your perusal."

"Not at present, thank you," said the doctor, frigidly, and Anthony was again thrown back. But not for long. Whenever he ventured to steal a look at Clarissa, he felt sure she was watching his operations with interest. He saw at times a certain something in her eye which rather nettled him, as if he were a source of amusement to her during all his efforts to win the unpropitiable doctor; but that thought was pushed out by another. She evidently must have managed the return, and so must want to give Anthony the opportunity the doctor so churlishly refused or made impossible—that of explaining the scene of the morning.

If the doctor would only have gone on reading in "Bayle," Anthony might have rested from his labors, and, perhaps, have assisted Clarissa to spend her time of enforced stay pleasantly, if not profitably; but the doctor, afraid, perhaps, of compromising the moral attitude he had taken up with this "abandoned" young man, shut down the cover with a noise and waft that made quite a commotion, even though heard between the clamors of the storm.

Anthony looked just what he was—puzzled. He had already caused wine and biscuits and a few suitable delicacies to be placed on the table; but they were untouched. The doctor was impressive when he spoke, but his silence was truly awful. Anthony was at his wits' end. If "Bayle" wouldn't do, then no book would do. There was a bagatelle table in the house, but could he even propose such a frivolous thing as a game at bagatelle to the doctor? Absurd! Of course he could not. Dick Sleuth might have helped him by talking to the doctor, but he was busy preparing for his departure, and, somehow, rather shirked being much with the doctor and Clarissa in Anthony's presence. If the doctor had been a sporting character, he (Anthony) might have proposed a bet on the raindrops, as they raced each other down the panes—an amusement at which Anthony had once been silly enough to lose a few pounds. But though the doctor loved "game," and was a strict "preserver," and occasionally went to races, Anthony doubted the prudence of building too much on these facts. Meantime, Clarissa herself preserved an unfriendly silence, and didn't help in the various little conversations which Anthony started. He must, then, again risk what he had rather striven to avoid—refusals, or discourteous replies.

"These are fine peaches, doctor!"

"Are they, sir?"

"May I offer you one?"

"No, I thank you."

That was effort one; now for effort two.

"Does Miss Pompess like sherry, doctor?"

"Ask her, sir."

Anthony did ask, and got only the unsatisfactory reply:

"Sometimes."

"One more trial," thought Anthony, "and then I think I'll be satisfied."

"Dr. Pompess," said he, and the doctor thought the tone demanded his instant attention, while Clarissa wondered and felt uneasy. "Dr. Pompess," he repeated, and with changing color, "this is my house; I offer you anything and everything in it. I will gladly do anything to please you, gladly explain anything you care to hear; but hang me if I wouldn't rather you'd find a codicil in favor of yourself or Dick Sleuth, and turn me out of it, and set that brute after me, than treat me in this fashion. It's not kind—not—not friendly—not just!"

"Ha! What's that? Not just?"

"No, sir. The people you saw here to-day came because they thought there was something to get. I won't deny that they had a right to think so; but when I had feasted them, and heard all they'd got to say, I begged one favor of them in return——"

"And that was——?" asked the doctor.

"That they wouldn't put me to the trouble of asking you to put them in the stocks if they ever dared to show their faces again in the neighborhood—a thing I was sure you would do."

"So I would, boy, every man of them; and that delicate lady too."

"No, doctor—no—not so pretty a creature as that!"

Anthony looked slyly at Clarissa, but he met a look that warned him that this was no jesting matter.

"And who set the dog at them?"

"I did, to make them go faster, and let me get back to you."

"Ha—ha—ha!" at last roared the doctor, as the true character of the whole scene began to dawn upon him. "Capital! capital! Quite a young hero, I declare! A—a Scipio in modern times! Anthony, my boy"—and here the worthy doctor gave the young man a rousing slap on the back—"the best and—hem!—the wisest of men will make mistakes. I have made a mistake. But no matter; you're a fine fellow, and will be an honor to the neighborhood—to the county—I may say to Great Britain. We must have you in the magistracy by-and-bye. There, take my hand—and yours, Clarissa. Sly rogue, isn't he? There, that's settled. I say, Anthony, I like that dog of yours amazingly. How well he did it! That dog snuffs authority. He knew better than to touch me. I shall go and have a look at him."

"Have him, doctor. Do let me give him to you. But, then, you must let me have the loan of him for an artist, to make a couple of pieces of sculpture. Yes, I'll have him modeled, and set up each side of my gateway as supporters."

"Ha! ha! ha!" again laughed the doctor. "It's fine enough now, Clarissa, I think. We won't take our young friend out to-day. He has had quite enough for one day of society, I'm sure, and wants that rest which he pretended he was getting. Look out, Clarissa, and see if you daren't venture."

Clarissa went, and the doctor, getting into a most amiable and confidential mood, said, leaning his hand on Anthony's shoulder:

"Anthony, I am very, very glad we did not part with such a foolish misunderstanding. I see now we shall be friends, and you will like my daughter."

Anthony looked as though he thought he might venture to say he should. But the doctor went on:

"Mind, it's only now as a friend, I am going to tell you something that will interest you. No other idea in the world."

What could he be going to tell Anthony? Ideas ran swiftly through his brain that he was ashamed of the moment after. Was not the doctor a little too demonstrative, if he were really going to suggest conclusions which Anthony preferred to arrive at in his own way? Clarissa was lovely—was everything heart of man could desire, so far as he (Anthony) could judge; but still——

At that moment a gleam of sunshine caused him to look forth, and his eyes fell on so exquisite a picture that he could not but turn to the doctor with new zest, to hear what he fancied he was going to hear about the central figure of that picture.

"I shall introduce to you—hem!—a friend of mine and Clarissa's—a gentleman I am sure you will like very much, of—of good parts, handsome person—very like me some persons say; large estates, contiguous to mine—altogether charming man. Well, he, I may whisper in confidence, is not unlikely to become a member of my family. Hem! Here Clarissa comes. Not a word, Anthony, on that subject, of course."

Anthony bowed with a gallant effort to smile, but with a bitterness of soul that astonished even himself, when he had time to become conscious of it.

Two minutes later, when Sleuth came in, he found Anthony looking out of the window in a strangely silent mood; but before he had time to ask what was the matter, Anthony caught him by the hand, roaring with laughter, and saying, to Sleuth's surprise:

"Oh, Dick! a charming man! a charming man! The doctor's been confiding a secret to me. Let me confide one to you, Dick—tell it not in Gath, proclaim it not in the streets of Ascalon—the doctor's an ass!"

TOWN GOSSIP.

We take for granted, though the thermometer at the present writing is at 80, that fashion has cut the country, the springs, the seaside, and all things that partake of the rural, to prepare for the coming campaign.

Of this grand series of battles there are beginning to show serious indications. The opera, firstly, is in full blast, the milliners and dressmakers have "opened," and the world of fashion is agitated to know what is to be the coming mode, whether round hats are going out and the introduced style, as shown by the milliners, notwithstanding its grandmotherly aspect, is to be the accepted one or not. A fair lady, who is in the secret, informs us that the Empire hat is a sweet thing, the only point being that we have no knowledge of the millinery mysteries of the said Empire. Of round hats, we are confidentially informed that there is the "Greek," the "Figaro," the "Pacha," the "Martial," the "Mexican," and many others too numerous to mention, and which we shall not discuss. We are further assured, from the same "reliable" lady, that of silks "moire" will prevail, and greens be the fashionable color, after which will come Mexican blue, and a new color, entitled "Moon on the Lake." On the subject of boots, the Spanish have the inside track, the merit of which is said to lie in the sole, the peculiar cut of which decreases the pedal size at least 25 per cent., a most absolute recommendation to popularity.

But now comes the all-absorbing topic in the lady world, and that is: "Does the waterfall go out or not?" Fashion, as derived from the other side of the Atlantic, says and decrees its downfall, but our own observations on Broadway and the salons do not corroborate the decree. The drollery still flourishes, and we can veritably assert that the shoulders of our belles still bear masses of something enclosed in a net, that argues that "Faith, fanatic faith, when wedded fast

To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last."

The next fashion in hair, as offered us from Paris, is the other extreme; the hair being all brought round in front, and the pretty faces peer out in a way that we can compare to nothing but the idea of an owl peeping through a bush. Now why will not our belles invent fashions in hair for themselves, or go to the prints of the olden times for their models? Let them look at the tasteful hairdressing of the Egyptians 3,000 years ago; let them go to the rooms of the Historical Society, and study, from the Abbott collection, the tasty head-dressing of the ladies of that time, and—our word for it—Paris will be surpassed, and a clue will be found to very many of the ideas of the modistes of to-day.

We shall end our dissertation upon waterfalls with a little anecdote, for which we vouch.

A young lady, on leaving a store where she had been making various purchases, said to the clerk, as she went out:

"Now, don't forget; there are rats, mice, waterfall, crimpers, nets, and filling, send 'em all."

An old lady who had been a listener, raised her spectacles, and watched her benevolently, until she reached the street, and then turning to the clerk, in a pitying tone, said:

"Poor thing! she's crazy, ain't she?"

From waterfalls to an omnibus is but a step, while we are on Broadway, and we will say something about pickpockets. It is, perhaps, no secret to all the world, that these gentry very much affect these conveyances, especially in winter, when cloaks and extra clothing make their doings less likely to be noticed. We were witness a few days since to the discomfiture of an elderly gentleman by one of these professionals—a female one, by-the-way—who, in style and innocent appearance, would compare with most of our Broadway beauties. The lady got into the stage, and after a rapid glance, seated herself beside our elderly friend, who is a father of a family, of pious proclivities, and demure mien. In a few minutes he could not help being alive to the fact of somebody's digit being insinuated into his pocket—the identical one where lay his well-filled receptacle of greenbacks, and it wanted but a moment's farther consideration to convince him that it was his fair neighbor. Not stopping to think on this discovery, he instantly seized the hand and held it firmly, while the pretty owner, amid a shower of screams and protestations of insult, struggled to free herself. Indignant passengers of course took the young lady's part, and, to the utter amazement of the elderly gent, he found several threatening demonstrations made upon his person, while his declaration of the truth could not be heard in the hubbub. In the midst of it, out rushed the much abused young lady, and disappeared down one of the side streets, and then, and not till then, did the astounded gentleman get a chance to show that he had actually had a passage at arms, or rather hands, with one of the accomplished female pickpockets that infest all our public places and conveyances.

Another case of this kind of work, demonstrating to what an extent these gentry can carry their impudence, occurred, during last week, in one of the Madison Avenue stages. A man got in at Bleecker street, and, soon after seating himself, snatched the portmonnaie from a lady's hand, who sat beside him, declaring, as he did so, that it belonged to him, and that she had stolen it from his pocket. The frightened woman was speechless; but a gentleman, sitting opposite, undertook to defend her, when the scamp stopped the stage, called in the aid of a policeman, and had both lady and gentleman conveyed before Alderman Jones at the Tombs Police Court, on a charge of picking pockets. When there, the agitated lady asserted her respectability, and sent for her husband, a well-known broker in Wall street. Before he had arrived, the alderman very blandly informed both lady and gentleman that the charge against them had been withdrawn, and upon their looking for their accuser, they found him non est, and, of course, all chance of his punishment fled with him. Verily, what with pickpockets, aldermen, and other thieves, New York is a delightful dwelling-place.

We see, by a Georgia paper that reached us a few days since, that Gen. Brannan, commanding in that department, has issued an order, prescribing the prices at which provisions shall be sold. The prices are as follows: Fresh beef, first cut, per lb, 20 cents; fresh beef, second cut, per lb, 15; country dried beef, per lb, 15; country cured beef, per lb, 15; jerked beef, per lb, 10 to 15; veal, per lb, 20; mutton, per lb, 20; fresh pork, per lb, 25; butter, per lb, 40 to 50; fowls, grown, $1 to $1 25; half-grown fowls, 75; spring chickens, per pair, 50; spring chickens, second size, 40. We mention this fact that we may utter a prayer that Gen. Brannan may be sent to this locality for the coming winter, or that Gen. Hooker be respectfully requested to follow in the Brannanian footsteps, adapting it to New York and the pockets of the poorer classes. Without some such arbitrary rule, we fear much for the coming winter in our crowded cities. There is a vast overplus of labor, and employers are enabled to cut down wages, from the eagerness of the unemployed to obtain work. While this is so on the one hand, provision and house-rent is still going up, and all the necessaries of life are at this moment rated higher than at the time when gold was quoted at nearly 300. Farmers and middlemen seem utterly without souls, and occasionally they centre their affections on some one article, until it is brought to that pitch in price which places it entirely out of the reach of the laboring classes. The latest instance of this is butter, which in this city is 70 and 75 cents per pound, with hopes of a still further rise, while in Philadelphia, last week, it was run up to $1 to $1 25, at which it stuck, and the dealers in the article were served likewise with their stocks. What all this is coming to heaven only knows, while the alimentary destinies of our population are in the hands of a parcel of petty corner grocers. Their consciences are much on a par with one we heard of last winter, who called to his son: "Jimmy, is it werry cold out o' doors?" "Yes, father." "Is the gutters froze hard, Jimmy?" says the old man, ramming a chunk of warm breakfast into his benevolent countenance. "Yes, father," responded the boy; "very hard." "Ah!" sighed the old sinner; "then you must put up the coal twopence a pail, Jimmy. God help the poor!"

Before we close we must say a word about the revival of Southern business with New York. We cannot see any of that bitter spirit that we were so freely told would be shown by our "Southern brethren," when they would again mix with us, and as to the manner in which they are treated, we shall make an extract from a letter written home by one of them now in this city, which certainly does not betray that same bitterness on either side. He says:

"I asked for 60 days credit, and got it without a word of objection. B—— told me that he asked four months, was given three, and treated like a gentleman everywhere. He showed me a receipt for $1,500, which debt he contracted before the war, and has just paid, and from the same firm he has just bought a bill of $8,000 at four months. Another friend settled his old bill at one-third cash, and the balance on notes at eight and twelve months, while he got 90 days on three-fourths of his new bill."

This certainly demonstrates that our old enemies have no trouble in walking into our financial affections.

In amusements there is little that is new. All the theatres are doing wonderfully well, and we verily believe that were some genii to pop down into our midst half-a-dozen first-class houses, they would all be nightly filled as the others now are.

Wallack's produced a new play, or rather a re-serving of an old one, Colley Cibber's "Double Gallant," a stupid production that was only saved by the admirable manner in which it was put upon the stage.

The story is of two fathers, one of whom has a son the other a daughter, who are betrothed by the parents without ever having seen each other. These festive individuals meet by the very original catastrophe of the gentleman saving the lady's life by fishing her out from the Thames, into which she has been spilled by her boatmen, and as a consequence falling violently in love with her, a passion that is reciprocated by the lady. At this point begins the confidances in which each express their disgust at the matrimonial engagements made for them with unknown persons, and their determination never to fulfill them. The result is the old, old story, of plot and counterplot, and the final success of the lovers. The play is so named from a character introduced, the double gallant, Mr. Davenport, a gentleman who makes love to every lady he meets, and in so doing, assumes a different name to each. The best scene of the play is, where he is confronted with two of these ladies at once, one of whom knows him as Colonel Standfast, the other as Mr. Freeman.

Though there are many pleasant scenes, and much good acting in "The Double Gallant," we doubt whether it will ever be a very great favorite with New York playgoers.

The Winter Garden this week produced "Our American Cousin," with Mr. Clarke as Asa Trenchard, and Mr. W. S. Andrews, late of the Washington theatres, as Lord Dundreary. It is hardly necessary to say that it was a great success, and has filled the house to overflowing.

Barnum, just now, seems to be reaping the golden harvest of his exertions in getting ready the new Museum so speedily. He has made a Lecture Room that is, without question, the cleanest, most cheerful, and airy spot of its kind in the city, and the people seem to have found it out, for there, both day and night, they flock in crowds.

Barnum's Museum has become so much an institution, that it can not be confined to any locality, or be destroyed in the affections of the people, even though forty fires may be lighted to consume it.

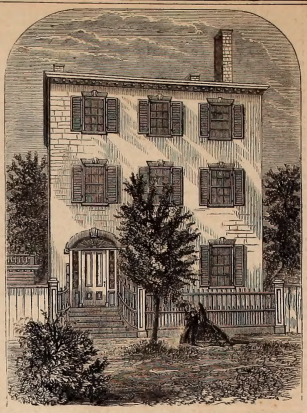
THE FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE.—Among the countless sewing machines before the public, we cannot do less, as an act of justice, than single out this one for our commendation. They have advantages possessed by none other, and we candidly believe that it only requires the inspection of such as are skilled in sewing machines to give this one their unqualified choice. They make four different stitches on the same machine, have a reversible feed motion and self-adjusting shuttle tension, and do not only all the work done by others, but what others cannot do. The office at No. 505 Broadway.

THE LATE MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY S. H. MOSHER, OF NEWBURYPORT.

HANNAH F. GOULD, THE AUTHORESS.

The name of Miss Gould is familiar in the mouth of every reading person through the length and breadth of the land, and her death to them and to the nation's literature, is a loss that cannot be passed over without something a little more than mere mention.

The memory of such poems as "The Midnight Mail," "The Veteran and the Child," "The Scar of Lexington," "The Frost," "A Name in the Sand," and "The Pebble and the Acorn," will make her name cherished through all time by every one who can enjoy the simple unaffectedness of real poetry.



Miss Gould passed the quiet undisturbed life portrayed in her writings, and for more than half a century resided in Newburyport, Mass., the centre of an intellectual circle, who looked to her as a superior in the social as she was in the literary world. Her personal character was of rare excellence, and in the pursuits of her literary tastes she never neglected womanly duties or forgot her home.

She first wrote when American literature was in its infancy, and whatever she has cast forth to the world bears the stamp of her own original genius, and will live through all time by its genial simplicity, its patriotism and religious fervor.

JUDGE HALIBURTON.

Literature has suffered another great loss in the death of Mr. R. C. Haliburton of Nova Scotia, who is so well known to all the Anglo-Saxon world as the author of "Sam Slick," "The Old Judge," "Traits of American Humor," "Nature and Human Nature," and various works of wit and humor, which have become household books throughout all the land. Mr. Haliburton was formerly Chief-Justice of Nova Scotia, and Member of Parliament. In 1858 he received the honorary degree of D. C. L. from the University of Oxford. He was an industrious man, and though not showy as a debater, he was a good worker, and earnest. He died on the 26th of August, at his residence, Garden House, near Loudon, aged 68.

How many musical strains does it take to burst a singer?

THE RESIDENCE OF THE LATE MISS HANNAH F. GOULD, AT NEWBURYPORT, MASS.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MOSHER.

GRAND DISPLAY AT THE STATE HOUSE, BOSTON, MASS., OF THE COLORS OF THE MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENTS RETURNED FROM THE WAR.—SKETCHED BY ROBT. D. WILKIE.

LINDEMANS CYCLOID PIANOFORTES.

THE new Cycloid pianos now on exhibition by Lindeman & Sons in the Fair of the American Institute, are attracting marked attention not only on account of their peculiar and beautiful form, but for their great excellence in all that constitutes a first-class piano. These instruments were first introduced into public notice, through the columns of this journal, since which time they have gained a reputation and popularity, never before achieved in so brief a period of time. They are not only known, but they are represented in almost every State of the Union, causing a demand for them to supply which, taxes to the utmost the manufacturing facilities of Lindeman & Sons, notwithstanding they have enlarged their manufacturing facilities more than double, within the last few months.

The Cycloid shape, as will be seen by our illustration, presents a curved back, terminating also in graceful sweeps in the front of the instrument. The outline is elegant, for there are no square corners, consequently in a parlor, instead of being unsightly and cumbersome, they harmonize with the furniture, however rich and elaborate it may be, while at the same time they occupy much less space.

THE LATE JUDGE HALIBURTON, AUTHOR OF "SAM SLICK."

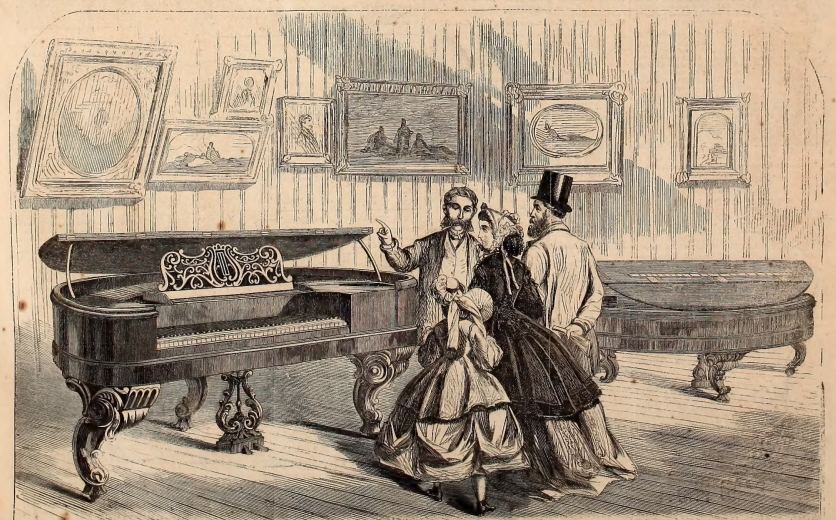
The form of the Cycloid is not, however, adopted simply for its symmetrical appearance; it serves other and more important purposes. In the first place it gives strength to the case, and secondly, by this strength, it affords a large and clear area for sound, by abolishing all the heavy blocks of wood which encumber the interior of ordinary square pianofortes. The strength of the case is derived from the process of manufacture. Some 25 veneers of wood the quarter of an inch thick, are glued together, and placed, warm, in a powerful press of the Cycloid form, and when they are taken out they seem as one piece of wood, but far stronger than any solid piece of wood could be, and so immoveable in the curved form, that no strain that the piano has to bear, could make it yield in the slightest degree. By this means the case is also made more sensitive, and consequently more susceptible to the waves of sound.

The musical critic of the New York Tribune has an elaborate article on the Cycloid pianos in that journal, from which we make the following extract:



"The tone of the Cycloid is as solid as that of a Grand pianoforte; it is not merely loudness, which is always liable to impure and loose vibrations, but it is the largest amount of sonority, with the greatest purity in quality of tone. A powerful player can use it as he would a Grand, and he cannot break the tone; he cannot thin it or confine it by forced diverging vibrations. Gottschalk tested it in every way to the utmost, and acknowledged that it triumphed over the test that he had applied.

STARTLING ACCIDENT AT THE DRAW BRIDGE OF THE RENSSELAER AND SARATOGA RAILROAD, FEDERAL STREET, TROY, N. Y., SATURDAY, SEPT. 23.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY A. CORDEN, OF TROY.

But it is not in force alone that the purity of the Cycloid is pre-eminent; in the medium tone and in the pianissimo it is surpassingly beautiful, and even the soft pedal can be used without destroying the pure and individual quality of the tone. In addition to this, while each tone is round and distinctive, in close and spread harmony, no one tone predominates, but a perfect accord of combined tones swells up to the fingers, and dies out without one dominant vibration. The 'singing' power partakes of the same purity of quality. It can be prolonged in a remarkable degree, and the quality of the vibration does not change or 'lift,' but preserves its roundness until the sound has ceased. The Cycloid possesses one other point of superiority over the common Square piano, namely the power of standing in tune. The whole structure is so compact, so solid, so rigid and unyielding in its strength, that it will vanish up to concert pitch from its first tuning, allowing for the stretching of the strings, and will not fall a stade for months.

THE CYCLOID PIANOS NOW ON EXHIBITION AT THE FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE, 14TH STREET, N. Y., MADE BY LINDEMAN & SONS, 171 AND 173 MERCER, NEAR BLEECKER STREET, N. Y.

These qualifications are great in their significance, and elevate the class of instruments hitherto represented by the Square piano, far above its present position as a musical instrument. The scale is larger, purer, and more beautiful every way; and for strength and durability in its initial excellence, we believe it will improve superior, after years of trial, to every other plan of construction. The mechanical details and workmanship are of the best quality, and its touch in all that can be required to give the most exacting professor of music. The system upon which the present Cycloid piano is made, is equally applicable to the Grand and Upright form, and we look forward to the result of the experiments in the first which will be undertaken, to be immediately proceeded with, as a mark of real interest to refined and cultivated musicians all over the world, for there is hardly one respectable homestead in which the piano is not considered nearly as a necessity as a luxury.

We consider the Cycloid piano as a great advance upon the prevailing system of construction, and as approaching as near to perfection in sound as our present knowledge enables us to conceive or to construct."

Frank Leslie's of January 31st, 1865, says:

"The tone is really beautiful, rich and clear; full and ringing; with a power of sustained, yet subdued, full sound, which is only found in Grand pianofortes. It is capable of the most delicate shading, and can be forced up to the loudest crescendo, without losing any of the purity of tone."

In addition to the universally complimentary notices of the press throughout the country, the most eminent concert pianists and professors of music have given unanimous testimonials of the surpassing excellence of the Cycloid pianos. Gottschalk, the renowned pianist, says:

"It is the finest instrument of the Square class that I have ever tried. Both the mechanism and rich and solid as that of a Grand piano. I have tested it as I would a Grand piano in every key and point of view and strength, and it has stood the test in every way. I consider that the invention of the Cycloid action is its last."

In this opinion the following eminent artists fully concur: Charles Fradel, William Mason, Theodore Reid, Gustave Satter, George W. Morgan, J. N. Pattison, A. H. Pease, Henry Sanderson, A. Ingold, J. D. Kerrison, Carl Anschutz, and many other first class artists.

The prices of these pianos, are their own best recommendation. They are unsurpassed in beauty of tone, in thorough workmanship, in endurance, in the increased capacity of being kept in tune, and in every element of a first class pianoforte, and superior in elegance of form over all others. Purchasers may place entire reliance upon the instruments manufactured by Lindeman & Sons.

THE WORD COCKNEY.—In the reign of Edward III. a knight-bl kt was land at Oakney, in Nottinghamshire, free of rent during the reign of the king, on condition of his devoting the king's pallrey, or saddle-horse, on each foot, with the king's nails and materials; but if he lamed it, he was to give the king another, worth four marks. The Knight of Oakney attended at the king's stable to perform his duty, when one of the monarch's fanciers objected to nail him how to do it; but in order to save his place he declined the office, consequently, by his ignorance, he lamed the horse. This was reported until he had to forfeit more than double the value of the land, by which act of folly the word Oakney became proverbial, even at court; and every stupid, untutored citizen was called a Cockney knight, which was afterwards changed to Cockney.

THE Berlin Society for the Study of Modern Languages announces two prizes to be given next year for the best treatises on the following theme: First, the Influence of Shakespeare on the Development of the English Language, and on account of the state of poetic language in England during the literary period on relatively preceding that of Shakespeare, points of its development in the poetry of Shakespeare, a comparison between Shakespeare and his contemporaries as regards purity, and choice of the substance of his writings on the poetic language of the country. Second, History of the influence of Shakespeare's literature by the German and Roman Nations. The prize for the first theme is 100 thalers in gold, and for the second 200. The decision to be announced on the occasion of the anniversary fete of the society, on the 26th of October.

UNLUCKY DAYS.—An old Latin manuscript, of the time of Henry VI., contains an account of certain days alleged to be unlucky. It says: "These are the evil days according to old philosophers among the Greeks. For if on any of those days a child be born, it shall die soon; if any one fall ill, he shall never get well; if any one undertake a long journey, he shall never return; if he take any one to marry, he shall soon be parted from his wife, or else they shall live together in the greatest misery; if any commence a great undertaking, he shall never attain the desired end." The unlucky days are also enumerated as follows: January 1, 7, 8, 9, 11 and 20. February 16, 17 and 18. March 15, 16 and 18. April 7. May 15 and 17. June 6. July 13 and 14. August 20 and 30. September 16 and 17. October 6. November 11 and 17. December 6, 7 and 9.

Just Published,

No. 92 of

FRANK LESLIE'S

Budget of Fun,

FOR NOVEMBER,

Being the Comic and Satirical History of the Month.

The large cartoon represents the modern Columbus Balancing an Egg on the Pet Republic; the Mexican Pig and the Emperor; and John Bull, Brother Jonathan and the Penitens; besides other humorous engravings. There are also sixteen pages of the best and most diverstied reading, full of fun, interest and excitement.

Very Powerful Microscopes.

No single lens instrument can be made to magnify more than 500 diameters, by mail for 65 cents and stamp. Four of different powers for $1.00. Address T. EDWIN KING, Box 2,932, Boston, Mass.

Pile Remedy

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. Its warranted to cure.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

COMIC CARD PHOTOS.

Of the latest and best subjects. Agents wanted in every town. Send stamp for sample and catalogue to H. IRVINGTON & CO., No. 660 Broadway, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF

PRACTICAL UTILITY AND

EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1865; improvement patented June 3, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is NOMELESS in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and makes the Elastic Lock Stitch. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity. Makes no stitches to each revolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Baffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c., requires no Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a Lifetime, being original it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is not a small Model Machine pushed by hand over the work like others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work must pass through it like all Regular Machines.

The Running Stitch Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or sell any imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement of its patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,

Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Spanish Curling Cream, Warranted to Curl the most Straight or Stiff Hair. Mailed for $1. Address GEO. BLACKIE & CO., 712 Broadway, N. Y. tf

---

Economy, Simplicity, and Luxury are secured by the use of THE EUREKA COFFEE POT, which saves all the aroma and flavor of both Tea and Coffee. Try it. GEO. B. MORSE, Agent, 349 Broadway, N. Y. 823-24

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address

SHAW & HIDE,

821-33 Biddeford, Maine.

RIMMEL'S

Aromatic Vinegar,

One of the most necessary adjuncts of the Toilet and the Bath, and a most agreeable Antiseptic. To be unequaled as a disinfectant for the sick chamber and an excellent preservative of unwholesome Atmospheres.

RIMMEL'S PATENT

PELLUCID GLYCERINE SOAP.

The most useful and agreeable Soap for the Toilet or the Nursery ever introduced. Containing 30 per cent of Glycerine, it can be used in cases where no other Soap can be employed, as for producing the least irritation. Manufactured by E. RIMMEL, London and Paris, and to be had of all Druggists. 96 New York Avenue Hotel; CODDINGTON, New York Hotel; HEGEMAN & CO., Broadway; and by Druggists generally.

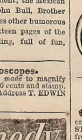
I CANNOT SING THE OLD SONGS.

Words and Music composed by Claribel,

I cannot sing the old songs
I sang long ago,
For heart and voice would fail me,
And tears would flow
For by-gone hours come o'er my heart
With sadness now
I cannot sing the old songs.
Or can we these dreams again.

Price 30 cents. Ma cd free.

FREDERICK BLUME, Publisher,



tf 208 Bowery.

Couch No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle. 824-57

Army of the Cumberland Badges & Pins.

Also for every Division of 4th, 6th, 9th, 14th, 15th, 20th, 21st, 23d, 24th Corps, all in 16-karat gold, enamel lettering.

ARMY BADGE RINGS, enameled, for any regiment, and Division and same gold. Both Pins and Rings sent for $1 and $2. Discount to Sutlers.

E. H. TOMACK,

12 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

AGENTS !!!

$10 Per day made selling the Sketches entitled the "SOUTHERN PRISONS OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS, and SCENES from Life as PRISONERS OF WAR." Sold only by subscription. It is decidedly the best ornamental, historical work that has ever been presented to the public, and will be purchased by everybody. Copies sent free to agents on receipt of $1. Circulars sent free on receipt of stamp. HOPKINS & CO., 74 Bleecker street, New York.

NED BUNTLINE'S OWN SERIES.

None but the best Stories in this Series.

No. 1. The Parricides; or, Doom of the Assassin, 25 cents; 2. Rose Seymour, the Pretty Ballet Girl, 25 cents; 3. Mermet Ben, the Astrologer King, 25 cents; 4. Motta and Rose of New York, 25 cents.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address

HILTON & CO.,

824-5 128 Nassau street, N. Y.

GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION

BY THE

NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION,

713 BROADWAY, N. Y.

12 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from $250 to $300
15 Melodeons, Rosewood Cases..... 125 to 225
100 Music Boxes..... 15 to 45
100 Silver Revolving Patent Castors..... 15 to 40
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets..... 15 to 30
500 Sets Silver Tea and Table Spoons..... 15 to 30
500 Gold Hunting-case Watches..... 50 to 150
100 Diamond Rings..... 50 to 200
60 Gents' Gold Watches..... 60 to 150
300 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 60 to 85
100 Gents' Watches..... 30 to 50
Diamond Pins, Gold Bracelets, Coral, Florentine Mosaic, Lava and Cameo Ladies' Sets, Gold Pens, with Gold and Silver Extension Holders, Sleeve Buttons, Sets of Studs, Lockets, Vest Chains, Plain and Chased Gold Rings, Gold Thimbles, Lockets, Silver Baskets and Goblets, Pitchers, Cups, &c., &c. Every description, of the best make and latest styles, valued at $500,000!

To be Sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

Distribution is made in the following manner:

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents. Six for $1; Eleven for $2; Thirty for $5; Sixty for $10; and One Hundred for $15.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then if you choose you can pay the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, Sewing Machine, or any other article of jewelry on sale for $1; and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. Address

C. M. DUNN & CO.,

555 Broadway, New York.

☞ Immense Depots have also been opened in Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati, under the management of Messrs. DUNN & CO.

Greatest Convenience of the Age!

ASHLEY'S

PATENT SCREW EGG BEATER.

The only one that can be used in a small vessel, or that will beat from the bottom. No unpleasant smoke. All other beaters must be attached to some places to be used in this country to be of any value. This will do the work thoroughly in less than a minute. Durable, simple and cheap. Warranted to give satisfaction. For sale by all House Furnishing and Hardware stores. Manufactured, patented, for 20 cents, by the inventors free.

E. E. ASHLEY, Sole Manufacturer,

820-23 Office 95 Maiden lane, (Box 5,040 P. O.) N. Y.

Writing Paper, Envelopes,

Blank and Memorandum Books, Cheap, at

822-33 LEACH'S, 86 Nassau street, New York.

Agents WANTED Agents

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 879 Broadway, New York. 821-35

$3.00 ALBUMS. $3.00

A Fine Album, two Gilt Clasps, Relief Sides, finely finished, for holding 50 FULL SIZE Card Photographs. Sent by express to any part of the country, carefully packed.Album in the market. TRADE and Agents supplied. $24.00 per dozen. WILLIAM C. WEMYSS, 879 Broadway, New York. Ladies and Gents, please send your address for Illustrated catalogue.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—We stand aghast at the thousands hastily hurried to a premature grave, victims of having neglected the first symptoms of disease. When the complaint originated in the body, or be introduced accidently through the skin, a delay of a few hours may be fatal by a timely or course to one or both of these medicines.

To Beautify the Complexion,

USE SQUIBS' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.

The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a freshness and transparency to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. No harm is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents. Address

SQUIBS' DEPOT,

824-36 285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Mother's Mark, Chaps, Chilblains, Tetter Flesh etc., besides being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE instantly removes hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body, and positively cannot injure the skin. GOURAUD'S ORIENTAL CREAM, or Magical Beautifier, for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, Tan, Sallow faces. All found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The high and efficacy of the above preparations have been attested for the last forty years, and are known all over the world.

AGENTS WANTED in Philadelphia: Bates, Goodrich & Co.; Boston: Johnson, Dedrick; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$6 ELEGANT $8 WATCH.

Fine Imported Watches for the Retail Trade at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. A BEAUTIFUL Double Case Silver Watch, second size, ORNAMENTED THROUGHOUT, with Chain, Key, and Gold Locket to each, $50 per Case of Six. Sample one, free by mail, for $8.

An ELEGANT Gold Plated Engraved Double Case Watch, with Chain, Key, and Gold Locket to each, $12 per Case of Six. Sample, free by mail, for $3.

Fine Double Hunting-case, Gold Plated Watches, Jeweled, with Improvements, Regulated, per Case of Six, $60. Sample, $15.

Silver Compass Hunting Case Watches, Magic Cases, Jeweled, per Case of Six, $30. Sample, $8.

COIN SILVER Hunting Lepine, Warranted, per Case of Six, $36. Sample, $15.

FINE SILVER English Levers, Full Jeweled, Superior, per Case of Six, $48. Sample, $20.

ENGLISH DOUBLE WARDER, Extra Silver Cases, Large Levers, Range Dial Hands, per Case of Six, $40. Sample, $20.

IMPERIAL WATCH, with Thermometer, Compass, Calendar, Attachment, Fine Movement, Jeweled, Complete, Gold Watch, Chain and Time Indicator, imitation of $500 Gold Watch; price, per Case of Six, $60. Sample, $20.

Gold and Silver Watches of every description. Catalogues mailed free. Agents wanted. Liberal commission. Address orders to

CATLEY BROTHERS, Importers,

102 Nassau St., N. Y. Established 1855.

CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERYBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without tying. Send 25 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 879 Broadway, N. Y. 821-33

DURYEA'S MAIZENA

Was the only "Preparation for Food from Indian Corn"

Can received a medal and honorable mention from the United Commissioners at the Great International Exhibition, London, 1862. Makes Puddings, Blanc Mange, Custards, Blanc Mange, etc., without isinglass, with few or no eggs, it is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, etc. For ice cream delicate and delicious beyond all it. Put up in one pound packages, under the trade-mark "Maizena," with directions for use. A most valuable article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere. Wholesale Depot, 106 Fulton street.

824-3 WM. DURYEA, General Agent.

Prepaid by First Mail to any Post Office for $4 00.

The New Illustrated Dictionary and Encyclopedia contains nearly 1,500 pages, illustrated with more than 300 engravings, with index complete. Agents wanted. ANDRUS, ZOWLER & WILLIS, No. 389 Broadway, New York.

"Of all the publications which have attained such a wide popularity and success, that of ANDRUS, JOHNSON & WILLIS, No. 389 Broadway, New York, is more adapted to general utility than this rich, comprehensive, and well-arranged Encyclopedia.—N. Y. Tribune. 823-24

Tin Type and Ferrotype Albums.—For holding 96 pictures, by mail, $1.50; 64 pictures, $1. Send postpaid. TRADE PRICES $12.00 and $9.00 per doz. W. C. WEMYSS, 879 Broadway, New York.

All who want to know a sure way how to raise Whiskers, cure Freckles, Pimples, win at Cards, and 50 other secrets, send 25 cents to WILLIS, 84 Nassau street, New York, who will inform them by return mail free. 821-34

The West Indian Hair Curler, warranted to curl the most straight hair, on the neck and entire application, into short ringlets or waving massive curls. Sent to any address on receipt of 50 cents. Address THE HENDERTON HAIR CURLING CO.,

Box 2,531, New York Post Office.

Why squander Money on useless arti-cles when Dr. STOCKTON'S WELLS' preparation for that purpose for which until cured the hair of many of female immediately, and will last six months. Prepared at my Chemical Laboratory, New Haven, Conn., and at my Residence, E. STOCKTON WELLS, Jersey City, N. J.

Curls! Curls!!

SAMPLE SENT FREE. A sample of Prof. Robb's Curling Fluid will be sent free to any address. It will Curl the Straightest Hair on the first application (without injury to soft, luxuriant, beautiful, flowing Curls. Address, with stamp, PROF. ROBB, PARKER, PARKER, Ohio. 824-5

Look Here! Boys! Full instructions by which a person can ascertain the day of any marriageable in a few hours. Satisfaction given or money refunded in every case. Price, by mail, $1. Send your money and make a world of fun and a fortune. Address

M. A. HAGGERS,

Calhoun, Illinois.

Only 60 Cents.

The Art of Painting Photographs in Water Colors. Bound in morocco; also a full set of Artists' Brushes. Mailed free for 60 cents. Address

PIKE, HOWARD & HUGHES,

824-7 No. 167 Broadway, New York.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address
tf T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

Something New.

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

LADY AGENTS WANTED

To sell valuable articles wanted in every Family. Catalogues sent Free. Address
CHAS. MANCHES, 658 Broadway, New York.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
524-36 P. O. Drawer 202, Albany, N. Y

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of

PROF. DE BREUX'

FRISER LE CHEVAUX.

One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

"How 'Tis Done; or, The Secret Out." The original and only "BOOK OF WONDERS." containing the Great Secret of a Moustache and Whiskers in 42 days—Gambling and Marked Cards Exposed and Explained; also, Fortune-Telling, Ventriloquism, Fishing Secrets, Imitation Liquors, and 100 other Secret Arts never before published. This is the only "original" BOOK OF WONDERS. All others are imitations of this book. Price only 25 cents—6 for $1. Mailed free.
Address HUNTER & CO.,
521-24 Hinsdale, N. H.

The Great Money-Making Article. Everybody needs it. Agents or Soldiers can make $10 a day. Sample, with particulars, sent free by mail, for 25 cents. Address
000 E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

DON'T BE FOOLISH.

You can make Six Dollars from Fifty Cents. Call and examine an invention urgently needed by everybody. Or a sample sent free by mail for 50c. that retails easily for $6, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

SAVAGE & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS of LANTERNS AND BURNERS,

286 Greenwich St., New York.

Fifty varieties of the latest improved Kerosene Oil Lanterns; also Patentees of the CELEBRATED SAVAGE AND CO. NO-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted immediately. Send for circular.
524-25 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
505 Broadway, New York.

$1. WHISKERS. $1. For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box, 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburg, N. Y.
525-37

GEORGE L. CANNON'S AIR WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS, KITCHEN RANGES, &c.

614 BROADWAY NEW YORK. | BETWEEN BLEECKER & HOUSTON STS.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. White French Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, etc., without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. 1,000 different kinds. Send stamp for a Catalogue
000 VICTOR DELAPO, 80 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIBON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are headquarters for the following, viz.:

Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including

VIEWS OF THE WAR,

Obtained at great expense and forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT UNION CONTEST

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,
Yorktown,	Pontoon Trains.
Gettysburgh,	Hanover Junction.
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,
Fredericksburgh,	City Point.
Fairfax,	Nashville,
Richmond,	Petersburgh,
Deep Bottom,	Belle Plain,
Monitors.	Chattanooga,
Fort Morgan,	Atlanta,
Charleston,	Mobile,
Florida.	Strawberry Plains,
	&c. &c.

American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, &c., &c. Also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.

Photographic Albums.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States and we manufacture immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any other.—They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER.

The Trade will find our Albums the most Saleable they can buy.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects (to which additions are continually being made) of Eminent Americans, &c., viz: about

100 Maj-Gens.	100 Lieut-Cols	650 Statesmen,
100 Brig "	250 other Officers,	130 Divines,
275 Colonels,	75 Navy Officers,	125 Authors,
40 Artists.	125 Stage,	50 Prominent Women.

3,000 Copies of Works of Art,

Including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues. &c. Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp. An order for One Dozen Pictures from our Catalogue, will be filled on receipt of $1.80, and sent by mail, FREE.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five per cent. of the amount with their order.

The prices and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

Will force a beautiful set of Whiskers or Moustache on the smoothest face in from five to eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin; or hair on bald heads in eight weeks, and no humbug. I receive recommendations nearly every day from persons who have used it, and found it genuine. Read testimonial:

"Washington, D. C., Fort Dupont, Sept. 8, 1864.

"DR. BRIGGS.—Dear Sir—As I have personally experienced the benefit of your Golden O'dor, I cannot refrain from giving my testimony as to its merits. My face was entirely smooth, and no whiskers to be seen. I commenced using your Golden O'dor, and in six weeks I found a crop of Whiskers and Moustache starting, and they are now growing finely. I sincerely trust that this testimonial may prove of as much benefit to you as the O'dor has to your humble servant and well-wisher.
"Sergt. JOHN TAYLOR."

I will send my Golden O'dor by mail, sealed and postpaid, for $1 25; or five O'dors for $5. In order to obtain the genuine article, all orders must be sent to
DR. C. BRIGGS,
521-24 P.O. Drawer 6308, Chicago, Ill.

Albums for the People.

Holding 24 Pictures, and sold at 75 cents. Albums of all descriptions free by mail on receipt of the price.

C. HUGHES,
Album Manufacturer,
102 Centre St., N. Y.

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,

A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years and cannot be detected. Price $1. 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO., PERFUMERS,
000 133 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

New Books, New Books, and Sporting GOODS. New Styles Cartes de Visite. Sample 25 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. F. MANCHES, 658 Broadway, New York.

Magic! Magic!!—A beautiful Morocco MAGIC POCKETBOOK, which I have just imported. This is an ingenious invention, which every man of wit and fashion should possess. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1. Address C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

WONDERS WILL NEVER CEASE!!

During a residence in Spain, I obtained of a Spanish sociere a correctly constructed HOROSCOPE, the only instrument in the world capable of producing a facsimile of an absent person. By its aid I am enabled to produce an accurate PHOTOGRAPH of your future WIFE or HUSBAND, also the date of marriage. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, and enclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail.
MISS FANNIE A. MASON,
524-5 P. O. Drawer 32, Albany, New York.

How to Win a Sweetheart or Lover.

If any young gentleman or lady wishes to know how to begin a love correspondence, or if they wish to speak their mind in a tardy, bashful or careless way to their lover, this book tells exactly how it should be done. It tells you how to write love letters, and how to win your sweetheart every time. It tells you how you can marry whoever you wish, and how you can become rich in a very short time. Handsomely bound in gilt muslin. Sent by mail, postpaid, for $1. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, Publisher, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill.
521-24

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.

Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.

Treating on "Psychologic Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate, win the undying love, and marry any person they wish, irrespective of age or personal appearance. Sent by mail for 50 cents, by E. D. LOCKE & CO., Box 1525, Portland, Maine.
522-25

Wanted! Attention!—(Something new.) I will send by mail, postpaid, a beautiful MILITARY ALBUM, with twenty-four pictures of our Union Generals for 50 cents. Agents wanted immeciately. Price per dozen, to agents, $3 per dozen; or $1 75 per half dozen. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y. tf

---

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS of great value to families; all pay great profits. Send 15 cents and get 80 pages; or 25 cents and get 80 pages and a sample gratis.
517-29 EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a lifelike picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with the date of marriage. This is no humbug, as testimonials without number can assert. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, and enclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address Miss JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 38, West Troy, N. Y. 524-25

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of September 5, 1865,

No. 13300	drew	$100,000
No. 16939	"	50,000
No. 4009	"	25,000
No. 9746	"	10,000
No. 21621	"	5,000

Being the five capital prizes.

Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Onguents and Curling Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Ventriloquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5057 P. O., New York. 522-25

WHISKERS

AND

MOUSTACHES

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using

DR. SEVIGNE'S

RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.

The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most flattering success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

LOGAN, STURGEON, BROUGH AND WIRZ.

With Portraits and Characters—President Lincoln, with two portraits showing a marked change in his physiognomy in four years. SIGNS OF CHARACTER, by Mrs. Wyllys.—The American Man—Ethnology. OUR SOCIAL RELATIONS.—Work for Women—How to Win Love—Faces at the Window—Our American Girls—Swedenborg—What they Say—Brain and Mind—Equal Rights—Going South—Visitors Coming. BUSINESS.—Hints to Speakers—In Trouble—Madame Hahnemann—My Ideal—The Armadillo, with cuts, and much other interesting matter in the Oct. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL; 20 Cents. Newsmen have it. Address
Messrs. FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway.
524-5

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (52 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price. Address FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
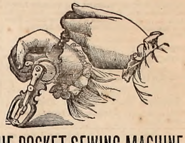
tf

The Great New England Remedy!

Dr. J. W. Poland's

WHITE PINE COMPOUND



Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. Burnhams & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Petre F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE.

THE POCKET SEWING MACHINE,

Specially adapted for Quilting, Embroidering and Braiding.

Easily used—being held in the hand, and traverses the material to be quilted or embroidered; works with great rapidity, and gives entire satisfaction. Follows any design stamped on the cloth. Sent by mail, to any part of the United States. Plain Steel Machine, $5; Heavy Silver Plated Machine, $8. State Rights for sale. Address A. S. GILCHRIST, Secretary Pocket Sewing Machine Company, 17 Wall street, New York. tf

---

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 109 Nassau St., N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed

From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1 25, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 512-24

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 512-24

Asthma Cured.

Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free. 512-24

Stereoscopticons and Magic Lanterns for Public Exhibitions, with Photographic Views of all prominent places, men and events, for sale by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Priced and Illustrated Catalogue sent gratis. 513-25

Just Published.

FUN! FUN!!

The LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JEFFERSON DAVIS, price 25 cents. Sent by mail. Address C. L. BRIGGS, 144 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

---

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address
521-26 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature. Sent Gratis. CHARLES E. MACKEY,
267 Broadway, New York.

Notice.—Those wishing to become rich or successful in anything they wish, should send for one or all of the Gipsies' Seven Mystic or Secret Charms, as they are all-important to success. For further particulars as to their great benefits and uses, send a postage stamp to E. F. MAYO, Ballston Spa, New York, and get full explanation. 523-25

Adventures of Jeff. Davis.

A most comical book; just out; 40 fine engravings; only 15 cents; 10 for $1.; sent free. Address HUNTER & BRO., Hinsdale, N. H. 524-7

Agents Wanted.

Live Agents wanted everywhere. If you want employment and a good chance to make money, send your address and receive my circular, free by mail.
BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK,
524-7 14 Chamber's street, N. Y.

$90 A Month.

Agents wanted for six entirely new articles, just out. Address O. T. GAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine. 521-33

AGENTS WANTED

To canvass for our new, beautifully illustrated, and thrillingly interesting volume of army experience, CAMP FIRE, AND COTTON FIELD, by Thomas W. Knox, Herald correspondent. Full of Startling Incidents, Amusing Anecdotes, Ingenious Stratagems, Life in Camp and Bivouac; together with ample and reliable directions to those who design engaging in Cotton culture at the South. Send for circular.

o HUBBARD & CO., 19 Beekman street, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $20 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gifts and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. County right Free, sales immense, demand increasing, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.

o M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers, 160 Nassau street, New York.

SMOLANDER'S

COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF

BUCKU,

Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, REFORMATING DROPSY, &c. PRICE ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. BARNES & Co., and F. C. WELLS & Co., New York. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 520-39o

ITCH! ITCH! ITCH!

SALT RHEUM!

Cured by Reidy's Crimean Ointment. Price, 25 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-39o

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.

Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Solo Agents. 520-39o

BALLOU'S

PATENTED

FRENCH YOKE SHIRTS

Warranted to FIT, and to be

CHEAPER

for the same QUALITIES and, MAKE than those of any other Shirt House in this city.

Circular containing drawings and prices sent free.

F.Y.S.

For sale by all the principal dealers throughout the United States.

BALLOU BROTHERS, 403 Broadway, N. Y.

o

EDITOR OF FRANK LESLIE'S: DEAR SIR.—With your permission I wish to say to the readers of your paper, that I will send, by return mail, to all who wish it (free), a recipe, with full directions, for making and using a simple VEGETABLE BALM, that will effectually remove, in ten days, Pimples, Blotches, Tan, Freckles, and all Impurities of the Skin, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth and beautiful.

I will also mail free to those having Bald Heads or Bare Faces simple directions and information that will enable them to start a full growth of luxuriant Hair, Whiskers, or a Moustache, in less than 30 days.

All applications answered by return mail, without charge. Respectfully yours,

THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
No. 834 Broadway, N. Y.

o

STAMMERING

cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address H. C. L. BEALS, 377 West 23d St., N. Y.

ccwo

Those cases of scanty, retarded growth, the person over 18, the Eunuch of the Tennessee Swamp-Bite has been found to excite the Beard, Moustache, &c., to a fine and vigorous growth. (See Testimonials.) The Pamphlet and a small sample of this Balsam sent in sealed envelope on receipt of return postage.

JOHN RAWLINS, 815 Broadway, N. Y.

ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE.

It is with pleasure that we are able to announce a much larger circulation for the "HOME MAGAZINE" during the present year than it has ever before attained; and also a more heartily expressed approval, by subscribers and the press, of its tone and character.

During the next year, we shall bring into its pages a still more vigorous literary life—a higher excellence—a broader spirit, and a more earnest advocacy of all things pure and noble. The terms will remain the same, but from eight to sixteen pages of reading will be added, and the quality of the paper improved, so as to place our magazine as all respects among the leading periodicals of the day.

TERMS.—$2 50 a year, 2 copies for $4, 5 copies and one to getter-up of club, $10. Single numbers for sale by News Agents throughout the United States. Two volumes a year, beginning in January and July. Address

T. S. ARTHUR & CO.,

o 323 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

As a means of removing pain from the body, no medicine has ever acquired a reputation equal to DR. DAVIS' PAIN KILLER. The sale of this article has exceeded all belief. We feel it has real merit, and that it sufficient.—Newport & Covington News.

Agents Wanted

For the Standard History of the War, complete in one large royal octavo volume of over 1,000 pages. Splendidly illustrated with 127 fine portraits of Generals, and battle scenes. This is just the book the people want. It presents a rare chance for agents. Teachers, ladies, energetic men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it peculiarly adapted to their condition. Send for Circular. Address

524-5o JONES, BROS. & CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa., and Cincinnati, O.

"ALL'S WELL, THAT ENDS WELL!ES!"—SHAKESPERE.

UNCLE SAM—(Dickerson)—"Now, Grandaddy, my little donkey, Algonquin, is ready to run again yourn."

GRAINNY WELLES—"Well, I'm ready too—just tie your animal's tail to the post, as mine is, and whose tail comes off first wins the race."

Self-adjusting Enamelled "Jones White" Linen Finished, $7 and $8 per dozen. Enamelled, Linen Finished, $6 and $7. Linen, with bevel, $5 and $6. Cloth, with bevel, $3. Cuffs, $6. "Best Cloth Shirt" $5. "New Tie," $1. Ladies' "Short Collars," $1 50 ; Cuffs, $1 50 per pair. Send "Size" and "price." Trade supplied. BILLOU & FOSDICK, INVENTORS, PATENTEES and MANUFACTURERS, 79 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

HORRORS OF REBEL PRISONS.

Art and History Combined.

All Soldiers, Relatives of Soldiers, and Persons wanting a NEW, BEAUTIFUL and Illustrated History of all the Rebel Prisons, and THEIR HORRORS, should send at once for 31 Splendid Sketches, which, by a novel arrangement, are printed upon one sheet, 34 by 36 inches, accompanied by a book, the whole being a complete pictorial historic description of all the Rebel Prisons and Stockades. Price, single copy, from $2 to $3 each. Those wishing to become agents will receive a copy upon sending $1 by mail. Address

HOPKINS & CO., Publishers,
o 74 Bleecker street, N. Y. City.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted and spread information, which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost him nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburg, Kings County New York.

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 30 cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1130 Broadway, New York.

0000

The Brazilian Hair Curler. One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of $1. Address

H. S. CHASE, Cohoes, N. Y.
515-24

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Three of different powers for $1. Address

000o F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

STEINWAY & SONS,

Manufacturers of

Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,

Warerooms, No. 71 & 73 East 14th St.,

Between Union Square and Irving Place,

NEW YORK. 1o

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 50 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $36 to $36 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Handbooks are selling and building. The handy guide which the place is laid out is receiving great attention. Pamphlets with full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office. Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Sidney Rousseau, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all Buyers of Jewelry

AT

B. T. HAYWARD'S,

208, BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Can be found a full and complete assortment of GOLD & PLATED JEWELRY, DIAMONDS, LOCKETS, BRACELETS, &c. Also Headquarters for

Army, Navy, and Masonic Badges and Emblems.

☞ The Trade are respectfully invited to call and examine the Stock. o

"A Scientific Wonder,"

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER.

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to DENOTE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. Correct in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." All attempts to imitate are an imposition. Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Cases, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. DILLENBECK & CO., Sole Proprietors, o 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

Hall's Hair Renewer

Is the most perfect preparation for the hair ever offered to the public. It is a vegetable compound, and contains no injurious ingredients. It will restore gray hair to its original color—will prevent the hair falling out—and will promote its growth. It is a splendid hair dressing—cleansing the scalp, and making the hair soft, lustrous and silken. R. P. HALL & CO., Nashua, N. H., Proprietors. o

AGENTS WANTED.

$10 A Day can be Easy Made $10

By selling Engravings, Card Photographs, and Stationery Packets. Our Stationery packages excell all others. Each packet contains Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencil, &c., and Jewellery worth a dollar at retail, price only 50 cts. We will send Agents 100 Packages and a Silver Watch for $17. We have a fine assortment of STEEL ENGRAVINGS and PORTRAITS, very popular and saleable will send 100 assorted kinds for $15 that will realize $90; will send a sample lot for $5 that will sell for $15. Send stamp for catalogue, terms, etc. Address

o HASKINS & CO., 35 Beekman street, N. Y.

For a Fortune

Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-39o

Shooting, Fishing,

AND

Sporting Tackle

of all kinds.

ALFRED WOODHAM,
434 Broadway,
Bet. Canal and Howard Sts., N. Y.
Repairing done well. 1o

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $10

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Cut Hands, "English Movement," and Correct Timekeeper, with an accurate "Miniature Calender," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat case, with a BEAUTIFUL VEST CHAIN, for only $10.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Miniature Calendar, &c., specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.

English and American LEVERS from $35 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.

Address CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 88 and 44 Ann Street, N. Y.

o Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers.

250 RARE RECEIPTS

Containing many Secrets and much valuable information never before made public, including over 100 Receipts now in exclusive use by the celebrated Metropolitan Hotel in this city. Price 25 cents, mailed, postage free. Address HUTCHINSON & CO., Publishers, 569 Broadway, N. Y. 1o

DUNN'S

Great Gift Sale. Great Gift Sale.

o SEE ADVERTISEMENT ON PAGE 62.

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. oct

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20

$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and putting up the Crystal Door Plate. Specimens sent free. Trade and Instructions cost $30. L. L. TODD & CO., 39 Nassau street, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.
519-31o

Books, Cards, &c., that will please you; a great variety on hand. Send your address on stamped envelope for our catalogue. WARD & CO., Box 2,190, New York Post Office. o

Decalcomanie, a New Process to Embellish Furniture. Wood, Glass, Silk, Velvet, Leather, etc. Can be practiced by every one at P. E. VACQUEREL'S, 811, Broadway. 524-7o

The National Park Bank

of New York.

Capital,...$3,000,000 | Surplus,...$1,200,000

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

New York, August 21, 1865. 519-52

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at full rates by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates. 000o

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers or a Moustache, or both, in one month, or no cost. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y. 513-24

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S

PIANOFORTES.

99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway, NEW YORK. 1o

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money is the JOHNSON PEN, warranted for one year, 14 carats fine; also every variety of Penholders on hand. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. R. E. JOHNSON, Manufacturer and Office, No. 15 Maiden lane. 519-31o

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York. o

Try Ward's India-Rubber Enameled PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS.

ALSO, WARD'S FRENCH PRINTED PAPER COLLAR & CUFFS,

AT ALL GENTS' FURNISHING STORES.

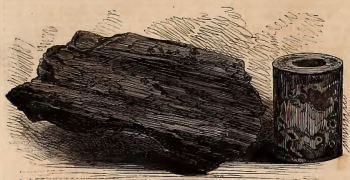
The Trade supplied at

No 387 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

1,000,000 Purchasers Wanted.

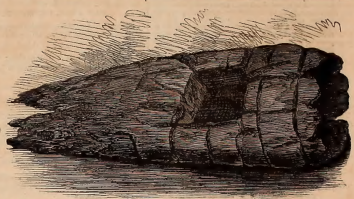
Articles to suit everybody. Catalogue sent free. W. C. WEMYSS, 376 Broadway, New York. 523-4o

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER



Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 525—Vol. XXI. | NEW YORK, OCTOBER 21, 1865. | [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00



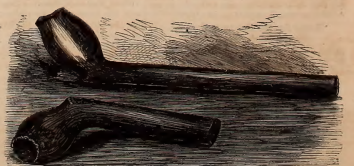
THE ANCIENT WRECK.

Some enterprising Bostonians have succeeded in exhuming the wreck of an ancient ship on Cape Cod, which is supposed to be that of the Sparrow Hawk, lost at that spot in the year 1626, or 239 years ago, and have transported it, with sundry other relics found on board of it, to a spot near the west gate, Boston Common, to give the citizens an opportunity to inspect its proportions.

This ship, if it really be the one, and there is no reason to doubt the fact, was stranded; and history

THE ONLY REMAINING PIECE OF THE RUDDER BAND AND A METALLIC BOX, SUPPOSED TO BE AN INKSTAND.

THE REMAINS OF THE PUMP-BOX.



THE REMAINS OF ONE OF THE PILGRIM SHIPS (SUPPOSED TO BE THE SPARROW HAWK) AND RELICS FOUND IN HER VICINITY, DISCOVERED, DISENTERRED AND REMOVED TO BOSTON, FROM CHATHAM, CAPE COD, MASSACHUSETTS BAY.—FROM SKETCHES BY ROBT. D. WILKIE.

tells us was visited by Gov. Bradford, that stern old Puritan, who relieved the wrecked passengers, and entertained them at his own house, until they could recover from their misfortunes. It was found at a place called Old Ship Harbor, no doubt so called from this lost ship, near Chatham, Cape Cod. The sands of this locality have been constantly shifting, through the action of the winds and tides, and have in time covered the timbers of the old ship for a century or two, and have, in the same manner, delivered them up, almost as good as new, to the present generation, a subject for study and speculation.

ONE OF THE BONES, SUPPOSED TO BE A SKELP'S, FOUND IN THE OLD SHIP.

OLD TOBACCO PIPES, FULL SIZES.

The build of this ship is a puzzle to the naval architects of this day, and has no parallel among our own floating establishments. She was probably built in the reign of James I., and sailed from England for Virginia, at the period above named, which was close to the date of the voyage of the Mayflower.

Among the relics taken from the wreck are some pipes, very small as compared with ours of to-day, a size that may be accounted for by considering the expensiveness of the luxury of tobacco; an inkstand of singularly elegant shape and brass bowls, showing that our forefathers on the passage fed upon the good nutrition of civil England, and valued other things, each having its separate interest and telling its own story.

These relics are viewed every day by many thousands, and there is but one opinion as to their authenticity and deep interest. Antiquarian and scientific men pronounce her to be of the period claimed, and there is but one judgment on the deep historical interest of this ship of our forefathers.

Important Publications for the Year.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANACS.

NEARLY READY.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

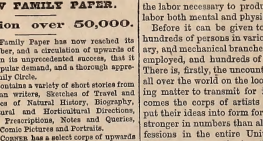
This most valuable work contains as much useful information as an octavo volume, and is Indispensable to every household. In addition to this useful matter it is embellished with upwards of 90 beautiful illustrations by the first Engravers and American Artists, engraved in the highest style of art. It also contains a splendid lithographic portrait of President Andrew Johnson, besides four beautiful pictures printed in colors. The price of this Almanac comprises a great variety of subjects in art, science, natural history, incidents, scenery, adventure, botany, &c.

Price 50 Cents.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

This beautiful and useful companion for the ladies supplies a great variety of useful and interesting matter than has ever been presented to them. It is entitled the Lady's Illustrated Almanac, and published, and contains over 50 exquisite engravings of great variety, beauty, and interest. The reading matter is a complete Lady's Manual, and is adapted to every class. It is also embellished with a most admirable and correct lithographic portrait of Mrs. Gen. Grant, as well as four large engravings printed on plate paper.

Price 50 Cents.



Frank Leslie's Illustrated Comic Almanac for 1866.

This amusing Almanac, the only one of the kind published in America, contains numerous illustrations by Nast, Bellew, McLean, John Leech, Howard, Tunnell, Fiske, Stephens, Grant, Keene, Crosson, &c., besides comic features, jokes and astronomical knowledge made easy, &c.

Price 15 Cents.

A copy of either one of the above Almanacs will be given to every annual subscriber to FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, or FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE.

FRANK LESLIE'S

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Circulation over 50,000.

This valuable Family Paper has now reached its Seventeenth Number, and a circulation of upwards of 50,000, showing its unprecedented success, that it merits a great popular demand, and a thorough appreciation in the Family Circle.

Each Number contains a variety of short stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Fashion and Horticultural Directions, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Fashion Engravings, Humorous and Portraits.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER has a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of unequaled ability and large experience.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER is the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent artists.

Every number contains a striking portrait, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of the CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. This is the most costly g.ft plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every Family should possess this truly national picture, and thereby preserve it, it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York. It is sold everywhere, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Terms for the Chimney Corner:

PRICE 10 CENTS EACH NUMBER.

One copy, three months	$1 00
One copy, six months	2 00
One copy, one year	4 00
Two copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	7 00
Four copies, one year, to one address, in one wrapper	15 00
Five copies, one year	20 00
(With an extra copy gratis to the person sending a club of five.)

One copy of Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner and one copy of Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine (the most complete Lady's Book published) for one year.....

Address FRANK LESLIE,
537 Pearl Street, N.Y.

Barnum's New American Museum,—BROADWAY, between Spring and Prince streets. Afternoon at 3. Evening at 7½. Increased Attraction! Full House! The charming Comedienne and Vocalist, MISS SALLIE ST. CHAMBERS, will appear in a Grand Equestrian Drama, entitled WILD RATE OF THE WILDERNESS, and in which will be introduced THE TRAINED HORSE "TARTAR." Previous to Drama, the splendid Farce of THE JEALOUS FISHERMAN. Mr. B. Harrison, Extemporaneous Singer; the Lilliputian woman, MISS FRANCES JONES, the Scottish Queen, aged 18, 28 inches high, weighing 24lb: Over 100,000 Curiosities in Natural History. Admission, 50 cents; children under 10 cents.

The Red Jacket Stomach Bitters are a very agreeable and healthy stimulant—very pleasant to the taste, have a soothing influence and create a good appetite. We notice that druggists generally sell no Bitters so popular as these.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 21, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE.—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be used, authors must inclose stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the leaf only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

WANTED, a COMPLETE FILE OF THIS PAPER, from May, 1861, to May, 1863, inclusive, Volumes XII. and XIII. Address, stating terms, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

About Ourselves.

We have a theory, that when a person does anything well, they must either be considered egotists or hypocrites. If they speak of it as it deserves, they are accounted egotists, and if they keep silent on the commendable quality, they certainly are hypocrites.

These thoughts come over us as we view a number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWS just fresh from the press, and think how little the purchaser who takes his paper from the newsvender or the post office, appreciates the labor necessary to produce such a sheet—how little will he appreciate it.

Before it can be given to the public, some hundreds of persons in various artistical, literary, and mechanical branches, must be directly employed, and thousands more indirectly. There is, firstly, the uncounted correspondents all over the world on the look out for interesting matter to transmit for illustration. Next comes the corps of artists and engravers, to whom their ideas into fair for the press, a corps stronger in numbers than all of the same professions in the entire United States twenty years ago. In gathering this corps, we can only be guided in securing the services of establishments are by economy, but must select the best of their class without questioning the value at which they set their services. Onthis point we have a most binding proposition to tell them that ofcentimes the cuts of a single paper, before going to press, will be raising $3,500.

Then a portion of the work is done, there comes the editorial preparation for the press, and the intellectual judgment that shall select from the mass of matter that reaches us, such stories, articles, and poems as shall please a host of half million of readers, and uphold the character of the paper for literary ability.

This point over, there is the type-setting and taste that turns off the pages, looking as if handled by fairies, and follows the pressman, and the unceasing care that is necessary in running an immense edition through the printing machines, and turning them out in the right numbers and at the right time, without flaw or mistake. This done, there is only the mission of the mailing department and the newsvender, and the immense edition of over 100,000 copies, or over 200 reams of paper are distributed over the face of the earth to be perused by a half million of critics.

In connection with all the vast establishment necessary to publish a great paper like FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED, there are many little outside departments, which, in themselves alone, are an institution. As an example, we have lately added to this office a photographic gallery, with all necessary apparatus, to enable us at any moment to dispatch an artist to any part of the country to take views of celebrated places, scenes, people, etc. At any time of the day or night, when intelligence may come to us of anything worthy of illustration, we can send out a photographer, artist, or writer, to get the facts on the spot, and transmit them almost before the daily press have secured it, to our columns.

Whatever energy or pecuniary liberality can do, we will do, and though we have been working ten years to achieve our present great success, we feel that we are only on the threshold of illustrated journalistic triumph, and that each day adds to our knowledge, as it does to our vast circulation and influence.

Another President Assasinated.

In the present unhappy condition of the Republican cause in Central America and Mexico, the loss of any one of its leaders and defenders is an irreparable calamity. The supporters of free institutions sustained a severe blow in the recent death, in this city, of Gen. Doblado of Mexico, one of the oil too few incorruptible leaders and statesmen of the American people, who upheld the arms of the unyielding Juarez, in his unequal contest with that unholy European alliance against Republicanism, which has been plunging that land into carnage and the United States, and which tottera to its fall in the land of Montezuma. It is no disparagement to the memory of Doblado to say that a severer loss has since recently been sustained in the assassination of Gen. GERADDO BARRIOS, legitimate President of San Salvador, Central America, by a usurping instrument of this same anti-American and anti-Republican combination. This accomplished scholar, able statesman, incorruptible patriot, enterprising ruler, and faithful defender of liberal institutions, was shot by a miserable tool of the Francoadventurer Barrios, a white-washed negro and friar, who, two years ago, by an unwarranted invasion of San Salvador, and sustained by subsidies from the French Emperor, was forced upon the unwilling people of San Salvador as ruler of their prosperous and industrious, but weak republic. In the darkest hour of our great civil war, when the question of a recognition of the "Southern Confederacy," and the consequent destruction of the Republican system of this continent was supposed to be a question of hours, Gen. Barrios, President of San Salvador, was approached by the emissaries of the proposed new Empire in Mexico, with the insidious proposition to bring the State over which he presided into an arrangement whereby the whole of Central America should be absorbed in a Confederacy under the dominion of some contemptible "Serene Highness," from that hungry horde which European policy seems determined to force on disgusted humanity. But, notwithstanding the seeming eclipse of the cause of Republic, under whose protecting sgis the Republican States of America had obtained existence, Gen. Barrios rejected all the seductions of title and wealth, and in the spirit of Washington, and with words of scorn and contempt, drove the emissaries of Napoleon and the reactionaries of Guatemala beyond the borders of San Salvador. This occurred about forty-eight hours wherein to relieve the State, the soil of which they had polluted, of their presence.

The consequence of this step was an invasion of San Salvador by Guatemala, an invasion instigated by French emissaries, sustained by the priestly party of Guatemala (which controls that so-called republic), acting through the instrumentality of the Indian dictator of the country, named Carrera, a friend of his debaucheries. San Salvador, with less than half the population of Guatemala, and unsustained by foreign subsidies, nevertheless, in a fierce battle, defeated the invader, routed and dismayed. For awhile all was quiet, and President Barrios believed the storm was past, and that no further attempt would be made to bring Central America under Austrian rule.

Meantime, however, the priestly party in San Salvador were not idle. The President, years before, had insisted that the church should be subordinate to the civil authority, and that the decrees enacted by the representatives of the people should be superior to powers arrogated by the priesthood, under authority from Rome. The archbishop had not only opposed this doctrine, but had undertook, through his subordinates, to excite resistance to the constituted authorities. He had, in consequence, been expelled the State. Without, probably, any previous intent of favoring the results which followed, he found in the political movement from Guatemala, an opportunity of revenging what he regarded as a personal degradation, and of regaining his position. Under his influence, a diversion was created in San Salvador, and when the savage Carrera made his next attempt on the State, he was met by a host of enemies, including traitors among the soldiers—but the generals in Barrios' army. The President, after a heroic resistance, was compelled to fly. The members of his cabinet, relying upon the sacredness which, in civilized countries, attaches to merely administrative functionaries, remained, but they were taken and shot in cold blood. It was as if, invading Canada, the forces of the United States should capture the members of its indisputably lawful government, and order them at once to execution. Such things only occur when the victorious party is made up of barbarians and priests! An ex-friar, by the name of Dueñas, was forcibly put at the head of the government of San Salvador, not by the voice of the people, but through the force of foreign bayonets.

Gen. Barrios, as we have intimated, after innumerable vicissitudes, escaped the impossible barrier. Through the aid of the wife of the American Consul at the port of La Union, an adroit, as well as most benevolent woman, he was placed on an American vessel of war, and was thus saved for the time, from the bloody fate of his cabinet and political officers. What next happened we learn from the editorial columns of the New York Herald:

"Gen. Barrios retired to Panama, and thence to New York, where he resided, gaining the esteem and good will of all he met, until in December last he returned to Central America, taking up his residence in Costa Rica, Guatemala backed up Duchiez, his usurping successor, to demand his surrender; but the plucky little State refused to deny his right of asylum, whereupon they declared non-intercourse with her, permitting neither persons, letters or merchandise from Costa Rica to enter their ports. After some months of suffering he rather embarrass the people who maintained their right to exercise hospitality to whom they pleased, by retiring voluntarily to Panama. Here, in June, he was advised of a fresh conspiracy on foot to overthrow the usurping power, which at one time extended over more than half the State, and, under the leadership of Gen. Cavalleri, its oldest and most honored Salvadorian. He was called upon to return, but on arriving off the coast heard that the plan had been matured but put down, and their sympathizers try to stigmatize as a rebellion, and he at once decided to return to his wife and children. The vessel in which he was passenger was struck by lightning, and, in distress, driven into the port of Realejo, Nicaragua. Here the present reactionary Governmental authorities, acting under the influence of their Guatemalan minister, seized on the vessel, although under the American flag, on the pretence that the passengers were irregular, took Barrios prisoner, and on the demand of the Guatemalan minister, shot him on the 2d inst., without going through the hypocritical form of examination which usually should be gone through.

"Of course the wretched Duchiez lost no time in hurrying off the news to Guatemala, and, as usual, no duty does not spare, and shot without delay. He was condemned on the 2d and executed on the 3d, and executed in the morning. Duchiez trusted nothing to chance, but knew that with a fair investigation in the case the danger in which their President was placed would become manifest among the people. How distrustful he was on this point appears from the fact that, on receiving the news of Barrios' capture, he attempted to escape the prisoner from the port of La Libertad to the capital, a distance of many leagues through a desolate and entirely uninhabitable! He probably reads his fate in the universal execration in which he is regarded in Nicaragua, who was instrumental in securing the surrender of Gen. Barrios, was shot on the very night when his first became known.

"Central America owes it to herself, if she wishes to retain the respect of nations, to act as a unit, country by country, to avenge the foul assassination of Barrios, and to demand the severest punishment of the murderers. Nothing less than the unconditional relinquishment of power. She cannot expect to live in harmony with civilized nations if she so flagrantly violates its engagements.

"In all probability the United States has to inquire of Nicaragua the circumstances of her capture of the American vessel in which Gen. Barrios was a passenger, and it will only be proper for our Government to reconsider—what we are astonished should ever have been afforded—its recognition of the usurping Government of Dueñas.

"If necessary, we should require satisfaction for this outrage. The morality of the age and the common sentiment of mankind will at once stamp the late wanton and cold-blooded murder of an able, honored and lawful ruler as a foul crime, and we do not see how we can do all within the power of a temporarily successful rebel government to avenge the wrong, condemn the act and vindicate her character, and the memory of her worthy citizen and benefactor, by punishing and visiting capitaling the ex-friar Dueñas from power."

No one in this country, probably, looks upon the "Fenian movement" in Ireland, in any other sense than as a farce. As a farce, not as regards the "Fenian" but how it represents America. Policemen and detectives, ambitious of preferment, know how to "work up a case," and there are many of these, who, for the sake of creating a sensation alarm, expect to be advanced from mere patrolmen on a low salary, to sergeants on double their present pay, to captaincies, and, indeed, the highest they can make the "movement," the greater their probable reward. We doubt not there are some mercenary "Fenians" (for of a very reasonably very), malignant kind, who "divide" with the "active and indefatigable detective A 1," and take the chances of incarceration on unproved charge. Our excellent, fraternal, sympathizing, and valued friends of England may take courage. If any are so disposed, they can console themselves. We have means of knowing that the "Fenians" have only $80,000,000 in bank, and only 800,000 men in arms, of which it is said that Jack Seward has undertook to take command under "sixty days." A recent English paper states that his mother was a "washwoman," and there is no doubt of the fact, since he has come down from earliest infancy. It says also, that he is the centre of the "Fenian movement." If so, so much the better for the "movement."

But really, either England has got what is called "a big scare," or else its newspapers have received, for their services, a fund for the excitement and sell their editors! We are "Fenians," also Americans, also "greasers," have attended Hermann's exhibitions, and are consequently of a fiarid, not to say dangerous, turn of mind, and we beg to be permitted to allay the fears of perturbed Britain. The 200 iron-clads already constructed (or to sail under the flag of Brian Boromhome, or whoever he is), lack several weeks of completion. So the chances are they may sell cheap. Its commissariat may go back to Portsmouth and be knighted, and much good may it do them. If they were to come over here, we (Feniens) would probably make them "companions of the Bath," in the first duck-pond.

No one appreciates the strength of the "Fenians," especially in the female department of its organization. By a curious arrangement, the warriors are to wear the cincoine, and the female Hibernians are to do the other thing. In this way there will be effected a beautiful "sell on the sly"—we mean the queen. While all the collected Saxons are busy in trying the girls, the boys will walk into the forts, dockyards, and palaces. Whereupon the "lordly Saxons" will marry the young ladies, endow them with their lands (under pain of confiscation) and Brian Boroumme will be proclaimed "Grand Fenian Corbe" under salvos from the Tower of London!

"PYTHIUS" is the euphonious name of the newly-found oil district in Pennsylvania, in which a town has sprung up called Pithole city. Nearly 200 wells have been or are now going down. Thirty of these are yielding from 20 to 1,500 barrels per day. The total yield of 40 of the wells now reaches nearly 10,000 gallons per day. The oil is worth $10 a barrel at the wells, but costs from $3 to $5 more to haul it to railroad. The Government impose an internal revenue tax of 3 a barrel on the crude, and 20 cents per gallon on the refined oil, so that with the least margin of cost for labor or machinery, we have a steady contribution of $200,000 a day, or $70,000,000 a year, from this vicinity alone. The field of the whole of the Pennsylvania oil regions is three times that of the Pithole region, so that without counting the products in West Virginia, Kentucky, or Ohio, we have a sum of over $200,000,000 annually, as a direct gift from nature, or sufficient to discharge the national debt in 15 years.

A GERMAN professor to have counted the hairs on the heads of four women of different complexions, and has just published the results. On the head of a blonde there are about 140 hairs; on that of the brown-haired women, 109,440; on that of the black-haired, 102,963; and on that of the red-haired, 88,740. Although there was this disparity in the number of individual hairs, each crop was about the same weight. The average weight of a woman's hair is stated, on the same authority, to be 14 ounces.

AN Embassy from the Bey of Tunis has arrived in the country, and proceeds to Washington. Gen. Hsehem, the head of the Embassy, is the bearer of a letter of condolence to Mrs. Lincoln, on the death of the late President, and also of a letter of felicitation to President Johnson, on the happy restoration of peace in this country.

A SIGN formerly over the door of an eccentric quack doctor ran thus: "He vendinr narcotium, catharticum, et omne quod exit in sow pustre fvmedium." The translation is: "Here is sold narcotics, emetics, cathartics, and all things which end in sm, except the remedy."

THE proclamations of President Johnson, giving the rebel States provisional civil governments, has its form and conditions. They expressly declare that their object is "to enable the loyal people of said State to organize a State Government, whereby justice, law and established domestic tranquility insured, and loyal citizens protected in all their rights of life, liberty and property." The constitution of the State and the convention does not assume that object, in the judgment of President Johnson, he will have the same right to reject the action of the convention that he originally had to authorize it.

As attempt will, no doubt, be made by some of the Southern statesmen now in power to force congress to get into that body without taking the oath which requires them to swear that they "never voluntarily bore or abetted the rebellion." Some of these candidates were rebel leaders, notorious for their traitorous zeal, and distinguished for their hostility to the Union. We presume that the oath is in violation of the Constitution—appealing to an instrument which they did their utmost to subvert, and which makes the punishment due to their past conduct, death! This instrument provides, among other things, that Congress shall be the judges of the "qualifications" of its members. Distinguished service in the rebel camp or cabinet will not, we fancy, be regarded as a superior qualification for Congressmen in Washington, whatever it may have been in Richmond.

TOWN COSSIP.

THERE is an old saying from somewhere which says that "a prophet is not known man his own city," and somebody else has declared cities only seen upon the face of the earth.

No doubt to a certain extent both these wiseacres are right, but to any but a diseased mind the city, for all it may be the invention of man and a failure to improve on nature, may be made to become especially those that season of the year when the ice king reigns.

In New York in the policy of our city legislators and city fathers (?) not to improve the fair physical proportions of the town, but to endeavor to cure the plague spots on it by decayed poverty and vice from whatever locality it may settle. Old citizens will remember that at different periods certain places in New York have in an accounted the very best houses of vice and wretchedness, and that in after years the entire character has changed, and the land out once been as much desirable or perhaps fashionable. It is within our memory that Murist street of this city was a spot through which any one possessing a decent coat or a suspicion of shillings in their pocket dared not venture; while now it is one of the most desirable localities, inhabited by Quakers, and safe at any hour. Again, there was the notoriously classical Five Points, which within a dozen or two years would announce for murder of the most fearful hue, and being the lurking-place of the most desperate thieves who dwelt within its fastnesses and sallied out to prey upon their fellow-men in the bold robbers of the olden time did from their forest caves.

All this has passed away, but not so much by the raids of the police as by the old New York idea of improving the physical geography of the place. Firstly, the Five Points Mission thrust itself into the noisome spot and actually had the temerity to offer to and succeed in clothing, feeding and educating the wretched children —and there were crowds of them—found there. After this came the authorities, and the streets were opened and graded, the gaunt houses were levelled to a level with other parts of the city—we do not mean the moral grade. Then came light, more gas, and with it fled thieves and murderers. They could not stand cleanliness and light.

All this was done, and the original populace almost weeded out, but it did not lessen the gross amount of depravity in the city. Crime broke of prey only few in a new nest, and now we find these clustering and swarming in Water street, in Cherry street, in Mackerelville, and upon the newly-opened line of the east side the town above 50th street, while the Five Points is gradually losing caste, and will, without doubt, in a few years only appear in the annals of crime, stored with the rich goods of every clime, and placards in the windows that tell the government sale of the same are among over the gorgeous display. "No goods sold at retail."

One idea suggests the other, and, speaking of placards, Orsados and the rest of the "Ladies' Revolvers" by a Broadway window, and saying: "Ladies' Revolvers." We do, before this, have occasion to remark, that since the Miss Harris' affair of Washington city, it is perfectly safe to carry revolvers, and all the murderous instruments of torture and destruction, but when we are informed by the public newspaper creature, who smilingly exhibited her own smith & Wesson, silver-mounted, at the "Ladies' Revolver" placard, we are credulous, and knowing that she sometimes gave way to fainting fits, when the cheese was not properly toasted, laughed. Since this time we have become more wise and have asked the question one of our lady acquaintances. We find, therefore, on reporter-ing among the sellers of revolvers, that lady customers are not numerous, that they affect the small, the silver-mounted, the pearl and very polished, the more expensive, and the something that will look "sweet."

But what all this mean? Is it really a token that the fairer portion of creation have taken the law into their own hands, and instead of settling their little disagreements between themselves and their "particulars," to the police or to the courts, are going to settle matters themselves, revolver in hand? How delightful it will be, if this be the case, to have the ladies settle matters as we have been for some weeks paying delicate attentions, by which satisfied with our conduct, our social reputation and our personal, is more eager than ourselves, who cannot study her out so quickly, how delightful we say, will it be to have the ladies settle matters while sitting upon the balcony in her own father's house, shrinkingly pure and pretty, and revolver in hand, aiming at declaration of intentions, or an immediate fulfillment of them, or, as we say, the "popping of the question."

The exuberance of our happiness we offer one cheate to the ladies, be brought to a full realization, and be formed that nothing less than an instant change in the direction of our wish will be satisfactory to the ladies, or a clergyman's, will save our persons from instant destruction on the spot. Ah, ladies!

This is certainly a pleasant prospect, but forewarned is forearmed.

Among the events of the week, and one that will be regarded with no little interest by the fashion-up Bra. Toodle's proprietors, has been the arrest and holding in heavy bail, one of the most prominent lawyers in the city of our city. These gentry are in the habit of taking a house in some good neighborhood, furnishing it with all kinds of odds and ends, of furniture and trash, the like of which hall and the Seventh Ward can furnish cheaper and the manufactured-to-sell-sort, and depending on the ignorance of the landlord, and the honesty of the rest of the population, they advertise, "A great sale of elegant furniture, carpets and mirrors, the property of a family just leaving for Europe." On the day set a crowd gathers, and when a lot of furniture is knocked down hastily, and the impudence of an auctioneer; they manage to thrust a large part of their miscellaneous stock on their audience at more than double or treble its value, many of the victims often paying cash down for goods, leaving them at the "sale" to be sent home, which is never done, and when application is made in a day or two, the birds have flown, and the nest is an unwelling parlor.

This thing has been going on for a number of years, the public hearing little or it through the press, simply because the victims have chosen to settle quietly themselves by appealing to the police for protection and retribution. The case which has come to light now is one in which the bogus auctioneer endeavored to thrust $2,500 of stuff on his victim, but he managed to get in possession $1,000 of money, before he was refused to refund. It is to be hoped an example will be made.

Talking about justice and law, brings us to a decision of the police which deserves notice. A man who sells walks the street, travels by rail or steamboat, or frequents public places, is a "peddler" according to the Supreme Court, has decided in the case of sundry backmen arrested for soliciting passengers for certain lodging and hotels about the city, that such arrests were against the law, and ordered the prisoners to be released on no way to prevent these men from asking any person if they want a carriage.

This may be law, "crowner's quest law," but we protest against it as being bad law. We protest against that such a decision is rendered as to allow the public to be followed by staring crowds wherever they walk.

How the matter will end? When we consider that it was but a few years ago that we walked into the same district of "Five Points" and were followed by crowds of royal palace about his ears, and now he sends us a deposition of "Lo, the poor Indian!" When we consider the death of the late President, and an offer of treaty and alliance. Verily, the world does move.

There is little doing that is new among the theatres: after a week of the "Colleen Bawn" and "Arrah Neal," Octave has closed, and we shall see her no more for ever. She carries with her the best wishes of many in them will never die. Mr. Chanfrau and the best and most legitimate of the "Mose" line, are in a new piece of the "American Cousin" following, called "Sam," which is said to be a very good piece for him, whatever.

Speaking of the "American Cousin," reminds us that we have not mentioned that the management has made quite a reference to it, which has been dragged into a court of law for settlement. Miss Laura Keene, who is the part of Laura Keene or her agent, Mr. J. S. Lutz, to obtain an injunction to restrain Mr. Wm. Wheatley Jones, to prevent his producing this play. We have too great respect for our opinion of the policy or decency of members of the theatrical profession, to venture any remarks before the public, to be obliged to offer it here again. We shall see what will be the decision, or her agent, Mr. Lutz, are especially fond of the sport, and ready to come out first best. In the present case they have not only been ignominiously defeated, but have also contributed to the benefit of the public, by using in their proceedings to that in which the opposite party is interested. We hope every member of the profession should endeavor to cover with a veil of forgetfulness and kindness.

With "Our American Cousin" on the bills, the Winter Garden has through the week been doing an excellent business.

At Wallack's, the "Serf" and the "Double Gallant."

At the Olympic, "Lolah" has been withdrawn. She did not suit the critics.

Niblo's, with the Ravels, is a jam nightly, and the memory of the olden time hangs faithfully to them.

Barnum has struck a new idea in the elephantine, intonine line. He has imported a baby elephant. Every elephant, that it is expected every day will expedite to pocket it. The darling creature has just arrived at Quarantine, and will be on view in Ann street. Barnum bought it for the trifling sum of $1,600, which, at the present rate of gold, means exactly $11,200. We hope it will pay.

Last, though not least, we speak of Hermann, who leaves us this week. Who ever misses seeing this great artist, misses what we will never have a chance to repair in this century. We know what the great practitioners of the last fifty years, have been—and we are making nothing in the assertion—has never had, and has no equal, and we are sorry to say, in the city about to that our public are appreciative of this fact, and the only wonder is that they do not. While he can, night after night, fill the vast space of the Academy with an approving audience, he will remain there to other localities. We have no desire to be selfish in saying this, but only regret that we cannot say, and can only look forward to concept for it by any other theory than that by the wicked hand of the public somewhere else than in the city, he has more money than he knows what to do with, and he has the satisfaction of having given to gratify his tastes and attach the public to him.

BOOK NOTICES.

TOO OLD A BIRD TO BE CAUGHT WITH CHAFF. By Mrs. Henry Wood. New York: T. A. Hoyt.

What more can we say in announcing the publication of this popular name of the authoress. Mrs. Gore has a talent for writing stories which fascinate the reader, and the publication is not inferior to its fellows. It is put up in Brady's usual handsome style for 50 cents.

LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET. By Miss M. E. BRADDON. New York: American News Company.

A handsome edition of the celebrated novel in boards, well done, with illustrations.

THE REBELLION RECORD. Part XLIX, Illustrated. New York: G. P. Putnam. 192 Broadway.

This number comes to us with two beautiful portraits on steel, one of Major-Gen. C. Augur, the other, Major-Gen. Joseph Hooker, and a thorough digest of all material matter connected with the late war. It is a valuable reference.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—During the month of September 59 criminals were sentenced in the Court of General Sessions in this city. The aggregate of their sentences ranged from one to ten years—the long sentences being for burglary and forgery.

It is reported that Ralph Waldo Emerson lost his entire property by the Concord Bank robbery, except his homestead.

—The printers of Denver City presented Hon. Schuyler Colfax with a complimentary notice, on his recent visit to that city, he being one of the "craft."

—Among the Court files at Taunton, Mass., is the finding of a coroner's inquest, held on the body of a man ago by a lawyer, which concludes "that the said ——— came to his death by the visitation of the aforesaid God."

—Newburyport has a venerable public functionary in Jacob Stickney, 91 years old, who has held town office for 67 consecutive years. He was 21 he has taken the official oath 225 times on an honest count.

—In Philadelphia there is an Anti-butter-adulterantil—He prides himself on being a Philadelphia-Esquire.

—Mount Auburn Cemetery, Cambridgeport-side, on recent visit to that city, he being one of the "craft."

—The Boston Post says that some 20 housekeepers at the South Boston Saturday market accordingly have come to the determination to dispense with the use of butter, and the consumption of one pound a week for each family, until it can be purchased for 30 cents a pound. The plan is generally adopted, it is said, and would insure a reduced price of butter.

—Andrew Jackson Donelson has written a letter, in which he says he is extremely pleased with the paid labor system in Mississippi. He says companies of fifty negroes will plant 1,000 per acre more for the open lands on the Mississippi.

—The Mississippi has a freshman class of 60. About 30 have entered other classes and the Scientific Department. A gymnasium building of stone is to be erected at once.

—An army surgeon in Arkansas tried to bire a young negro. He refused to serve as a cook for him. The astonished lad exclaimed, "Workl why, I can't work; I'm a doctor!"

—In Sacramento recently a woman procured the release of her husband from jail by paying a fine and jail sentence with another fellow. Her object in procuring her husband's release was to get a divorce from him, which she did.

—There are in Washington nine colored day schools whose teachers are supported by tuition fees. There are also two colored Sunday schools for Northern philanthropy, and eight free morning schools, taught by ladies of the Freedmen's Committee. The city of Washington, as a corporation, pays nothing for the education of the colored people.

—The new dent of screw stoops-of-war numbers 17 vessels, and of 2,000 or 3,000 tons. Part of them are already launched, and the rest are in process of construction.

—A late report from Arkansas gives the total colored population of that State at 440,000; the number employed, 40,777, and the number drawing rations, 1,079.

—Mr. L. Pope Walker, the first so-called Secretary of War of the late Confederacy, is in town. He has received a pardon-paper from President Johnson. Mr. Walker has the office of Commissioner of Patents under Jefferson Fort Sumter.

—The nomination of Gen. Humphreys as Governor of Mississippi is now considered as certain as it is authoritative by the action of the Mississippi Convention.

—The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger states that complaint is made that too much cotton is being sent to the North for manufacture. There was no limit fixed upon the amount that was allowed to be sent North, and the quantity going forward is dangerous to the peace of the nation, the interests of the government demand.

—The agreement between Hiram Sibley, representative of the Western Union Telegraph Company, shows that Russia grants the exclusive right to construct the line by Behring's Straits and the mouth of the Amoor River to the Russian boundary, and thence by it over the lines to and from America, and the Minister of the Interior will give the necessary necessary for securing the company's telegraph from being maliciously injured by the local population.

—Mr. Bigelow, the owner of the mansion of George H. Stuart, near Philadelphia, was sold at auction recently for $75,000. The house is to be occupied by the educational town.

—It is reported that Alexander H. Stephens, late Vice-President of the Confederacy, or in favor of equal suffrage—he would allow negroes to vote who are qualified by the educational test.

—Springfield (Ill.) is reviving the old blue laws. A journeyman barber was fined $50 for shaving a gentleman in his private room, at an hotel, on Sunday.

—Government has just passed to the credit of bad debts $170,247 67, due from Isaac V. Fowler, late Democratic Postmaster in this city. It has been ascertained that the defalcation is uncollected from his securities.

—The annual meeting of the freedmen of Tennessee was held at Edgefield, Oct. 4, 6,000 being present. They were addressed by Gen. Fisk and others. Great enthusiasm prevailed.

—The Fitchburg (Mass.) Sentinel says: "At the September term of the Probate Court for the will of Luther Carter, late of Berlin, in Worcester county, was presented, and the application made to its allowance on the ground that it was dictated by a spiritual medium. The objection was admitted by the judge, and the will disallowed."

—Outlaws are committing great depredations in North-west Alabama. Three have known as Clark's men recently visited the premises of John S. Wilson, near Florence, tortured him to death with fire, in an effort to extort money, and also killed the overseer, Wilson's wife and two daughters. One of the latter was also killed by troops that pursued them. This is the same place for whose capture Gen. Hood once offered a reward.

—Forgery.—Peace have been so abundant in England that they have had time to turn out a fine crop of forgers during the year. He won the Great St. Leger at Doncaster, on the 13th September, Mr. Merry, the Clerk of the Course, published upon the excessively fine list of winners of the English turf. His latest story was a forgeous conclusion.

—Further details have been received respecting the war in South America. The Paraguayans were actively engaged in preparations for defense. Their land forces, remained motionless, but concentrated at Concordia, opposite Paso de los Libres. The Brazilian fleet, on the Parana river, had commenced a retrograde movement, and the Paraguayan batteries would contract their fire below, so as to gain command of the river. The magnificent 600-ton steamer Tacuary had been captured from the fast that, at the date of our latest advices, there were 50,000 men under arms, of whom 36,000 were Paraguayans and 37,000 allies.

—J. P. Benjamin, rebel ex-Secretary of State, is about to publish a history of the South, which the newspaper gives to him a puff preliminary, on the ground that he possesses the necessary qualifications.

—Cholera is making alarming progress in France, and the reports from Toulon are flowing from that city on account of the plague.

—The book of M. Ernest Renan, which is to form a sequel to his "Life of Jesus," is composed of two distinct volumes; one, entitled "Les Apôtres," will appear about the 1st of October, and the other, to be called "St. Paul," will be published three months after.

—The present year there is the prospect of three brothers. His oldest brother, Count Gabriel, is 84 years of age. Count Guido Girolamo, the next in size, is their sister, the Countess Benigni, a vigorous old lady 77 years of age. Count Girolamo, the brother, died at 84 years; and the Countess Catharine, his mother, died at 94 years; Count Girolamo's grandfather lived to the patriarchal age of 96. Altogether, the family of Conti is a remarkable one, and the Pope has no lack of nephews and grand-nephews.

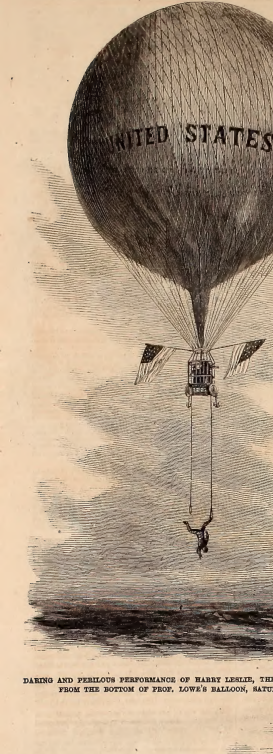
—There are several half-penny papers already in existence in London. At the head of them is the Penny Journal, which commands a circulation of 1,500,000.

—The American song of "Old John Brown" has been adopted for a like purpose in England. A Yankee song, now popular in Ireland, asserts that "John Brown's Body lies a-mouldering in the grave." But the memory of the movement of '98 and the American war in its mind of course.

—When the innkeeper at Neufchâtel catches an Emperor he makes the most of him. His bill for entertaining Napoleon the Third and his suite, on his return was $6,000. He is almost up to the prices of American hotels.

SOUTHERN "BLUE LAWS."—New Englanders have been so long, and so often taunted with the memory of their "Blue Laws," that it is a matter of no moment that justice to note an historical fact developed in the records of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, reversed in Garner, communicates to that journal, extracts from a couple of pages of the court records, dated 1644 and 45, him from the Court House of Warwick county, Va., of which we extract the following specimens, taken from some twenty-six similar decisions by the court, which date of 1644 and 45:

"John Hardy, wife of Henry Hards, being presented for not coming to church, is accordingly fined fifty pounds of tobacco, and the Sheriff is offered to collect the same, and in case of non-payment, to destress."



"John Levis, his wife, for absenting herself from church, is fined fifty pounds of tobacco, to be collected by the Sheriff, and levied upon her husband, the bishop-mit, the said Sheriff to distress."

"Thomas Pierce, for not only refusing to take the oath of allegiance, being ordered her, is committed into the custody of the Sheriff, to remain safely until he shall oath, or until further ordered to the contrary."

"Thomas Pierce, for refusing to take a common swearer, is fined fifty pounds of tobacco, to be levied by the Sheriff, and in case of non-payment, upon his goods."

SOMETHING ABOUT BRILLIANTS.—Mr. Emanuel, in dealing with the history of precious stones, generally agrees with the views laid down on the subject by Pliny that Cleopatra did not dissolve a pearl of immense value, as he denies that it could have been done in vinegar. The ancients had the hydrogen changed with a perfectly true; but that it does so as the health of the present day is a fact. The discovery of the use of coke assigned to all gums; they not only influenced the gods, raise their evil spirits, and were very pretty, but made the wearers stout-bearded. The diamond, when placed in the mouth of a man, is said to render him actually its power; just as a fishy fellow now may silence a lady's tongue by the use of ten times more than the size Sir Brilliant, and a hundred times his faculty of attraction. Mr. Emanuel, however, is not quite correct in many gems, reduced to powder, were supposed to have therapeutic virtues. He has relied on the Arabian Physician, Serapion of Cashmila Leonardus. Let us add that, with the exception of the Koh-i-noor, collected by the ancients and India, according to Mr. Emanuel, is nearly exclusively from Brazil, and that the latter, as well as gems are now so cunningly imitated that the most expert jewellers are unable to be puzzled between the Rhinestone and his counterfeit.

CRAMPS.—These most terrible of pains arise from a sudden and violent contraction of the muscles or fibres against the bare nerves, and thus impede the circulation of the blood. In ordinary cases this contraction produces neuralgia, which is literally "nerve ache," but when the nerves are exposed to cold or wet, is, that the blood is so impure, so thick, so full of disease that it cannot circulate freely. Sometimes cramps in proportion as it is thick it is cold, and this abstract state of the blood is produced by a chill, which suddenly patients it is very marked, and existed days and weeks before the attack. The following is a simple method of treatment. Let the patient be seated in a hot bath, get some hot water quietly and expeditiously (for noise and bustle only add to the alarm and fright), and whilst the nervous equilibrium, put the sufferer in the water as quickly as possible, and keep the temperature of the blood, which sends it coursing along the veins, and the pain is gone. While the water is in preparation, rub the cramped part very briskly with the hand or a woollen flannel, with your mouth shut. But why keep your mouth shut? You can rub harder, faster, and more efficiently; besides, it saves the sufferer from meaningless and annoying inquiries. A man in pain does not want to be talked to—he wants relief, not words. If all could know, as physicians do, the inestimable value of quiet composure, and the confident air on the part of one who attempts to aid a sufferer, it would be practiced with considerate sensibility by the considerate and the humane.

DARING AND PERILOUS PERFORMANCE OF HARRY LESLIE, THE GYMNAST—SUSPENDED FROM THE BOTTOM OF PROF. LOWE'S BALLOON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 30.

BREAKING GROUND ON THE IOWA CENTRAL RAILROAD.

ONE of the great works of the great West has just been inaugurated with imposing ceremonies at Cedar Falls, Iowa, on the 19th September.

The day was ushered in with the booming of cannon and the early awaking and gathering of the people, who poured in by thousands to assist in the ceremony, conveyed in every conceivable article upon wheels, from the stylish carriage to the straw-packed ox-wagon, crowded with its freight of ruddy beauty.

The procession itself numbered 103 teams and 1,500 people, and extended for one mile. There were many banners, all of which were in good taste and appropriate, a specimen of which we note:

"The Lakes and the gulf have met, shook hands and vowed eternal friendship."

"The New Trinity—Minnesota, Iowa and Missouri."

"The Direct Route to all parts of the Old World is the Iowa Cebtral via St. Louis."

"The strongest ties between the North and South are the Iowa Central ties."

"No Transfer, no Shortage and plenty of Care."

"We prefer a Depôt to a Sand-Hill Station."

"We are rather a quiet people, but the Level, Chain, and Dollars will tell."

"The Roads that Pay—New York Central, Michigan Central, Illinois Central, Iowa Central."

Reaching the ground the procession passed under a handsome arch, bearing the inscription:

"This is the day we Welcome our Friends and Break Sod for our Enemies."

The ringing of bells and firing of cannon and beating of drums ceased, and Peter Melendy announced that the great event of breaking ground on the Iowa Central was about to take place. The crowd gathered thick around the little square that was to be graded and tied, and the engineer drew his lines and told the anxious men where to put in their shovels. Gathered thus the crowd waited for the President of the road, Hon. David Morgan, of Oskaloosa, to throw the first shovelful.

As the President threw the first dirt high in the air, three rousing cheers echoed the great event.

Ploughing, scraping, shovelling, hoeing now became lively and general. "Shovel and fall back," was the word; everybody wanted it to say that he threw dirt at the ground-breaking of the Iowa Central.

Peter Melendy and L. H. Barnes laid down the first tie, amid cheering, ringing of bells, firing of cannon, blowing of horns, and all the jubilant noises that could be made. The road was no sooner completed than Conductors Bishop and Gannon arrived from the North and South respectively, and the happy announcement was made that "The northern and southern trains are in on the Iowa Central!" and then such a flying about of rumors! Nothing in New York or Chicago ever approximated it.

The festivities of the day closed by a ball in the evening at Overman's Hall. There were many participants, and a delightful time was enjoyed. The dancing continued into the small hours.

THE GERMAN TRANSATLANTIC STEAMERS.

THERE are two lines of first-class steamers running from German ports to the port of New York, landing at the foot of Third street, Hoboken, N. J.

The first German company who ever owned steamers was the Hamburg-American Packet Company, founded, in 1847, by eminent merchants in Hamburg. This company, which also owns a number of first class packet ships now plying between the Old and New Worlds, ordered, in 1854, two steamers to be built in Scotland, the Hammonia and Bornesia, which made their first trips in 1856. They met with such success, and were so much patronized by the traveling public, that in the following years the company added the steamers Saxonia (1857), Bavaria and Teutonia (1858), Germania (1863), and Allemania, which made her first trip in very boisterous weather in September, 1865, arriving from Hamburg and Southampton at New York in 10 days. Two other steamers for this company are in process of construction in the shipyard of Messrs. Day & Co., in Southampton.

All these steamers contain the best and latest improvements, and are divided into ten watertight compartments, and carry eight large Francis lifeboats each. They vary between 3,700 and 3,900 tons, and their engines have from 425 to 700 horse power each. All the steamers of the Hamburg-American Packet Company are classed A No. 1, and are commanded by the most experienced and gentlemanly captains. The fare in the first and second saloons of the Hamburg line of steamers is exquisite, and like that of first class hotels. Wines are furnished at very low prices.

PROF. T. S. C. LOWE, AERONAUT.

The Agents in New York for this company are Messrs. Kunhardt & Co., 45 Exchange place; the agents for passage alone, are also Messrs. C. B. Richard & Bons, 6 Barclay street.

The second line of German transatlantic steamers (running between Bremen and New York), is owned by the North German Lloyd, in Bremen, of which Messrs. Oelrichs & Co., No. 66 Broad street, are the only agents in New York. The Lloyd commenced running their steamers in 1857; but only in 1863 they succeeded in establishing regular trips every fourteen days, with the new and elegant steamers Bremen, New York, Hanau, and America. All these ships were built by Messrs. Caird & Co., in Greenock, Scotland. They contain the latest improvements, and are, like the Hamburg steamers, commanded by experienced captains, who are anxious for the safety, as well as the comfort of the passengers. The Bremen steamers vary from 2,500 to 2,700 tons, and their engines have about 700 horse power each.

The business of the North German Lloyd has so much increased, as to make it necessary to contract for three new steamers. One of them, the Hermann, will make her first trip in December next, from Bremen.

PROFESSOR LOWE'S AERONAUTIC AMPHITHEATRE, CORNER OF 59TH STREET AND SIXTH AVENUE, N. Y.

BREAKING GROUND FOR THE IOWA CENTRAL RAILROAD, AT CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, SEPT. 19.—FROM A SKETCH BY E. WILD.

THE MASKED BALL.

BY ADA VROOMAN.

A nose of serge, and all were mine—
But, under the gown and crucifix,
A glittering dagger, sharp and fine.

Without the palace the saintly moon,
The breath of flowers, and dewy buds;
Within, the dazzle and heat of noon.

A motley crowd of every race
That laugh and chatter under the sun,
But a painted mask hid every face.

Of no avail to my keen eyes
(I knew a clown for our reigning prince),
For me not one walked in disguise.

Ah! low I laughed as glided by
The man I hated; at his side,
The face for which he was to die.

I heard him sigh, and call her "Sweet,"
I saw him kiss her sacred hand,
Who should have knelt down at her feet.

Nay, not so much, since she was mine;
That night I meant to buy the right
To beauteous flesh and spirit fine.

I sickened with my awful hate,
For she was waning day by day,
With hatred of her coming fate.

(Dream not she knew my soul's intent,
Her heart at least was baby pure,
I dared not breathe the crime I meant.)

The revel deepened. Loud and sweet
The charmèd music echoed down
The hours that went with flying feet.

At last they came—my time and place;
Alone he stood beneath the sky;
The starlight on his evil face.

Perhaps just then he dreamed of her,
So soon, he thought to call him, lord;
Perhaps his gloating fancies were——

Enough! I plucked my dagger from my vest,
Prayed Christ to help me in my need,
Then sprang and plunged it in his breast.

My aim was sure. He did not groan,
But fell across the garden flowers,
No rival now—a helpless stone.

I sighed with joy. Such scanty grace,
For all who—— God! a shadow fell
Athwart the dead man's staring face.

Oh, hush? Who says she stood beside?
Who told she shivered at my touch?
Who whispered I had lost my bride?

THE ANGEL WIFE;

OR,

A NIGHT UPON THE BATTLEFIELD.

It was the 26th of November, 1863. The grand army of the Potomac, under the command of General Meade, had left its quarters around Brandy Station at early dawn on that dull Thanksgiving-day morning, to cross the Rapidan. It was the first time the army had undertaken this movement. True, Kilpatrick's cavalry corps had penetrated within the enemy's lines, crossing at various fords, and dashing up the steep banks into the wilderness beyond—a wilderness of wood and bayonets—but now the movement was general, and speculation ran high as to the probable result of the action which must follow.

The mid-hour of Thanksgiving day had arrived. The troops had reached the river. Culpepper, Germania, Jacob's Mill, and Raccoon fords were the various points of crossing.

At Jacob's Mill ford the artillery of the Third corps came thundering down the declivity from out the dense wood, going "into battery" upon the high bluff upon the north side of the river, ready to send forth the iron shower of death, whose lightnings, in their vividness, and whose thunders, in their terror, vie with those of an angry Jehovah, rending, crushing, opening great gashes, and closing up life on earth.

But the action was delayed; men stood at their guns and waited. At length they stretched themselves upon the parched earth, as veterans awaiting the shock of battle—victory or death—calm as a child reposing beside its mother, safe from the reach of harm. And so the day passed, and not a shot awoke an echo across the river, or through the dense wood around, while upon the right and left, not many miles distant, the shrieking shell, the booming cannon, and the death-wail could be heard, borne upon the soft air, mingled with the river's melody, changing its glad song to one of sadness.

Let us return to New York. Gettysburg had been fought and won. A wounded soldier had returned to this city. His hurt was not great, but sufficient to detain him from the field for several weeks. Two years before, he had left a wife and infant child—young Harry Lee, his first-born and most highly prized. For two years had that soldier prayed amid the din of battle, by the midnight watch-fire, and in his lonely tent, that he might be spared to see his boy and wife again. He had returned. The child, trained by the fond wife, sprang to the arms of its parent, and uttered the words, "Dear father!" and then it wrapped its loving arms around that weeping father's neck.

A soldier can weep.

The father's stay was years of bliss condensed into a few weeks. His boy prattled and romped, and the soldier laughed. The wife clung to the husband's arm, and as her eyes lighted with pleasure at the gambols of her child, the diamond drops filled them up, the bright sun shining through the mists of morning. She was thinking of the time, of the hour when that child's father, her own husband, and her own life must again take his leave, and face terrible death upon the bloody field.

"IN A MOMENT MORE THE LITTLE DRUMMER-BOY HAD REACHED HIS SIDE."

One evening they sat together upon the humble porch. Little Harry was unusually gay, but the wife was sad. Her eyes were moist, but they were also dull. No gleam of joy was visible; the soldier husband had spoken of leaving on the morrow for the front.

"Darling!" said the wife, as she wound her arms around the husband's neck, "do you think there will be another battle soon?"

"I hope so," replied the husband, in a low voice.

"You hope so!" echoed the wife. Then she bent her face upon his breast, and after the suppression of a sob, continued:

"You love me, don't you, Harry."

A tear came to the husband's eye; he held her close to his breast for a moment, and then answered:

"Jennie, I believe I love you better than I do my God or my country——"

"Hush, darling! you speak thus, because I am with you now, and present love absorbs your other feelings."

"True, wife; but you can't realize a husband's love, and a husband's longings the night before the battle. If I could have seen you and my child at Gettysburg on the evening before the battle commenced, I could have fought better, I could have been in every way a braver man. Oh! it is dreadful to feel that you may be killed upon the battlefield after so long an absence, without even the pleasure of pressing your head to mine to your breast, and bidding them a last farewell."

"And you will go?"

"I must return to-morrow."

"Do you think there will be another battle this fall?"

"I think there will. Meade will scarcely lie idle around Warrenton all this beautiful weather. He will most likely attack Lee at Gordonsville, or in some of his strong works across the Rapidan."

"You must be with him?"

"Certainly."

"I shall be near you!"

"Jennie!"

"I shall be near you upon the battle-field, my husband!"

"You are talking madness, my darling wife."

"Why so?"

"Does not our child claim your care, here?"

"Our child will die!"

"Oh! God, grant otherwise," exclaimed the husband, starting to his feet, and gazing towards his babe, as she frolicked upon the the little grass plot. "Say anything but that I should lose that child."

"Sooner myself?" asked the wife.

"Neither, oh, neither!" and the soldier hid his face.

"Then neither," replied the wife. "I suppose mine is a mother's fear. But I sometimes fancy that the hectic flush upon little Harry's cheek speaks of mortal decay. But let us talk no more upon this subject!"

That night there was little sleep. Harry talked of his papa's departure on the morrow, and an hundred times crawled up to steal a kiss, pulled his parent upon the cheek, and calling him "my pa." The wife did not sleep, but she suppressed her sobs. All night long she wrestled close to her husband's heart, as if she would ever hold him there, and when the morning came, and the good-bye was spoken, she said, with emphasis, while yet the eye was dry:

"Husband, our child will bless us here only a little while, and then it will become a bright angel. I feel a heaviness at my heart. Our union will be in heaven. Kiss me, husband. Hold me a moment in your breast before you go. If you fall upon the battle-field, I shall be near you!"

The words of the fond wife sounded strangely to the soldier's ears, and yet they appeared prophetic. "Our child will not bless us here, but a short time, and then it will become a bright angel!" Would the loving mother's fear prove correct? "If you fall, I shall be near you!" How could she reach the battle-field? The Potomac must be crossed, and then the lines of pickets, and without the proper passes, this was next to impossible. No doubt the wife would be with him in spirit, but in person it was utterly impossible. She felt all she spoke, but to carry out her desires was another thing.

And the soldier parted with his wife and child.

It was on that thanksgiving day, a month later, that this same soldier, Harry Woodbury, straightened himself upon the ground upon that bluff at Jacob's Mill ford upon the Rapidan, by the side of his gun, and watched the movement of the few visible Confederates, which lined the wood upon the opposite bank. His brow was sad; but it was not caused by fear. The veteran had been a hero of too many battles to harbor a coward's qualms within his bosom. But what were his thoughts? Let the words will explain.

"John," he said to a comrade, "you know the address of my wife?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"You will forget to write her, if I fall?"

"No. But Harry, you are unusually sad."

"Am I. Well, perhaps the words spoken by Jennie at our parting still affect me."

"What were they?"

"She said our boy would die."

"A mother's fears."

"Yes, but the last time I heard from her, he was ill. And then her silence troubles me."

"You must shake off these feelings, Harry."

"John, you have seen me often upon the field. Did I ever flinch, or fail to do my duty?"

"Never."

"Well, I feel that I shall fall this time."

"What!"

"Listen, John. I have always felt a confidence that my life would be spared during each battle. Now, I believe I shall be killed."

"If you feel thus don't go into the fight."

"I must; but I shall be killed. And the words of my wife ring in my ears now—'If you fall upon the battlefield, I shall be near you.'"

Night was approaching, the artillery could not cross at the ford in consequence of the steep bluff upon the opposite side. Our soldier had waited, and when the order came for an advance he took from his pocket a book, and wrote as follows:

"I feel that I shall be killed in the coming fight. If so, will any of my comrades who may find this pencil word to my wife? If our army is driven back, and my dead body should fall into the hands of the Confederates, will any of them, finding this paper, do the same, as I have often done for them?"

Then followed the address of the soldier's family. After this had been done the soldier placed the document in his pocket, and then resumed his thoughtful attitude.

But the night approached. All night long the march of the artillery continued. It was found to be impossible to drag the heavy guns up the steep bank of Jacob's Bluff; and in consequence, they were compelled to move down the river several miles, to Germania ford, cross, and return to the former position. Hence the line infantry were awaiting the action on the morrow.

All night long the weary, hungry horses tugged at the guns, dragging them over the slough but to mire in another, and up one rugged hill but to find a second one more difficult. All night long the weary cannoniers tugged at the gun-wheels, assisting the poor beasts in their efforts.

The night was bitterly cold, and during the intervals of pause fires were built under each fence corner, and the fierce blooding sun, during the day rails, soon formed two lines of glaring light and warmth, between which passed those warriors and their instruments of death, to be used upon the battlefield, and to certain death to some, and gaping wounds to many on the morrow.

Daylight arrived. Covered with Virginia's "sacred soil," the veterans passed awhile beside a clear stream to bathe, and seek a brief repose. But that repose was brief, for soon the rattle of the musketry, and the occasional deep tones of the advance artillery, told that the work of death was commencing. Hotter and hotter became the fire, and faster and louder the booming of guns.

Then came the wild shout of the enemy, which tells the fact that a charge is being made, and then the volleys with the deep, sullen roar thereto was received. Oh, heaven help those who stand before that terrible, unbroken roar, and those storms of sulphurous fire and showers of leaden hail.

As the dusk of evening approached the crash of battle gradually ceased. Still the shots continued to speak, and the sharpshooters, although not dealing forth so wholesale a death, were more sure in the clear twilight air than in the density of war upon a battalion's volley had been at midday.

The soldier husband had fought that day more like the lion than he—no, just like the man and soldier—the husband and father—that as one who felt that he was doing so for his God, his home, his country. All the day he had escaped, and each hundred-mile bold encounter around him. And just as twilight was merging into the deep dark of evening, after the sun, in its mighty struggle, had painted all earth and sky of bloody clouds and hid his face in horror, the weary, throat-parched warrior leaned against a tree, and as he wiped the dust and black of battle from his brow, he spoke:

"Thank God! Thank God! The battle is over. Here will I lie to-night—but where to-morrow night? And where are they locating? They do not know of this dreadful conflict. Oh, if I could fly to her heart, hear her voice, speak to her one fond word, how much better would I fight to-morrow!"

The soldier bent his face upon his hands, and something like a gathering cloud fell to the ground, but in the dull light it was not a brilliant drop, but full of heart love. Then, raising his head, he continued:

"Locust Grove has been a bloody field, but mine does not mingle with the gore which crimsons all the sod around me, and I stand idle here, while I penciled thrusts are required to require my zeal. Yonder is a little drummer-boy, now nobly he passes from one to the other of those prostrate forms, giving his little help."

The soldier made a step forward, but threw up his hand and clutched his temple. Between the fingers the hot blood spirted, the soldier reeled, his breast heaved with a convulsive sigh, and he fell to earth. In a moment more the little drummer boy had reached his side. He struck a match and held it to the face of the fallen soldier. As the light flamed up, he saw the gash was fearful—the enemy sharpshooter had done his work of death appropriately.

The boy washed the wound. He whispered to the dying man, but no answer came. The night spoke. The gentle moaning breeze, and then the eastern sky was tinted with streaks of deep crimson, as was the field of Locus Grove. But still the soldier lay upon that self-same spot, and the faithful boy sat beside him. But they were alone, save the few scattered dead around, which had been unable to remove.

During the night, the wind moved forward towards Mine Run, while the field of yesterday was alone with its gory brave.

As the morning light broke through the woods, the soldier raised himself upon his elbow and tried to speak. But a rattle in the throat was the only sound. And yet he opened his eyes and gazed upon his drummer companion. There was a sudden twitching of the muscles, a look of agony and a deep groan; and then a smile came across the haggard face. Still the soldier spoke not, although there was an evident effort to do so.

The sun shone upon the face of the drummer-boy. It was the first glimpses the dying man had of it. Oh! how pale it was—pale as the corpses near, and yet it was tinged with blood. And upon the full breast a stream of crimson could be seen. The life had flown freely forth, but the tide had nearly ceased, and the thick bubbles oozed out, as if dragging the remnant of life away. The youth bent over the dying man, and said in a husky but low voice, while the tears rolled freely down these livid cheeks:

"Oh! husband! husband! I told you if you fell upon the battle-field, I should be near you."

The angel wife threw her arms around the soldier's shoulder, form, but in a brief embrace, she raised herself, and as she saw only the look of inquiry upon that face, so near to death, she continued:

"You would know all, my darling husband. You shall, if I have strength to tell. Our little one is in heaven. He died a few days ago. I learned an advance of the army was to be made. I sought for leave to come to you, but it was denied me. Then I resolved to come, and I hired myself thus. Through the aid of the baggage-trains I crossed the Potomac, and pressed forward. I arrived here just as the battle closed, and sought for you. But I was—oh!"

A stifled groan escaped her. The husband started. Memory returned for a moment, and it was clear, but weak.

"Wife—darling—you are injured—you are wounded!"

The words were scarcely uttered before the jaws were locked, and the dying man fell back. But he extended his hand and feebly grasped that of his wife. Then, as a cloud wildly, a gleam of life came over them, there was a quiver, and the soldier was no more.

For a moment the wife gazed upon the lifeless form, and then she exclaimed:

"Yes, my husband. To-day there will be a family united in heaven. We have staunched this blood that I might live while you remained, but now——"

She drew a folded cloth from a gash within her fair breast, and the blood leaped forth. Calmly she sank back—calmly she closed her eyes and slept beside her warrior husband.

That noon the sun shone on the face of those loving, brave ones. That night a kind hand had placed them beneath the sod with that bloody pillow for their mutual bolster and mother were sleeping together—at least their bodies were, while little Harry lay far off in another cold but quiet bed.

But were not the words of the angel-wife fulfilled? Was there not a family united that day in heaven?

THE DROP OF WATER.

A drop of water fell down from a cloud
To the sea beneath, amidst a crowd
Of billows tossing and tumbling about,
And with the roaring of the winds broke out:

"Oh, what a wretched creation am I,
Fallen into the ocean waves from the sky!
Ah! I am nothing, and less than naught,
Here in these measureless meshes caught.

I can't escape, and I shall sweep
Away with you on the terrible deep,
Never by men nor angels trod,
Grandest of all the works of God."

While thus it spoke, by chance there came
An oyster near, and swallowed the same
Ungrateful drop, stirring not a word,
And carried it down to the depths below.

The drop that into the billows fell
Lay hardening long in the oyster shell,
Till, scorning its early life of misery,
It turned at last to a pearl of price.

A diver, diving for treasure, found
This brilliant pearl so pure and round,
And brought it up with its purest ray
To meet the fate beautiful of day.

The drop of water, so whirled and tost,
Was not in the boundless ocean lost;
For now 'tis that fine and famous gem
Which gleams in the Persian diadem.

THE PARRICIDE.

BY JOS. N. POPE.

Some ten years ago I sailed from Boston, in the good ship Albatross, of about 300 tons burthen, commanded by Jeremiah Winthrop, and bound on a voyage to Europe. My crew hands consisted of eight able seamen, beside myself, but this being only my second voyage, I was rated as an ordinary seaman. We were strangers to each other, and being but young in years, and still younger in knowledge of the world and human nature, I naturally felt an anxious desire to learn the character of the men whom I was destined to associate with, almost exclusively, for the space of several months. In this respect, however, to my satisfaction, that my shipmates, with one exception, were a jovial, light-hearted fellows, who could spin a yarn, or sing a chorus to the glass of grog with as much complacency as any old salt that ever sailed on blue water. But there was one man, who shipped under the name of Tom Withers, whose appearance and conduct attracted me exceedingly, and when addressed replied only in monosyllables. He was never seen to smile, and from his pallid cheeks, his restless eyes, and sombre countenance, it was evident that anguish was praying on his heart. But for all this Withers was a thorough seaman. He was athletic and active, and indefatigable in the performance of his duties. If all hands were called, Withers was on deck in an instant, and seemed always desirous to be employed about something, the harder the task the better he seemed pleased. He partook of the ship's fare sparingly, and never drank his grog. The second day after leaving the harbor, he was noticed to furtively steal to the ship's side and throw his allowance of liquor in the briny waters, muttering something between his teeth about "poisonous, murderous fluid."

"A queer chap that," said Bill Adams, "to heave his grog over the side. If he had only passed it in this direction, I would have stowed it in a snug locker, where it would never have troubled him again. I say, steward, 'tis a pity such good stuff should be lost; so in future just hand me that chap's allowance."

Bill Adams wisely concluded that there was something wrong in Withers' upper works, or he would never have refused his grog; and the remainder of the crew were pretty much of Bill's opinion.

In about a fortnight, Withers' demeanor became more reticent than ever, and it was the subject of much speculation among the crew. He was seldom known to turn into his berth, and when he caught a nap on his chest, he would constantly mutter some incoherent sentences to himself, and in a few moments awake with a convulsive shiver. Although he still evinced strength and activity in the performance of his duties, yet his flesh gradually wasted away, and he resembled an animated skeleton more than a being of flesh and blood.

One warm, sultry afternoon we were steering to the southward, with a light air on our quarter. The sea was smooth, with the exception of a long, rolling swell. Every rag of canvas was set to catch the scanty breeze, but the sails flapped heavily against the mast, and the ship moved through the water only at the rate of about a knot and a half. Withers was at the helm. The mate and the remainder of the watch were variously employed at the other end of the ship, the captain was sitting reading on the quarterdeck, under the shade of an awning. Suddenly Withers was heard to exclaim:

"Great God! he has come for me at last!"

The captain, on looking up saw a large bird, having a head like a man, hovering over the quarterdeck. He called to the mate to pass him his fowling-piece, but before this could be done the bird was no longer within shot, having flown about a quarter of a mile ahead of the ship, and quietly alighting on the water.

The captain went forward, hoping to get a shot at the bird from the bow. He ordered the helmsman to steer directly for his intended victim, and when within about thirty yards he fired, the charge of which he shot struck the bird around the bird, and seemed to disable him. Anxious to get him on board, some of the watch jumped into the cutter under the bows, and the oarsmen's heads were stretched forth to grasp him, when, apparently with a convulsive effort, the bird stretched out his wings, and to the unspeakable astonishment of all, flew off.

Tom Withers saw this strange scene, and exclaimed;

"Captain Winthrop, it is of no use to fire at that bird; you only waste your powder and shot, you can never hit it."

"I'll try it once more, at all events," replied the captain.

His fowling-piece was again loaded. Meanwhile the strange bird had flown a few hundred yards in advance of the ship, and again settled quietly down on the water. As the ship drew near, the captain fired; the bird did not rise from the water evidently uninjured, and after swimming about sedately over the quarter-deck, flew away until out of sight.

"I understand it all," said Withers, in a tremulous voice, while the perspiration stood in large drops on his forehead. "Captain Winthrop, you might fire at that bird till doomsday, and you would not hurt a feather of its wing. That bird is my father's spirit, and I know why he has come. Well, I am ready." As he uttered these words, his eyes seemed to be lighted up with an unearthly fire.

"What do you mean, Withers?" said the astonished captain, in a soothing tone. "Your father's spirit! What nonsense is this. Come, don't let us have any more of this foolish talk."

"Call it not foolish, captain. It is truth what I say. That bird, which you shot at twice, and which flew away uninjured, is my poor murdered father's spirit. I know he has come for me at last, and it will not be long before I join him."

"Why, this is worse than folly, Withers, it is madness. What do you mean? What can I understand by such incoherent language."

"Captain Winthrop, I know that I am not always in my right mind, and I will tell you why. I have something which lies heavy at my heart, and which I should like to clear myself of. I wish to make known my guilt, for the weight on my breast that all hands be called. I have a dismal tale to tell, which might do them some good—at any rate it can do them no harm."

There was no need calling all hands, as we were all then standing in the waist of the ship, and at this hint from the mate, we gathered around Withers, who thus commenced his tale:

"My father was a respectable farmer in Vermont, and I his only son. But I was from my youth, possessed of an unpovernable temper. When about fifteen years of age, for some trifling offence my father chastised me severely; it was then I took a solemn oath never to work for him again, and at some future day to be revenged; and fearfully have I kept that oath. I left my home and followed the sea. For eight years I was absent, and during that time had visited almost all parts of the habitable world. By this time my revengeful feelings had been softened down, and I wished once more to behold my parents, particularly my mother, who was always kind and indulgent. I accordingly returned to my native village. I saw my parents, and was reconciled to my father; I lived with them eight weeks, and nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of my visit, until one fatal evening I accompanied my father to a banking frolic. The flowing bowl—accursed be its pernicious influence—passed freely around, and by midnight we all became somewhat merry. Indeed, my father, who had partaken too freely of the intoxicating draught, could with difficulty keep his feet, and I was obliged to support him on his way home, although my brain seemed on fire, and I could hardly walk myself.

When about half-way home, we came to a cross-road, which, my father insisted, was the right path. In vain I told him he was wrong. He would pursue the wrong path, and on my attempting to prevent him, he struck me a violent blow on the face. This roused the demon within me.

"It is!" said I, "old man, a blow! You will find I am a boy no longer, to be abused by you!" And, raising my arm, struck my poor, inebriated father a powerful blow, which felled him to the earth; and then the recollection of former injuries unrevenged rushing into my mind, I caught up a stake from the fence, and struck him repeated blows over the head as he lay on the ground.

But the fatal crime was hardly committed ere I repented bitterly what I had done. I hung over him—I called him by name; he returned no answer. I saw the blood streaming from the terrible wound, and would have given worlds to have recalled him to life. An awful voice seemed to whisper in my ear—"He is your father!" Yes, God! he had received his death-blow from the hands of his only son!

I took the corpse up in my arms, and wept bitterly over it for more than an hour. At length I felt the necessity of doing something in order to hide the enormity of my guilt, and I laid the body among some rocks which were near the foot of a steep precipice, and then fled from the accursed spot; but that awful voice pursued me, again whispered—"He is your father!" Even the trees seemed to stretch forth their long arms to arrest my flight. Since that time I have never known comfort. I see my father in my dreams, and sometimes when I am awake he stands before me. Only this, while I sat upon the wall-side, I fell into a doze, and saw him in the shape of the bird that flitted around us to-day, and he whispered in my ears, "Your time has come."

Such was the tale of blood told by the wretched Withers, and although we all felt detestation at the unnatural crime he had committed, we could not help pitying the miserable wretch.

While we were listening to the wretched man's confession, dark clouds arose above the horizon, and the appearance of the heavens betokened a heavy squall. Preparations were made accordingly. The flashes of lightning were frequent and vivid, and the deep-toned thunder reverberated fearfully in the distance. Soon a ripple was seen on the water, followed by a ridge of miniature waves, which, breaking as soon as formed, presented the appearance of a boiling sheet of foam.

"Now, mind your helm, my lad," said the captain to the helmsman who had relieved Withers. "Keep her head before it."

"Aye, aye, sir," responded the man at the helm, and in a few moments the squall struck the vessel on the starboard quarter.

The ship flew before the wind, which blew with the violence of a hurricane, at the rate of ten knots. The rain fell in torrents, and what with the roaring of the waves, the howling and whistling of the tempest, the dazzling flashes of lightning which seemed to play around the mast, and the echoing peals of thunder, the scene was absolutely terrific.

The shrilling tale told by the self-accused parricide was for a while forgotten; but suddenly a strange and awful voice was heard, which sounded louder than the conflict of the elements, as it uttered in a high spirit of the storm:

"My poor, murdered father calls me! I come! I come! Then, with a wild and prolonged shriek of agony, which, even above the roar of the tremendous Withers sprang on the bow, and, ere any one could prevent him, precipitated himself into the swelling ocean. No human effort could save him. He rose in the eddying wake, and with his body half out of water, with agony of the most intense description depicted on his ghastly features, he gave another shrill and dying shriek—then sunk to rise no more.

In half an hour after this event the clouds broke away, the hurricane was hushed, the sun shone forth in all his wonted splendor, the ship was piloted on her way towards Africa, and we, impelled by a genial breeze, when, fabulous as it may appear, two birds, similar to the one that was flying around us previous to the storm, made their appearance. They alighted for a few moments on the peak of the mainmast, and perhaps it is unnecessary to state that they were not shot time enough by the captain. They remained a while over the quarter-deck, took a few circles around the ship, and then flew away to the southward, and we never saw them more.

REPAINTING THE SPIRE OF ST. PAUL'S.

We illustrate this week one of the little events which, while it is nothing within itself, attracts the eyes, and astounds every day.

The spire of the church of St. Paul's was sadly scorched at the burning of Barnum's Museum and it became necessary to repaint its tapering proportions. This has been achieved during the past week by some daring and ambitious knights of the brush, who, pointing themselves on a scaffolding between sun and earth, soon sway through the day apparently thoughtless that a little slip of the machinery that landed and held them in the elevated position they occupy, and they would be a shapeless mass of clay in less than ten seconds. Regardless of this thought they perhaps whistle away on their perch, while thousands from below gaze up to them with curdling blood and almost unbridled fear of the events around the people are really men or only flies crawling over the spire and scaffolding.

Why is an Irish row like the dirtiest spoken in Lower Canada?—Because it's a Foul-saw (patois).

THE LELAND PALACE,
At New Rochelle.

THE advance of a people in all social characteristics is an endorsement of their advance in enlightenment, and in that view we think that every step we take in the humanities of our hospitable resorts should be hailed as a great point reached in our advancement as a great people.

In this light we have this week undertaken to illustrate one of the palace homes of the land, and one that, following as it does in a citizen whose name as a household word in the mouths of the people all over the land, will be viewed and read with more than common interest.

The Leland brothers are known, by reputation, we may say, all over the world, wherever good living and comfortable homes are appreciated. As the hosts of the Metropolitan Hotel of New York, the great Union Hotel of Saratoga, and the Continental of Philadelphia, they have become a proverb. This week we give one of them in his own home, to show how wealth can carry taste into the domestic circle, and how it can direct even that attention to business under a free government.

Simeon Leland is the elder of the Leland brothers, and was born at Chester, Windsor county, Vermont, from whence, 28 years ago, he came to New York to seek his way up in the world.

His first promissory before the public was the keeper of the old Clinton Hotel, on the corner of Pearl-st and Nassau street, a hotel that in its day enjoyed a reputation that stood highest from Maine to Louisiana.

From these he, with his brothers, emigrated to the Metropolitan, the mine from which the wealth has been dug that has given to the name of Leland the wealth we shall write.

Seventeen years ago Simeon Leland bought the ground, 40 acres, on which now stands his house. At that time New Rochelle was little better than a mere series of farms, and Mr. Leland, a hotel man to the backbone, and the value of property was in accordance. Since then the goddess has sought the place, allured by its beauties, and the former idea of a hotel man to the back bone is now a kitchen garden only, as covered with luxurious residences, and every one of them the outward habit of wealth, while the single acre is valued as once a whole farm was only rated.

After holding his property seven years, he determined to build upon it a home, and calling in the architectural aid of Mr. W. T. Beers, whose name has only to be mentioned to make an assurance of the merit of the design, it was determined to build an English castellated Gothic edifice.

At the end of four years Mr. Leland became the occupant of the palace we shall endeavor to describe. In its erection it combines the solidity which the massive stone that was laid, and every hand and head that was taxed, could boast of all the skill and care that could be bestowed upon the whole.

The house is of grayish stone, of the granite order, some of which was quarried at Derrytown and some in the neighborhood of New Rochelle. The front is 130 feet, the depth 86 feet, while the main tower is 100 feet in height. It contains on the ground floor rooms each being 16 feet high, the second floor 14 feet, every room of which is fresoed in the highest style of art by such artists as Mr. D. Huntington, Mr. Leutze, and others, the rest, while the woodwork is of solid black walnut, as are the stairs of all the household dwellings. The grand staircase, leading from the main hall, hits, directly from its first landing, the billiard-room and picture-gallery, in the latter of which are a choice collection of works of art, prominent among which is an "Apollo and Daphne," the artist unknown, but a beautiful picture, subject only "A. B., 1677." The billiard-room, by-the-way, to further accent the stake, we have, on either wall, two highly executed paintings, the first the stranding Atlantic entering the harbor of New York; the second, the packet ship New York entering Liverpool docks.

From the billiard-room, which looks upon the lawn, the house being less than a quarter of a mile from the water, five lighthouses can be seen, and a most splendid sweep over Long Island Sound, with its fine shore country. From this fact the name of "Castle View" has been appropriately given to the residence. The principal rooms have each been designated according to their artistical fittings; as the Gold Room, the Blue Room, the Rich Room, the Library, &c., &c., each being in its gorgeous belongings so vies with the other, that it is next to impossibility to select one as the most beautiful.

It is, of course, not a supposable case that such a palace could be built without the grounds being in accordance with the whole, and accordingly we find rosewood and high polished walnut vieing with ormolu and gold in every apartment, while the floors are covered with velvet carpets and tapestry hangings, and beautiful carpetides and ottomans, looking up to rich chandeliers and cut glass shades, or gigantic mirrors.

From the house to the barns, stables and outhouses is a natural transition. The barns are large and roomy, and nearly 400 feet extension, with stabling for 40 horses. If of which Mr. Leland has now on hand. Here, as in the house, the walls are of stone, the floors of brick, and ceilings are fresoed, while the carriage-house is fitted with almost everything that runs on wheels.

Close beside the stables stands the farm-house, and not far removed the gardener's domicile, each marvelous in appointment and comfort, and practically what is wanted for such uses.

The grounds have 7½ miles of drainage and 1½ miles of walks, at every turn of which the eye meets with a vance meet the eye, while trees of every variety, some trained to trellis, are interspersed, and rural nooks or summer houses break upon the promenade.

We have endeavored in this to describe one of the palace homes of our country, a type to which a tradesman prince refuses to enjoy the domesticity of life. In other lands the sight of such magnificence may create envy, but in our land, where wealth and position are but stands as a monument to every poor and honest man, who can colour himself with the thought that nothing save his own fault can keep him on the same level of manhood as that such a palace as that of Mr. Simeon Leland.

MDLLE. EUPHROSYNE PAREPA.

THE great successes of this wonderful artiste, make her name and history one of more than common public interest.

It is but little over a month since, almost unheralded, save such encomiums as came to us over the water, Mdlle. Parepa made her first debut in America. No attempt was made to forestall public opinion by indiscriminate puffery. She was left to make her way into public favor if deserving, her manager trusting to the good taste of an American musical public for a satisfactory endorsement. The result has shown his good judgment as well as the talent of Mdlle. Parepa, and we have a success that since the days of Jenny Lind has not been equaled, and not even surpassed by that famed artiste.

Mdlle. Euphrosyne Parepa was born at Edinburgh in the summer of 1839. Her father, the Count Demetrius Parepa, a Wallachian nobleman, had rendered himself marked in the land of his birth by the liberality of his opinions, and as a consequence was obliged to abandon his magnificent estates in the neighborhood of Bucharest, and seek an asylum in England, where after a few months residence he married the sister of Mdlle. Parepa. It was in that country his daughter made home to every American whose musical memory reaches back a score of years. From the union came the little Euphrosyne, who from the very time that her gifted mother was winning all her musical laurels in Europe, Italy and Spain.

It was during this time that almost without what would be called study, the gifted and beautiful child was beginning with instinctive power not only to charm the world, but to astonish those who, intimate as they were with her, did not at first properly estimate her talent. During the first years of her child life that talent, would not listen to the proposition for a public appearance, but as she awakened to the great talent of the yet almost child her resolution gave way, and in the winter of 1856, Mdlle. Parepa made her debut as a singer, and as in the case of Jenny Lind, it was proven that all the prophecies of her friends fell far short of the facts, and that her fame was destined to spread with the rapidity of the wings of fire.

At Milan and Naples her triumphs were of the most decided order, and from thence with Gaglini, she created a furore that will always be remembered. At Rome, Genoa, Madrid and Lisbon her triumphs were unbounded, and every where she was the idol of the people and critical Germans her execution created an enthusiasm beyond all cavil. She was invited to sing at the Gewandhaus concerts of Leipsic, and was considered fit to interpret the great masters which that musical nation has given to the world.

Her first appearance in England was in 1858, in "Tampa," and from that time the United Kingdom has been crossed and recrossed by her.

Mdlle. Parepa speaks fluently all European languages, and as a consequence in the concerts she is now giving throughout the United States, she can render her repertoire equally upon all the great works of different lands. In concluding this article we cannot do better than give a short but graphic notice from the columns of the New York Tribune, announcing the debut of this great artiste on Monday night of 15th of September:

"It is pleasant to record a success—a genuine success achieved by sheer force of genius, unaided by advertising pretensions, by the favor of friends, a clique, or the prestige given through elaborate and pretentious puffery. Mdlle. Parepa has won her way to fame unaided by so such fortuitous circumstances, and yet in the course of a few months she has her entire audience, and gained a verdict of approval from those whose judgment is entitled to the most. Her first appearance was that hackneyed scena "Ernani involami." The first notes of the singer betrayed a mastery by their fine phrasing and emphatic declamation, that Parepa was an artiste of the highest order. The purity, sustained by the impression, while the brilliant rendering of the trette passages showed her to be a true artistic position. Mdlle. Parepa has a voice of very high, and a compass, we believe, of full three octaves. This range is not composed of a number of notes of equal excellence, but in reality two, and the blending of the registers is absolute perfection, giving to the whole, homogeneity and equality but rarely to be found even in singers of the highest order. She executes with ease and rapid, and whether in plain scale or in groups, or in chromatic runs, is beautifully distinct. Her first selection was Una pizzarda, which is so facile and so impure, but every note of which is so frequently individualized. Her staccato passages are particularly brilliant and distinct. Her shake is pure, prolonged and thrilling. Her trills is clear, open and decided, and always upon the true intervals. She concluded all with surpassing finish, while her gracioli are executed with exquisite taste. In the second part of the concert Mdlle. Parepa holds her voice completely under control. This quality is rarely found in but one particular point and we strike every one—for instance, where she holds a high note in breathing it for a time, which commences a rapid down scale passage. The voice must have a firmness of support to execute a feat so perfectly as Mdlle. Parepa does. In her singing she acknowledges the double task, that of the composer and performer, another proof of that vocal subordination which she possesses in a high degree.

Mdlle. Parepa made a genuine and complete success. In her the New York public has shown herself an incomparable artiste, and we also have shown herself an incomparable audience, and we congratulate her on the presence of one whose exquisite singing offers so pure a model of high and refined culture."

PRISON PEN OF ANDERSONVILLE.

THIS well-known and accursed place, situated in Sumter county, Georgia, near Flint river, 60 miles from Macon, the only correct view of which ever published, we present to our readers a drawing made, by Mr. R. K. Sneden, of the Topographical Engineers, in the month of May, 1865, and which has been carefully photographed. He was seven months a prisoner at Andersonville, and was in eight other rebel prisons, and therefore had every opportunity to make a true sketch of a prisoner. While waiting for transportation to Savannah, at the rebel headquarters, he made the plan of the pen and procured the rebel official drawings of the prison. The plan and drawings were secreted between the soles of his boots, and, by the aid of the Confederacy, with drawings of the prisons of Salisbury, Millen, or Camp Lawton, Florence, and the hell pen of Savannah, which he also visited, he escaped after Sherman arrived there, 15th July, 1864. The prisoners hung six of their fellow-prisoners for the murders they had committed, after putting up the gallows near the south gate. Murders were of nightly occurrence, until a police force was established among the prisoners, who hung the murderers, in July. Seventeen dead bodies have been counted lying inside the stockade for a week at a time, naked and putrifying in the hot sun, only to be handled with sticks to get them out. Wirz was sick a month in August, when Lieut. Davis had sole command, and put up the white flags, swearing the forts would open upon the prisoners if they crowded between the flags and gates while new prisoners were being received.

The stockade is of pine trees, sunk five feet in the ground, and twenty feet above, and firmly set in close ranks. Parallel with the stockade, and 20 feet distant, was the dead line, which consisted of posts, six inches square, 10 feet above the ground, and on the top to form a rail, which rail lasted only one week, the prisoners having taken the wood for firing.

The stockade was originally eleven acres, which was increased to fifteen on the 20 of July, 1864, which made it 1,000 yards around, with 22 posts or sentry-boxes, reached by steps from the outside. The daily guard was 162 men, and 200 more as pickets, while outside the stockade, within 1,000 yards, the entire strength of the guard on July 30, 1864, was 2,421.

The commanding officers of the prison were: Major

Winder, Brig. Gen. Colver, Capt. Gee. Morton, A.A.G. Lieut. S. R. Davis, and Capt. Wirz.

The deaths were, as taken from the death book at Wirz's headquarters:

1864.	Port Hosp. Stockade.		S.-Pen	Total.
March	222	18	5	242
April	477	11	84	572
May	623	63	10	703
June	1,042	1,259	10	2,311
July	419	699	5	1,744
August....	1,440	1,568	2	3,010
September.	1,140	1,455	0	2,673
October....	1,294	501	0	1,795
November.	88	4	0	92
December.	166	2	0	168
1865.
January....	101	8	0	109
February..	141	6	0	147
	8,569	4,159	64	15,799

As an interesting close to this chapter of horrors, we give an extract from the testimony elicited on the Wirz trial, descriptive of the following incident:

George W. F. Reynolds testified that he was taken prisoner as a spy in Tennessee, made his escape, but was retaken, tried for espionage, and sent to Andersonville, afterwards he was transferred to Andersonville, where he arrived in June, 1864. He acted as a paper-dealer and also as a magazine. Men were brought before him for stealing, and were sentenced by Sergeant Bates, set to work and washed. A number of men were handed him, among whom was Willis, who had been with me in the camp were filled with "soup-peddlers," and at the time complained of being sick. He had the itch, fever, ague, and gangrene. There were 600 bakers in the stockade—half sick and half well, and all starved. There was plenty of flour, saleratus, etc. Witness had an establishment called "Novelty Store." He had a greater variety of articles than any other person in the prison. Sold flour, meal, chickens, sweet potatoes, beans, peas, etc., besides medicines. Witness further testified that he was in the habit of purchasing property in camp; there were also in camp barber shops, clothing stores, and a bank; latter were organized on one paper money, cheques, and gold and silver; there were also sutlers' stores in camp. Had a tent in camp for his family watches and a number of breastpin and rings to sell. Witness was in the habit of visiting the hospital. The witness testified that there were also fruit stands in camp. Fruit was sold at high prices, generally, and that lots of ground were purchased at reasonable rates within the stockade, on which markets were erected. There were also gamblers there, who had tables and chairs. Was told that the fruit was bought in many other things, showing that extensive trade and traffic was carried on at the prison. Was told that a certain class of men say that they suffered from hunger. The witness said there were a number of speculators in various kinds of food and goods at the prison.

NEW AND BEAUTIFUL EMBROIDERY.

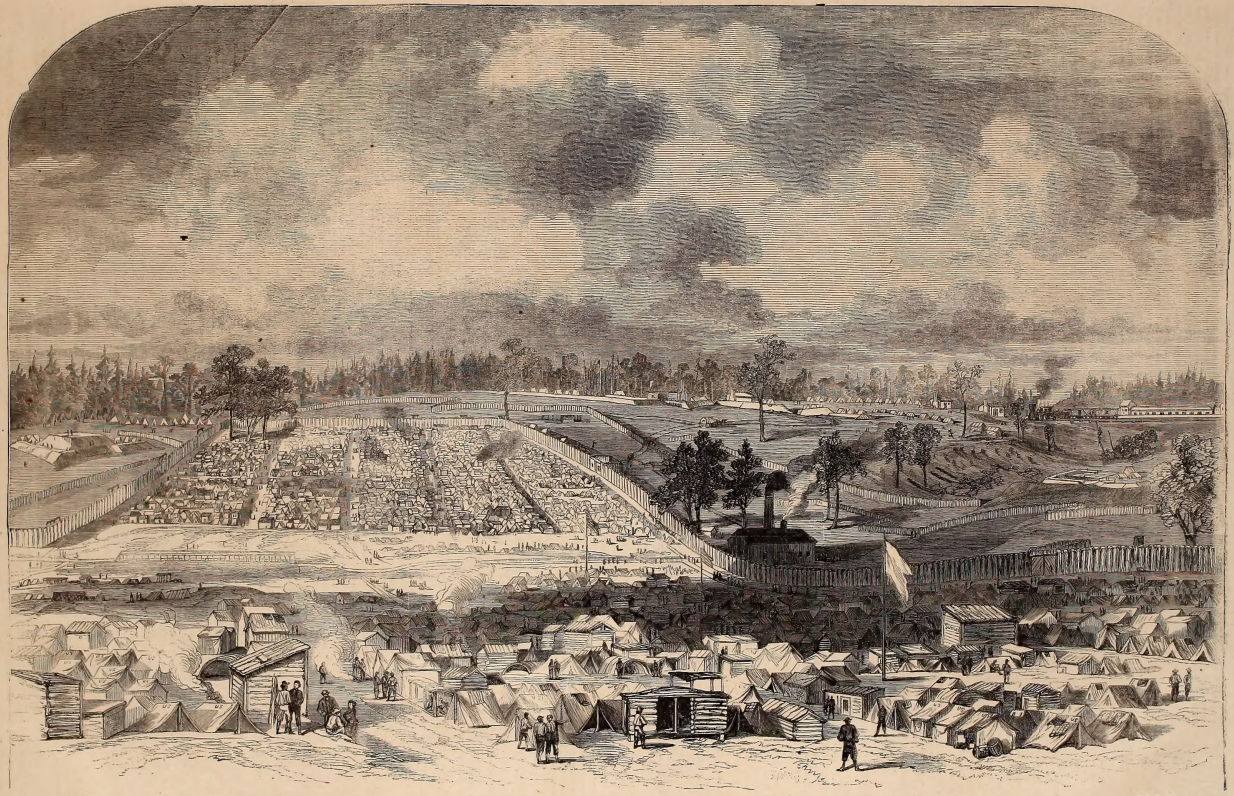
THE growing appreciation of elegant embroidery, as a means of beautifying and fashioning garments and fabrics, is an evidence of increasing refinement in taste, which all lovers of the natural, as developed in the beautiful, must hail with pleasure. Not a little of this interest and appreciation is owing to the more extensive introduction of this work, rendering it infinitely more effective, as well as greatly abridging the tediousness of the process. A few years ago embroidery was almost entirely confined upon a few articles of clothing or household adornment belonging to the wealthy. Ladies could not even afford to hire it done, so costly was the work considered for the length of time required in its production. What their own industry and skill could not bestow in the way of ornamental needle-work, they were obliged to do without; but so highly prized were the comparatively crude results of the fair and dainty hand that the wealthy valued gifts of a few hours' labor on her lower was a scarf embroidered with her own fingers. Now, all this is changed. Large gore cloth during the months, and even years, that were frequently occupied in the work, is entirely done away with, and elaborate flowers on silk or wool, have seen the brilliant and graceful designs of nature wrought in the most delicate of thought in these later days, through the instrumentality of the Grover & Baker sewing Machine, which they have located with disgust upon what had before been a source of such satisfaction, and believed that the magic of the wand had been transferred to the hands, and, instead of the lamp of Aladdin, found its home in the new sewing machine.

The facility with which the most difficult and elaborate designs are executed by the Grover & Baker machine, is the special delight of the ladies, who, while they admire the exquisite beauty of the workmanship, has made it the favorite machine for the manufacture of many of the fashionable garments and morning wrappers, buffer dresses and basques, which has forced the carriage and opera cloaks. The carriage-rug of the Princess of Wales, supplied every day in her rides in Hyde Park, is embroidered in white silk, in the Grover & Baker stitch, and the Prince of Wales has been furnished with a harness, and, instead of the lamp of Aladdin, found its home in the new sewing machine.

The facility with which the most difficult and elaborate designs are executed by the Grover & Baker stitch, has elicited the exquisite beauty of the workmanship, has made it the favorite machine for the manufacture of many of the fashionable garments and morning wrappers, buffer dresses and basques, which has forced the carriage and opera cloaks. The carriage-rug of the Princess of Wales, supplied every day in her rides in Hyde Park, is embroidered in white silk, in the Grover & Baker stitch, and the Prince of Wales has been furnished with a harness, and, instead of the lamp of Aladdin, found its home in the new sewing machine.

The facility with which the most difficult and elaborate designs are executed by the Grover & Baker stitch, has elicited the exquisite beauty of the workmanship, has made it the favorite machine for the manufacture of many of the fashionable garments and morning wrappers, buffer dresses and basques, which has forced the carriage and opera cloaks. The carriage-rug of the Princess of Wales, supplied every day in her rides in Hyde Park, is embroidered in white silk, in the Grover & Baker stitch, and the Prince of Wales has been furnished with a harness, and, instead of the lamp of Aladdin, found its home in the new sewing machine.

AMERICAN TACTICS IN ENGLAND.—Gen. Wm. H. Morris's system of infantry tactics, as published by Van Nostrand, of New York, is being adopted. This autumn, by order of the Duke of Cambridge, commanding the British army, the 60th rifles, the military genius, born of this war, should so direct it, there will be something surprised. Gen. Morris, in fact of John Bull's armies moving to the tactical music made by a Yankee brain.



ORIGIN OF THE EPITHET "TURNCOAT."—The opprobrious term of "turncoat" took its rise from one of the Chinese books, where dismembering type comes to the incursions of the two contending houses of Spain and Prussia, he was obliged to change sides and fall in with that power that was most likely to decrease him, according to the maxim, "Where there are no arms against me, I am no enemy." Hence the term was applied to those mercenary leaders in various kinds of food and goods at the prison.

"Wrinkling girls and crowing hens Always come to some bad ends."

In one of the curious Chinese books recently translated and published in Paris, this proverb occurs in substantially the same words. It is also an injunction of the Chinese priesthood, and a carefully-observed household custom, to kill unnecessary crowing hens that crow as a preventive against the misfortune that the circumstance is supposed to indicate.

THE DOCKS OF THE STEAMSHIPS OF THE "NORTH GERMAN LLOYD'S" AND "HAMBURG-AMERICAN PACKET COMPANY," AT HOBOKEN, N. J., FOOT OF THIRD STREET.

THE GREAT REBEL PRISON PEN AT ADVERSONVILLE, GEORGIA.—From a Drawing by R. Sneden, of the Topographical Engineer Corps.

ONE OF THE MANY.

BY S. W.

"The young here bled to death that dreary night in the woods. He was singing the Star Spangled Banner, but never finished it."

It was a summer's evening,
As on the ground in pain
A soldier lay, who never thought
To see the sun again.
'Twas after sad Shiloh's day,
When bullets raincdlike hail,
And cannon shot and bursting shell
Told a too fearful tale.

Around and wires tried comrades,
Some glad to snatch repose,
While weary sentinels kept guard,
To warn of coming foes.
And others there lay wounded,
And oft a smothered moan
Came gritting through their teeth, as though
It were a shame to groan.

All else was still, when through the air
There rang a joyous sound,
That thrill'd each worn-out sentinel
Who trod the weary round.
It was a song—a soldier's song—
A glorious nation's song
Its theme, the watch-word of the Right.
Who battle with the Wrong.

And through the gathering darkness,
The notes so full and clear,
Came throbbing from a soldier's breast,
That never throbbed with fear.
Forgotten was his shattered limb,
Forgotten all his pain,
As through the woods the chorus rang,
And echoed back again.

But faint and fainter fell the notes,
The voice was joyless yet,
Though fast the life-blood ebbed away
In many a crimson jet.
Fainter and fainter still they fell,
Still scarce above a breath
The murmuring music quivered, ceased—
The song was hushed in death.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAY," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.—WHEN THIEVES FALL OUT, IT IS NOT ALWAYS THE HONEST MEN WHO ARE LIKELY TO GET THEIR OWN.

IT was a little curious that Richard Sleuth should so easily be able to satisfy himself that the codicil would be sure some day or other to reach him; for apart from the danger which the burglars would see must attend any attempt on their part to open negotiations for the sale of the document—a danger greatly aggravated by the death of the alderman—how were they to know that no later instrument had been executed in favor of Anthony? There are truths so painful that no man who is not a hero can face them; and there was a truth in this kind that Sleuth could not face—namely, that he had committed a murder without even being sure that he was going to profit by it. He saw the logic of the case plainly enough, but he did not choose to recognise the conclusion—failure. And for once his luck greatly served him by making the recovery of the codicil possible.

Towards dusk of a day preceding that on which Sleuth had to start for London he, within the funds required for his journey, a man looking very like a broken-down cellar—one of the most disreputable of a class which seems to gravitate between the desire to be an honest livelihood by industry, and the making of acquaintances with men whose tendency is to go in a very different direction—shunk out from one of the narrow streets behind the New Cut, Lambeth, and began what soon appeared a difficult undertaking—the seeking for some one or persons, whose whereabouts greatly interested him. He went first to a low inn, and after lounging about outside, to take a long and careful look at the inmates of the tap-room through the window, he went in, to have a more trustworthy glimpses of the interior; and then managed to mistake his way out, and to stumble over the threshold of the parlor as he suddenly opened the door from a dark passage. He was assailed by a storm of execrations, and more than one of the men rose and slipped their hands into their pockets, as if for concealed weapons; but when he said humbly:

"Beg pardon, it's only Bob the Ostler, who wants to find some friends of his."

"What friends?" asked one of the more quiet and dangerous looking drinkers.

"Itey Small, and his pal Jack."

The reply was greeted by a laugh from one of the men, who said in explanation:

"Well, Bob the Ostler, they ain't here, and I don't know where they are; but I can tell you something you may like to know on."

"Thank you humbly," said Bob.

"It's this: you want them, but they don't want you. That's all. Now then, mizzle!"

To strengthen his speech, the speaker, without a word of warning, pitched at the intruder's head a pewter measure, generally protruded inside the door—a wooden trencher, on which one of the pots of beer they were drinking from had been standing. Bob the Ostler saw the movement, drew back just in time, and reclosed the door, amid a burst of merriment. He then gave one long look at the door, as if he saw through the wood, and he clenched his fist, as he murmured between his teeth while his face scowled ominously:

"Lucky for you it didn't hit that's all I say now!" And then he went off to repeat his search in similar places—but still in vain. From the New Cut to St. Giles's, from St. Giles's to Whitechapel, then back again to Lambeth, Bob the Ostler went his stealthy round, with a dogged pertinacity that made fatigue, hunger and disappointment of no avail.

But when, after some hours spent in this exasperating kind of work, he stopped in the neighborhood of Houndsditch to wipe his face, and have a drink from a pump, which only made him the more angry at the thought of his destination, his face suddenly broke out with a kind of illumination, that only made more visible and hideous its latent expression of villanous cunning and sly ferocity. He started at once, forgetting even the sores of his heel, which a boot in the last stage of decomposition continually rubbed.

He stopped this time at a tall, dusty, but still respectable-looking house in a decent court—a house that had no exterior peculiarities beyond these two: the lower windows were all fortified by upright bars of iron, too close together for a man to pass between them, and the upper windows had mostly their shutters fastened. On the door, which was of unusual strength and thickness, was a dingy brass plate, that had probably never been cleaned from the time of its being set up to now. On this Bob the Ostler read:

JAMES & CO., REFINERS.

After some little hesitation he rang the bell, and then, as if prepared for a survey, he glanced up at the one window that showed signs of inner life, and there, sure enough, he saw a face, and that face in return saw a knowing kind of quick wave of the hand, and it once disappeared. Bob then slipped down a side passage out of sight, that led to the back of the house, where, after a long delay, a door was opened, but only so far as the chain would allow.

"What do you want so late, Bob?" asked the voice of a man unseen.

"Why, Mr. Jakes, if you please, I sent you a bit of custom t'other day, and I want to know if my partners have been?"

"Who are they?"

Again was the reply given of

"Itey Small, and his pal Jack."

"Yes."

"They've been, and without me!" gasped Bob, "me, who put them up to it!"

"There now, Bob, the sooner you're off the better, if that's all you've got to say. You know very well I never go into these things, never meddle with unlawful business, and never ask impertinent questions, such as you are now asking of me."

"Beg your pardon, Mr. Jakes; stop just a minute. Will they be coming again?"

"Why, no. I rather expect them to-night on another matter."

"I'm worry much obligated to you, and I won't keep you in the draught. Please don't say I've been."

The only answer condescended to this request was the sudden and angry slamming to of the door.

Bob the Ostler now looked about him for a resting-place. It was dreadful to him to have a corner made by the angles of the wall. He went to it, squatted down on his hams, leaned his head back, and presently was fast asleep.

He did not sleep at all long, however, but that when, for the second time that evening, the door was opened and closed again, Bob the Ostler heard the last step on the pavement, and was instantly awake and alert. He saw nothing, however, to justify his belief that some one had gone in; there was the dingy wall, the door, the piece of blank darkness. But Bob knew some noise had widened him, and determined at all costs not to go off into a doze again.

"All right," he murmured fervently to himself, a few minutes later, as he saw a gleam through the key-hole, heard the bolt and chain and lock and handle, and then, when the door opened wide, stood face to face with the long-sought men.

There was an exclamation from one of them, but the other, who was the first to recover, came outside, took no notice, but wished the unseen Mr. Jakes good-night, and not till the door was shut and fastened did he turn to Bob.

"Now, you meaning varmint, you've turned up again, have you?"

"Yes, Jem, but let me explain," began Bob the Ostler, in an humble tone.

The man he had spoken to caught him suddenly by the nape of the neck, and, using, without the power to resist, right out of the court, and into the immediate neighborhood of a newly-lighted tavern, where, while he held him with one hand in a most indicrous and pitiable position, with his face turned to the light, tortured into the most terrible contortions by the stretching of the skin, and by mental fear, he held to his nose a fist terrific for size and for the stories trusted abroad of its strength and doings, and then he said, with a half scorn of the abject figure object before him:

"You see that? You feels it?" Bob the ostler made no response, but his nose giving way to the pressure. "Well, then, that's my way of explaining. Now, right about face, Bob, or you'll find yourself in the middle of next week."

Bob was turned round, received a most unpleasant kick on an unsatisfactory part of his person, and the Ostler was hurled from the pair and the terror, the men were gone.

Gone, certainly, but not, as they fancied, out of the Ostler's sight. He had in his nature the one good quality to compensate for the want of many other qualities; he could stick like a leech when there was blood—which with him meant gold—to be drawn. Up one street and down another he followed them, shrinking back whenever he saw they were aware of him, but renewing pursuit with prompt energy as soon as he saw they moved again forward.

They tried to baulk him at this game by stopping for him, intending, no doubt, to give him a sudden blow that should settle him. But they soon found that Bob the Ostler was master of that game, for as sure as they ever managed to double back upon him, was he near, or surrounded by people, that made assault dangerous or impossible.

Seeing that these tactics served him, by enabling him to keep up with them, they all at once began to walk at a rate that few men could keep up with, even if fresh and unfatigued. But Bob the Ostler, in spite of exhaustion through fatigue and want of nourishment, and in spite of the malignant pain that across his heel, was like some of the poor half-starved horses he often had to deal with—able, on emergencies, to set all calculations at naught, and show power that seemed almost to spring from mental and privation had a kind of latent capacity of their own for achieving wonderful results. He was not to be out-walked or outrun, any more than he was to be outmanœuvred, or put hors de combat by an unexpected stroke.

But, then, Bob the Ostler had a keen eye for geography, in its application to streets. Whatever the origin of his skill, he seemed to know almost instinctively the turns he was obliged to lose sight of his men in one place, how to recover the trail in another, a few minutes later, by a short cut. On one occasion, in the Strand, when he himself thought he had been baffled at last, the two men and himself emerged almost simultaneously from different streets into that brought them together, or, rather, would have done so, if Bob the Ostler had not stopped in time, respectfully.

The men laughed as they saw him stop and hesitate, and from that moment seemed to take no more notice of him, but go on their own business, which was apparently leading them towards the neighborhood of Covent-Garden Field.

And then, strange to say, just when the obstacles to pursuit seemed removed, the pursuer disappeared. Again and again they looked back, and seen, as they said in their own elegant language, "It was no go."

But not for long was Bob missing. About midnight the men reached a house which stood some short distance down a lane, which was dark except at the entrance, where was a gas-lamp. They went down the lane till the darkness began to shroud them from observation, when they were interrupted by the leisurely movement of a horse along the main road.

"Itey!" said one, below his breath.

"Mounted patrol," was Itey's response.

"You can hear, can't yer?" asked Jack, savagely.

And then Itey did hear talk going on between the mounted patrol and a voice they knew too well.

"Jump the hedge and cut across the grass, if you're to have any chance of the tools, and I'll meet him, like a blessed hinnocent, to stop his gag."

The tools were transferred, and while the holder of them prepared to climb the other stole along under cover of the darkness towards the end of the lane, straining his ears to listen, and, of course, expecting to hear that Bob the Ostler was there, too, in readiness, all obligations.

But, to his surprise, he discovered that, though suspicious characters formed the subject of talk, that Ostler was not the patrol off in quite a different direction to that where the danger really lay.

"I shall just keep ahout here for a bit," said the horseman, as he walked his horse away. "Give a whistle, my man, if you see or hear anything, and I'll be back in a jiffy."

The burglar waited till the horse's footfall sounded sufficiently far off; then, as if he had previously reconnoitred how to do, he went straight towards the spot where Bob the Ostler waited. But as Bob was full in the glare of the light, and secured a better position better than when the burglar had, only an hour or two before, made him similarly conspicuous, the burglar was obliged to leave some two or three yards of space between them, in the same time as to the disadvantage of leaving the friendly shade of the hedge, while he could still hear the footsteps of the patrol's horse.

"Bob," said he, "that you?"

"Yes, it's me," said Bob, looking a little nervously in the direction of the mounted supporter.

"Well, that's queer!" said Itey.

"Isn't it?" assented Bob.

"Like a lady's bill," added Itey.

"Well, I think, I rayther should," said Bob; "only my friend'll soon come back."

"Bob, I want to have a word on you that we should keep all the swag out of that ere job."

"Didn't I first tell yer on it?" began Bob, nervously.

"You did," mildly replied the burglar.

"Didn't I tell you how easy it was?"

"Easy" twice popped at it! Easy? wish yer had been there."

"Well, I say I ought to have been; but I had my reasons. I know something of the old man—"

Itey looked as if he intended to take in quite new ideas of the whole matter.

"So, master Bob, you've been setting us upon a little game of your own, eh? Friend of yours, eh?"

"Friend! I'd like to have seen him when you settled his business so nicely."

"Bob, none o' that. We did crack the house, but we didn't touch a hair of the old man's head."

Here Jack could make no other reply, but waited, in a sort of masterly patience, to see what else the burglar would say or do after that significant comfort.

"I tell you, Bob," repeated the burglar, with earnest feeling, "neither I nor Jack fired our pistols at all till we was in the garding. Believe as you like, but that's the truth."

"What'll you give me to believe?" asked Bob, with a laugh.

"What'll I give? why, Bob, I'll make your fortin for yer, if you've only brains enough to secure fast hold o' yer luck."

"Luck!"

"I tell yer. But first, Bob, mind this: we didn't get enough out of the alderman's infernal house to pay expenses."

It was now Bob's turn to whistle. And the burglar went on:

"And what we did get we were hobligated to spend while hiding from the chase arter us, which was uncommon strong. But here; come across to me."

"I'd rayther you'd come to me."

"There, then," exclaimed the burglar, and he laughed as he threw a paper across the impassable two or three yards of ground.

"What is it?"

A document that gives all the old man's property to the young un as was in the house that night, and who, I suspect, was hunting for it when we was outside."

"And he's not the man who's got it now?" asked Bob, eagerly.

"Of course not."

"Has I, but?" gasped Bob, in alarm, lest the brilliant prospect should dissolve, and leave him only the laughing-stock of his semi-partners, "hasn't the man who's in possession got another and newer deckrement?"

"As him; I haven't the honor of his acquaintance, Bob. Will it do?"

"Got a tanner, Itey, to let me get something to eat?"

"Here you are; catch!"

"All right, Itey; I wish you luck down the lane."

"You'll tell the patrol?"

"Of course I will. I'd like to shake hands, Itey, but you make such queer use of your fists."

With a laugh they parted: and while Itey returned to the house to resume operations, after waiting a reasonable time to make sure that Bob played them no ill trick, the latter worthy man went back to Jemmy, limping, sore, hungry, miserable in every nerve of his body, but exultant in mind, proud of himself, and in a kind of peace with all the world, as he felt the precious paper, and stopped to read it at sundry gaslights, but always put it hastily by, waxed, after seeing, once for all, that it was the kind of paper that had been described to him, and then almost ran along, as if he were already eating out on the expedition for the promised fortune that he was to get by taking fortune to one Richard Sleuth.

CHAPTER XXIII.—READ GIVES AN ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF.

"WHAT on earth am I to do with myself today?" thought Anthony, as he sat down to his lonely breakfast the morning of Sleuth's journey to London. "Sam has taken his horse all day. I've a good mind to go over and be introduced to the 'charming man.' Good-morning, Mrs. Milton."

"Good-morning, sir," said the housekeeper, who always made and carried in her young master's coffee herself, as she had done the alderman's.

"I tell you what, Mrs. Milton, you must just sit down, and let me have a cup with me. It won't be the first time, you know."

"Thank you, sir," said Mrs. Milton, drawing herself up, and arranging her stomacher and apron, and then she added the first time, carefully. You used to be sent out to get your meals with me when you was in disgrace with your uncle sometimes, when you'd been a-bad passion or away from him, that nothing one could cram into your mouth could quiet you. I've often been in such a fright at your kicking your feet in the door in defiance of him before he got out of hearing, that I've done something a purpose to anger you, and make you get at me."

"Ah," said Anthony, "you see I'm more grateful now for the good things you provide me. Shall I pour out the coffee, or will you? I will; remember, I want you to think of what I can do with myself. My cousin won't be back till evening, and then won't stop an hour. What on earth am I to do with myself?"

"Well, I don't think you've been at a loss yet, sir," observed the housekeeper.

"No," said Anthony, "I'm left alone to-day. That cousin of mine, is such a quiet, unselfish, thoughtful fellow, one hardly finds out what a treasure he is till he's away."

"Hem!" said the housekeeper, drily. "Not quite so much sugar, if you please, sir."

"Eh, what? I beg your pardon. I'm glad he's gone," continued Anthony. "He needn't a chance, if ever any one did. I don't think he's been looking at all well. He must have had a trying time of it."

"Mr. Richard has got a patient coming, sir," said Mrs. Milton; "some people haven't."

"He's been a model of patience," said Anthony. Mrs. Milton muttered something about "dear, keys could run when a cart of turnips was going before 'em;" but her young master, as he leaned back in his chair, had fallen into a fit of listless thoughtfulness, and did not hear her.

"I wonder," he said, as if speaking to himself, "I wonder what my uncle did all day?"

"Lg, sir!" answered the housekeeper, heroically sipping the coffee, that was not prepared at all to her taste, "first thing in the morning, before breakfast, perhaps, your poor dear uncle 'ud go out in his slippers, and lift up the little pots over the flowers to watch the sar-vigs."

"I'm afraid that wouldn't amuse me," remarked Anthony.

"And, then, if his gout was bad, that was generally his time to go round and blow us all up.

"But I haven't got the gout, so have no excuse for such a recreation," said Anthony.

At that instant there was a knock at the door, and Phillis entered hurriedly and out of breath.

"He's coming up the stairs, and I can't help it," she exclaimed in answer to the severe gaze of her godmother.

"And who told ver to help it?" rejoined a voice behind her. "I come to see your master, didn't I? and not to be kept down there by you."

And to Anthony's surprise and the housekeeper's horror, Esau appeared in the doorway, making alternately grimaces at Phillis and deferential salutations to Anthony.

"You little chicken!" exclaimed the housekeeper; "you—you audacious—— Phillis, send Gibbs up with the horsewhip."

"Stop a bit," said Anthony; "I did tell him to come. I may as well have him in now, and have done with it. Come and stand here, sir."

The housekeeper put her handkerchief to her mouth as Esau passed her, and wheeled her heavy chair back from the table, taking her coffee with her.

"What do you think I'd better do for him, Mrs. Milton?" asked Anthony. "Make him one of my retainers?"

"Whatever I did for him, sir, if I was you," answered she, "I'd give him to understand he isn't to poke his nose here any more, and as to putting it to me, there's no telling the use he'd put it to."

"Under such circumstances, then," said her master, "perhaps gratitude is out of place, and I'd better send him about his business, without doing anything for him. Is that what you mean, ma'am?"

"Why, no, sir, not exactly. But, lor, sir, gratitude to that limb? Look at him, sir."

Anthony did look, and saw that Esau had thrown a little away from them, and was staring vaguely out of the window. He was dirtier and more ragged than ever this morning, and there more ragged than ever this morning, and there was a weariness and listlessness in his face and attitude that Anthony had never seen in him before. The housekeeper's severity seemed to relax a little as she looked at his slight form and childish face.

"Give him a sovereign, sir," she whispered, "and send him off."

"You shut up!" said Esau, sharply, giving her a quick, scornful glance. "What 'ud be the use of a sovereign to me? who'd change it? They 'ud think I 'ad stole it; and that's what you want, I 'spose."

He turned his face away again, and a drearier and darker look came over it.

"Better help his father and mother to put him to school, sir," suggested the housekeeper, in a less angry tone.

"Where'll yer find 'em?" asked the little outcast, with a short laugh. "You'll have to go where you'd never go to find her, and you'll have to wait till you go where you will go to find him."

"Why, you poor, miserable little creetur," said the housekeeper, "do you mean to say they're both dead?"

Esau gave her no answer, only an impatient jerk of his head towards the window again, and she sat looking at him, not unkindly, and rubbing her spectacles.

"Come," said Anthony, suppressing a yawn, and pushing away his cup with a business-like air. "You must answer questions, you know—or it's impossible for us to see what we can do for you. You say your father and mother are dead?"

"She is," said Esau, without looking round.

"Your father is living, then?"

"Don't know, nor don't care," was the answer, given in a low, deliberate tone.

The housekeeper put out her hands, and turned up the white of her eyes.

"Didn't he use you well, then?" asked Anthony.

"I dunno what you call usin' well. He kicked me up in the morning if I wasn't up afore he woked, and he kicked me in if I wasn't in afore he wanted to shut up."

"But he give you enough to eat, didn't he, you poor wretched creetur?" inquired the housekeeper.

As Esau did not condescend to answer her any more than by a stealthy grimace, Anthony repeated the question, and Esau then replied:

"I had his leavins'. Sometimes there was enough—sometimes there wasn't. Sometimes there wasn't none."

"And what did you do then, you miserable mite?" said the housekeeper. "Steal?"

"Yes. Put-a-dozen-cowcumber's-tongues, and give 'em all to You. I wish," said he to Anthony, "you'd speak, and arst me what you want to yourself, and not have to use her jaw."

"And what's become of your father now?" asked Anthony. "When, and how did he leave you?"

"A long time ago; but I dunno what's become of him, and I don't care," said the boy. "He told me he was going away, and then——"

Esau paused, and the little bare elbows reddened under the dirt, and the face was turned more determinately away than ever.

"Well," asked Anthony kindly.

The flushed face turned quickly to him, the mouth quivering, the eyes wet and fierce.

"Then," said the tramp, "he hit me with his fists in my eye and mouth, and said as that's as how he'd serve me if ever I come after him, or tried to find out where he was."

"Which you never did, my boy, I suppose?" said Anthony, laying his hand on the shoulder the ragged boy shook.

"Me—me go after him?" answered Esau, clenching his fist, and setting his teeth together. "I'd sooner go after the——"

"Now hold your tongue, you misguided little creetur," interrupted the housekeeper, looking up from her pocket-handkerchief. "None o' your wicked talk here. Gracious goodness! I always thought trouble was given to make people good; but lor bless us!"

"What is your father's name?" asked Anthony, as a thought crossed his brain which made him look with sudden interest for the boy's answer.

"Brand," said Esau.

The interest passed from Anthony's face again, and he stirred his coffee with an air of disappointment.

"He never went by any other name, did he?"

"No, not as I knows on," replied Esau.

"Well, come," said Anthony briskly, "we must get to business. Pray, what can you turn your hand to? Anything in the way of work?"

"Yes, sir, lots o' things."

"Well, tell me some of them."

"I can make bashkets, sir."

"La, only hear that!" said Mrs. Milton.

"Why, how did you learn that?" asked Anthony.

"Some gipsies learned me this Easter."

"And what are the other things?"

"I can mend a cane cheer, and I can holler yer a whistle out of a stick, and I can tame pigeons and ketch yer strays, like a good un. I can ketch birds and get nests, and sell 'em, too, top prices; and I can look after and sell them; and I can make yer a fire anywheres, and a oven o' stones to cook your dinner in—or bricks 'll do best. Look here, you're one for a good sleepy, I offers to clean yer for him for a tanner, while he has his nap."

"Grooms ought to be ashamed of themselves," remarked the housekeeper, "for letting such characters in."

"Still," said Anthony, "this is a little nearer the mark. I shouldn't wonder if the boy could do he was asking for help yesterday—he said a boy would do."

"Yes, sir," answered Mrs. Milton, looking at Esau from head to foot. "A boy, he did, sir."

"Well, I ain't a gal, am I?" observed Esau.

"Hold your tongue, sir," said Anthony. "Well, if Gibbs wants a boy, why shouldn't this one do, Mrs. Milton?"

"Lor, sir, Gibbs is a respectable man; I've known his mother this fifteen year, sir——"

"Well, Esau, we won't shock his respectability," said Anthony, rising. "But come along and show yourself, and let's take our chance."

Esau followed Anthony from the conservatory steps and through into the garden, which sparkled and glowed in the full lustre of morning.

They found Gibbs busy at his labors on a sock of oats, and reading a newspaper.

"Look here, Gibbs," said Anthony, "I've taken pity on this boy, and want him as an assistant."

Gibbs looked at Esau, then at his master, and grinned. He evidently took it as a joke.

"Well, do you like him?" added Anthony.

Gibbs looked at Esau, and then at his master, and at the dog sitting on its haunches beside him, and colored violently from his face to the back of his thick neck.

"Do, sir? No, sir," he said.

"He won't do," repeated Anthony. "Why not?"

"I think the work seems lighter now, as I'm getter used to the place, sir," answered Gibbs, evasively. "I think as I can do without a boy."

"Well, but I wish you to have this one, and make him as useful as you can, and then the work will be lighter still."

"Thank yer, sir, I think I'd rayther do without," answered Gibbs, decidedly, carefully avoiding to look at Esau, as if at other glimpse of him would be too much for his stomach.

"Well, but I want you to have him. You asked for a boy. Why won't this one do as well as any other? It's no use having a youth who's afraid to soil his fingers, you know."

"Yes, sir," replied Gibbs; "but still, sir——"

"Well?"

"Osses like somethink a little more like a Christian, sir."

"Well, come, you'll take him, and make the best of him, won't you?"

"Take him, sir? Yes, sir."

"But suppose I say you must?"

"Then, p'haps, sir, you'd be so good as to name it in the character?"

"Name what?"

"The cause o' my leavin' you, sir?"

"Why, you don't mean to say my insisting on your taking this boy would make you leave?"

"Yes, sir; I'm afeard it would, sir. I'm a responsible man, sir, and I ain't been used to such company."

"Here, come away, you little rascal," said Anthony, pulling Esau by the ear; "I'm not going to have Gibbs for you. You young monkey, arn't you ashamed of being such a disgrace to me? Come in with you."

Still holding him pretty tightly by the ear, Anthony never stopped till he reached the housekeeper's room.

"Look here, Mrs. Milton," said he, entering without ceremony, "Gibbs won't have anything to say to him?"

"I should ha' wondered if he had, sir," said the housekeeper. "Gibbs is a responsible man, sir."

"So he told me," answered Anthony. "I dare say he's right about the boy. His appearance is against him at present, there's no denying it. I ought to have sent him to the workhouse to be scrubbed down before I presented him at the stables. However, there's only one thing now for us—we must send him to the workhouse. I'm not one trying to do anything with him till he's made, as Gibbs says, a little more Christian-like; and I suppose we had better begin with the outside, hadn't we?"

Rather to Anthony's surprise, the housekeeper made no very vehement objections, and before Esau could very well understand what the great rub of hot water in front of her fire was preparing for, he was seized in the housekeeper's substantial arms.

But only for an instant. There was a sharp struggle, a scream from Mrs. Milton, and then Esau stood between her and Anthony red and panting, and looking defiantly from one to the other.

"Now—now! what's this about?" asked Anthony.

"What's it about? Why, jest you keep your hands off a me; that's what it's about."

"A spiteful little monkey, he's stuck his teeth into me!" said Mrs. Milton. "You ought to be ashamed o' yourself—a beautiful hot bath like that!"

"Take it yourself, then; I'll have none of it. Stand out o' the way, an' let me go."

"Now, listen to me, my fine fellow," said Anthony. "I've a fancy to see you washed, and that fancy I mean to have gratified. Shall Mrs. Milton do it herself, or shall I assist her? Because I may not be quite as gentle as she is, you know. I may put you in head first."

Esau looked at him searchingly, and seeing that Anthony's "fancy" was evidently not to be shaken, began tremblingly to undo the collar of his shirt, muttering:

"I shud hope I can get in myself, without havin' my skin scratched off a my bones by a old woman like that."

They stood still, watching him while he proceeded, in the most leisurely manner possible, to divest himself of his rags. He had but two garments on, and when the first was off, and he stood in his shirt, folding the ragged trousers up with a tasteful affectation of carefulness for them, Mrs. Milton could contain herself no longer. Going up to him, she dragged the shirt over his head, flung it to the further end of the room, then seized him, bore him, kicking and shouting, to the bath, and plunged him in. She then began business with soap and brush, and Anthony sat in the old oak arm-chair, enjoying his "fancy" immensely, and giving Esau a nod every time his head escaped from the housekeeper's hand and bobbed up from the soapsuds, spitting and blinking his eyes.

Each time the head came up the wet hair glittered in the firelight more and brighter, till Anthony grew quite interested in watching for it.

"Gets in your eyes, indeed!" said the housekeeper, in answer to his frantic lamentations. "Never mind your eyes just look at your skin. There's a arm a little gentleman might be proud of. Look, Mr. Anthony, isn't it like a bit of halabaster? Now, then, the perfect Donna, sir, when he comes out. Ha! you little villain, keep your teeth to yourself. I'd have them drawed next thing, if I was you, Mr. Milton."

"I say, Mrs. Milton," said Anthony, "it will never do for him to put those rags on again. Haven't you got a heap of my school things somewhere?"

"Yes, to be sure I have, sir, but——"

"Well, go and find a suit for him, if you can; never mind about the fit of a remote fashion. Here, I'll hold him down while you go. Well, sir, I hope you feel better?"

Esau made no answer but by splashing the water in Anthony's face, for which Anthony boxed his ears. He glanced up then more respectfully, and said at once:

In a few minutes Mrs. Milton came back with the clothes, which Esau eyed with distrustful interest.

He submitted pretty quietly to the process of dressing, till Mrs. Milton, in her admiration of the improvement, and her contempt, held back his shining little head, and gave him a hearty kiss.

"Get out!" cried Esau, wrestling himself away. "Don't you touch me again. Jest show me the things I'm to put on, and I'll dress me alone."

She gave him the stockings and little buckled shoes, which he put on with much amusement, casting a side glance at Anthony. When, however, he tried to dress himself, the buttons and ties in his new clothes so bewildered him, that he was glad the housekeeper came to his assistance. There was a little more howling and fighting when she brushed his hair, but at last he stood completed, sticking his elbows out, and looking comically at his immensely broad collar lying over his shoulders.

"Now you shall come and look at yourself," said Anthony, taking hold him by the hand, which now felt soft and childish enough. He led him into the drawing-room, before one of the pier glasses.

Esau looked at himself half curiously, half bashfully for an instant, then his head trembled in Anthony's hand, he glanced up into his face with a quick, wistful look of gratitude, that vanished instantly as he heard the housekeeper's voice.

"Well, what do you think of yourself?" asked she.

Esau gave another look, and ended by putting his tongue out at his image, and exclaiming:

"Pah! you've given me his air!"

"Now," said Anthony, "we'll go and have another try with Gibbs."

"Lor, sir," exclaimed Mrs. Milton, "what a pity it'll be sir, those dirty strables."

Anthony laughed as he led him out.

"Why, you've got a touch of a Christian now, Esau," he said; "I'm afraid Gibbs will say you're too respectable."

Mrs. Milton waited with no little curiosity for their return, and in a few minutes Anthony came back alone, and nearly choking with laughter.

"Gibbs didn't know him," he said, "didn't know him a morsel, and the little monkey takes it all as demurely as possible. He was being mounted on the mare when I came away, to show off his paces; but I couldn't stop another minute, I was choking."

"Shush, Mr. Anthony, sir," said the housekeeper, holding her sides. "There's Gibbs asking for you down-stairs. Sure as life he's found it out."

At that instant Gibbs's heavy foot was heard on the stairs, accompanied by other feet, and shrill female voices.

"Why, what is the matter?" asked Anthony, stepping out on the staircase, where he was against Gibbs, whose face was almost scarlet.

"He's off, sir!" he panted, as soon as he could get breath. "He's off half-way down the London Road, and there's a man at the gate as says he knows him, and we shall never see the mare again. He's jined to a gang, sir, and I dessay they've met him by this time, and took the mare. He's no fault o' mine, sir. I couldn't ha' took him for a ten-pun note if I'd a knowed he was the one as you showed me store. He's clean gone, mare, an' dog, an' all."

"Gone, sir; clean gone! Mare, and dog, and all!"

Repeating these words, Gibbs stood before his master, waiting till the full force of their meaning should strike him.

The housekeeper was already sufficiently impressed, and had sunk down on the stairs, and drawn out her smelling-salts and black paper fan.

"Oh, Gibbs, Gibbs, I shall never get over this!" cried she. "To think I washed him with my own hands! With my own hands, Gibbs!"

"It ain't no good a washin' him as sheen, mum," answered Gibbs, speaking in a low and mournful voice. "Their wickedness is more 'n skin deep, mum; an' it's my opinion as kindness, an' washin', an' all that, don't strike it in'ards, mum, as cold'll strike a child's measles in'ards—that's my opinion, mum."

"I've a very confident opinion it is, too, Gibbs," observed the housekeeper, impressively; "and one as the heads o' parishes 'ud do well to stick it over their vestry doors."

"Confound it all!" cried Anthony. "What am I to do? Why, there isn't a beast in the place to go after him on, is there?"

"Why, yes, sir; there's two, sir, such as they are."

"Two?"

"Yes, sir; but no use in the world, sir. There's the gray rig horse, as 'as done nothing these six months but walk out to be rubbed down with the hay, and there's the animal we've named the Paddock Pony, sir, as 'as had nothing on his back for three years."

"I'll engage! but he shall have something on his back now, though," said Anthony.

"Mercy on us, sir, you'd never touch that beast? He's only been kept because you've been liked to see him a-seeing his long mane, and kicking at the fence. He's been no use this ever so long; he's been let get so wild and vicious," said the housekeeper.

"On with the saddle, Gibbs," cried Anthony. "My boots, Mrs. Milton, please; and look here! Mrs. Milton, where's a bell? Ten pounds to one on me and the Paddock Pony against that imp and the mare!"

"And I can never ketch him, sir," said Gibbs, ruefully.

"Nonsense! I'll come and help you," answered Anthony. "But keep it quiet, there's a good fellow, or I shall have all the parish laughing at me for being taken in."

So they went down to the paddock together, and the pony showed off all the fine antics that used so to delight the alderman, but which to irritated Anthony, that Gibbs found out he had not been quite his match for nothing—in the way of swearing, at least.

Round and round they went, the sun blazing, and the perspiration streaming down their faces. At last, as they met at the gate, both felt they could stand it no longer; so they came out, and left the pony master of the field.

"Let's have it given to the gig horse," said Anthony, gloomily, and they went round to the stables.

Just as they were turning the corner of the yard, Gibbs made a dead stand and colored up to his temples.

"What's the matter?" asked Anthony.

"Why, doose take it all, sir, look there!" he whispered, drawing back a little.

Anthony looked, and saw a little picture, from which he did not very soon withdraw his eyes.

At the far end of the yard, under the shade of some trees, was a dog-kennel, surrounded by a very large Newfoundland dog, who lay with his head hanging out of it on the yard stones. Beside the kennel stood Anthony's new mare, and astride on the animal's back sat Esau, with her black mane and tail streaming over his shoulders. He had taken off the coat, and was holding it in his hands, examining it with a face full of childish interest. Sometimes he lifted it to his head, and stroke the stooping face at his shoulder, or the ugly, jealous head of the new bull-dog, who had mounted the kennel with him; but his chief attention was given to the coat—its buttons, its embroidery, its pockets—and his face all the time was so free from its accustomed expression of contempt—was so full of childlike peace, and of enjoyment of his shady seat, his companions, and his examination of the coat, that Anthony felt for his examination of the coat, that Anthony felt for a while but he thinking kindly of the former owner of that coat.

"Well, Gibbs," he said at last, "we ought to thank our stars and the Paddock Pony that we have not made greater fools of ourselves than we have."

"Yes, it looks innercent enough, sir, don't he?" said Gibbs. "I don't think I'll mind doing my best with him, sir, and seein' what can be made on him."

"You won't repent it, Gibbs," answered Anthony. "But, now, mind, not a word about our mistake, and the chase in the paddock to your dying day, Gibbs."

"No, sir," said Gibbs, grinning.

"That must remain a profound secret between you and I and the Paddock Pony."

"Yesser."

"Well, go in and ask Mrs. Milton for a glass of her best ale, for I see you're quite knocked up. And, I say, Gibbs!"

"Yesser."

"Don't forget to drink to the health and long life of the Paddock Pony—we are under great obligations to him."

GEN. BARRIOS, EX-PRESIDENT OF SAN SALVADOR.

THE execution of Gen. Barrios, legitimate President of San Salvador, by order of the usurper, Duefias, on the morning of the 29th of August last, was an act as atrocious in all respects, and in others still more horrible than the murder of our own lamented President. It was a deliberate assassination, notwithstanding the forms of a court-martial were gone through with to give a hypocritical coloring to the proceeding. We have commented on the act elsewhere, in an article which recapitulates the facts, and which obviates the necessity of more than a brief reference here. Gen. Barrios was expelled from San Salvador by an invasion from Guatemala, and his place given to a tool of the invaders. More than a year afterwards, an American vessel, in which he was passenger, was driven by stress of weather into Realeji, a port of Nicaragua. The authorities of this State, who have covered themselves with infamy by act, seized upon the General and delivered him up to the tender mercies of the barbarian who had dispossessed him of his lawful authority, and who ordered a convenient court-martial, which condemned him (for what, we are not told), at midnight, and shot him early in the morning, giving him but five hours to prepare for his end. This haste was made to prevent a demonstration on the part of the people. The assassination has sent a thrill of horror throughout all, and it is believed will lead to serious outbreaks and retaliations. Gen. Barrios was the leader of the Liberals of Central America, and deeply beloved.

UP IN A BALLOON.

WHAT a history would it be to trace the rise and progress of ballooning from the days of Montgolfier and his fire machine, to the present time, when Professor Lowe, with his grandly constructed globes, sails away into space with the same feeling of safety as though he were sitting down to cross the Brooklyn ferry.

The science of ballooning has reached that point, under his hands, that we may reasonably expect at any moment to find it emerging from its position as a subject of mere science and amusement, to one of general utility and as a certain means of travel. When we watch the easy flyrid with which a party sails away from his aeronautic amphitheatre at Central Park, and see the daring deeds that are done under his supervision, our belief in danger is utterly overthrown. A recital of one ascent will show our meaning.

It was announced on Saturday, September 30th, that during a detached excursion, young Harry Leslie, the famous walker of Niagara Falls on a tight-rope, would perform some acrobatic feats beneath the car of the balloon while it was suspended in the air.

At the appointed time the amphitheatre was crowded to overflowing, while every outside spot that could command a view, was occupied by myriads of people waiting for the exciting performance about to come off.

At 6 P. M. the balloon rose from amid the spectators, the car containing Prof. Lowe, Mr. F. Fleury, a passenger, and Harry Leslie. When at an altitude of 300 feet, Leslie threw himself upon the suspended rope, and in an instant after another was thrown him and his perilous feats began. He hung by the hands, the feet, the head and thighs, and swung fearfully above the heads of the multitude, the balloon at the time sailing at a height of nearly 2,000 feet. When over High Bridge he placed his head in one noose, his feet in another, and swung fearfully backward and forward until he seemed but a speck against the sky, when exhausted and fatigued Prof. Lowe and his companion pulled him into the car. Meanwhile the balloon has been slowly sailing through space, the air has died away, and the watch tells 6:30 P. M.

Just at this moment—to follow the description of the trip from the travelers' own account—we struck a current of air and the balloon went up the Hudson at a terrific pace, rising and descending at the will of the Professor. The scene was splendid, and as we passed the villages we were hailed and cheered, bonfires were lighted and guns fired, the sound of which, though faint, reaches us distinctly, and the cities and villages, now beginning to be lighted up, rush by with lightning speed.

At length the professor sights, four miles away, the house at which we are to land, and the anchor is thrown out, with 80 feet of rope attached, which in a few minutes catches in the roof of Mr. Peter Archer's house, on the grounds of Messrs. C. J. and E. Dewitt, landing us at 7:45 P. M., in the centre of a fine lawn, the place called Bramble Station, 20 miles from New York. The balloon being secured in a hollow, was left in charge of the Messrs. Tyler, and Harry Leslie started for New York on the train, having to hasten to Niagara, where he performs on Wednesday, while the Professor and Mr. Fleury are taken in charge by the Messrs. Dewitt, and enjoy the hospitalities of their palatial home until the following Monday morning.

On Sunday, at four o'clock, the gas is let out of the balloon, and the huge monster is packed in the presence of some hundreds of ladies and gentlemen from all parts of the adjacent country.

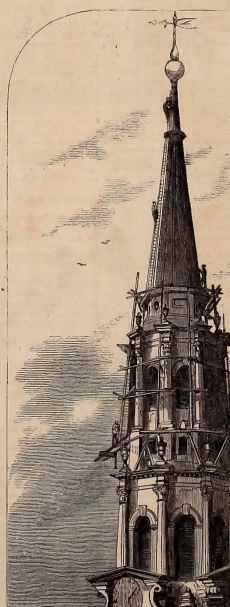
The comic incident of the voyage was the service of a writ for trespass on the professor by Peter Archer, the man on whose house the anchor caught. Mr. Archer was one of the "cow-boys" of the Revolution, and does not know how to read or write. For twenty years he has not been to New York, and for seventeen not to Yonkers, not two miles distant. The notice runs in this wise, literally:

"DAMAGE OF TRESPASS.

"On account of the Baloon being on the premises, the owner of the Baloon must hereby see Mr. Peter Archer before taken away. The house is damaged by the anchor of the Baloon."

Without asking the address of the scribe, the professor gravely examined the writ, and judicially decided: 1st. That a balloon could not commit trespass; 2d. that there was no trespass; 3d, that there was no damage; 4th. that there was no stamp on the document; at which last decision Mr. Peter Archer scratched his head, and declared that it was "that infernal stamp'vat was no pad!" and withdrew his claim for damage, which he had assessed at $5 in greenbacks.

The place of landing is known as the Neutral Ground, and the Messrs. Dewitt are located on the very spot where the English troops were buried in the Revolution.



The voyagers, after all their perils and pleasures, arrived in New York at ten A.M. on Monday.

MADAME EUPHROSYNE PAREPA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY FREDRICKS.

GEN. GERARDO BARRIOS, EX-PRESIDENT OF SAN SALVADOR, CENTRAL AMERICA, ASSASSINATED AUGUST 28, 1865.

REPAINTING THE SPIRE OF ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, BROADWAY, BETWEEN FULTON AND VESEY STREETS, N. Y.

1. The Landing. 2. The Grand Staircase and Picture Gallery. 3. Side View, showing the Principal Tower. 4. The Drawing Room and Dining Room. 5. View from the Turret, looking down the Sound. 6. The Front Entrance. 7. Front View of the House. 8. The Gateway. 9. The Pasture. 10. The Upper Hall. 11. The Music Hall. 12. The Carriage Porch—Four-in-Hand. 13. The Hennery.

THE RESIDENCE AND GROUNDS OF SIMEON LELAND, ESQ., AT NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

Why is the toothache like an unanswerable argument? Because it makes people hold their jaw.

The richest child in Europe. Roth's child.

Why is the ancestor of taxes the best man in the world? Because he never underrates anybody.

Why is a pig in a parlor like a house on fire? Because the sooner it's put out the better.

A newspaper young man says that a woman's heart is like the moon—it changes continually, but always has a man in it.

An Irish dragoon, on hearing that his widowed mother had married since he quitted Ireland, exclaimed, "Murther! I hope she won't have a son colder than my last step, I shall lose the estate."

The attempt to lay the Atlantic cable, has, for a time, terminated in disaster. We have witnessed the terminations until they have succeed in fetching the cable up again from the depths of the ocean, we cannot hope to see the "end" of it.

Man leads woman to the altar—in that act his leadership begins and ends.

A preacher at work in his vocation, always looks down in the mouth.

"Never saw such stirring times," as the sponge said to the saucepan.

Where can donkeys be spelt with one letter? When it's U (doubting personal meant.)

An uncophisticated alderman, on being told that the Italians and French have no W in their language, replied that he informed that he "couldn't run him in that way," and knowingly wanted to know how they could spell such a thing as wealth, or woman, or wine, without a W.

An old gentleman accused his servant of having stolen his stick. The man protested perfect innocence.

"Why, you know," rejoined his master, "that the stick could never have walked off with itself."

"Certainly, sir," answers the waiting stick."

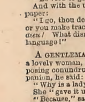
A Frenchman, just arrived, who had been taking lessons on the voyage from a fellow-passenger, complained of the difficulty of our grammar. Turning to his companion, he said:

"Why is a lady unlike a mirror?"

She" gave it up."

"Because, what the rude fellow, "a mirror reflects without speaking; a lady speaks without reflecting."

"Very good," said she. "Now answer me. Why is a man unlike a mirror?"



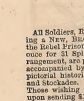
"I cannot tell you."

"Because the mirror is polished and the man is not."

HOME AGAIN!

DR. B. C. PERRY

Takes great pleasure in announcing to his patients and the public generally that on and after MONDAY, October 2, he can be found at his office, No. 49 Bond street, New York, where he is prepared to treat successfully all diseases of the scalp, loss of hair, and premature whitening. Also warts, moles, and worms effectually removed. No charge for consultation.



TO THE LADIES

Use PERRY'S Moth & Freckle Lotion, which is warranted to remove Moth & Blotches. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all Druggists. Price $2 a bottle. Sent by Express or Circular

AGENTS.

All Soldiers, Relatives of Soldiers, and Persons wanting a Neat, Illustrated, and Illustrated History of the Rebel Prisons, and their Horrors, should send at once for Special Soldiers, which, by a novel arrangement, are printed upon one sheet, 24 by 36 inches, accompanied by a book; the whole being a complete pictorial historic description of all the Rebel Prisons and Stockades. Price, single copy, from $2 to $4 each. Those wishing to become agents will receive a copy upon sending $1 by mail. Address

HOPKINS & CO., Publishers, 74 Bleecker street, N. Y.

SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW!

Novelty, Utility and Beauty.

BARNES' PATENT NECK-TIE AND COLLAR CLASP,

For holding the Neck-tie and Collar together instead of pinning or sewing them.

Good inducements given to Agents in all parts of the country.

For terms and samples address the manufacturers

BARNES, ROBINSON & CO.,

Providence, R. I.

Piano Study and Practice is Made Attractive.

By the System adopted in "RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD." Every day practice per se becomes exercises, but SPRIGHTLY STUDIES throughout, and CHARMING BALLADS for practice, at every step. No one who has used this book will ever use or recommend any other. It is all that can be desired. Sold by all music dealers. Price $3 75. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

COMIC CARD PHOTOS.

Of the latest and best subjects. Agents wanted in every town. Send 15 cents for sample and catalogue to H. RIVINGTON & CO., No. 650 Broadway, New York.

I CANNOT SING THE OLD SONGS.

Words and Music composed by Claribel.

I cannot sing the old songs
I sang long years ago,
For heart and voice would fail me,
And fresh tears would flow;
For by-gone hours come o'er my heart
With sad recalling,
I canno sing the old songs,
Or drs on their dreamy again.

Price 30 cents. Ma cd free.

FREDERICK BLUME, Publisher, tf 208 Bowery.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1863; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Completely Constructed Novelty; is SCIENTIFICALLY in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, sews with DOUBLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to each evolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Skirr, Tuck, Bind, Braid, Cord, &c.; requires no Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a lifetime; being simplest it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is not a small Pocket Machine affair, but does the same work like others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work must be done by the Regular Machines.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a perfect running stitch, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of the genuine Running Stitch, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Sole delivery guaranteed to every wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address
SILEX CO.,
521-33 Biddeford, Maine.

CoughNoMore

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

624-578

Army of the Cumberland Badges & Pins.

Also for every Division of 3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, 11th, 12th, 14th, 20th, 24th Corps, all in 16-karat gold, properly executed.

ARMY BADGE RINGS, enameled, for every Corps and Division, of the same gold. Both Pins and Rings sent by mail $3. Discount to Dealers. Address

D. P. BEACH,
13 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

AGENTS !!!

$10 Per day made selling the Sketches entitled the "VICTORIOUS PRISONS OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS, and Scenes from Life as PRISONERS OF WAR," with key of 24 pages. It is decidedly the best ornamental, historical work that has ever been presented to the public, and will be purchased by everybody. Send for terms to agents on receipt of $1. Call on, or address with stamp, ROBBINS & CO., 74 Bleecker street, New York.

NED BUNTLINE'S OWN SERIES.

None but the best Stories in this Series.

No. 1. The Particide; or, Doom of the Assassin. 25 cents; 2. Rose Seymour, the Pretty Ballet Girl. 25 cents; 3. Mermet Ben, the Astrologer King. 25 cents; 4. Hetta Bride and Rose of New Orleans. 25 cents.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

BEADLE & ADAMS,
524-5 128 Nassau street, N. Y.

Just Published,
No. 92 of
FRANK LESLIE'S
Budget of Fun,
FOR NOVEMBER,

Being the Comic and Satirical History of the Month. The large cartoon represents the modern Columbus

Debarking the Egg: the Pet Pentient; the Mexican Pig and the Emperor; and John Bull, Brother Jonathan and the Fenians; besides other humorous engravings. There are also sixteen pages of the best and most original reading, full of fun, interest and excitement.

PileRemedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

ALBUMS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Holding 24 Pictures, and sold at 75 cents. Albums of all descriptions free by mail on receipt of the price.

C. HUGHES,
Album Manufacturer.
102 CENTRE STREET, N. Y.

GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION
BY THE
NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION,
213 BROADWAY, N. Y.

12 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from	$250 to	$300
12 Mahogany Seraphim Cases,	125 to	225
150 Music Boxes,	15 to	45
100 Silver Revolving Pistols Cases,	15 to	35
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets,	15 to	35
100 Solid Silver Tea and Table Spoons,	15 to	30
100 Gold Hunting-case Watches,	75 to	150
100 Diamond Rings,	50 to	200
200 Gold Watches,	60 to	160
500 Ladies' Gold Watches,	40 to	75
500 Silver Watches,	25 to	40

Diamond Pins, Studs, Sets, Cars, Florentine Mosaic, Jet, Lava and Cameo Ladies' Sets, Gold Pens, with Gold and Silver Extension Holders, Silver Butter Dishes Stud Horses, Gold Chains, Plated and Chased Gold Rings, Gold Thimbles, Lockets, Silver Baskets and

TUNE AND PRICE. Every description of the best make and latest style, valued at $500,000!

To be Sold for One Dollar Each without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you receive what you will receive.

Distribution is made in the following manner: CERTIFICATES, naming each Article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well MIXED, and one envelope containing the Certificate or order for some Article, worth at least One Dollar, and not more than Five Hundred, is sold or sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, at One Dollar each. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it draws, and in what manner he may obtain it ONE TO FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and can then send ONE DOLLAR and receive the Article, or can choose any other one Article on our List of the same value.

NO BLANKS—Every purchaser gets value. Parties dealing with us may depend on having prompt returns, and the Articles will be immediately sent to any address by return mail or express. Entire satisfaction guaranteed in all transactions. No Certificates for $1; thirteen for $5.

AGENTS WANTED. Send a stamp for a Circular. All letters should be addressed

T. BENTON & CO., Box 5567, P. O., New York.

METROPOLITAN ENTERPRISE
GREAT GIFT SALE
OF THE
New York & Providence
JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.
Capital--$1,000,000 !
Depot, 558 Broadway.

An immense stock of Pianos, Watches, Jewelry and Fancy Goods, all to be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you see what you will receive.

CERTIFICATES,

Naming each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents; five for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 65 for $10; and 150 for $20.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to pay the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, Sewing Machine, or any Set of Jewelry on our list, for $1; and in no case can they get more than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. Address

C. M. DUNN & CO.,
558 Broadway, New York.

☞ Immense Depots have also been opened in Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati, under the management of Messrs. DUNN & CO.

Writing Paper, Envelopes,
Blank and Memorandum Books, Cheap, at
522-38 LEAKE'S, 189 Nassau street, New York.

Agents WANTED Agents

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 521-33

$3.00 ALBUMS. $3.00

A Fine Album, two Gilt Clasps, Relief Sides, finely finished, for holding 80 FULL SIZE Card Photographs. Sent by return mail for $3.00. The neatest and cheapest Album in the market. TRADE and Agents supplied. $34.00 per dozen. Cash with order. 25 per cent. off by way. New York. Ladies and Gents, please send your address for interesting catalogue.

To Beautify the Complexion,
USE SHILLITO' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.

The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and renders it soft, smooth and transparent, to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. Sent to any address on receipt of Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents. Address

C. F. SHILLITO,
524-36 285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York.

Spanish Curling Cream, Warranted to Curl the most Straight or Stiff Hair. Mailed for $1. Address GEO. BLEAKLE & CO., 189 Broadway, N. Y. tf

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S
Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., being borne by the very best physicians compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE arrests that from low forehands, upper lip, or any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale face, neck, arms, etc., GIVES THE richest, red and tested cross. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 5 Bond street.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been submitted to the Faculty of Paris. We have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Lippincott, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co. Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$6 ELEGANT $8 WATCH.

Fine Imported Watches for the Retail Trade at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. A BEAUTIFUL Double Case Silver Watch, small size, Jewelled, Chain, Key, &c. Sample, with Chain, Key, and Gold Locket to each, $30 per Case of Six. Sample, by mail, for $6.

An ELEGANT Gold Plated Engraved Double Case Watch, Fine Time-keeper, Gold Locket, Chain, Key, &c., to each, $42 per Case of Six. Sample, free by mail, for $8.

Fine Double Hunting Case Gold Plated Watches, Jewelled, with Improvements, Regulated, per Case of Six, $60. Sample, by mail, $10.

Silver Composite Hunting Case Watches, Magic Cases; Jewelled, in Case of Six, $30. Sample, $6.

Coin Silver Hunting Lepines, Warranted, per Case of Six, $24. Sample, $5.

Fine Silver English Levers, Full Jeweled, Superior, per Case of Six, Sample, $30.

Jewelled Silver Levers, Hunting, Silver Cases, Large Bezels, Fancy Styles, per Case of Six, $100. Sample, $20.

IMPERIAL WATCH, with Thermometer, Compass, Calendar, Second Hand, Independent Movements, Barometer, a Storm, Heat and Time Indicator, imitation of $200 Gold Hunting Case, per Case of Six, Sample, $30.

Gold and Silver Watches of every description. Catalogues free. Sole delivery guaranteed to every wanted. Address orders

CASTLEY BROTHERS, Importers,
102 Nassau St., N. Y. Established 1856.

CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERYBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without tying. Send 25 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 521-33

Tin Type and Ferrotype Albums—for holding 20 pictures, 10 by 12 inches, $1.50. Sent postpaid. TRADE PRICES $13.00 and $9.00 per doz. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York.

1,000,000 Purchasers Wanted.
Articles to sell everywhere. Goods sent free. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 522-31

The West Indian Hair Curler, warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair, on the first application, with ease and in the shortest time. Sent to any address on receipt of $1. Address
THE HENDERSON HAIR CURLING CO.
Box 5,231, New York Post Office.

Why squander Money on useless artificial chinning to curl hair, when you can purchase 2, STOCKTON'S WELL-KNOWN CURLERS for the purpose of $2, which will curl the hair of male or female immediately, and will last for months. Sent to any part of the United States, by mail, free of postage, on receipt of $2. Address
STOCKTON WELLS, Jersey City, N. J.

Curls! Curls!!
Ringlet Spun Yarn. A sample of Prof. Robb's Curling Yarn will be sent free to any address. Anybody can curl their straight hair on the first application (without burning) by soft, natural curls. Send stamp for circular, with stamp, PROF. B. H. ROBB, Parkman, Ohio. 524-5

Only 60 Cents.
The Art of Painting Photographs in Water Colors. Bound in morocco; also a full set of Paints and Brushes. Mailed free for 60 cents. Address
CRAWFORD & WILLIS,
524-7 No. 147 Broadway, New York.

GROVER & BAKER'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, N. Y. ot

Fun! Send your address to Drawer 5,970, Chicago, Ill., and receive by return mail something that will please you. ☞ It costs you nothing.

Or, MAGIC MADE EASY.—A New Book, just out. The most complete book on Legerdemain, Slight of Hand, &c., ever published. Price 25 cents. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address BEADLE & ADAMS, 128 Nassau street, N. Y.

Just published, Beadle's Dime Book of Winter Sports, containing Skating, Coasting, Sleighing, Gaming, Snow-Balling, Forts, Snow-Shoeing, Fun and Games for the Winter Season, Comprising Magical, Chemical, and Optical performances of the best Magicians, Wizards, and Prestidigitateurs. 64 pages, with illustrated cover. Price only 25 cents; sent for $1—mailed free. Satisfaction guaranteed.

BEADLE & ADAMS & CO., Publishers, Rimpire, N.Y.
522-38

$2,000 a Year can be made with the instructions which I send everywhere for 25c. Address
525-27 W. FRIZZLE, Baltimore, Md.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newport, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HAINDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Rates charged low rates. 0000

LOOK! LOOK!—Full instructions by which a person can can master the art of Ventriloquism in a few hours. Sent by mail for 25 cents. Three copies for $1. Address 525-28 C. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Illinois.

Look Here, Boys!—My Golden Compound will force the beard to grow on the smoothest face in 21 days, or money refunded. Sent by mail for 50 cents, or three packages for $1. Address
525-28 M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Illinois.

Pimples, Moth, Freckles, Sunburn, Ringworm and Tetter vanish completely by the application of DR GRAFF'S Sun Flower Extract, warranted. Sold by druggists. Sent by mail, by DR. GRAFF, Medical Hall, Albany, N. Y. Sent by mail. 523-38

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and are to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 10 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple yet wild acquirement all can possess, secured by certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the numerary of both sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

$5 Something New—$5

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has attained the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the patron, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can attest. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
624-36 P. O. Drawer 202, Albany, N. Y.

BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of

PROF. DE BREUX'S FRISER LE CHEVAUX.

Containing no metal to rust the most delicate and stubborn hair or either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed from observation, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

"How 'Tis Done; or, The Secret Out." The original and only "BOOK OF WONDERS," containing the Great Secret of all Sketches and Whatever is Startling and Mystifying and Marked Cards Exposed and Explained; also, Fortune-Telling, Verdaquism, Planchette Secrets, Indelible Liquids, Love Powders, Secret Arts never before published. This is the only "original" BOOK OF WONDERS. All others are imitations of this book. Price only 25 cents—if for $1. Mailed free.
HUNTER & CO.,
521-24 Hinsdale, N. H.

The Great Money-Making Article. Everybody needs it. Agents or Soldiers can make $10 a day. Sample, with particulars, sent free by mail for 25 cents. Address
G. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.
000

SAVAGE & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF LANTERNS AND BURNERS,
286 Greenwich St., New York.

Fifty varieties of the latest improved Kerosene Oil Lanterns. Also, Patenters of the CELEBRATED SAVAGE AND CO. NO-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted immediately. Send for circular.
624-39 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a peculiar Self-Adjusting Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
505 Broadway, New York.

A GIFT FOR YOU AT THE PHILADELPHIA GIFT BOOK PUBLISHING HOUSE.

The Eleventh Year of the Enterprise.

NEW BOOKS AND NEW GIFTS.

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK!

A new Classified Catalogue of Books just issued, of over 50 pages of Books in every department of Literature, with the Books alphabetically forming Clubs, &c., &c.

The best place in the world to buy books is at the "EVANS ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK SALE."

Catalogues sent free on receipt of red stamp. Address
G. G. EVANS,
525-28 630 Chestnut street, Phila.

Very Powerful Microscopes.

No single lens instrument can be made to magnify 2,000 inch these. Free by mail for 40 cents and stamp. You, of different powers for $1.00. Address T. EDWIN KING, Box 2,852, Boston, Mass.

Vineland Lands. To all wanting Farms.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufactories and others. Churches, schools and good society. Title perfect. Rapidly improving place for residence and building. The only beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Horace Rountree, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune
"It is one of the most promising tracts, in an almost best position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

GEORGE L. CANNON'S
AIR, WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS,
KITCHEN RANGES, &c.,
614 BROADWAY, NEW YORK. BETWEEN BLEECKER & HOUSTON STS.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. White Pearl Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, etc., without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail, or express. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. 1,000 different kinds. Send stamp for a Catalogue. 000 VICTOR DELAFO, 80 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest designations. Also, Gem Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BIDON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufacturers and Importers Materials,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our own manufactures of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are headquarters for the following, viz.:
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Our list of views is largest and most varied, including those of the Seven Days' Battles.

Obtained at great expense and forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION AND COUNTRY

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,
Yorktown,	Fenton Trains,
Gettysburgh,	Hanover Junction,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,
Savage Station,	Rickahominy,
Fredericksburgh,	City Point,
Fairfax,	Nashville,
Richmond,	Petersburgh,
Deep Bottom,	Belle Plain,
Manitors,	Chattanooga,
Fort Nergan,	Atlanta,
Charleston,	Mobile,
Florida,	Strawberry Plains,
	&c. &c.

American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, &c., &c. Also, Revolving Stereoscopes, for public or private exhibition. Our Catalogue is sent to dealers on receipt of ordinary rental of Stamp.

Photographic Albums.

We were the first to introduce them into the United States and we now produce Immense Quantities of every style, ranging in price from 50 cents to $20. Our ALBUM with Ivy ornament, is the most beautiful and popular style ever manufactured. They will be sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER.

The Trade will find our Albums the most Saleable they can buy.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue contains the Names of Persons are different subjects (in which additions are continually being made) of Gallery Keepers throughout the U. S.

Mathew Brady,	359 Broadway.
102 Reg't,	205 other Officers, 126 Privates,
104 Colonels,	30 Major Generals, 32 Generals,
20 Admirals,	175 Flags, 80 Prominent Women, and a large number of miscellaneous subjects.

Including reproductions of Celebrated Paintings, Statuary, Fruits, Statuettes, &c. Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp. An order for One Dozen Cards, assorted as desired, will be filled on receipt of $1.00, and sent by mail, paid.

Photographers and others will find it to their interest to call, as we will please them by the low prices at which they can buy.

All Orders by Mail or Express will receive prompt attention.

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,

A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years; not detected. Price $1. 19 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO.,
000 133 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

WONDERS WILL NEVER CEASE!!

During a residence in Spain, I obtained of a Spanish savan a correctly constructed HOROSCOPE, the only instrument in the world capable of producing a fac simile of an absent person. By its aid I am enabled to produce an accurate PHOTOGRAPH of your future wife or husband, also the date of marriage. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail.
Address MADAME FANNIE A. MASON,
524-5 P. O. Drawer 32, Albany, New York.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are composed of several different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana. They are as beautiful as solid gold, and are warranted at one-eighth the cost. The cases are beautifully designed and engraved, and are made in the full Hunting Lever, and so exact an imitation of gold as to defy detection by any but experts. The movements are the well-known St. Jimer Watch Company of Europe and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, fancy centre, and the adjusting regulator, line dial and skeleton hands.

The watches are all Hunting cases and of three sizes, the smallest being for Ladies. A case of six will be sent by Mail or Express for $15.00. A single one sent in a handsome case for $25. They will readily sell for three times their cost. We also import a very superior finish and elegant watch which we can sell at $30 each, or $180 per case of six. Descriptive circulars sent out for Ladies and Gents. We are sole agents for this watch in the United States, and offer a genuine watch that does not bear our Trade Mark. Persons ordering watches, C. O. D., will please remit $2 per case of the amount with their order. Orde s for any kind of watches, jewelry and fancy goods promptly attended to. ARCANA WATCH CO., No. 62 FULTON ST., New York City. Importers & Dealers in Watches of every description.
525-26 Successors to Girard W. Devaugh & Co.

Holloway's Pills,—The blood is the very essence of health and life. It furnishes the components of flesh, bone, muscle, nerve and integument. The stomach is the apparatus—the arteries the channels through which the nutrient fluid circulates by which the waste matter is carried off. Upon the stomach and bowels, these medicines act simultaneously.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by WM. EARL M.D., 100 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 13 White Street, New York.

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.

Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.

Treating on "Psychologic Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate, win the undying love, and marry any person they wish, irrespective of age or condition. Sent by mail for 25 cents, by E. D. LOCKE & CO., Box 1518, Portland, Maine.
522-25

Wanted! Attention!—(Something new.) I will send by mail, Designs in beautiful MILITARY ALBUM, with twenty-four pictures of our modern Generals for $3 per dozen. Agents wanted immediately. Price per dozen to agents, $3 per dozen; or $1 75 per half dozen. Send all orders to C. L. BRIGGS, 14 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill. 521-24

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through medical impotence and quackery. By inclosing a post-paid envelope, a copy of the work in question may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y. tf

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW and useful articles. Great value to families; all will pay great profits. Send 15 cents and get 36 pages; or 25 cents and get 80 pages and a sample article.
517-29 EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with the date of marriage. This is one of the testimonials without number can assert. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, and sending a stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 98, West Troy, N. Y. 524-29

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of September 5, 1865,

No. 13300	drew	$100,000
No. 16959	"	50,000
No. 4009	"	20,000
No. 9733	"	10,000
No. 21621	"	5,000

Being the five capital prizes.
Prizes cashed. Information furnished. Highest cash paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make GILDAL without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Patents and Curing Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Verdaquism Made Easy; Information of Importance to Ladies; how to make the Love of any one, &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 5027 P. O., New York. 522-26

WHISKERS AND MOUSTACHES

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using

DR. SEVIGNE'S
RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.

The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Roots and Glands in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the élite of Paris and London with the most astonishing success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, with descriptive circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

LOGAN, STURGEON, BROUGH AND WIRZ.

With Portraits and Characters—President Lincoln, with his convictions and personal change in his physiognomy in four years. SCENES OF CARNAGE, by MRS. WYLIE—The American Man-Monkey. OUR SOCIAL RELATIONS.—Work for Women—How to Win Love—Faces and the Wonder about Abraham Lincoln—Swedenborg—What they Say—Brain and Mind—Equal Rights—Going South—Visitors Coming. Business—Hints to Agents—In the Sanctum—Miscellaneous—Ideal —The Annabilis, with cuts, and much other interesting matter in the Oct. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL; 30 Cents. Newsmen have it. Address
FOWLERS & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway.
524-5

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen—Sample, 10 cents. Photograph Cards (52 views), $1.25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Marked Back Playing Cards, $1 00 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price. Address FORWARDING AGENCY, 83 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

Dr. Sherwood's Truss, 545 Broadway. Has no spring around the body to shape; is the only Radical Cure Truss known, because the only one that can be worn in bed without pain.
SUPPORTERS
For the Abdomen, the prolapsed Uterus and Rectum, which will do their work when everything else fails.
545 BROADWAY.

The Great New England Remedy!
Dr. J. W. Poland's
WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the virtues of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicines generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass.
Burnham & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Peter F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE.

THE POCKET SEWING MACHINE

Specially adapted for Quilting, Embroidering and Braiding.

Easily used—being held in the hand, and traverses the material to be quilted or embroidered; works with great rapidity, and gives entire satisfaction. Follows any design stamped on the cloth. Sent by mail, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Price, $7; Heavy Silver Plated Machine, $8. State Rights for sale. Address A. S. MILLER, Secretary Pocket Sewing Machine Company, 17 Wall street, New York. tf

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.

R. G. GRAHAM, 199 Nassau St., N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed

From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by Perrin's Depilatory Powder. Mailed to any address for $1 25, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-27

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER. Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-27

Asthma Cured.

Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield to this remedy. Mailed for $2. Sent postpaid to any address. S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free. 525-27

Stereoscopicons and Magic Lantern for PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS, with Printed Views of all prominent places, men and events, for sale by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 924 Chestnut st., Philadelphia. Price and illustrated Catalogue sent gratis. 513-25

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Statesmen of America for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actresses for 25 cents. Address 521-26 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature. Send 25cts. CHARLES MASON & CO.,
207 Broadway, New York.

Notice.—Those wishing to become rich or successful in anything they wish, should send 25 cents to one of the Gipsies' Seven Mystic or Secret Charms, as they are the most magical to success or happiness in marriage or their great benefits and uses, send a postage stamp to E. F. HAYO, Ballston Spa, New York, and get full explanation. 525-25

Adventures of Jeff. Davis.

A most comical book; just out; 40 fine engravings; only 15 cents; by first o ass free. Address HUNTER & BRO., Hinsdale, N. H. 524-7

Agents Wanted.

Live Agents wanted everywhere. If you want employment and a good chance to make money, send for address and circular to BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK, 524-7 BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK, Hartford, Conn.

$90 A Month.

Agents wanted for six rapidly new articles, just out. Address C. T. GAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine. 521-24

WHISKERS.

$1. For One Dollar I will send, sealed and $1. postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box, 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburg, N.Y.
524-27

New Books, New Books, and Sporting Goods. New Styles Cartes de Visite. Sample 25 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. F. MANCHE, 638 Broadway, New York.

THE BEST JUVENILE MAGAZINE
NOW PUBLISHED IS

Our Young Folks

Published at $2 a year; 20 cents a single number, by
TICKNOR & FIELDS,
124 Tremont street, Boston.

It is filled with the best literature, and the most attractive pictures. In the year 1865 it has reached a circulation of FIFTY THOUSAND COPIES.

Send 20 cents for specimen number, and you will be sure to subscribe for it for your children.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $20 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gold and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. County rights free, sales immense, demand increasing, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.

M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers,
o 102 Nassau street, New York.

SMOLANDER'S
COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF
BUCKU,
Cures Diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, &c. Price ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. BARNES & CO., and F. C. WELLS & CO., New York. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents. 520-33o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!
Cured by Reide's Crimson Ointment. Price, 31 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-33o

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.
Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-33o

BALLOU'S
PATENTED
FRENCH
YOKE SHIRTS
Warranted to FIT, and to be
CHEAPER
for the same QUALITIES and MAKE than those of any other Shirt House in this city.
Circular containing drawings and prices sent free.
For sale by all the principal dealers throughout the United States.
BALLOU BROTHERS, 403 Broadway, N. Y.
o

EDITOR OF FRANK LESLIE'S: DEAR SIR—With your permission I wish to say to the readers of your paper, that I will send, by return mail, to all who wish it (free), a recipe, with full directions, for making and using a simple VEGETABLE BALM, that will effectually remove, in ten days, Pimples, Blotches, Tan, Freckles, and all Impurities of the Skin, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth and beautiful.

I will also mail free to those having Bald Heads or Bare Faces simple directions and information that will enable them to start a full growth of luxuriant Hair, Whiskers or Mustache in from 20 to 30 days.

All applications answered by return mail, without charge. Respectfully yours,
THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
No. 823 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents Wanted
For the Standard History of the War, complete in one large royal octavo volume of over 1,000 pages. Splendidly illustrated with 22 fine portraits of Generals, and battle scenes. This is just the book the people want. It presents a rare chance for agents. Teachers, ladies, energetic men, and especially returned and disabled officers and soldiers, in want of profitable employment, will find it peculiarly adapted to their condition. Send for Circular. Address
JONES, BROS. & CO.,
524-5o Philadelphia, Pa., and Cincinnati, O.

AGENTS WANTED.
$10 A Day can be Easy Made $10
By selling Engravings, Card Photographs, and Stationery Packets. Our Stationery packages excell all others. Each packet contains Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencil, &c., and Jewelery worth a dollar at retail, price only 50 cts. We will send Agents 100 Packages and a Silver Watch for $17. We have a fine assortment of STEEL ENGRAVINGS and PORTRAITS, very popular and saleable; will send 100 assorted kinds for $15 that will realize $50; will send a sample lot for $5 that will sell for $15. Send stamp for catalogue, terms, etc.
o HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman street, N. Y.

For a Fortune
Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-33o

STEINWAY & SONS,
Manufacturers of
Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,
Warerooms, No. 71 & 73 East 14th St.,
Between Union Square and Irving Place,
NEW YORK. tfo

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 10 cents. Address F. B. FOOTE, M. D., 1130 Broadway, New York.
0000

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,
Magnifying 500 TIMES, mailed to any address for 50 cts Terms of agents and powers for $1. Address F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.
0000

THE NEXT APPLICANT FOR PARDON AT THE WHITE HOUSE, AND HE'LL GET ONE TOO, "SURE FOR."
THE D—L (loquiter)—"Mr. Pope Walker, who ordered 'Open fire on Sumter,' has got his paper. That's encouraging—so here goes!"

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

THE LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING EMPORIUM
OF
THOMAS AND MORISSETT,
No. 845 Broadway,
SUPPLIES EVERY ARTICLE a LADY, CHILD, or INFANT REQUIRES, in the furnishing of their TOILET or WARDROBE. 525-36o

Decalcomanie, a New Process to Embellish Porcelain, Wood, Glass, Silk, Velvet, Leather, etc. Can be practiced by every one at P. E. VACQUEREL'S, 811, Broadway. 524-5o

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted and spread information, which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address
Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburg, Kings County New York.

To all Buyers of Jewelry.
AT
B. T. HAYWARD'S,
206, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Can be found a full and complete assortment of GOLD & PLATED JEWELRY, WATCH CHAINS, LOCKETS, BRACELETS, &c. Also Headquarters for Army, Navy, and Masonic Badges and Emblems.
☞ The Trade are respectfully invited to call and examine the Stock. o

"A Scientific Wonder."
EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,
One Dollar Each.
(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)
AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to INDICATE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. Correct in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." All attempts to imitate are an imposition. Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-plain Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country on receipt of price. Satisfactory guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to
J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
o 481 and 203 Broadway, N. Y.

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address
o O. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $10
A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Out Hands, "English Movements," and Correct Timekeeper, with an accurate "Miniature Calendar," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat case, WITH 7 BEAUTIFUL VERY CHARMS, for only $10.
A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Miniature Calendar, &c., specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.
English and American LEVERS from $25 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.
Address, CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20
$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and plating by the Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions cost $30. L. L. TODD & CO., 29 Nassau street, New York.
SEND FOR A CIRCULAR,
519-3lo

The National Park Bank
of New York.
Capital,...$2,000,000 | Surplus,...$1,300,000
This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.
J. J. L. WORTH, Cashier.
New York, August 21, 1865. 519-3lo

Shults' Ongnent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid for 50 cts. Address O. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y. 512-24

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S
PIANOFORTES.
99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money is the ROBINSON PEN, warranted for one year, 14 carats fine; also every variety of Penholders on hand. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office, No. 15 Maiden lane. 519-3lo

Buy Me and Try Me.—Only 5 cents (five cents). J. G. BELLIS, 83 Nassau street, N. Y. tfo

Dispense with the Laundry.
Patent Self-Fastening Shirt Collars, 75 cents each; the American do., 50 cents; Steel Bosoms, 75 cents; Cuffs and Wrists, 75 cents. Samples mailed free on receipt of price, by OTTO ERNST, Patentee, 62 Bowery, New York. o

SAFETY LAMP.
No smoke, no chimney. Portable, not dangerous. Free from smell, and has all the advantages of gas without its expense. A great LIGHT, all for a penny for six hours. Send for full description. For sale, Wholesale and Retail, by the LIG-NO-LINE FLUID and LAMP COMPANY, No. 12 Gold street. o

Ladies and Gentlemen—If you wish to Marry you can do so by addressing me. I will send you valuable information that will enable you to marry happily and speedily (irrespective of age, wealth or beauty. All letters strictly confidential. The desired information sent by return mail. Please enclose postage or stamped envelope, addressed to yourself. Address SARAH B. LAMBERT, Greenpoint, King's County, N. Y.

QUADRILLE BAND.
Quintette Quadrille Band—In five separate books—1st and 2d Violin, Clarionet, Cornet and Bass, containing 22 sets Quadrilles, 40 Fancy and Contra Dances, Polkas, Marches, &c. Price $6 per set, or $8 with half a quire of Music Paper bound in each book. This set of books contains everything necessary for the season's business of any band. The air being "cued in" to the first violin part it can be used for any number of instruments from one to five. Sent by mail post-paid. ELIAS HOWE, 103 Court street, Boston. o

HELMBOLD'S FLUID EXTRACT BUCHU.

STONE TOP

HOLTEN TOP

Seen gathering Buchu Leaves at the Cape of Good Hope, for
H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist,
594 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 526 Vol. XXI. NEW YORK, OCTOBER 28, 1865 [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

Redistributing the Sexes.

FEMALES are in excess of males in almost all, if not, indeed, in all countries of the world, except the United States, where, in the total of white population, there were, according to the last census, an excess of upwards of 700,000 males. This excess is partly to be accounted for from the circumstance that among emigrants males are most numerous. Men are better able to leave their homes and settle abroad than women, and furthermore, are not so much kept at home by local attachments. They feel it incumbent "to go and seek their fortunes," impelled by ambition, love of adventure, or hope of speedy gain.

These causes have operated powerfully in some of our Eastern States, and have drawn heavily on their male population, so much so, indeed, as to leave a preponderance of females in all of them, except Maine and Vermont. In Massachusetts, in 1860, there were 37,000 more females than males. In New York there were 11,000 more; while in California there were 141,000 more males than females, and in Indiana 59,000 more, Wisconsin 40,000 more. In the territories, the disproportion of the sexes was, and is, naturally much greater.

This unequal distribution of the sexes, obviously detrimental to the morality, as well as the material welfare of the country, has long attracted the attention of reflecting men, but has not, until lately, called out any practical, or attempt at practical remedy, except on a very small scale. A few years ago, Governor Slade of Vermont, undertook to promote the emigration of women from New England to some of the Western States, but only a few hundred, we believe, went out under his auspices. It was not until last winter that the matter was made the subject of Executive notice and recommendation. Gov. Andrew of Massachusetts, who combines more of practical philosophy, with propagandist zeal than any statesman of the day, called the attention of the Legislature of that State to the disproportion of sexes as a matter deserving of consideration, if not of legislative action. We have not his message at hand, and cannot say if he made any specific recommendation in the premises.

About the same time the Legislature of Washington Territory, within which, in 1860, there were 8,225 males, and only 2,913 females, acting under the inspirations of a Mr. Mercer, authorized him, as agent, to undertake the enlistment of women for the territory. It made no appropriation for the purpose, nor did it attach any emolument to his office. It seems that this gentleman came east, met with hearty co-operation from Governor Andrew, and especially from Gen. Grant, and was received with favor in those districts where the female population most largely predominates. The net results of his efforts seem to be, that upwards of one thousand women, most of them between the ages of 16 and 20 years, have determined to cast their fortunes in Washington Territory. The Government has given them the use of the steamer Continental, which, however, the agent of the territory is obliged to equip and cupply, and in doing so has conferred a more tangible benefit on the country than can possibly result from keeping up a "show fleet," in European waters, at a thousand times the cost. The speedy population and development of an important territory, the amelioration of the condition of a considerable body of our population, with concurrent moral elevation, is an object worthy of governmental attention and aid.

The movement may be regarded as experimental, but there can be little doubt of its success, and, if successful, it will probably result in establishing an equilibrum in the distribution of the sexes throughout the country, so far as that equilibrium can be established, under the present preponderance of males.

The circumstances under which these young women go to the Pacific slope, contrast strongly with these which attached to the somewhat egresponding immigration of women to the colonies of Virginia and Georgia. The mothers of the "chivalry," or a large proportion of them, were women taken from houses of correction, or arrested for social improprieties not necessary to name. They were sent over at Government expense and sold to the settlers. A hundred pounds of tobacco was the price of "a buxom lass" in Virginia.

The fair emigrants to Washington Territory are such only as can establish the highest character for virtue and propriety. They pay sums for their passage proportionate to their means, or engage to pay a certain sum from their earnings when they arrive at their destination, where they are guaranteed $4 a week and board, with higher prices for services of a higher grade. The wives and daughters of slain Union soldiers pay, or engage to pay, but $25 for a voyage of 10,000 miles.

CITY ENORMITIES—EVERY BRUTE CAN BEAT HIS BEAST.

No one who has the good of the country at heart can fail to wish "God speed!" to the Continental, with its load of youth and womanly hope. Its passengers go to ameliorate a frontier society, to build up homes, for there is no home without woman's presence, and to help to lay deep and firm the foundations of a State. No mission could be worthier. May its success be commensurate with its merits.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 28, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to Frank Leslie, 537 Pearl street, New York.

Notice—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the lea only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

WANTED, a COMPLETE FILE OF THIS PAPER, from May, 1861, to May, 1862, inclusive, Volumes XII. and XIII. Address, stating terms, Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

The Currency.

Once more this vexed subject has been dragged upon the carpet, and we have a full exposition of the views of Secretary McCulloch on our floating cash capital, in a speech delivered by him at Fort Wayne, Indiana, on Wednesday, Oct. 11th.

In that speech he expressed—as was to be expected—the strongest desire to place our currency at a specie value, and declared his belief that such a consummation can not be arrived at unless a large portion of it is removed from circulation by funding. He could not believe in our present prosperity, as long as it is based upon depreciated paper, and saw no safety but in a return to a currency redeemable in specie.

He attributed the present inflation in prices and tendency to reckless speculation to be the result of a redundant circulation, and drew a rather gloomy picture of our future financial condition, in case the volume of currency were not reduced so as meet only the legitimate wants of the country. Apart from mere financial considerations, however, the Secretary advocated the curtailment of our paper currency, on grounds of public morality. "The existing inflation," he said, "is corrupting the public morals, and converting the business of the country into gambling, not confined to stock and produce boards, but spreading through our towns and into the rural districts. Men," he continued, "are apparently getting rich, while morality languishes, and the productive industry of the country is being diminished." He nevertheless thinks that a nation that has raised the largest armies known in modern times, and sustained them in the field without borrowing from other nations, has within it the strength and capacity to escape the financial disasters which have invariably attended on the close of great wars in other countries, and are supposed to be inevitably consequent on heavy issues of irredeemable paper. He thinks if Congress will authorize, at an early day, the funding of legal tenders, the currency can be contracted within reasonable limits, without any serious disturbance to legitimate business. He will probably recommend such action to Congress. His action in this direction has been decided, and he has exhausted his authority in funding the legal tenders. Within a few weeks, availing himself of an overlooked clause in an old act of Congress, he has withdrawn $50,000,000 of greenbacks and interest bearing notes, and all the late monthly treasury reports have shown a constant reduction in the volume of paper, which, though small as compared with the total issue, must, nevertheless, ultimately tell on it, and bring it nearer to what the Secretary regards as "the wants of legitimate business."

We are not among those who regard our currency as very greatly in excess of our requirements. These requirements have greatly increased within four years, and will increase with unprecedented rapidity every coming year, and themselves rapidly absorb whatever there may be of excess in our present issues. Still, there can be no doubt of the general soundness of Mr. McCulloch's position. It will not require the withdrawal of many millions to eliminate the gambling surplus, equalize prices, and restore that financial steadiness which are essential to "legitimate business." That Congress, if satisfied of the soundness of his views, will give him the authority requisite to this end, is not to be doubted. The bare passage of a bill authorizing the funding of $300,000,000 of "greenbacks" on advantageous terms, would reduce the premium on gold to within 10 per cent. in a week; and that amount finally withdrawn would, we feel sure, bring us to substantially a specie basis. Of course "fancy" stocks and fancy importers of "fancy" French goods and gewgaws would come down "on the run," and elicit a dismal howl of "ruin." The public interest, however, would be subserved, and the distress of the "fancies" generally be looked upon with resignation and composure. It is for them to prepare themselves for the coming crash. They are forewarned.

There is a paper published in this city weekly, with commendable regularity, and it is called the Weekly Review. Why it should be called "Review" is not clear. However, that is not the question. It has a correspondent, who adopts the highly Celtico-Italico cognomen of "McArone"—a name that may identify him, as may suit his convenience, with the Fenians or the Carbonari. His productions are not worthless; on the contrary, they ought to give the Review a distinctive and remunerative individuality. It is rarely, indeed, that a contributor strikes a literary vein which lasts a twelvemonth; vide "Doesticks," and sundry other ephemeral writers, not excepting "Orpheus C. Kerr." Some one having the time, which is, perhaps, of more consequence than anything else, ought to write "The History and Progress of American Humor," taking in "Maj. Downing" and "Squibob." American humor may not have been, in all cases, of the highest or chastest kind, but it will be interesting to follow its developments in the country. This is of as much interest, historically, as the record of national progress in many other directions. Humor is a thing of ancient Spain and modern America. The English occupy an intermediate position; Continental nations have little, the French none at all. No people are more ready to recognize wit and humor than our own. It, however, must be vital, belonging to the times, and not what is called "classical." We are making history, not repeating it, for the circumstances forbid any deep deference to precedent. Anterior facts do not apply to the new order of things. Humor must conform to altered circumstances. Its only peril, in this country, is that of descending a little too low in subject or language. The Weekly Review, in the person of "McArone," has this, among other things, for the week, which is endurable:

"You say Madame X. is a splendid woman—graceful and 'swanlike.'

"The swan is a great splay-footed thing, that eats live frogs and newts, and soils the margin of lakes.

"Perhaps 'Chickabiddy' is as inoffensive an ornithological endearment as can be applied to woman.

"The domestic hen, though not precisely graceful, and liable to be tempted occasionally by a dead mouse or a bit of raw meat, is, after all, quite as well behaved as any of her more pretentious sisters.

"'Ducky,' however, is inadmissable and unpardonable. 'Piggy' would be just as flattering.

"The idea of comparing your loved one to a creature whose head is all mouth, whose walk is a deformed waddle, whose sweetest note sounds like driving carpet-tacks, and whose food is offal!

"It is a little too much.

"It were far better to call her a cow. The cow has dignity; the duck has none. The cow has strong maternal instincts, and may have beauty; the duck has, and can have, neither."

A just alarm is created among the Americans resident in Europe, as to the amount of money abstracted by tourists, from the wealth of this country. It is estimated that there are now on the continent (few Americans find it either pleasant or profitable to stop in Great Britain) not less than 50,000 American visitors, each one expending at least $3,000 per annum—equal to a yearly expenditure of $150,000,000 in gold. Yet most of the people making this vast drain on the country have never seen the Mississippi nor even Niagara, but run to gaze on the sewer called the Seine! Thousands who have never, even as residents of New York, visited the grandest aqueduct in the world, or that was ever in the world, the Croton, will get up at an unseemly hour in the morning, and pay a guide, in order to visit the little fiddling contrivance, equal to that of a second-class hotel here, which supplies Leghorn with water. They will weary themselves to reach lakes, and pretend to gaze on them with rapture, compared with which Mahopac and even Lucern are oceans. These people forget that intelligent Europeans, or those whose good opinion is worth having, look with contempt on Americans who are not acquainted with the natural beauties and resources of their own country. With plenty of money to spend they will be able to buy cheap obsequiance and apparent respect of the garcons of Paris and the kellners of Germany, but they will not have in consequence either the recognition or esteem of those whose right it is to put the stamp of Epaminondas on them, or to confer that social status which is, or ought to be, their highest ambition to attain.

The dense ignorance which reigns among a portion of the white population of South Carolina has been often noted in print, and the fact has, therefore, gained wide circulation. But it is not so universally known that this class is fitly represented in the South Carolina Constitutional Convention, as the following remarks made by Mr. Dunovant, on the sixth day of the session, abundantly shows: "I deny that slavery is abolished. The relation of the master and slave is disrupted, but that relation returns as soon as you restore the writ of habeas corpus. I will not admit that we are rightfully under military rule; the President has no warrant in the Constitution for keeping a standing army among us, and I will not submit my will to him in this matter."

The last steamer from Central America brings intelligence that the greatest dissatisfaction exists throughout all the Republics against Salvador for the shooting of Ex-President Barrios. The present President of Salvador, Dueñas, is afraid to leave his house, which he keeps strongly guarded, and sees no one, for fear of being assassinated.

The "Fenian movement" in Ireland is the prevailing or pet excitement in Europe. The Paris Presse calls the Irish "great children, loving noise, agitation, whiskey, and nocturnal vagabondism." What else could we expect from the frog-eaters? While we might, perhaps, agree with the Presse in some of its allegations, we deny its accuracy when it says: "At bottom Ireland has no real grievance; she is in the enjoyment of civil, religious and commercial liberty." We have italicised "religious," because no statement could be more at variance with truth. We will agree with our Gallic contemporary, not that "Ireland has no reason for revolting," but in the assertion that she "has not the means requisite for doing so." This is the rub. The time will come, it may soon come, but it is not now.

The Paris Debats thinks that the question now forced on England is "one of serious embarrassment," but to be accounted for by the "disbandment of the Federal armies." Our readers can form their own estimate of the value of the last observation. The Debats supports its position by arguing that "Wherever powerful armies are hastily disbanded after having been hastily formed they rarely fail to leave behind them certain elements in dissolution which ferment and depo it in the atmosphere the germs of fresh storms. It is, then, only a question of finding out in what part of the world the storm will burst. If not in Mexico it will be in Ireland! Viewed in this light Fenianism appears to us a more serious affair than people were at first inclined to suppose."

The London Times comforts the loyal Britons by doing the United States "the justice to say" that

"So far from conniving at these filibustering designs, or at the exportation of firearms to Ireland, there is reason to believe that it has earnestly discouraged them. It is stated that the information upon which the seizure was made at the Irish People office was derived from Washington, and may probably have been communicated to our Minister by the United States authorities. We sincerely trust that such may prove to be the case, and none would have more reason to thank Mr. Seward for his intervention than the deluded youths who may thus have been saved from plunging further into crime."

Mr. McHenry, a liberal American gentleman, residing in England, has purchased Mr. Bierstadt's picture of the Rocky Mountains, for the sum of $25,000. Mr. McHenry is a gentleman of cultivated taste and a liberal patron of art, and already possesses a fine collection of paintings, valued at $600,000.

Gen. Banks has been nominated to Congress, in Massachussetts, and has thus "defined his position:" "I am in favor of granting the right of suffrage to colored men. I believe this measure to be necessary to the settlement of the affairs of this country, and have full confidence that it will be adopted."

A discovery of a deposit of alum has been made on First avenue, between 47th and 48th streets, in this city. It was found 10 feet below the surface of the earth, in layers between the rocks. Dr. Parmelee thinks there might have been chemical works in that vicinity in years past, and this alum is the deposit from it.

The question whether the United States is or are a singular or a plural, was settled by the Constitution of the country, in which the designation is uniformly used in the plural, as, for instance, in that recently forgotten clause which declares, that "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies."

Artemus Ward is "mixed" on the matter of genders, in writing of Jeff Davis. He says: "Jeff Davis is not pop'lar here. She is regarded as a Southern sympathizer. & yit I'm told he was kind to his Parents. She ran away from 'em many years ago, and has never bin back. This was showin' 'em a good deal of consideration when we reflect what his conduck has been. Her captur in female apparel confooses me in regard to his sex, & you see I speak of him as a her as frekent as otherwise, & I guess he feels so hissel."

The vote on the question of permitting negroes to vote in Connecticut, resulted, 26,851 for, and 33,263 against. Two votes have been taken on this question in New York, namely, in 1846 and 1862, resulting, the first, 85,306 for, and 223,845 against; the second, 197,503 for, and 337,984 against.

That the prevalence of cannibalism marks a step in the development and progress of a people, is rather a startling proposition. It has, however, been broached in a paper read before the British Association by Mr. Crawford, author of "The Indian Archipelago." His argument was to the effect that the early races of men, originally eaters of the raw flesh of animals, were driven at a subsequent stage of progress, when wild animals had become scarce, to eat the bodies of their slain enemies. This was the stage of cannibalism, and it ceased when, pressed by a diminishing supply of food, human ingenuity was stimulated to invent means for augmenting it by cultivating vegetable food and domesticating animals.

It is plain that the way out of all our financial troubles lies in the application of labor to the undeveloped resources of the country. With a population about equal to that of the British Isles, we have 30 times their area of square miles, and 100 times or 1,000 times their natural wealth. Our coal mines alone are, in square miles, nearly double the whole area of Great Britain and Ireland, yet England is still the greatest miner o coal in the world. The New York Tribune says:

"Eight million six hundred acres of coal fields, which make an extensive surrounding near Pittsburg, rate at an average depth of eight feet, and are estimated to contain 53,516,430,000 tons of coal, which, at $2 per ton, would be worth $107,032,860,000 or four thousand millions of national debt paid twenty-seven times, or a thousand years' gold and silver product of California and Nevada, supposing their yield to be one hundred millions every year. This is plausibly quoted as a fact in itself of great encouragement. Add to the sum given, gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, petroleum, &c., by the same process of eduction, and it would be vain to calculate the result."

As an appendix to the list of the rebel bond holders in high places in England, the list of members who composed the Southern Independence Association will be read with considerable interest. Fourteen members of the British Parliament joined the society, and half of them contributed to the funds. Six members of the House of Lords were also in the pot, and the irrepressible Beresford Hope appears to have conducted the correspondence, backed up by W. S. Lindsay and Robert Bourke, a less known rebel sym pathizer.

"An American is only an Englishman rather more sharpened up," says Sir Morton Peto, who has been able during his western tour to see the point.

Article 234 of the French Code reads thus:

"In cases of adultery, the murder committed by the husband on his wife, and also upon her accomplice, at the moment he surprises them en tête-à-tête, in the conjugal dwelling, is excusable."

A letter has been published by the late Mr. Cobden, to a French friend, estimating with characteristic sagacity the issue of the American war just a year before its conclusion, before the taking of Atlanta, and therefore while all the principal English authorities spoke of ultimate success as the wildest of dreams. He predicted also the sudden collapse of the Confederacy in the end. He, at the same time, wrote concerning the Mexican intervention: "The resentment against you for the Mexican intervention is ready to burst forth the moment the rebellion is in a sure way of defeat," and he anticipates "a peremptory demand from Washington for explanations from the Tuileries which will lead to war or humiliation." The American people are awaiting impatiently for the realization of this anticipation.

The "Pennsylvania Freedman's Relief Association" has charge of 4 schools in South Carolina, 5 in Tennessee, 4 in Alabama, 7 in Washington, 3 in Virginia, with over 3,500 pupils on their registers, and an average attendance of nearly 2,800 The teaching extends generally to geography, sometimes to history, and even physiology. The schools are far from being, as is sometimes asserted, attended mainly by sharp half-breeds. Out of 380 pupils on the school registers of South Carolina, only 38 are mulattoes, 342 pure blacks, and to show that these latter fairly enter into the higher studies, it is sufficient to say that the number of pupils who study mental arithmetic is 151; of those who study written arithmetic, 117; and geography, 116.

A report to the Academy of Medicine of Paris states that since Home introduced into France the clumsy jugglery of "the Misses Fox, of Rochester, N. Y.," insanity has increased 21 per cent. The Journal de Rouen speaks of a town where, after the sojourn of a spirit-rapper, 50 women entered a lunatic asylum.

At the Episcopal General Convention lately held in Philadelphia, delegates, lay and clerical, appeared from the dioceses of Texas, North Carolina and Tennessee. It is supposed that there will be a complete re-union of the Church, North and South, before the meeting of the next general convention.

TOWN GOSSIP.

With the coming on of winter, in the city there are two all-absorbing topics of conversation. Among the rich, fashion and amusement; and among the poor, the ways and means to struggle through the inclement season and make both ends meet.

We are not croakers, but we cannot help foretelling a hard winter for the latter class. The market for employment is fearfully overstocked in some of the departments, and our streets are full of men who have just returned from the army and are without occupation, while all the necessities of life are at the very highest grade. These facts must operate to make a severe winter among the poorer classes, which cannot fail to be felt the moment the cold weather commences. Coal is $13 per ton, and yet it is not claimed that there is any falling off in the supply. Coal men, and all those engaged in any way in the traffic, are growing rich, one of our citizens claiming that he will this year realize $1,000,000 from his immense business in it. There are, in this city, three or four dealers in that fuel who can at any time control the market, and put it up or down a dollar or two per ton at their pleasure.

As it is with coal, so it is with everything else of the necessaries of life. A few greedy speculators can control the market, and after their greed is satisfied, then comes the rapacity of a horde of small Dutch and Irish corner grocers, who not content, as in the olden time, with a fair profit, know no reason in their demands, and in many cases actually ask and receive two or three hundred per cent. advance. We look upon these petty grievances as the curse of our poor people, and only please to bleed the workingman out of his earnings and keep him always in their clutches. One year we find some Union of the species opening a former grocery, with a capital of $10, a bar behind a screen, or in the back room, where villainous compounds are retailed and called liquor, and the next we find him owning the house he started in, perhaps two or three more about the neighborhood, and running for Alderman in his ward.

With the rich this infusion works in the same way. They are now getting an advance upon articles of luxury not in the least degree warranted by the state of the currency, or the price of gold. Ask some of these goods are twice what they are on the other side of the water, and yet in the face of this fact shopping never was brisker or more money spent. Nothing is too extravagant for us, and the importers say that the very best of everything comes to America. Bonnets at $100; velvet cloaks at $400 and $500, are not uncommon, and create no remark.

As having some connection with the subject of extravagance and money spending, let us give a computation of the money spent in one night, as accurately computed from observation and manuscript statements at the different theatres in this city:

Academy of Music—Opera	$2,957 50
Niblo's—Ballet	1,840 00
Barnum's—all day	1,560 20
Olympic—Ledger	1,200 00
Wallack's—Double Gallant	1,100 50
Winter Garden—An American Cousin	917 00
Broadway Theatre—Celeste	859 75
Bowery	640 00
New Bowery	450 00
American Theatre	400 00
Bryant's Minstrels	440 00
Wood's	415 00
San Francisco	375 50
Tony Pastor's	265 00
Brooklyn Academy—Hermann	400 00

Making in all a total of about $14,000 in one night for the leading places of amusement, a judgment of the thousand spots where thousands of dollars are spent in every part of the city.

As having a bearing, and being interesting to persons in the habit of theatre-going, it is well to do no more than discuss a little the old subject that attracted so much attention last winter—"Gas-fitting and Gas-fitters' Pretensions." These associations, last winter, were great successes, and will very easily be revived. It is an matter interesting to New York alone, but to every town and village in the country. It is only necessary for a few persons to be together and get together to be free of their number treasurers and stewards and having put whatever they have on together, to organize a band of cards to purchase certain necessaries of life at the wholesale price, retailing them out to each other at the same rate. By this plan they will save the 100 per cent. which is now paid to the middle man, or the retail grocer. Why this plan is not carried out among family men working together in factories, or in neighborhoods, is something we cannot see through, or account for. It has been tried among consumers of coal, and with the general public in paying $15, these subscribers are getting it for $7, and the only cause of dissatisfaction is the city that are now waking up for the winter e-scon are pressing to be about the same rate. It is not necessary for any one to wait to find out such an institution. It can be started by forming a list, and any dozen or eight can do that.

Among the institutions of the day, and one which bids fair to be the fashion, is the cooking school of one Mrs. Hayes, who is the lecturer and teacher by occupation so to speak. The gentleman has opened rooms in the upper part of Broadway, and proposes to instruct ladies in the genius art of cookery. How successful he may be we have not yet had any successful opportunity to inspection, the idea is one that even if in its infancy, and the Professor a tyro, should be encouraged. A cooking school should be something a little more than a mere matter of trade; it should be mechanical. Every scholar should be taught the simple chemistry of food, and what will nourish. They should know the chemical economics of food, and to make everything tell, as well as to make savory dishes. We know that no cook can be a good one without a generous one, but there are many persons they can study the economy of generosity. Generosity and economy are two things, though they are too frequently confounded. If the teacher does not understand this, and does not instruct pupils in the principles of climate and locality on food, he is utterly unfit for his position. Let him read the life of Soyer, take from their European localities and dropped here without having to take opportunity to study the nature and or the climate, would make a failure on the very first dinner they gave.

Among the many unnoticed matters of deep import to the city of late is one frequently brought to our civil and criminal courts. In the country, anything or this kind, though attended with a heavy small amount of money or a light punishment, will attract the attention of a whole county, and the people, when they find out that it is individual interest to them, and show that interest by their votes. In the city, people are too deeply immersed in the sea of business to mind the small waves that are going about them, even when at some future time one may engulph them.

The last case in point is one we have up a morning's paper, and read a few lines reporting a couple of cases. The first was that of a man who uses the wooding-up merchants, Messrs. Hoyt, for repairs to an injured body, caused by one of their carts rolling pulling a valuable, if flour upon him as he passed their store, so injuring him that he was carried from their door to a hospital. The jury adjudged his three months' suffering at $750, and the four-pound-loss thus throwing each still go on from a thousand stores, and men, women and children who get their ribs crushed, their legs broken, and their clothes torn, and all for the sake of a certain saving, without it ever entering the head of a policeman that an ounce of prevention is a lot or less worth than a pound of cure.

The other case is that of a porter and collector for the baggage and lily perfume at the corner of Pine. He had collected some money ($60), and before he made his returns, he was knocked down and robbed. Two persons held him responsible, and sent him before a magistrate. Luckily for the porter, all his character is good in Silk Prison under the prosecution of his millionaire employer, the thieves were arrested, tried, convicted, and sent to that establishment; and still, in the face of this fact, Mr. Shoddy sued the porter for the value of a charge of boxes sound, a charge the magistrate, Justice Dodge, promptly allowed. The porter, an elderly and of respectable man, was desirous to repay the money, and offered, in default of the place, to work it out, but the representatives of Shoddy could see nothing but the prison of the Penitentiary on the spot. As no such thing operation could be performed, all hands left the temple of justice disgusted, the porter at having been knocked down, robbed of his own money as well, and had to pay for it, Shoddy at the bad use he had made of him of giving him two years in State Prison for the crime of losing his own. Why, it was a great city!

Nothing new, much, among the theatres. The Broadway has changed hands, Dr. Wallack's "Double Gallant" is only a commendation of everything, and at that, a better written play than "An American Cousin," has been a great success, which simply shows that the public value of the amused, not instructed. Celeste has made its decided a hit in the bionic whirlwind Sam, as Gabriel, in the Duenna, and Parlor in the Groom, plucked from the burning brands of the circus and put into livery, brings down the house two or three times in real gushes of laughter. Miss Olive Logan is poor, wretchedly so. She is awkward on the stage, has a bad dressing voice, and is entirely without the first idea of fun. She even lacks that great essential for a woman upon the stage—she does not know how to make up, but dresses as though her clothes were put on with a hay fork. We feel sorry to say these facts, but the truth is, last Week's female representatives of the drama will not do for New York.

Barnum, always up to the times, or a little beyond, has laid in a new stock of giants, fat girls and dwarfs, and is adding every day some new feature. There is one thing about Barnum's of which very little mention is made, but which, to our thinking, is the great feature, and that is that he gives for about half the money a better theatrical performance than a majority of the theatres of the country. The Lecture-Room is a neat, well ventilated and comfortable seated place, and the company a little better than usual. We noticed in it Miss Sallie Partington, a young lady whose so many of the youths of Gotham went broken-hearted about several years ago, and who has returned to us more beautiful than ever, and with such a thing as painting the lily or gilding refined gold.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The local police of Nashville, Tenn., are now allowed to search all houses, and occasionally searched by the Provost Marshal, and if any weapons are found they are taken from the owners.

——The detection of Dr. Mudd, who endeavored to make his escape from the Dry Tortugas, by disguising himself on board the steamer Thomas Scott, was brought about in a very curious manner. The doctor had managed to reach the coal bunk, and to cover himself over with coal, excepting his head and shoulders, which were exposed. The search was about to be abandoned, when one of the officers, suspecting that the doctor had a sword into the coal, the point of it touching the hidden man's face, and causing him to start, which at once revealed his place of concealment. He was immediately taken back to prison and put to hard labor.

——The Memphis Bulletin says that the recent rapid increase in the value of real estate in that vicinity, relieves the following story of a speculator of that city who suddenly became rich against his will: "A few years since a gentleman sold a piece of property of this city, an account for collection. It was not a large claim, but the debtor was by no means in a prosperous condition, as otherwise he would have got nothing for his Circinnatus from the Mississippi plantation got a piece of property which he accepted for the debt. When he informed the Cincinnati gentleman of the deal done, they refused to be bound by it, and wrote back a very indignant letter, in which they told him that since he had wanted him to purchase real estate for them, they would not be bound by his purchase. He was not at all troubled about it that he finally gave his own note for the amount of the debt, $1,100, retaining the land thus reluctantly thrust upon him. He subsequently disposed of the same for of land is now worth $100,000, and even that sum has already been refused for it by a speculator, or by stems, and lincets will not moiest the plants.

——The Richmond Whig says: "C. E. Dalley, Esq., of the Treasury Department, Washington, passed through this city on Saturday, en route to his home in Georgia, accompanied by his wife and baby. The latter is one of a pair of twins born during the war, and is now about two months and a half before they were expected, weighed only two pounds and a half. The other twin is now seven weeks old, and weighs two and a half pounds.

——The New York correspondent of a Cincinnati paper says: "Mr. Beecher's wages in the forests of our avenue belies. The slanderer!—but he states as a fact that he pretty freely indulges in champagne, that $50,000 in a single night at costs.

——The Richmond Whig says: "Our continued drouth, has become such an article of luxury in some parts of Mississippi that it is sold by the bottle. Gentlemen of the people are afraid they will soon be obliged to use sea water.

——A young lady in Richmond was lately robbed of all her wedding outfit the very day before that appointed for her marriage. The thief was subsequently caught.

——The cargo of a New London whaler, just in, is worth $300,000. The vessel is commanded by Capt. Allen, captain of a whale ship, which not long since made from a voyage of 37 months, took as his part of the proceeds $100,000 in gold. Capt. Allen is a young man than was ever before received by a whaling captain for 37 days.

——A Grand Hotel at the Central Park.—It is stated that Mr. Stewart, proprietor of the Metropolitan Hotel, has purchased the ground bounded by Fifth avenue, Fifty-ninth street, Sixth avenue and Fifty-fifth street, for the purpose of erecting a magnificent hotel at the Fifth Avenue entrance to the Central Park.

——Soldiers in the Custom House.—Six military officers, including Brevet-Brigadier General Scott, have been appointed by the President to the Custom House. Three one-armed soldiers have also been appointed night inspectors. Two hundred and fifty soldiers have received the appointment of laborers in the public stores.

——Mrs. Symonds, of Malden, Mass., whose husband was murdered by a negro in that place about two months ago, has just received a dispatch from Washington, stating that he died at Andersonville prison, and that his body was buried there by the order.

——A young mulatto blessed a second song in a Newburn, N. C., tinsetre the other night, for which offence he was seized by the police, taken before the Mayor, and fined $20.

——Jeff. Thompson says the only persons in the South at the present time who are willing to go to war fighting, are those who did not do say when they had the opportunity.

——The late Concord, N. H., robbery is still enveloped in mystery. A large number of persons living in the vicinity of the robbery, the Express Company, Government bonds, and deposited them in this bank, and subsequently received the bonds after the successful burglary.

——Gottschalk, the celebrated pianist, has been creating a great sensation in California, not by his musical talents, but as showing the power of the female ladies to escape from their boarding school at night. The school is broken up in consequence.

——The Boston Post says that the Albemarle will get $30,000 as his share of the prize money out of the Stonewall.

——Women have a "hard" time in Nashville, Tenn. Scarcely a day passes but some fresh horrible case has impose a fine on half a dozen or more men for beating their females. The brutes are in all cases fined $25, the latter of a few.

——The usual predictions of a very cold winter have been made. The birds have started off to the South. The musquitoes gave their last spiteful bites on Monday last.

——Prof. Snell of Amherst College, who has kept a meteorological record for 27 years, says he never recorded so small an amount of rain for the same month as during the month of September last.

——It is reported that Ralph Waldo Emerson left his entire property by the Concord Bank robbery, except his manuscript.

——The Boston Post says the butter sold in that city contains 10 per cent. of lard.

Foreign.—A tragedy was recently enacted in a small hamlet of the commune of Moniaux (Vaucluse), but one which has unhappily many pieces out of a feeling of jealousy between a husbandman and his wife, the former ended in the most horrible point blank into the mouth of the woman, wounding at the same time his little daughter, aged three years, who was in her arms at the moment. The assassin immediately afterwards blew out his own brains with the same weapon.

——Somewhat late in the day it has been determined to erect a memorial at Birmingham to James Watt, the "Father and pioneer of mechanical engineering." Watt died in 1819.

——Mr. C. J. Richardson, in a letter to the London Times, says his chimney at Woolwich Dockyard has shown that petroleum is 50 per cent. more powerful than the best coal as steam fuel, that it can be burned with ease and without danger.

——The Eternal City is hard to cope to claim the fifteen of the Pope. The mouth of the Tiber, it is said, has been surveyed, and the work of restoring the port of Rome is to be undertaken. Or will Italy not let Rome become again the capital of the Old World?

——During the recent Eisteddfod at Llandudno, on the coast of Wales, a prize was offered for the best Welsh poem on the Holy Cross. The prize was won by a little girl eight years old, the daughter of a London banker.

——In the report of the British Inland Revenue Commissioners, just issued, it is stated that while writing letters containing money, and signed individual as "conscience-money" or unpaid income-tax, and in a few instances the sum of £1,000 has been received from one individual.

——The greatest strike at work in the Sheffield cutlery factories are very ignorant. Several lately, in answer to questions put, stated that they had heard the name of Bonaparte, but could not tell who he was. Believe she 'found 'em in money.' Never heard of Adam or Eve. Thought Napoleon was the man and man made woman. One child, aged 12, said that the Queen's name was Victoria, but thought she was a man. Another of the same age declared that he did not live in England.

——The hideous practice of "waking" is still carried on in Ireland. At the late Cork Assizes a coroner's jury found that the deceased had died from natural causes, the body of a man who had died of drink was kept for a week. The house was filled with all who liked to be exposed, and a tallow candle on each side of him. The coffin was then carried to the grave-yard on men, about 12 feet square, to the number of 10 at once, during the whole time, night and day.

——Mr. Hall has built a church in London for the use of the deaf and dumb, of whom it is supposed there are no less than 2,000 in the metropolis alone, without a suitable place of worship. The Queen has given £50, and contributed others £25, if 40 others will give the same amount.

——According to statistical returns, there are in London, 12,000 public houses, licensed, in 6,300 of which different trades are carried on. The thirteen-part of the population of London is computed at 2,500,000.

——The Panama Star says: "The unhappy wife of Gen. Santiago Perez, President of Peru, is one of the brightest ornaments in Central American society; a lady of fine education, refined manners, and accomplishments, a lover of a husband, to whom she was so much attached, that she followed him into exile, and shared, in all its adversity, will be an irreparable affliction to her; but all will be forgotten when she shall have a hero's crown of glory, and we doubt not she will outlive her present grief. Two vengeance wreaked at some future day on the heads of those who have so deeply imbrued their hands in her husband's blood, and who now stand before the world a disgrace to the name of soldier, to the name of man and a stain on the very name of humanity and civilization."

——A journal has just been started at Naples, under the curious title of Il Pungolo. Strong and vigorous, it give full details of the progress and direction of the epidemic, and contains a host of useful remedies, palliatives, and antidotes hitherto discovered.

——Some wag says: "Among the new publications is announced a work entitled 'Poetry,' by the author of 'The Life of Cæsar,' with a few words about the copyright."

——There is a great outcry in England at the proposed new regulations for the privateer crops. The English oyster is a small round bivalve, with a strong coppery flavor, something as if a penny had become mature, and although foreigners (especially Americans) do not like it to begin with, they soon get to like it as a matter of deal. The French crop is not good, and the cunning Parisians are tempting the dredgers to make contracts with them for supplies.

——M. Place, formerly French Consul at Mossoul, has devoted the last few years to personal and active research on the site of ancient Nineveh, is printing, at the Imperial Printing Office, a splendid work, giving exactly illustrated with engravings, embodying the result of those labors.

A STORY OF EGYPT.

SOME of the stories of the family of Mehemit Ali, late Viceroy of Egypt, are worthy of the eminent personage to whom they are discussed are the Nights." Fadia's daughter, Princess Nashi-Hanem, was a second Charlotte of Russia, or Marguerite de Bourgogne. She has married the Prince Mohammed Ali, second son of Ismail Pasha, and is remarkable for her beauty and her cruelty. One day Mohammed Ali hinted to his daughter that he never felt quite at ease with her husband, that events might arise which would present to him the princess, his wife. Coffee does not always agree with the Orientals, and Mohammed Ali's cook Nashi-Hanem sought to seduce her widowhood by a systematic course of intrigue. Her emissaries frequented the coffee-houses, and the conversation had not been found, he was desired to present himself at a certain gate of the palace at a certain hour. There he was received by two eunuchs, and (no chance) his eyes were bandaged, and he was conducted to the presence. For the first moment he thought he was going to be killed, but the eighth day, "My husband is coming home," she would say: "we must part; but when he is again absent, I shall send for you once more."

The visitor's eyes were again bandaged. When the bandage was removed he was standing at the door. He was conducted to a store opening on the river, and sped forward with a gentle push. At another of the royal seats, the Palace of Kasr-el-Nil, on the bank of the Nile, the palace in the Moskee, the same useful office was performed by a cistern. These frequent disappearances at last began to excite alarm, and a young Italian determined to break the spell. He went assiduously to the cafés where the eunuchs were wont to resort, and he dispensed. One evening, a eunuch of the harem seated himself near the young stranger and began to converse.

"I know a fair lady who is not if different to you," he began, "and if you wish I can manage the introduction."

"I shall be delighted, if she is so good-looking," replied the Italian; "only I can't come this evening. Will you take me to-morrow?"

"Yes; be at this door about seven o'clock, and when I pass, follow without speaking."

Next day the young man kept his appointment. He had not long to wait, and when he had followed his guide into a lonely street, he submitted to his eyes being bandaged. After a long walk, they reached a house, and ascended a staircase. The bandage was removed from his eyes in a brilliantly-lighted room, richly furnished in the eastern style. A boy, neither young nor beautiful, but admirably dressed, reclined on a divan, playing with a chaplet of coral and diamonds; a slave fanned her with a bunch of ostrich plumes. The Italian received a signal to depart, and to kiss himself on a cushion at her feet. The lady's conversation was enchanting, and with a hostess who did the honors so graciously, a week passed most agreeably. The eighth day arrived.

"We must part, my beloved," she said; "my husband is coming, and you, we should be lost."

"Madame," replied her guest, "I trust that your husband has no intention of returning, inasmuch as you are the Fair-ya Nashi-Hanem, who have been a week in some years."

The lady made a highly negative gesture.

"Believe me, madame," he continued, "I know who you are, but I am not the man to betray you. I am but I had not taken my precautions. Your domestics would recognize me, and a mad dive opening on the Nile, and insist me with a slight push.

"And, madame, what precautions have you taken?"

"Mad Dieu, madame, they are very simple. Instead of following your emissary at once, I arranged to come with him. I have a boat in the river, and I can trust my consul. When your retainer came to seek me, two negre Sous and in the room below. Consequently, if followed us; he, therefore, knows that I am here. My consul is accustomed to forewarn me if to-day he does not see me again, he will know that I have—suffered the doom of your favorites. I will address myself to his Highness the Viceroy; you perceive the scandal that would create. Rumor suspects you of numerous crimes. Suspicion will then give place to certainty."

The princess turned very thoughtful. Recovering a little, she implored him to be discreet. The Italian took his leave, and arrived without accident at the consul, where he found a cause from the consulate awaiting him, and where he remained for three days in order to scrupulously disregarded the parting request of his amiable hostess.

THE MECATHERIUM.

THIS leviathan of the vast plains of South America, which were once occupied by immense numbers of the race, now nearly extinct, partakes of the generic characters of the rhinoceros and elephant. It rivaled in size the largest rhinoceros, was armed with three of enormous length, which and power to frame possessing an extreme degree of solidity. With a head and neck like those of the sloth, its legs and feet exhibit the characters of the armadillo and the ant-eater. Some specimens of the animal give the measurement of five feet across the shoulders, and the whole bone we nearly three times as thick as that of the elephant. The spinal marrow must have been a foot in diameter, and the tail, at its part nearest the body, was not less than a foot in circumference. The girth of the body was fourteen feet and a half, and the length from the nose to the tail was admirably adapted for cutting vegetable substances, and the powerful claws were admirably adapted for scraping up the ground in search of roots, wrenching off the branches of trees, and uprooting those on which it principally fed.

The habits of this animal are accurately accounted, says Dr. Buckland, in his eloquent description of the megatherium, "it could neither run, nor leap, nor climb, nor burrow in the ground for safety. The movements must have been necessarily slow. But what need of rapid locomotion where a single pat of a stroke of a digging rools for food was almost stationary? And what need of speed in flight, when the force of a stroke whose giant carcass was exposed in an impenetrable armor? Like a mailed knight in the midst of a host of his tail, could in an instant have demolished the cougar or the ocelot that should have attempted to leap on his strong armor, where was the enemy that would dare encounter the formidable claws of this beast? In what more powerful creature can we find the cause that axe decided the extinction of this race? Man, of course was as an apparatus of colossal mechanism, adapted exactly to the work in hand. Strong and powerful as a prop portion as she creature was heavy and unwieldy, it was, nevertheless, admirably fitted for its position. Like so many other respects was it calculated to be the vehicle of the most powerful muscles to a gigantic set of projects, which, though they have ceased to be counted among the living inhabitants of the earth, still, by their fossil bones, left behind them imperishable monuments of the consummate skill with which they were constructed."

THE RED SEA.—The name Red Sea is derived from large portions being covered with patches, more a few inches in diameter, of a reddish appearance, microscopic vegetables, or animalcule, particularly abundant in the Gulf of Suez, where the water has an unusually blood red. When not affected by these organic changes, the waters are intensely blue, and the shore waters shades of green.

CHEAP LIGHT.—A London lamp manufacturer claims to have discovered a new and cheap burning magnesium wire. By burning a strip of zinc in connection with a battery of four cells, he is able to reduce the cost of the light two-thirds. He predicts that in the course of a few years he will be able to obtain a street a mile long at the rate of half-penny an hour. The wonder is that the inventor or two dollars a thousand (or gas will like to see Mr. Gran's prediction verified.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR COFFEE.—A Turin letter says: "A new beverage is offered by the Propugnatore of Bologna as a substitute for the coffee, and recommended. It is to be prepared in the following manner: Take one or two pounds of dried carobs, soak them in water so as to produce a sort of soup, not very thick to be put very gently in a saucepan with a little sugar, fry, cut this up with hot milk, and enjoy it as 'a most economical and wholesome drink for the overtaxed citizens in Signor Sella's budget.'"

TOBACCO.—There are about 30 species of tobacco, all possessing nearly the same properties. It is said the finest is grown in Persia and Turkey. It was taken to Spain, and from thence to Portugal. From Portugal it was carried to France by Jean Nicot, a famous scout-taking commenced in Pa, Catherine de Medicis, and afterwards to England. Its introduction into connection with the massacre of Protestants, being its first patron. Since that time it has increased in favor, it became an important article of commerce, and 120 pounds are the annual value for a while by some of the early settlers of Virginia.

HUMAN RACE.—The French consul at his meagre, narrow and low. The finish is small, and elaborately carved—thanks to its Moorish blood, corresponding with the Caucasian race of the Arabs and Persians. The Arab foot is proportional for its high arch; "a stream can run under the arch of the foot," as the saying is. The large anklebut; that of the Irish fits and square; the English, more delicate. The Americans are apt to be disproportionately small. A foot, for both beauty and speed, should be as large as the hand, and that in length proportioned to the height of the person. The Chinese custom of women—should be rotted and firm, and not too small.

THE JEWISH RACE.—For 1800 years the Hebrews have been dispersed among different nations and climates, and they have preserved in themselves most distinct from day intermixing with the other races of mankind. There are some Jews still lingering in the valleys of the Jordan, having been oppressed by the successive conquerors of Syria for ages—a low race of people, and described by travellers as being black as any of the Ethiopian races. Others of the Jewish people, participating in European civilization, and dwelling in the northern nations, show instances of the most complete physical beauty, as in the Jewish Duke of the Scandinavian families. We see them now to account for the difference in color without having to refer them to original or specific distinction.

THE EMBASSY FROM TUNIS.

NEW YORK has had a real sensation for the past week in the visitation of an Ambassador from the Bey of Tunis on his way to Washington. As usual with all great notabilities, Gen. Hashem, the envoy, has been taken in hand and shown about. He is accompanied by his Staff, Col. B. Goïta, Chevalier Antone Conti, and Mr. Amos Perry, as interpreter.

Gen. Hashem is about 50 years of age, and has about him all the appearance of the soldier. In complexion these gentlemen are not very dark, but rather incline to the olive tint of Southern Europe.

They have taken quarters at the Astor House, where they are the objects of perpetual curiosity as well as hospitality. Every day brings something new to our visitors; at one time a visit to the city and charitable institutions, at another to the public buildings. On Monday, the 9th inst., they officiated at a marriage, which took place while they were calling upon his Honor the Mayor, the General giving away the bride, and doing the gallant generally.

Our illustration is taken at the time of their visit to the Brooklyn Navy Yard, on the 9th inst., where they were received by Admiral Bell, Capt. Pennock and Commander Trenchard, the marines presenting arms in deference to the General's rank, and the fine band, the same that so distinguished itself at the battle of Gettysburg, playing our National airs.

They seemed deeply interested in everything, and examined the Monongahela and Lackawando, both first-class vessels, with especial interest.

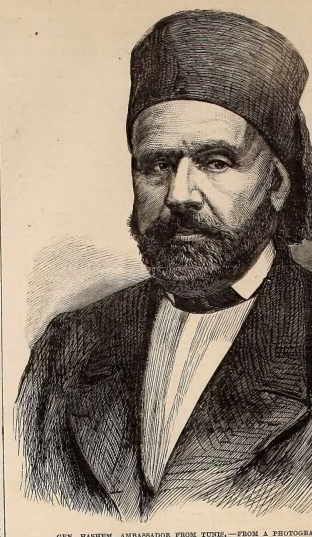
From the Yard they went to the residence of Capt. Pennock, where they met Vice-Admiral Farragut, then returning to the Yard they were entertained by Admiral Bell.

In a few days they go to Washington, where they will be received by President Johnson.

SAILING OF THE SOMERSET.

SATURDAY, Sept. 30, presented a great scene in the harbor of Baltimore, the occasion being the sailing of the Somerset, the first vessel of the new line between Baltimore and Liverpool, upon her initial voyage.

The occasion was inaugurated amid sunshine and cheers, the ringing of bells, the booming of cannon, and the universal enthusiasm of the people. In the early morning the crowds began to flow towards every spot that would give them a view of the lower harbor, with the apparent intention of making the time a holiday. The steam revenue cutter Nehama was tendered by the Government to carry the officers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and all the shipping, national as well as commercial, was decorated to the highest degree.



The ship goes out freighted with the wealth of Baltimore, and has already her return cargo engaged. The occasion has been one of great importance to Baltimore as illustrating that her merchants are determined to uphold her old commercial standing, and have direct communication with foreign ports, instead of depending for their facilities on other cities.

THE BRUTALITIES OF THE TOWN.

OUR first page offers an illustration of every day sights in New York, one of those brutalities that there is apparently no law for, or if there is, that it does not reach.

We do not claim cruelty to animals as something patent to New York. Unfortunately it is not, and without doubt every city will show more or less of such acts where the laws framed to cover them are not put into effect. We can draw no distinction between a great brawny fellow who will kick an animal with a heavy boot attached to a muscular leg, or strike at it with a cart rung, and he who would do the same to a human being. We would mete out the same punishment to both.

We have been gratified that our representation of cattle carrying, a few weeks since, has borne its fruit in the arrest, by the police, of several of the inhuman wretches who have offended against the better feelings of our pedestrians.

GEN. HASHEM, AMBASSADOR FROM TUNIS.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

A LEAF FROM A SAILOR'S LOG.

WE had a negro on board of very sullen and repulsive aspect, who bore the euphonious cognomen of Quaco. He belonged to the captain of the schooner, who had treated him with great kindness, and cared him, of that scourge of the African called "mal d'estomac," caused by eating earth. That his cure might be completed, his humane master brought him up the Orinoco with us, and, as he had been accustomed to the kitchen, or what is better understood in the West Indies, the cook-room, employed him as cook on board the schooner. The crew having been much fatigued with their exertion that day, the captain ordered his cook to make some good coffee, and enough for all on board. This was presently brought us; but the lad who served us as steward—an intelligent creole youth—the moment he placed it upon the table, besought us with entreaties not to touch it, saying that he felt certain there was something wrong in it, and that he had already cautioned the crew. The captain was inclined to treat the boy's warning as some idle suspicion, observing that the man had not been on shore, and that the medicine-chest was safely locked But nothing could pacify the boy.

"Look at it, sir," said he earnestly; "smell it, and say if it is as it ought to be."

"Why, it is rather thick," said the captain; and taking the cup up in his hand, added, "Egad! it does smell rather queer."

I inquired whether he had any test on board that might detect anything deleterious.

"True," said he, "I have a test, and a sure one;" and he reached a case from the lockers, from which he drew a brace of pistols, and very deliberately began to load them.

"What would you do?" I exclaimed. "Surely, upon such light grounds, you won't——"

"Don't be alarmed," said he, interrupting me. "I shall do nothing rash;" and he coolly examined the flint. Having loaded and primed the weapons—"Call down Quaco and the crew."

They came into the cabin. The cook was called forward, and the crew thronged around the door.

"Quaco," said the captain, sternly, "drink that cup of coffee to the very dregs."

"I don't like coffee," said the African, drawing back in evident surprise and alarm.

"Swallow it this instant!"

The negro took a spoonful of the mixture, though trembling with fear. He held it in his mouth for a moment, and then shuddering, spit it out.

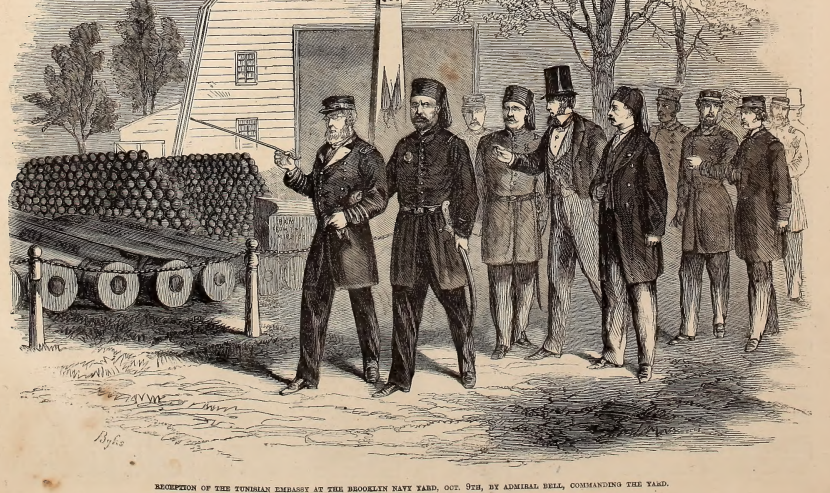
"Force him to take it, sir," said one of the sailors.

"He would have poisoned the whole of us," said a stout Augustinian.—"St. Antonio and the saints keep us!" and he crossed himself devoutly.

The sailors made an advance as though they would have enforced the request of the former, when the captain called out:

"Stand off; let no one lay hands on him."

He then emptied the cup which held the liquid into a vessel containing about a pint or more, and addressed the negro thus:



"Do you see these pistols? each contains two balls. You are a guilty man if you refuse to drink that coffee which you have made, and you only choose your death; for, as God is just, your minutes are numbered. But if you drink and are unharmed by it, I will give you your freedom for accusing you unjustly. I promise it in the presence of these witnesses. Now drink it."

The negro looked as though he understood the action of his master, if he did not fully comprehend his words, for he appeared to meditate a flight on deck; but the crew seemed to anticipate the intention, and their angry gestures plainly told him what mercy he might expect at their hands. Meantime all was silent as death, save the clicking noise which accompanied the cocking of pistols. The negro passed—big drops of sweat pourcd down his dark brow like rain—his eyes glared fearfully around, and the paleness of death was on his lips.

"Drink it this instant, you black, murderous fiend!" cried the captain, who had now no doubt of his guilt; and he leveled the pistol at his head.

The African with a convulsive grasp seized the jug, and, while his teeth chattered against its edge, drank very deep; then rolling his eyes frightfully, either on fear or agony, sank with a deep groan upon the floor of the cabin. A murmur of execration arose from the crew as he fell; and not one moved forward to assist the wretched man. Whether the captain thought he was hardly warranted in enforcing such summary justice, or that a slight shade of compassion came over him, he immediately endeavored to ascertain the nature of the poison with which it was evident the coffee was drugged; but the negro either could or would not answer. We examined his chest, and sought for a clue, but without success—until one of the crew discovered a quantity of savannah leaves, a most deadly poison, which the assassin had picked out from the recess of the mules, the resident of these animals rarely inducing them to reject it from their food. Satisfied with this discovery we returned to the cabin, where we found the youth who had warned us in the first instance on his knees, returning thanks to Providence for having been the means of saving us from a dreadful death. His thanksgivings were only interrupted by the groans of the negro, who was writhing on the floor apparently in his last agony. We prepared an emetic of white vitrol, which we forced the murderer to swallow; but it was useless. It brought on a slight vomiting; but in a few minutes he expired in dreadful tortures.

Many a time since have I been haunted by that dark, agonized, despairing face, and the recollection of those dying groans!

RECEPTION OF THE TUNISIAN EMBASSY AT THE BROOKLYN NAVY YARD, OCT. 9TH, BY ADMIRAL BELL, COMMANDING THE YARD.

SAILING OF THE STEAMER SOMERSET FROM BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, SEPT. 30, FOR LIVERPOOL.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY WEAVER & BACHRACH, BALTIMORE.

AN EPISODE OF THE WAR.

BY JOEL BATES SWETT.

Our in the starlight the picket sits
On his good bay steed, that for many a day
Has borne him bravely, and safely, through
The scenes of many a fierce affray.

Out in the starlight, all alone,
List'ning to catch e'en the slightest sound,
Or ready to challenge, with startling tone,
A friend or foe on the guarded ground.

Is that the form of a man he views,
Scarce seen through the dusky darkness dim?
Or a blackened stump he has just perceived
Under the shade of a hanging limb?

With straining eyes, and with listening ears,
He watches the object, until he feels
'Twas only a form such as fancy weaves—
A phantom that over the vision steals.

All now is still, and the picket breathes
More freely, conscious that he is safe;
But his good bay steed grows restless, while
With his burden and bit he seems to chafe.

Crack! sharp through the night air breaks the sound
Of a rifle, echoing through the wood!
The picket falls to the frozen ground,
And weltering lies in his own heart's blood!

"'Twas only a shot!" his comrades say,
"Two shots are given to make alarm;
And then they gather around the fire,
Or wrap, to sleep in their blankets warm.

A form glides forth from the hanging limb,
And nears the picket with stealthy tread,
To rifle his pockets of trinkets found,
And strip the clothes from the ghastly dead.

"Ha! what is that, now?" the rebel says—
"A locket of gold, and a tress of hair,
And a likeness too; egad! what luck!
'Twill grace the neck of my Susan fair."

In the starlight dim he takes one look
At the miniature, pales with grief and dread,
"My God!" he groans, "'tis my mother's face,
This form my brother's, and cold and dead!"

Oh! war—fierce war! 'tis a fearful thing,
For brother falls by a brother's hand;
And father and son in the struggle meet,
When civil warfare is in the land.

ON THE LAKE.

BEAUTY'S RESTING PLACE.

Skating into Matrimony.

BY FLORENCE HAMILTON.

Silence, deep and solemn, reigned over the village of Stockton, and lo! at the midnight hour, softly, slowly on the wheels of Time, was the New Year rolled into existence as successor to the Old Year, who died in giving it birth.

Jack Frost was in one of his icy, cutting moods, and robed the new born in a mantle of snowy whiteness; then, in an ecstacy of delight, mounted the restless wind, and careering north, south, east and west proclaimed the glad tidings to all the world. In Stockton, especially, his delight knew no bounds. Lingering around the church doors till the worshippers came forth from morning service, he dashed forward and embraced them, kissing the tips of their fingers—throwing his icy breath on the multitude of noses till they assumed a rosy hue.

"A Happy New Year," was the cry as homeward the throng hurried, anxious to throw the kisses from their benumbed fingers.

There were to be great doings among the young folks in Stockton that night, in commemoration of the New Year, and the joyful return of the soldier boys from the battle-field—brave boys who had promptly responded to the call of their country, and never flinched in the hour of trial. How sweet the "coming home" sounded to their battle-wearied hearts! and involuntarily a sigh escaped their lips as they remembered the brave comrades who had fallen by their side in the battles before Richmond, and were now lying low 'neath the grave-cloth of Virginia.

Poor fellows! they had gone home months before.

Heaven bless and comfort bereaved hearts, and bring peace to our land before another New Year wings its flight into eternity.

As if to increase the anticipated delight, the "Old woman," as the children say, began picking her geese, scattering the snowy feathers all over the earth till it was covered from sight, and the trees waved in all their glory of beautiful trimming. It would have non plussed a legion of special correspondents of the London Times to narrate all that was discussed by the Stockton belles and brass buttons that day.

The belles were proud of the B. B.'s, and nice cerse, and the male portion mimic blue coats and brass frkings felt as if they had got into the wrong pew somehow. Now comes the gist of our story. As everybody in the village was happy but Squire Belmont, of course that state of things was very unpleasant to the poor man, and he seemed to be doing his best to bring others to a like level of unhappiness. Everybody in the village who had any pretentions to being somebody knew Squire B., and could tell within an inch of the truth what he had for dinner every wash-day—how many fires he kept in the house during winter—what he paid John the coachman, and Biddy the cook, and Sarah the chamber-maid, etc., etc., and how "chuffy" he was sometimes to Madame B., who couldn't say boo to a goose. He was the one, though, to tell the old gentleman round her finger (Mrs. Grundy nodded approvingly). But then nobody was surprised at that, for was not also Grundy under her paw? and so on to the end of three chapters. The youngest child in Stockton knew the Squire's was one of the first families. The dreadful story had gone forth that about a miniature mammoth cave of round "shiners. Ah—little pitchers have large ears—why should they not have?

If Mrs. Grundy bobbed her wise head mysteriously when speaking of Miss Dora's handsome lover, why she knew on furlough, and intended taking her in "Lively Cricket" to the skating on the lake that night; and that Papa Belmont was opposed to the handsome lover ever since Charlie had joined the company, of which he was lieutenant, and there had been a great battle, Charlie's name figuring in the list of wounded and missing. So the gallant lieutenant was made to suffer by the bereaved parent, and the once hospital door closed against him for ever. But Mrs. Grundy knew there was a wedding soon in spite of all the Squire B.'s in the United States. If, I say, Mrs. G. said all these wise things, were the little pitchers to close ears and remain empty? Not they indeed.

Neighbor Belmont was a kind-hearted man, very passionate, very smashing; but as storms and clouds succeed sunshine it could not be expected he was to be all sunshine. When a storm arose, like many others, he never stopped to think, and scolded here and there, sending fly everywhere words and furniture; then, suddenly finding he had exhausted himself, would sit down with the wise conclusion, "He had been too hasty, but couldn't he helped; would do better next time."

This night pouting was to be one of those days when Belmont would himself, wherever he went Stockton's brass buttons confronted him. He heard them boast of great exploits, and knew every father in the village in him held the preserve of a returned soldier-boy sitting at his right hand at the well-filled board that day. But where was his son, the idol of his heart, and decidedly, he thought, the handsomest, wittiest boy in all the ville? Dead? perhaps buried in traitor soil. The thought was harrowing.

"No, no; all this rejoicing was joy to others but sorrow to him.

"Oh, Absalom, my son, my son, would I had died for thee!" was the cry of his heart as he paced back and forth, to and fro, over the rich Brussels; in the very bitterness of his thoughts seeming to see his life from the roses he was treading on. He could see only thorns; the cloud had no silver lining.

There was a light in the room, save a faint glimmer from the latrobe, and the blinds being open, the silver moonbeams reflected on the high walls. The laughter floated in from the street as the belles and B. B.'s were whirled by in sleighs drawn by horses whose every motion filled the air with sleigh-bells a hundred fold. The squire never deigned to cast his eyes on the gay scene. Only once he halted in his tramp, tramp, and then a dainty figure in skating costume had tripped into the room, and poising a cunning cap on one side of its head, was dancing before him.

"Dora!"

"Well, papa."

"You are not going out to-night?"

"Oh, yes, papa, I am to the lake. We are going to have such nice times. I don't believe a girl in Stockton dreams of staying home to-night. There's a party at Evan's, at Winslow's, a 'tarbagging' on College Hill, and our little skating party on the lake—most select, papa, and a dance and refreshments—at Mrs. Darby's across the lake—won't it be splendid? But I shan't go to the dance, because—(hesitating)—and then so many boys are home on furlough."

Dora came to a dead stop; she had made a tremendous blunder, and a storm came down in all its fury.

"That is enough, miss! Do you think of your dead brother, and rejoice at others' return? You hard-hearted girl!"

"Papa!" was all the astounded girl said; but reproach, astonishment, and anger found expression in that one little word.

"Go to your room, miss, and take off that mockery dress—no sensible girl would wear it. You are not going out this night to flirt with that Vernon. There, don't look at your mother, she can't help you. Go, I say, and let me tell you for the last time, if that lieutenant ever darkens my door again, I'll not be answerable for the consequences. Remember that!"

Dora, to hide the fast coming tears, flitted out, and vanished up the broad stairs in a twinkling.

"Bravo, bravo!" cried old gentleman slippers.

"You are too harsh with Dora. She has not been out of the house, excepting to church, since the sad heard of Charlie's death, and that is over months ago. Young people need some pleasure, Albert." The meek voice of little Mrs. Belmont, sounded like the squeak of a timid mouse.

In an instant the fortifications were besieged, and for full ten seconds her spouse towered above her.

"Madame! it is your weak indulgence has ruined that girl; you've let her have her own way till there's no such thing as denying her! You shall not spoil another daughter, for Dorothy will take into hands after this, and bring her up in the way she shall go; and ——"

"When she is old she'll die broken-hearted!" little madame ventured, with pouting lip.

No reply was deigned. The squire tilting himself on his toes, clasped his hands on his back, one chubby finger of his right hand patting the words down in the palm of his left, proceeded:

"Madame, I am going to learn over a new leaf—a new leaf—the old one is about worn out. You shall see who is master in this house—I—what are you meaning at, miss?"

Daughter Beauty dropped the long lashes over her wondering eyes, she had never heard papa speak so angrily before, and, peeping her head out behind her mother's chair, till, being fairly out of range of shot from the squire's great guns, she cast a perfect shower of glances at the huge combination of flesh, and bone, and blood that stood up and went down the room, reminding the little creature of an ironclad vessel at sea. As if satisfied there were no signs of peace in that quarter, the child turned to the white kitten in her lap, and began whispering to it in her quick, decided way.

"There! lie still, Kitty, don't move! Papa is so angry, and if you jump out on to the floor, I shall be frightened, and then I'll run after you, and send you flying out of the window, like he did poor little Pontoo the other morning, 'cause he scrubbed up my best wax doll's pate of hair when he was sleeping; and, oh, dear, he looked so funny, and two ladies came in—papa was so mortified, 'cause they couldn't help laughing at his bare head. Oh, dear, dear, dear, and Charlie is dead; lie still, Kitty, or you'll be dead too! and then Beauty will keep like ma does every night when she thinks of Charlie, and seems a bit like it did before he went to the war; papa grows cross, crosser, crossest, as Monsieur Finley says, and ma is sad, sadder, saddest. Would you not like to see brother, Kitty? Most all the little girls in the village have their big brothers home to-night, and Belle Gaylord got a splendid new tackle basket out out of wood when cramped on Mount—Mount ——"

Miss did not wait to hear what mountain; the little girl's breath tickled her ear, and with a bound she was on the floor, her bushy appendage curled over her back, and her two sides rubbing playfully against her immense slippers with two voices worked on each.

"Oh! don't papa, don't hurt Kitty! She did not mean to get in your way." Her dimpled arms clung around the limb that was raised to send pussy on an exploring expedition to nowhere in particular.

"Get up, child, get up, I say! Don't allow cats in the room. You know very well, you ——"

"Don't 'papa' me—won't have it! Do you think I am going to let you grow up like your unfortunate sister, Dora? Not if I know it. Beauty, I've turned over a new leaf; that cat must go to the kitchen. Ring the bell, and then go to bed like a lamb."

Poor little Beauty thought it was a sorry way to begin the New Year—ps so cross—no Charlie—no Kitty to play with, unless she went to the kitchen; and she could not help crying, which had always teased her about Willie Dawes—and she didn't care two sticks for Willie Dawes—she didn't! and she would marry anybody but Charlie, and he was dead.

Her kitten was carried strugging from the room, and, with her sobbing heart on her knees, she kissed her gentle mother and crept up to her chamber. Jane was not there. So climbing, climbing, ladder, and then the window, at the long, low window, she went to sleep, watching the moon shining on the white snow, and wondering if Charlie could see them from the bright stars and wishing her a happy New Year.

"Stolen pleasures are sweet." So it seemed, for a time. The night was cold and clear, the moon casting its silvery beams over the congealed lake, seemed to transform it into a sea of matted diamonds. Hither and thither glided the merry skaters over its smooth surface, the air resounding with their shouts and laughter, and the click, click, of their dainty steel runners, as they cut figures of strange device on the ice. Conspicuous among the gay throng were the fair, and the swiftest and most graceful skater of the crowd, was the irresistible Dora, in her charming costume. B. B.'s and studients, whose capillary attractions were considerably longer than ordinarily, flitted about her like bees round a flower; but her soft feet, twinkling on their slender foundations, carried her afar off, making them bite their lips with envy as she came up again, breathless and rosy, hanging to the arm of handsome Lieut. Vernon.

A race had been proposed, the forfeit a kiss from the loser (for variety's sake), all ranged themselves in line, and at the word "Forward!" they darted forward precipitately. On, on they flew, over acres and acres of ice, their garments flopping against the wind like wings of wild geese. The swiftest were first, the second rate skater sped after, and those easily vanished through up the rear. Soon a panting for breath, a falling behind, then all skimming forward again, crying, excitedly:

"Bravo, bravo, Dora—Darcy! I Don't let Vernon win!" and ahead of all Others were two figures, which soon resembled two birds in the distance.

Dora was a little in advance of the Lieutenant, and both were rapidly nearing the winning-post, when suddenly there was a heavy unbalance imbedded in the ice, and she was whirled round with dizzy velocity. Vernon never lessened his speed till the goal was reached, then turned, and was after Miss Dora, who was off in the opposite direction. Of course he overtook her; but it's not for us to say the peculiar sound which followed was not caused by the steel skates.

"Oh, Guy—Lieutenant Vernon—how dare ——"

"Oh, Guy—Lieutenant Vernon—how dare!" mimicked he, and sang:

"I'll kiss thee yet, yet,
An' I'll kiss thee o'er again,
An' I'll kiss thee yet, yet,
My bonny Peggy Alison!"

sang the provoking fellow.

"Oh, Guy, papa will be so go?" Dora pleaded, in a little, quivering, coaxing tone.

"Go, then!" opening his arms.

She started, and—found herself inside two large fur coat sleeves, while ——

"Guy Vernon, I'll tell your mother—if you dare! But it serves me right; if I had not disobeyed papa—never did it before—I would not be here to-night, you naughty fellow. I feel real wicked cause I came; am going right home again this minute. Do you hear, sir?"

"Papa be—enjoying himself at home!" was the amiable response, and tucking her hand through his arm, they started back.

"Well, but it isn't right for you to—to—when I don't want you to," and Dora pouted.

"Very well, then, let us give 'em all back to you with interest. I'm willing."

Oh, woman, perverse art thou! Dora was not willing, but darted away with a scream and laugh. They joined the others just as a large sleigh, drawn by two horses, dashed down to the lake shore, and a huge bundle, all covered with fur, rolled out into the snow.

"Oh, it's papa! What shall I do, Guy?" cried Dora, clinging, with little nervous laughs, to the amused young fellow's sleeve at her side.

"Hallo, squire, going to join our party? Splendid idea——"

"It's my daughter, Dora—Miss Belmont—in this crowd?" thundered the squire, scanning each individual.

"Well, she was, a few minutes ago; but she and Lieutenant Vernon were possessed of a sudden notion to cross the lake to Judge Derby's. There they go now!"

His informant pointed his finger at two distant objects, making all speed toward the opposite shore.

"A kingdom for a pair of skates!" shouted the enraged papa, hopping about like one possessed.

Immediately a small pile of glittering things lay at his feet.

"Confound them all! There ain't one big enough to fit my great toe. Don't see why you fellows can't have sensible sized feet. Can't afford the material, I suppose!"

The fugitives, meanwhile, were flying onward, growing more and more indistinct in the distance. With one despairing glance toward them, the squire sprang upon his feet, declaring he would dress on his way home—which were better than all the slippery skates in Christendom. "Never did believe in them—never!"

Stepping just a little too bravely "struck out;" but his feet being in a greater hurry to reach the runways than convenient, started forward on skate "over the handle," leaving the stout gentleman on the broad of his back, gazing at stars innumerable.

"Hallo, Belmont! studying astronomy?"

"Don't laugh, boys—don't laugh! Plaguey hard that ice is. Don't believe me—try it yourself. Cold t—too; but here goes again."

Thump! That time he fell backed, leaving him sprawling on his hands and knees in a most ludicrous position. The girls giggled spasmodically, and clapped their hands in their muffs.

"Bettah give it up, Squah! Won't pay. Miss Belmont is already in 'Canada,'" drawled a bespangled swell, who was gracefully moving, with graceful ease, in circles around the Squire; a charming divinity in coats and furs, hitched to his sleeve.

"Confound that rascal Vernon! He shall pay for this—so if he don't. I—I'll challenge him to shoot a duel with me."

"Hurrah for you, Belmont; stick to that, and we'll stand seconds!" shouted a dozen laughing voices, whose owners had watched at the preference Miss Dora showed for Lieutenant Vernon.

The old gentleman's temper was certainly getting the better of him.

"Plague take 'em both," he muttered. "I'll discown that girl, I will! Oh, my poor body! Jehu, you grinning spe come here and pick me up! Boys, if you see that daughter of mine, give her to understand she need never show me her face again."

Full of wrath and bruises, he was tumbled into the sleigh; and, when fairly out of sight, there was such a shout of mirth burst forth as never was heard on that lake before; the whole party starting on a double-quick across the lake to see "what was to pay," as some one expressed himself.

"Do forgive me and Guy, papa! We couldn't help it—indeed we could not—I mean getting married at Judge Derby's to-night. Just forgive us this once, and we'll never do it again, that's a dear, good papa!"

"Zounds! out of my sight this instant! I discown you—you ungrateful, disobedient young jade, you. And you, sir—I—I——"

"Where! what in creation is the matter this time of night?"

"Charlie! Charlie!" the ladies screamed, and fainted—almost.

Yes, it's Charlie—Charlie—real flesh and blood! Captured by rebs in battle; confined for six months a prisoner in miserable Richmond; exchanged—and is now ready to be smothered to death with kisses."

Such embracing—such joyful tears and laughter; then a hasty parlay to the young married pair—more embracing, and then Charlie darted upstairs to find his pet—his Beauty.

"Oh, Charlie! I'm so glad you've come. I dreamed in my sleep you would. Papa won't be cross any more—you will get me another Pontoo—kitty can come while she stays; and, oh, won't we be happy, brother?" Her soft arms clung round his neck.

The young couple say the one night remembered as the happiest of their lives was the one in which they Stated into Matrimony.

WHEN SPRING IS HERE.

BY ELLEN L. HILLBURN.

WHEN Spring is here, with leaves and flowers,
And blossoms on the tree,
And song of birds in shaded bowers,
And smiling skies and bright-winged hours,
Dearest, remember me.

I know it may be thine to gaze
On many a fairer brown,
On eyes of more serene repose,
On cheeks with hue of woodland rose:
Then canst thou love as now?

And thou wilt hear glad voices ring
In music wild and free,
Sweet heavenly tones, which thrill the breast,
And seek its inmost depths.
Then canst thou think of me?

Thou canst! I will not deem thee false,
I will not doubt thy truth
By that dark earnest eye, whose light
Reflects a spirit pure and bright;
I yield the love of youth.

And take it; 'tis a holy thing
A heart's first trusting love.
The first, the last, for none save thee
E'er sank on its wavering melody,
Changeless as heaven above.

The Last Goblin of Long Gully.

BY P. NORMAN.

PLEASANTLY situated amidst the drowsy atmosphere of a chain of blue hills, is the thriving village of Vinetoe. Even half a century ago, so it was distinguished for the beauty of its situation and the air of neatness that pervaded the row of whitewashed cottages, which constituted the body of the village, which a scrupulously clean and venerable looking church added materially to its appearance. A settled air of drowsy quietness rested upon the place, and the advance of the hills was not broken by the eternal jar and clatter of machinery. The people moved to their daily vocations in the manner utterly at variance with the present bustle and confusion, and throughout the long summer day, a dull, drowsy hum arose from the laborers perfectly in keeping with the scene.

Now, however, a great change has come over it. The gradual quietness is changed into bustle and activity; stores and hotels have arisen in a short time, and other more pretending churches rear their gilded spires heavenward, as if pointing out the true path to the beholder. The silence of the quiet hills, too, is broken by the demon-like shriek of the railroad engine, and the echoes startle their woody summits, where formerly nought was heard but the notes of the woodland songsters.

The present inhabitants of the place also differ from those of the anterior date in many respects. The good old-fashioned amusements, termed quiltings and apple-parings have given place to general dances, and the people, sometimes feeling the need of a little recreation, are thus left without a resource, or compelled to ape the absurd amusements of others. Long Gully, then, therefore, lost much of the gaiety that characterized those of the former age, and pass their time in a seclusion attention to business.

Among the many disused customs of the place is that of constant visiting. In those days of yore, it was customary for a score of young people to get together about some hospitable hearth, and while the fire roared and danced merrily up the ample chimney, and the cold winds howled their wooden-voiced gales at ghosts and goblins were related, causing the blood of the younger listeners to curdle with terror and awe. Whole hour for parting arrived, and all were compelled to take their homeward way, misgiving and fear was perceptible upon many a brow. Every distant shrub and shadow was mistaken for some supernatural form, and every passing night-breeze carried to the affrighted ears unearthly sounds. Happy was he who, on such occasions, could "screw his courage to the sticking place" sufficiently to solicit the companionship of some fair one through the lonesome way. In such cases the imagination regained its proper tone, and defiance was bid with safety to every nocturnal phantom.

There was a locality near this village called Long Gully, the very atmosphere of which was believed to be tainted with things supernatural. Half a mile or more, upon the rough and winding road leading from the place, a rude wooden bridge of some length spanned a narrow though deep gorge, the bottom of which was covered by a dense growth of cedars. Tradition made this place famous as the haunts of shadows too horrible to contemplate. It is related that in the days of the Revolution a peaceful family was butchered here by a band of refugees, and here, too, summary punishment was inflicted upon the murderers when they were captured. In later times the body of a poor peddler was found near the bridge, shockingly mangled, and his pack rifled of everything valuable. Suspicion failed to point out the assassin, and the body was hastily buried by the roadside. In the days of which we write, the low grassy mound was distinctly visible, and it was said that the ghastly form of the unfortunate peddler often wandered there in the night. To climax this eulogistic harrow, it was related that two notorious murder had ruthlessly murdered her innocent babe near the bridge, and left the body to putrify in the cavity.

This was enough to render this otherwise pleasant spot a stumbling-block in the way of all night travelers. We note the unfortunate swain who was compelled to pass this awful place after the shadows of night had fallen. To him each fearful step seemed to unlock new terrors; gnarled satyrs and goblins glided, with noiseless tread, through the sombre shade, and discmant sounds filled his ears, as though the very doors of infernal regions were turning on their hinges, and grating harsh thunder."

The genius of this part of the rolling thunder among the distant hills was mistaken for the wild rush and halloo of a band of spectral horsemen clattering over the causeway with iron hoof. The mournful sigh of the south wind through the pine tops, in the still, midnight hour, was magnified into the moan and wailing of the murdered baby, and the music of a running waterfall became the gurgling sound of life-blood welling from some ghastly wound. Every sound bore a terrible significance, and every shadow became a horrid form pictured by the workings of an excited imagination.

Man generally smile at these absurd fancies of our ancestors, and when surrounded with friends and in the full light of day, can talk logically of the folly of such imaginings, and of yielding to such trifling fears. But let their imaginations prove recreant to reason, and in the hush and solemnity of night conjure up some phantom from the surrounding gloom, and they, too, will shrink back appalled. When we consider that in those days it was the general belief of the common people that the spirits of the departed frequently walked the churchyards and such places, and kept watch and ward with the twinkling stars, and that such ghostly forms were often seen about Long Gully, we shall not wonder at the dread that caused them to shun it as a pestilence. The mention of the name was enough to frighten nearly juvenile one of half their senses, and cause them to cower to bed in a subdued manner, which could have been enforced by no other means in the absence of the usual whipping. Hence, notwithstanding its clustering terrors, it became useful to the good dames of the vicinity sometimes in subduing the obstinacy of their progeny.

A short distance from Long Gully bridge, upon a beautiful eminence, stood a brown stone house of antique style. It looked as though it had weathered the storms of many winters, and a closer examination would have revealed the date of its erection, A.D. 1680, worked upon the chimney leading back to the early days of the province, when hill and valley was covered with the primeval forest. This was the dwelling of Josiah Vandervater, the most wealthy person in the vicinity, and also proprietor of the broad fertile acres, stretching away on all sides. His boundary lines included Long Gully, but this, instead of being a source of congratulation to him, was one of disquietude, for he and again the good yeoman retired him to dispose of it in some manner, for she feared that its possession would bring some terrible calamity upon the family. The husband-Josiah was not so thoroughly imbued with supernatural ideas as his wife, and would sit and smoke pidgeonholly until she had concluded, and then, shaking the ashes from his pipe with an emphatic rap, would say:

"Why, you talk tosh; I shall not part with Long Gully, for no one would have it, and, besides, I want it myself!"

And so the subject generally dropped.

If ever there existed a fortunate individual it was Josiah Vandervater. He possessed an abundance of wealth, had a kind, good-hearted wife, plenty of time to smoke his pipe and cogitate upon profound subjects, and, to crown all, was blessed with a buxom, beautiful daughter, who was known throughout that whole region as the fair Joan Vandervater. The only drawback to his perfect comfort was concentrated in the persons of three stout negroes, of which he was unhappily the proprietor, and who were given to eye service and basking on the sunny side of some hedge-row, while hoeing of the weedy ground and "massy's" stout cudgel. Such conduct sometimes sorely tried his patience, but, as a general thing, all moved in perfect harmony, and grumbling and discontent was seldom heard. The old farm-house wore such an air of quiet repose that it might have been a haunt for any of the sentimental natural science. A stranger would have wondered at its dreamy quietness, and probably been in doubt as to whether its inhabitants were not enjoying a prolonged doze, unless he caught a glimpse of its owner's portly form upon the piazza, or heard Joan's voice singing some good old-fashioned air, as she attended to her household duties.

Joan could not complain of a lack of suitors, as many a bright-eyed maiden of our degenerate days can. She was a prize worth winning in more than one respect, and the dashing beaux of the vicinity were not slow in discovering the important fact, and acting accordingly. On Sabbath evenings it was not uncommon to see half a dozen possessions hitched to the fence in methodical order, while their owners ensconced within courted an acquaintance with Cupid, or talked with becoming gravity of the state of the weather or crops. On such occasions Josiah and his wife were all urbanity, and exhausted the catalogue of hospitalities for the entertainment of the visitors with such effect, that on the homeward way, visions of beauty, and endless piles of dollars, danced through their bewildered heads, to the utter exclusion of every thought save that of matrimony.

Among the retinue of suitors, there were two who confidently counted upon success; but who the favored one would be, it was impossible to decide, as seeming victory sometimes perched upon the head of one, only to fly to the other the next favorable opportunity. It was unquestionable that Joan was undecided herself with this subject, and adopted the expedient of retaining both until such time as it could be comfortably decided.

The claims which these rivals urged in the prosecution of their suits were about equal, the necessary qualifications lacking in one, being possessed by the other, and vice versa. James McGalliard was a Scotchman by birth, and possessed all the shrewdness for which that people are justly celebrated. His personal appearance was good, and half the girls of the village were in love with him, but his affections were concentrated upon the acquisition of the hand and fortune of the fair Joan, and he heeded them not. The genius of this son of Scotia was of the rolling stone order, but he never would obtain the hand of old Josiah's daughter, as he had been seen in a state of intoxication quite frequently, and was, moreover, poor as a church mouse.

John Vandyke, the other suitor, was an awkward, thick-headed Dutchman, who was not calculated to make a favorable impression by his external appearance. He, also, was a favorite with the villagers, for he was an unexceptionable character for sobriety of conduct, and possessed wealth to gloss over his many defects. Rumor said that notwithstanding his dullness, his chances of success were better than those of his more gifted rival, and that Josiah and his wife were known to rather favor his suit.

Time rolled on, however, and still nothing occurred to relieve this state of doubt. The last summer rose had lost its bloom; the crisp and yellow leaves fluttered sadly downward through the air, and all nature gave token of preparation for a deathly sleep while icy blasts should sweep over the earth. The farmers throughout the region engaged in gathering home the products of the soil, to be in readiness when the snow lay deep on the hill-tops, and merry gales growled without, to enjoy the society of the home circle, or go gliding over the smooth, hard-trodden snow with merry jingle and exhilarating speed.

One bright afternoon, Josiah Vandervater, one of Josiah Vandervater's negroes, the most worthless of the three, might have been seen riding the hilly valley of Long Gully, mounted upon a spirited colt. He appeared in his element, riding at full speed, and twisting and turning the mettlesome animal in the most fantastic circles and pigeon wings, much to the amusement of the beholders, who were never disappointed in having a little diversion in this line when Sambo was present. After riding up and down with an air that seemed to say: "Go way, dar, dis yeah hoss and me don't beat nuffin," Sambo drew in his mind and recollected the business upon which he was sent, and drew the rein. After scratching his wooly head a while, as if to collect his thoughts and his scattered thoughts, a bright idea occurred to him, and he made the following exciting proclamation to the crowd of gazers who had collected to witness his performance:

"Look heah, white folks! Massa Vandervater send me up to invite his fresse to a party to-morrow night; but by golly I'se 'bliged to keep it a secret of my ole head, and I derefore obfuskate to you our complems, and invites you all, yah, yah! Long Gully Ball, I tell you, and Massa Josiah say."

The next day was one of extraordinary preparation at the farm house; from early dawn, all was bustle and activity. The fat pullets were relieved of cake, and a variety of edibles, too tedious to enumerate, were deposited in the pantry against the evening, and another cooking of "massy's" colt, seemed to have caught the infection, and bustled about in such glee, that twenty years at least seemed to have been stricken from his age. The day was far advanced before everything was arranged satisfactorily, and the family had only a few hours to themselves before the festive hour arrived. The evening brought the first instalment of the company. Rustic Polly's, Sally's, and Betsy's interspersed with a few Pete's, John's, and Bill's, by way of variety, all smiling, laughing, happy, and on a very tip-toe of excitement. The whole company came pouring in their wake, and very soon the house was filled to its full, and the talking went on at an alarming rate. James McGalliard was there of course, and as usual, was continually the centre of a circle of admirers. A smile of quiet triumph rested upon his face as he noticed the absence of his rival; but this exultation was short lived, for at that very moment, John Vandyke was scouring over Long Gully behind, mounted in an antiquated gig; and the way the colt was tackled would have delighted the heart of a trot, even upon the most urgent occasions.

Supper was finally announced, and the evident relish with which the guests discussed the edibles piled up before them, spoke eloquently in praise of the skilful housewifery of the givers of the feast. Every duty, however, be it ever so pleasant, must end somewhere, and so, after ample justice had been done in the way of eating, the company adjourned to the parlor, impatient for the business of the evening to commence. At this juncture, a new comer—who was none other than Sam, the hero of the invitations—appeared in their midst. With shining ivory and mincing step, he made his way to the most conspicuous corner, and then call there produced a certain popular musical instrument from under his arm, upon which he produced such a sharp, diabolical noise, that every one was electrified. After much preliminary screwing and squalling, he took a seat, squared his elbow, and dashed off into "All the Blue Spirits" in the most approved style. The hint thus given, was soon acted upon by the company, and the dancing commenced in a most animated manner. None of your light and fantastic movements as though you were afraid of touching the floor, but regular, old-fashioned jigging, in the form as one set became fatigued, another stood ready for their places, and all seemed to be enjoying themselves highly.

There was one person present, however, who was utterly miserable, and that was John Vandyke, who had scarcely spoken to Joan the whole evening, and having at length gradually failed to secure her hand for a dance, he left the room in a surly mood. Not looking nor caring whither his footsteps were bending, his offended eye was suddenly greeted by a peculiar odor, which he could pronounce neither present nor disagreeable. Entering the pantry, from whence the fragrance issued, he finally discovered a neat sideboard, upon which sundry bottles were arranged in beautiful precision, and the peculiar odor which had attracted his notice. Here was evidently a consolation to be quickly formed a conclusion and a resolve. With a covert look around, to be sure that no one lurked near, he seized one of the bottles, and placed it to his lips, while the gurgling sound of the liquid as it rushed down his capacious throat, told of the depth of his grief. He replaced the bottle, and in short intervals, he repeated the experiment, until objects began to multiply to his gaze at an alarming rate, and he found himself in much the same way the merry party in the parlors. After a prolonged search he found the door and made his exit, resolving that he would steal away before any one could notice his unsteady condition. Fortune now seemed to favor him, for Dobbin was soon found dozing over a post, and our hero, after much difficulty and perseverance, in establishing himself upon the back of the docile animal, in utter forgetfulness of the gig, that was following so closely at his heels.

It was a beautiful morning. The moon, far down in the western horizon, threw her rays obliquely, causing the shadows to appear long on the road, while deeper in the woods the darkness was unrelieved by a single silvery beam. The constellations overhead looked like diamonds through the clear atmosphere, and everything was serene and unclouded, with the exception of Long Gully, from the marshy bottom of which a foggy vapor was slowly creeping up, enveloping in its gray, misty curtain. These beauties of the night, however, were wasted upon John, as it required all his remaining skill to keep himself in the seat. Presently the sound of wheels in the loose gravel behind attracted his attention, and turning about with difficulty, he discovered the dim outline of a gig in the rear.

"I swanny," muttered John, "if that don't look like Parson Hardy, and I really believe he must be crazy, or drunk, or both, to ride so close."

After riding awhile in silence, he began to think that possibly the gig might have the parson there near, taking note of his unsteadiness, and he hit upon a ruse to send him on:

"Ge-lang, Dobbin—ge-lang, you'd be—r drive on (hic); old Dobbin is dref—ful lazy (a—hic) tonight."

He had scarcely finished speaking, when a frightful groan rent the air, in unpleasant proximity to his head. He cast about one wild look of terror, and then, strange enough, both upright in the gig, and grasping the reins with long skinny fingers, sat a horrible figure. Nothing more was needed to fill the cup of horror, and with an exclamation of fear, and a volley of blows upon Dobbin's ribs, causing that sedate quadruped to start in astonishment, and make rider, gig and everything fly, he urged the animal on to unusual speed. The fact about one wild look of terror, and then, strange enough, both upright in the gig, and grasping the reins with long skinny fingers, sat a horrible figure. Nothing more was needed to fill the cup of horror, and with an exclamation of fear, and a volley of blows upon Dobbin's ribs, causing that sedate quadruped to start in astonishment, and make rider, gig and everything fly, he urged the animal on to unusual speed. The faster they went, until presently Long Gully appeared, dimly seen, right ahead through the foggy vapor that rose from it, and the bridge was not far distant. With one hasty glance over his shoulder, he saw the figure in frightful proximity, and another groan of terror caused him to urge his horse to the utmost. Old Dobbin was equal to the emergency this time, and in putting forth superhuman exertion, he fairly flew through the middle of the bridge, when there was an awful crash, and he came to a dead halt, sending his rider sprawling over his spinning head in the air into the soft sand on the opposite side. A wild demoniac laugh rang out upon the night air as the phantom approached and stood over the fallen hero.

"John Vandyke," it said, in solemn tones, "unless you make some promises and adhere to them, you are lost!"

"What are they?" abjectly groaned the terrified wretch.

"First, swear to speak of love to Joan Vandevater; give up all pretensions to her hand, and never mention this occurrence to any one. Do you promise?"

"Yes," answered John, in the same abject tone, not daring to look up.

"Then," pursued the figure in such an extraordinary tone, that any one in their cool senses would have had but little difficulty in deciding, that the speaker was in the imminent danger of suffocation from long suppressed mirth.

John finally mustered courage to look up. The figure was gone, and without a thought of anything but his own safety, he fled homeward, leaving Dobbin to care for himself. Ere it was fairly light the horse appeared much to his master's relief, dragging a nondescript sort of vehicle, composed of shafts, one wheel and a damaged gig seat. John rubbed his eyes, looked at the wreck, and endeavored to recall the circumstances of his flight, but all that remained was a vivid remembrance of that terrible form, and the promises he made. During the day a gig wheel and some fragments were found on Long Gully Bridge, bearing the appearance of having been smashed against the stout oaken railing, but John wisely kept silent, and it was soon forgotten.

Three months rolled by, and there was another party at the brown-stone farm-house. This one differed from the formerly described, for when the guests were assembled, Parson Wilson also appeared, and Joan and McGalliard were united in wedlock. John Vandyke was also there, and congratulated the bride, and wished her all manner of happiness, in such a strange way, that a peculiar smile stole over the features of the bridegroom. It passed unnoticed by John, but others present took note of it, and chuckled to themselves, when they found out in what wise that means the wily Scotchman had distanced his more genuine rival.

Half a century with its many changes and improvements has elapsed since these occurrences. Winston is no longer the quiet hamlet resting among the hills, but has increased to a flourishing town, while over through its streets resounds the clatter of machinery and the loud hum of business. Long Gully, too, has been reduced to a mere shadow of its former self; having been shorn of its shrubbery, and the greater part been made available for agricultural purposes. The old bridge has long fallen to decay, and now moaning and evening, the iron horse thunders across the gap where it stood, upon one of far different construction, and it is most probably the smoke and fire of this iron monster, that so effectually keeps the ghosts from infesting the former supernatural frequenters. It is seldom mentioned now, in connection with things ghostly, except, perhaps, when some one Josh Billings or a like old man—relates sometimes to an admiring audience, the circumstance, and the way in which he saw "The Last Goblin at Long Gully."

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

WHY is a thief your only true philosopher? Because he reasons on everything from a different point of view; is opposed to alterations of protection, and is ready to overlook.

IN walking, turn your toes out rather than out, your thoughts inward.

WHICH is the oldest tree known to man? The elder tree, of course.

WHY are some fortunes like ships? Because they are built on stocks.

WANTED, the receipt which is given when a gentleman "pops his question."

REALLY the rhetoric of puff writers is getting to be intolerable. One of them, in praising a new quality of cotton, terms that "it is as pure as the tears which fall upon a sister's grave!"

THE faculty of reason, like that of memory, is lost by those who have an ass.

THE body and the mind are improved by the soul that fattens them.

WHAT flower most resembles a bull's mouth? A cowslip.

WHAT two sciences are employed by teamsters in driving oxen? *Bas-*tinies and *gee-*ology.

ONE day, while a regiment was at the target practice, the commanding officer called out to the captain, who was a sharp fellow:

"Captain, can you deploy your company across the valley at once?"

The captain saluted, performed the duty required, and reported himself.

"Colonel, I have done as you ordered; but I don't think you need me while attending myself and company for the duty."

"Why?" asked the colonel.

"Because, sir, you showed us up before the whole regiment as a set of fools."

A MAGISTRATE asked a prisoner if he were married?

"No," replied the man.

"Then," rejoined his worship, amid peals of laughter, "I'll soon put you in the way of it."

"THAT was greedy of you, Tommy, to eat your little sister's share of cake."

"Well, ma, I was always to take her part," said Tommy.

"JEMIMY, my lad," said a hopeful father to his son, "keep away from the gals. Don't have one comin', dodge. Just such a critter as that young'un, making the way, was the ruination of your father. Avoid your pore ole dad, Jemmy. Don't cast your eyes that a-way, I tell you. I hadn't been for my pore wife, and you'd might have been in Brazil, lambin' dimuns, my s'

DURING a marriage ceremony, the bride was sobbing immoderately while the knot was being tied. "Will she say, 'I obey,'" whispered the parson to the officiat.

"Oh, sir," replied the bride, "it's because it's for ever."

"No, sir," rejoined the parson; "that's a mistake. It's not for ever. Death can put an end to the engagement."

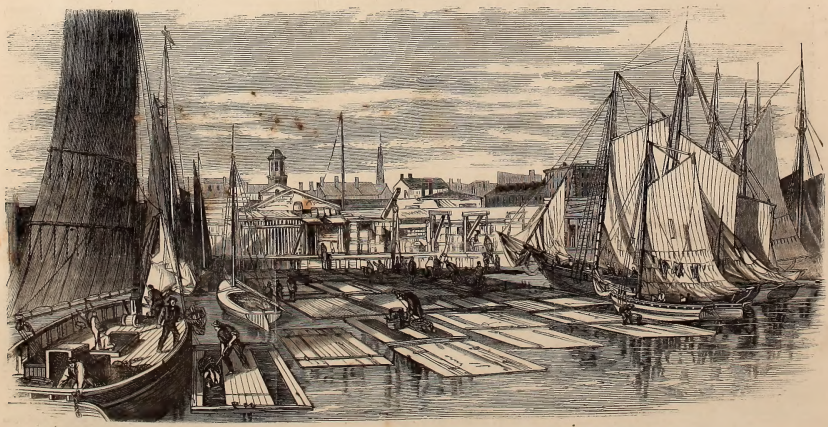
On hearing this the bride dried her tears and was consoled.

OF all the freaks of the telegraph, the following is the most remarkable which has come under our personal knowledge: Not long since a graduate from one of our Eastern institutions was appointed to the pastoral charge of a church in the extreme south-west. When about to start for his new field of labor, he was duly ordained by the presbytery of his Presbytery to ordain him. In order to explain it is non-arrival, he telegraphed: "I am ordained to ordain." The message was handed to the deacons of the church: "Presbytery licked a quorum ordained." In the course of the journey the message got strangely misconstrued, and reached the astounded deacons in the following shape: "Presbytery kicked a worm out to Adam." The sober church officers were sorely disappointed and perplexed, but after grave consultation, concluded it was the minister's facetious way of announcing that he would not get to revival, and accordingly proceeded to provide lodgings for him instead of one.

SOME years ago there were five public-houses in the following route, in Love Lane, viz., the Bear, the Angel, the Two Cups, the Three Tuns, and the White Horse. In opposition to the Bear and Angel, the latter house had the following satire writ large on the sign-board:

"My White Horse shall bite the Bear,
And make the Angel fly;
He'll turn the Three Cups upside down,
And drink the Three Tuns dry."

A CERTAIN method of keeping eggs from spoiling: eat them while they're fresh.



THE NEW YORK FISH MARKETS.

THE INTERIOR OF FULTON FISH MARKET, BETWEEN FULTON AND BEEKMAN STREETS, EAST RIVER, NEW YORK.

FULTON FISH MARKET, SOUTH STREET, NEW YORK.

FISHING SMACKS UNLOADING AND DEPOSITING THE FISH IN THE CARS AT FULTON MARKET DOCK, EAST RIVER, NEW YORK.

HOW THE FISH MARKET IS SUPPLIED.

MENDING THE NETS.

ASSORTING THE FISH.

DRAWING THE SEINE ON OLD LONG ISLAND'S SEA-GIRT SHORE.

FISHING WITH THE FOUND NETS AT GRAVESEND, LONG ISLAND.

IN THE CENTRAL PARK.

BY N. G. SHEPHERD.

I'm a lady of Fashion, my name's Millionaire,
I am young, though my husband is old;
And the gossipping world which we live in pro-claims
That I married my lord for his gold.

Never mind, it may talk as it will, for my part
I've a house that is stately and grand,
A carriage and horses, and servants to wait,
And all in exchange for my hand.

It is true, as I said, that my husband is old,
But his wealth is enormous, they say,
And what with petroleum, coal mines, and stocks,
I have heard 'tis increasing each day.

I am sure that his talk is of nothing beside,
To his friends at the office or over their wine,
As bonnets and feathers, and jewels and lace,
Are the popular topics with mine.

At five in the evening I go for a drive
Behind the bright bays in the Park,
And sometimes beside me my lord sits erect,
As becoming a man of his mark.
All smiling, he nods to this one and that,
And chatters to me all the while
Of their station, their fortunes, and how they were made,
Somewhat in this kind of style.

That's Brown, the big broker, and Smith of the bank,
And Doubleye, the head of our board,
And Jones, the contractor, my love, who, I'm told,
Since the war is as rich as a lord.
There's Charles, who's made such a fortune in stocks,
And Simkins, in oil wells, my dear,
And Stevens, in shoddy, whose income alone
Amounts to a million, I hear.

I listen, or seem to, at least, while he talks,
But my thoughts are of one who drives nigh
Along the broad drive on a proud-stepping steed,
And who bows as he meets my quick eye,
Just the ghost of a smile, a glance, that is all,
And the coldest conceivable tone,
In reply to my lord who inquires in regard
To my friend on the high mettled roan.

But sometimes I start on my drive while my lord
Sits over his wine and cheroot,
Along with his friends, while they argue of stocks
And the chances of loss or of gain.
And as up the broad drive tread the bright shining bays
In their majesty, splendor, and pride,
There, close to the wheel, while his rider bends low,
Steps the high mettled roan alongside.

So I ride in the Park while my lord sits at home.
My lord who is wealthy but old,
Whom the gossipping world which we live in pro-claims
I married because of his gold.
At home with his dinner, his friends, and his wine,
Discussing of loss and of gain,
And dreaming of gold in each bubble that breaks
In the froth of the creamy champagne.

And I in my carriage, behind the bright bays,
In their majesty, splendor, and pride,
Roll on through the Park, while close to the wheel
Steps the high mettled roan alongside;
And the voice of his rider, who stoops to my ear,
To my cheek brings a faint crimson glow,
And awakens a feeling far down in my heart
Which my opulent lord ought to know.

I'm a lady of Fashion, I dress in the mode,
And my name is pronounced Millionaire,
But harsher by far than the chains of the slave,
Are the barbarous fetters I wear.
I've a carriage and horses, and servants to wait,
And a house which is stately and grand,
Yet there lives not a wretch who is poorer than I,
Through the length and the breadth of the land.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.—ANTHONY'S GIFT.

THE doctor might be an ass, as Anthony had said on a certain occasion, but the words were scarcely spoken before the latter regretted he had been the person to say so. However, it was only to Dick Sleuth he had spoken, and Dick was not the man to repeat the hasty opinion. Anthony soon forgot all about it, and then, finding his thoughts revert to Clarissa, checked them with characteristic energy, by plunging suddenly into something else.

"Well, now, Dick," said he to his cousin, soon after the return of the doctor, "if you aren't quite ready to be off, or if you don't like the look of the weather, or if you'd rather stay at home just now, say the word, and I'll go myself to look into this business."

Sleuth glanced at Anthony, and saw there was nothing like taking offence in the aspect of his friend, and that he might, if he so pleased, really let Anthony go, and thus be uncontroled master, for a time, in the house. There were weighty reasons why this would have been desirable. He had not yet fathomed the mystery of the coat, and he wanted to do so; and then, as days passed on, he began to anticipate, with equal hope and alarm, the return of one of the robbers to open negotiations about the conduct—perhaps, even, to hold their knowledge that they did not themselves shoot the old man as a whip over those whom they might fancy to be the real murderers. He dreaded, of all things, Anthony's meeting with either of those men, for there was no saying what stroke, get possession of the codicil and destroy it, and be able to overpower Sleuth, by causing him to be arrested as a criminal, if he made any outcry about his rights.

But then, Sleuth had an intense desire to get away from the house, if only for a few days, provided he could do it in safety. The thought, the frequent sight, of that chamber where his whole life had been changed by a single act, springing, as he tried to persuade himself, from a momentary impulse, sickened him; and took away the energy that he felt might be required for coping successfully with so fearful an antagonist as the expected robber.

Nor was that all. He had a sort of instinct of cunning that whispered to him that he ought, he ought to be, and what doing; and it told him now he ought to be at Leeds, searching into the question of whether there was not a sort of claimant on the estate of the alderman that even he, Sleuth, would be obliged to acknowledge, in deference to the prejudices of the public. Sleuth didn't like the idea of having this child to look after, and who might be always ready to hint to him—"You know I ought to have all this property, and therefore please to mind how you behave to me." No, he must go to Leeds, and not let Anthony do it; and, after gently calling to take a good long look at the sky, while pondering over these things, he said:

"No, Anthony, I shall go—unless you like to say you have changed your mind about me."

"Dick, don't be a fool!" said Anthony, a little testily; but Sleuth proceeded:

"No, Anthony, again, you have work for every day in the week for at least a week to come, in putting things straight with Mr. Stamp, an invaluable man, and in looking after the affairs in a satisfactory manner."

"Quite right, Dick. Come, then, I wish you'd quietly and get me a pencil, some ink and a hammer. Ask no questions. You'll see!"

Sleuth went away, wondering what this new commission might mean, and of course, took the chance to keep an eye upon the movements of Phillis and the man, and so managed to satisfy himself they were all right for the time being, as far as Anthony was concerned.

When he returned with the tools and the nails, Anthony said, with a half smile, but with something behind it that made Sleuth crush Sleuth:

"Now—as they say in melodramas—follow me! but excuse my omission of the proper attitude." He led the way up-stairs, along the corridor, and to the bed-chamber which was to Sleuth the one place in the whole world he most detested and shrank from.

It is strange what fantastic and absurd ideas will at times come into men's minds under peculiar circumstances. Sleuth could not for the life of him avoid recollecting and dwelling upon a story he had somewhere read, of a woman having been walled up in a chamber where she had committed some heavy offence, never more to come forth. What if Anthony had made the discovery he (Sleuth) always lived in dread of, and was going to enclose him in a chamber of death—not, perhaps, to kill him there, but to accuse him, and shut him up till he could send for the officers of justice? Sleuth saw the absurdity of the supposition, but was not the less horrified at the incident, and wondered more and more what it could mean.

Everything remained in the chamber precisely as it had been left after the murder. Even the bed, where every little mark of a rise or a fall in the clothes might be the sole evidence of the murder, was unmade; Anthony having at first told the housekeeper not to let the place be seen by any but the police, and Sleuth having himself always locked and unlocked the doors during the business of the funeral, &c.

Already dust was settling upon the pillows, and spiders' webs were showing in the corners of the ceiling. The place had also a close, stifling odor, which caused Anthony, on first entering, to open one of the windows just for an instant, look out, then shut it down again, and begin operations.

"Now, Dick, you drill the holes, and I'll come after you with the hammer and nails. Don't tell. Time's precious, and we've something else to attend to."

Sleuth accordingly drilled holes where Anthony indicated, and soon the windows were nailed up. Then the shutters were closed, and subjected to a similar operation; the doors with the locks shut down. And then two of the three doors were similarly fastened. Anthony worked on with extraordinary coolness and quickness, as if there really was nothing particular in the operation, however noisy, and however much Sleuth might be puzzled; for he could not, for the life of him, imagine spirit, while, in fact, too uneasy about it even to venture to break Anthony's injunction not to talk.

Sleuth, however, kept a watchful door to fasten, and while this was, to Sleuth's relief, kept wide open to let in air, Anthony sat down on the edge of the bed, and said:

"Now, Dick, come here beside me, and hear what I've got to say. Sit down!"

"No, no, Anthony, thank you! I ain't tired."

"Surely, Dick, you don't feel afraid?"

"No, no, no, Anthony, not—not a bit afraid; but I—I don't think it exactly right—not decent—to sit there——"

"Ah, Dick, that may be your feeling, and, perhaps, most men's. It isn't mine. It may seem to you odd, but I've a reason for it, that the old man better than I ever did before, and would almost wish I hadn't a ghost of a reason for seeming to do so. But you don't know how good and genial he could be at times—I grant, only at times. But somehow I fancy that our uncle's true soul only really let itself out at those odd and seemingly inconsistent times. The world, Dick, is a great disguiser, and trade itself is often but one of the biggest of human masks. Well, Dick, I didn't, as you may judge, come here to talk this kind of nonsense. But do sit down!"

"I couldn't—I don't want, I tell you, Anthony; I'm not a bit tired."

"Why, you look fatigued to death."

"Well, Anthony, if I do, you may, I think, find some reasons for it, and—particularly in a place like this."

This was a bold thing to say. Sleuth was aghast when he had said it; but its very boldness proved his safety.

"You are right, Dick—always right, Dick, even when it sometimes fancy you are quite wrong. And it's precisely because I want you to understand how I think about you—your future and your past—that I am here now for us to have a talk before you go. I meant this talk to have been on the road, but an odd fancy occurred to me to have it here."

"Here, Anthony!" if to listen, shout a yard or so from Anthony, but gradually turned his face so that it could not be seen, while his attitude showed he was attentively cursed by Anthony's words.

"Of course, Dick, I never intended you to be a kind of 'led captain' or dependent poor cousin, to receive my contributions in humours at the risk of ejectment from house and home. Don't believe me so thoughtless; you couldn't believe me so selfish?"

"No, no, Anthony," murmured Sleuth, anxious to hear what was about to follow, craving for some information, but might anticipate the possible loss for ever of the right to ask one unmingled dearious not to compromise too far his own future relation to Anthony when the positions should be reversed, as reversed "they would be," he said to himself.

"Well, then, Dick, old fellow, this is what I propose. First, you want a position—a vocation—don't you?"

"Y—yes."

"Of course you do; so that, if I behaved badly, or you thought so, you might tell me to go to the unmentionable one, while you took off your tatter's and kicked me out of the premises," as my instructor in political economy used to say."

Sleuth laughed, and Anthony went on:

"That position is mercantile management. I must work, therefore, or you. You to rich—too lazy—too self-indulgent to work when I'm not obliged."

"Nonsense, Anthony! You know——"

"Dick, you're a wise man, learning somewhere to contradict what I now say? Very likely. Perhaps I may turn ambitious and go into Parliament, if I'm not too close-fisted. But that's my affair. Yours is to become my steward, look into everything, bring every rascal to book who tries to impose on me, and make the best of my estate, for I mean to sink my whole fortune in land."

"Not—not just yet, Anthony?" asked the frightened Sleuth, who felt he was not in control as he could summon up to disguise the poignancy of his alarm.

"Well, no—for this, among other reasons: we must mind what we buy, and how we buy, or we shall pay too dear for the whistle."

The "we" greatly reassured Sleuth, who thought it time to say:

"Well, Anthony, I have got already some inkling into the alderman's affairs, for he often employed me"—a statement that was quite true, but which ought to have been augmented by the words, "when he couldn't help it." Sleuth went on: "I should like it very much, what you say, only I've a deal to learn, and you must be vexed if I make mistakes."

"Not a bit of it. Well, now, Dick, for a tremendous question—story! It's my duty, you see, Dick, to behave to you as you are to behave to everybody else—that is, to grind you down, you grant, without mercy, for the pence five hundred a year for three years, and then a rise."

What could Sleuth say, but this Anthony was kind and liberal grateful?

"Come, Dick, now I shall have courage to go a bit further, now that we haven't quarreled over this. This arrangement is but a matter of business as between us; but you have a right to expect that I shall not receive this large property, which so easily might have been yours—nay, Dick, which I believe would have been yours, if you'd been a rogue, or anything but a downright good fellow at heart."

Sleuth "hemmed" and "hawed," as if preparing to disclaim; but Anthony said, loudly:

"Be quiet, Dick, and listen, because I want you now to speak out frankly. I have been thinking that I can do for you, and it's odd enough, but the answer to that question answers a different kind of question at the same time—what shall I do with this place, and you?"

"This house, Anthony!" said Dick, turning in surprise.

"Ay, this house, and the land belonging to it, and the furniture, and—no, not the books, I'll keep them, for his sake; but including the two horses and the carriage, and, and, if you like, your dear, crabbed old Mrs. Milton, and pretty, lovable Miss Phillis."

Sleuth began to change color, and reverted to his former position.

"There, Dick, you know now what I want to do. I want to give you this, in simple testimony of affection, respect and sympathy for your great disappointment."

"No, no, Anthony, I won't have it!" exclaimed Sleuth, vehemently; then, in alarm of what that manifestation of dislike might suggest, he added: "It's too much! too much!"

"Dick, you're a fool," said Anthony, with a constrained and hurt tone. "If you mean it's not enough——"

"Anthony, this is cruel of you!"

And, inexplicable as it may sound, the tears were standing in Sleuth's eyes, who had something in him of a woman's art of exciting sympathy at special times.

"You don't mean that? On your soul, Dick, you had no meaning of that kind?"

"Certainly not."

"Then, Dick, hang me if you shan't take it; or I'll smash our late arrangement—become my own steward——"

"But why——" interrupted Sleuth.

"Why what? Why give you this property instead of its equivalent?"

"Y—yes," assented Sleuth.

"I'll tell you, Dick, candidly. I can, as you see, sit here, and think only how I loved the old man. But I can't always be in such moods, and then, I own, the sight of the place where he was murdered becomes unpleasant to me. I don't mean merely because of the murder, but because of the tenderness the old man sometimes lavished upon me, and which makes me want to treat his house as something too sacred to be destroyed, as I at first intended; and yet as something which I should not be obliged to be in when I feel inclined to be away."

"But—but—Anthony," began Sleuth, and with an earnestness that he was obliged vainly to check, as he heard the sound of his own voice, "don't you think this applies to me, too?"

"No, Dick; because he didn't care for you, and you didn't care for him. That's the truth, and you are too manly a fellow to want me to disguise it. It isn't matter now to anybody how you regard my uncle's memory, further than this—that you pay all respect to his name for my sake."

Sleuth could not but acknowledge the truth of this, though the proffered gift absolutely revolted him at first, as seeming to bind him closer than ever to his crime. But then, again, he reflected on the convenience it would be to have Anthony away before the burglars might come to seek him.

"And when, when——"

"Well, it is yours from this hour. I have written, while waiting for you, a memorandum to that effect, and I shall dispatch it at once to Mr. Stamp, to be put in legal shape."

Sleuth began to pour forth his protestations of gratitude, but Anthony arrested them by asking:

"Do you like the house? I shouldn't like you to think the gift greater than it is."

"No," said Sleuth; then remembering that he had heard the alderman vaguely describe the whole at nine or ten thousand pounds, he said, cunningly: "It can't be less than four or five thousand pounds, Anthony."

"It's worth, at least, ten thousand pounds, I'm glad to say, since I know, Dick, it won't disappoint you. And now," he added, "do you understand what I have been about here?"

"Not exactly."

Sleuth began to think that he'd better.

"Nothing in this room for ever. I don't want to see it again—you don't."

Sleuth felt a tremor running over him that he was obliged to arrest with a painful effort, but he said nothing, and Anthony continued:

"I don't want to fancy people coming in here as to an exhibition. The house is big enough for you, Dick, and you should marry, and have no end of arrows in your quiver, without the use of this room. So let us take our last look, and leave it."

Anthony stood then apart from Sleuth, evidently forgetting him—stood a long while in deep silence, then sighed, turned, and said, in a tone of almost awful quietness:

"Dick, do you know, I fancy that I and the man who fired that shot will yet meet?"

They went into the passage, and then closed the door, and fastened it as the other doors and windows had all been fastened.

CHAPTER XXV.—THE PEDDLER.

WHILE Phillis was wondering whether Richard Sleuth was gone—and if so, what it meant that he had taken such a hasty leave of her, she took her work and sat in the porch of a little side entrance. The house cat had followed her, and sat at her feet smiling the long evening air, and looking up wonderingly at her face, when she allowed her to play with her worsteds unmolested.

But other than this of the long summer's day, or her secret anxieties, or the growing darkness of the night, made Phillis little inclined for work. She sat with her head leaning against the thick clematis, and her eyes looking straight up into the misty sky, that was slowly arraying itself like an eastern bride in filmy veils and robes, and glittering jewels, the place was very silent; the trees, which had been wrapped in a trance-like stillness all day, were beginning to tremble as if frightened at their own shadows on the grass, and to whisper among themselves, as if telling each other their fears.

The stillness and her own thoughts so oppressed her, that Phillis felt she must either sing or have a good cry to relieve herself, and she was just debating on the matter, when she heard a most encouraging footsteps caused her to lift her hands, and push back her tears. As soon as the burning brain had left her, there was a stronger reason towards her. He was evidently a peddler, for he had a pack on his back, and a mahogany case suspended from his neck. When Phillis first caught sight of him he had already seen her, and was hurrying towards her. She rose quickly, and picked up her work to go in.

"Good evening, miss," said the man, putting his foot on the step and resting the case on his knee. "A beautiful evening, miss. May I detain you one minute?"

"I don't want to buy anything, thank you?" said Phillis, passing, and letting her eye wander over the bright things, and that fine dusty depot of the case only partially revealed. "You have come to the wrong door. If you go round to the left you will see the kitchen; perhaps they may buy something there. Good evening."

And Phillis was turning somewhat reluctantly from the tempting case, when the man, sinking his voice to a confidential whisper:

"Excuse me, miss, but if you'd just step one instant—if you'd just throw your eye over one or two of the articles I have with me, I think you'd say they was far more suitable to ladies, miss, than servants—far more so, indeed, miss."

"Ah! but there are no ladies here," said Phillis, smiling at the compliment to herself,

"Dear me!" exclaimed the man, who by this time had divested himself of his cane, and was kneeling by his pack and rapidly unstrapping it. "I understood in the town that the new master here was married—how people talk, don't they?—and I was particularly advised to let the misses know of a few pairs of Paris slippers I have here. Ah! here's the very article, yours. Now, look at that, and see if it wouldn't suit you to a T, miss, just as if it 'ud been made for you."

"Oh, thank you," answered Phillis, putting her hands into her apron pockets, to keep them from touching the pretty slippers, "I don't wear such things."

"No, I'll warrant you, my dear," said the man, with a laugh. "If you ain't rollin' in riches I don't very well see how you could wear 'em. Do you know the price such things is in London? Half a guinea, if they're a farthin'."

"Well, I told you I didn't want them," answered Phillis.

"Ah, but I'm going, in consequence of our trade being hard beset just now, to offer 'em to you at a figger which'll be little more than givin' 'em away."

"Then I'm afraid they're not come by rightly," said Phillis. "I'm afraid they were smuggled."

The man winked, and said in a whisper:

"That's my look-out, my dear, not yours."

"They're certainly very pretty," said Phillis, with a sigh.

"Take them, then; and if you don't tell a soul about the price—"

"Hush, hush! Oh, please go away," cried Phillis. "Here's my godmother coming, and she won't let me buy such things."

"Hey—where, my man. "Here, take and cram 'em in your pockets, and these bracelets and this little cross. Settle any time you like. There, mum's the word."

He had stuffed Phillis's apron pockets with the things he mentioned before she could prevent him, and then turned after her godmother had come close to the door.

"Phillis!" exclaimed the housekeeper, in a tone of angry reproof.

"It's a peddler," said Phillis, speaking quickly and with heightened color; for she knew how angry her godmother would be to see her looking at the man's finery. "He seems a decent, civil fellow," she whispered, "and I thought I might as well buy my thimble of him as wait for the fair."

Although Phillis had spoken in a whisper, not liking the sound of the last story, he had his little tray of thimbles out in an instant.

"Ah, ma'am," said he, "I wish you'd choose for the young woman. She don't seem to know her own mind, when these two. Now, I can see at a glance, ma'am, that you are a judge of the silver thimble. But p'raps, ma'am, you'd just have a peep at what I've got here, while the young woman makes up her mind."

"No—no, my good man, you needn't throw your labor away upon me. Phillis, have done the door to be open? I tell you it's no good turning your things over. I shan't look at 'em, my man."

"Thank you, ma'am, feel the pressure of that there. French, ma'am, every bit; but mum's the word."

"I tell you I don't want a shawl; and if I did, those colored things is no good to me. I'm in mourning, and likely to be."

"Ah, to be sure, ma'am. Well, now, here's a genteel thing for a genteel grip. In mourning! yes, of course. Poor old gentleman! Awful thing; wasn't it? Left plenty to his servants for 'em to go into mourning, wasn't he? Fool the weight of that fringe, ma'am. Rayther a freaky old gentleman, though, they say in the town—left his money to the whales and such like."

"The wrong one, indeed," said the housekeeper. "Look here; here's a fray as long as your finger in the corner. I should like to know which is the right, if Mr. Anthony isn't, when he's been brought up to expect it all along. And you heard that in the town, did you? Ah, people say such thing but their prayers. Well, now, what would you have the face to ask for this—with a grease-spot here, and a fray there?"

"Oh, I've got plenty more: so have your pick. My eye! that must have been a night for you women folks—the night the poor old gemman was knocked off, eh, ma'am. The villains didn't hurt none o' you, did they?"

"Oh, no," answered Phillis.

"What do you mean by your 'Oh, no,' Phillis?" interposed the housekeeper. "But, of course, my throat had been cut, you'd ha' thought nothing of it."

"But I didn't know you were hurt, godmother," said Phillis, kneeling down as it to look into the case, but really to hide her burning pockets.

"Didn't know I was hurt? Didn't one of the wretches run after me—come back on purpose to murder me?"

"Oh, my! of course they did," answered Phillis very quickly, but not quickly enough to prevent her godmother from saying:

"You say that as if I didn't know it was one of them at the time, or the fright might have killed me."

"You took it for some one in the house, then?" said the peddler, his eyes asking the question more eagerly than his voice.

"Bless you, yes! First I thought it was Mr. Sleuth. Then I made certain it was Mr. Anthony."

"La, godmother!" said Phillis.

"But you're sure it wasn't Mr. Sleuth, now?" asked the man, with a laugh, that covered a sharp, inquisitive glance.

"Oh, yes. The wretch had a white coat on, or smock, and Mr. Sleuth hadn't got such. But there, don't talk of it. It gives me the shivers to think o' that night, and the narrow escape I had."

"I shud say it did," observed the man. "And the young gentleman,s living here just the same, I hear."

"Yes; but he's now away."

"For the benefit of his health?" inquired the peddler.

"No; on business."

"Oh! At London, I suppose?"

"No; at Leeds."

"Oh! at Leeds. Well, what do you say to that pattern? So the old man made a new will out just at last, did he? after everybody thinking it was all going to this here doctor chap—this young Slue, or what do you call him?"

"Oh, no; this will was made a long time ago. No, I don't like that color."

"You don't like the white in it? It's all the fashion now. Then the old gentleman never made a new will at all for the doctor chap?"

"If he did, he made away with it before he died, thank God!"

"Ah, one can see how the land lays with you, ma'am. Well, the new master's a fortunate gentleman in having you for housekeeper."

"Well, I think he might do worse. Oh, la! no; fold that up again as soon as you like."

"You'll purchase it, perhaps, the first, ma'am. Fold it over the fray, so, and who'll be the wiser? Well, I heard in the town for certain this will was made on the old gentleman's dying bed."

"I should as soon forget the day the poor dear met his death on, as the day when that will was made," said the housekeeper. "It was just a quarter past four in the afternoon when I was called up to sign it—a broiling day it was, too."

The man took his handkerchief from his hat, and wiped the face, vigorously.

"Much this time o' the year, then, I suppose?"

"It was August the second, eighteen hundred and eleven," said the housekeeper.

"Stop a bit," said the peddler, throwing himself on his knees hastily by his pack. "I've a thing here that'll just suit a lady of your street door."

As he knelt with his back towards them, and held up the heap of shawls with his left hand, while he took a bit of lead pencil from his pocket, and stooping down closely over the pack, wrote on the canvas cover, "Aug. 2, 1811."

"There," said he, rising with a shawl in his hand, "if that don't suit you, nothing will."

"Well, I'm sure that won't," exclaimed the housekeeper. "Why, bless us, what a thing! I wouldn't wear it for the world, I'm sure."

"There, let it alone!" answered the man, gruffly, and, snatching up the scattered shawls, flung them into his pack, as he rose from his knees. "You'll be a fool if you wear mind to say I'll not buy a thing," said she, indignantly.

"I wouldn't have, if I was you," answered the peddler, still arranging his pack in anything but a professional manner. "Old birds aint to be taken with young fly-fine fashions, they may be."

It happened, fortunately for the peddler, that the housekeeper had flung the shawl she had first taken a fancy to, in spite of its blemishes, on the porch, and had gone there to examine it, while there was time for this complimentary speech to reach her.

As soon as she was gone, Phillis touched the man's sleeve.

"Oh, pray, pray take these back," said she, beginning to cry. "I'll pay you any money here to pay for them, and I can't get at any without asking her, and she wouldn't let me have them for the world."

"Never mind, my dear, never mind," said the man, soothingly. "I shall be round here again before long, and you shall settle for 'em all quiet. Put 'em by, and say nothing about 'em—put 'em by. S'lush! here she comes."

Phillis looked on with burning cheeks, while her godmother paid the man, and longed to throw the things from her pockets, and entreat her help in making the man take them back. But before she could bring herself to do so, she saw the man go, and heard the outer gate slam.

At the sound she could control herself no longer, and burst into tears.

"Why, Phillis; what now?" asked her godmother.

"Oh, godmother, I—I——"

"Well?"

"I did want to buy something," sobbed Phillis. "Oh, you silly wench. Why, how do you know that shawl isn't for you?"

"Is it? Oh, dear, dear godmother?"

And Phillis threw her arms round her neck, partly because she wished to be touched by her godmother's kindness, and partly to conceal her pockets till they got into the dark passage.

About an hour after the peddler was in the clean taproom of the Magnet, a little public house at the far end of Heugston Town. It was such a hot evening, that the unglazed casement in the taproom had attracted had turned out to sit on the long benches, among the sunflowers and hollyhocks, and the peddler had followed his example himself. He sat at a table, near the little window, leaning his elbows on it, and his cheeks in his hands, and looking straight out over the hollyhocks and sunflowers at heads to where, many a day at his phone the white towers of Hock House. A greasy pocketbook lay on the table before him, and in it was one single sheet of paper, on the back of which the canvas wrapper, "August 2d, 1811." He then read over and over again, as if he could not give up the subject, a newspaper that was lying at his date he found in the paper given to him by the burglar—"March 22, 1816." He took the book up hastily as he heard a pleasure van stop at the outer door, and put some loose papers carefully into the pockets; then he sat down, and his eyes again found their way to the window.

"How I love that house!" he muttered; "how I love every soul belongin' to it! But never mind us's workin' round. The wheel's a workin' round. Who'll be up next, I wonder, and who'll come down? The doctor clap's my man; I've learned that much."

CHAPTER XXVI.—IN WHICH THE "MAGNET" FAILS TO RETAIN A GUEST WHOM IT HAS ATTRACTED.

The tap-room of the "Magnet," on the evening of the peddler's visit, seemed to be more than usually deserving of its name. That person seemed to give a new life to the place. He was generous, and treated all round; he sang humorous songs of a flash kind; he was affable to those who seemed to consider themselves his inferiors, and he knew those who appeared to have a right to look down on him. He said nothing definite about himself, but somehow everybody got the impression that he was no ordinary peddler; and two different opinions were drawn up, each having a respectable body of supporters—the one saying he was a gentleman in disguise, who was merely selling jewellery and other valuable things in order to win some mysterious bet; while others, more knowing in human nature and its ways, said he was a lawyer's clerk, who had suddenly got a windfall, and didn't know what to do with it.

But while the "Magnet" was in the very height of social glee, over a song sung by the peddler, which, in effect, glorified the doings of rascality, there occurred a pause, during which men refreshed their pipes and pots, and enjoyed a moment's silence. Through that silence, the peddler heard somebody say to somebody else, as a passing bit of gossip, "No; Mr. Sleuth hasn't gone yet, and, in course, won't go now till morning."

Five minutes later, the peddler was seized with so violent an attack of headache and sickness, that, to the astonishment of the whole company, he left them, and went to bed, amid universal regret and cordial wishes for his better health.

He found the back room, or bedroom, for when the peddler got there, and had sent away the very kind people who would accompany him, he threw his handkerchief, a pair of his coat, pocketed out the whole jugfull of water into the wash-hand basin, and dipped his head into it, and kept it there as long as he could hold his breath. After a prolonged bath, he lifted his face, and while he dried himself with the towel, went to the window to look out, in an inquisitive manner, as if investigating the shape of the sky, and the darkness of the night.

"I'll catch him now, sure as his name's Richard Sleuth, and mine isn't—well—what folks thinks it."

Resuming his seat, and pushing his case at valise under the bed, he opened the window, which was scarcely ten feet from the ground outside, and dropped; then withdrawing the sash to the fullness, exactly where he would fall. He did fall on the very edge of a tub of pig's wash, which fell with him on one side, and might, if it had been full, have covered him with its savory contents, but his good luck caused him to find it nearly empty. The shock and alarm were, of course, unpleasant, but broke no bones. He fell for help, but with no terror except that attributed to the thickness of his boots. Feeling for the edge of the tub, he restored it to its place, and then began to help him in his ascent when he should get back to the bedroom. He then made off in the direction of the aldermanbury.

It was remarkable how accurately he knew the way, though it was so dark he could scarcely distinguish the outline of a tree. No number rows branched, or whether the short cut Jay across a meadow, Bob went as direct to his mark as a London cabman, or rather, till he reached the wall of Rock House. Then he began to move more slowly and warily, but not because of his ignorance of the premises, or the fulness of his knowledge. There was the gate and door through which the servants habitually passed, and he knew where the key of the gate was, he touched the stable entrance, and he knew how to put his hand on every latch or bolt, how to avoid this window, and to keep clear of that, and to keep the low wall in the yard.

Presently he saw light streaming from an open window. Cautiously he approached it, and he heard one voice—the housekeeper's—he knew well, though unheard for many years, and another voice—younger and fresher, he also knew—though he remembered it but as a not many hours old. The housekeeper was saying:

"It's my belief as Mr. Sleuth don't want to go, or he'd never keep on going so many times, and then walk off to his bed as usual, not a bit ashamed."

"Has he gone to bed?" asked Phillis, who was sitting with her face close to her godmother's shawl, and a little suspicious as to his motives for delay.

"Had his hot water not ten minutes ago."

"All right, then, godmother; I'll help him to drink it presently, if only he's got some pincapple rum to put in it."

Bob paused on, wondering, now that his special knowledge began to fail him, how he was to discover Mr. Sleuth's room. If it were at the back of the house, where he now was, he didn't see how he was to get at it, except by venturing through a door into the interior. That was very risky. Bob, if caught, couldn't afford to explain his business, and on the whole, he had had labor and the vitilation of the whip if he didn't mind what he was about. No, he wouldn't venture inside. What he could not do.

He would sluk round to the front, get between the two wings, and climb up to the balcony that ran across the body of the house, uniting the wings at their base. Soon thought, soon done. Bob stood panting in the balcony, and then had command of no less than three windows opening on to many rooms.

"Doose is in it if his ain't one of the three!"

There was light visible from two of the windows. Softly the peddler approached the nearest, and slowly put his head forward beyond the window-line to look in; but drew it back instantly, for a man was there, who was looking at the window at the very moment of the transit of a strange face across it. It was an anxious moment for the peddler, that first one in which he drew himself up, ready for a sudden descent and flight; but, on second thoughts,, he felt sure his face could not have been seen, on account of the darkness outside and the light within. So he ventured again and was rewarded by entire conviction of his being unseen—unsuspected. A young man was sitting at a table, writing earnestly—so earnestly, that even so unsympathetic a personage as the peddler said to himself, with an inward chuckle:

"Love letter, I s'pose—he looks as no spoony about it. Not my man. Master Sleuth ain't got a moustache. Not my man? Stop a bit, Master Anthony Moule. I ain't quite made up my mind yet whether it's best to go to him and tell him I've got the property, and wants to keep it—with my leave; or to go to the man who ain't got it, and would verry much like to have it—with my leave. Howsomever, I don't want you now; so, good night."

The peddler moved on to the second window with similar precaution, and there took a long, earnest look. Evidently, he was very much interested. What did he see?

A young man, not having a moustache—dobtless, therefore, Mr. Richard Sleuth—was standing by his door, holding his handle, and listening intently. The peddler thought he would never move; minute after minute passed, and still Richard Sleuth stood and listened. Suddenly, just as the peddler's eyes began to ache, and he felt inclined to check his curious desire to know what was going on before addressing himself to his own affairs, he saw the door open, and Sleuth, with a lighted candle, which he shaded with his left hand, appear.

The temptation to follow was irresistible. The peddler lifted the window without noise, got in, took off his boots, passed through the room, emerged into the corridor, saw Sleuth near one end, pausing as if afraid to pass a staircase; but soon he moved quickly across that, and was lost round a corner. The peddler ran after him, and was just in time to trace him up another flight of stairs, and into a bedroom.

He pulled the door softly to the half-open door, and was again just in time to see Mr. Sleuth take from a box a brown paper parcel, tied up, as if about to be sent by coach to a distance. This he felt inquiringly, and was about to examine, when he, like the peddler, was alarmed at hearing footsteps and voices ascending. The peddler waited just long enough to see that Sleuth was putting back the parcel unexamined into its place, and then he fled, and became, in turn, pursued by the horror-stricken Sleuth, who did not see him, but caught sight of a shadow of vast proportions receding as he approached one spot, which seemed to him the one where he remembered to have had the first thought how easy it would be to get rid of Mr. Anthony Moule during the burglar's visit.

But he was to endure a still greater alarm on his return to his own room. He reached it breathless, and with wild fear and fancy of the shadow he had seen; and did not understand; fury at the endless disappointment about that coat, which had again probably escaped him.

He had entered through his light during his escape from the room containing that parcel, and now he sat on the edge of the bed, staring about him.

"Where is that coat? Surely something is in the corner over there! He sees it now—dark, rising, taking shape—a man's shape. The very marrow in his bones seemed to be dissolving when he heard a voice say, in low tones, as if muffled for the occasion:

"Don't be afear'd, sir. I sin't. I know you—you're Mr. Richard Sleuth."

Sleuth's hand had caught at the bell on the first commencement of the sound, and he felt the bedchamber, but he did not know he had rung it till he heard, even while the man was speaking, the tinkling of distant sounds.

"Did you ring that 'ere bell?"

"Yes—I suppose so. Who are you? What do you want?"

"They're a coming. No time to tell you now. Don't be afear'd on me. I've good news for you. If I can't get hold on you in-to-morrow morning early, I'll make an appointment. Don't say you seed me, or anybody. Worse for you if you do. Say you've got the stomach-ache. Good night, Mr. Sleuth."

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT IN FRANCE.—A Paris letter says: "The inmates of Clichy (the debtor's prison) are grievously disappointed at having to pass another year in the country, now they had discovered the jail windows, out of gratitude to the Emperor for the promise of abolition. But, at the close of the session, that imprisonment for debt should be abolished. The Conservatives, who form the majority of the Corps Legislatif, are firm believers in the efficacy of imprisonment as a protection to tradesmen against bad debts; and though they will not pressure in put upon them, they must vote as the Emperor orders, it is not with their good will and hearty will, should that property be the son of the debtor, which time-honored laws consider the property of the creditor, and under which so much business, they contrived to get the bill made a government one. Happily, the republican party circulated that, since the announcement of the measure, several debtors had absconded and tripled, and from this assumed fact it has been sought to argue that shopkeepers have become bolder in contracting bad debts in the secessary, and desire to protest beforehand against the proposed abolition. The truth is, however, that there will never so few prisoners in Clichy as now; the whole number of debtors in Paris does not much exceed the inmates of this great country could be vitally affected by letting the handful go of poor devils in jail. I have no doubt that the Emperor's humane idea, entirely conformable as it is to the spirit of the age, will be realized next year."

SELF-SACRIFICE for the benefit of one's family or country, is held in high esteem to be a virtue of the highest order. In cases where substitution is allowed, there is no difficulty in finding a substitute. For instance, a friend, who sells himself for about a hundred ounces of silver ($150 to $200), and is transported for life with his family. I knew of a case in which a distinguished literary graduate wrote a petition to the emperor representing the circumstances of his people, who were in a state of misery and destitution. The grievances were acknowledged and redressed, but their cause at present delivered himself over to the Ministry to be dealt with as the authorities should deem fit. The nails were torn from his fingers as a punishment for having written the petition, and he was ordered to die in prison. A cannon was awarded temple was built in his honor, a pension was awarded by the people to his family, and everybody seemed satisfied that everything rigid and proper was done on the occasion.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT AT AUBURN.—FROM A SKETCH BY FRED. COPPIN.

THE FISH TRADE OF NEW YORK.

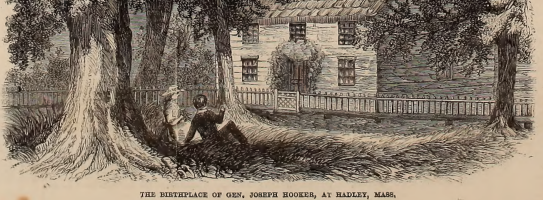
THE city of New York has always been celebrated as a fish depot throughout the world. Her waters have always yielded an abundance of the finny tribe; and as facilities for transportation have increased, the denizens of the deep have been ruthlessly snatched from their watery homes, and hurried, with lightning speed, to Gotham, from whence they are transferred to every available point in the United States where fish are eaten, or to reach which they can be kept in a respectable degree of freshness. Labrador gives up her halibut, and the Southern rivers their mullet, the western lakes their white fish, sunkwit and pickerel, the streams of Maine and Canada their salmon, and the soft flowing waters of Pennsylvania their trout, all to grace the epicurean tables of New York, or, laid stark and cold upon Rockland Lake ice, to be whisked away to other languishing palates, either in our own land or in Europe.

Fulton Market, one of the oldest in New York, is at the eastern foot of Fulton street, and occupies one block, exclusive of the fish building, which has a frontage of about 350 feet on South street, the rear upon the East River, over which one half the building is extended, for the convenience of the dealers, in taking their fishy commodities direct from the cans or boxes in which they are kept to the stands.

Our illustrations show, firstly, the interior of the fish market, in which building the largest amount of business is transacted between the hours of three and eight in the morning, during which time the retail dealers of the city and vicinity come in for their stock. After the latter hour the general public begin to look out for their dinners, and by twelve the sales are over, and the busy spot is comparatively deserted.

The rear view, with the fishing smacks unloading, is one of especial interest, for here the small vessels used for catching and transporting arrive, and transfer their cargoes to the boxes or fish cars. These boxes are simply square receptacles, constructed with a door on top, and interstices between the boarding, so that water can have free circulation. They float in the area behind the market, each dealer having a certain space in the water for his cars. In these the fish will live weeks, perhaps months, and be always ready and fresh to his owner's hands. To this spot come the boats from every part, bringing their cargoes in what are called "wells," which are simply compartments in the centre of the vessel, with holes directly through the bottom for the circulation of water and keeping the tenants alive.

"Old Long Island's sea girt shore" is the favorite fishing ground, and there some thousands of jolly fishermen pluck a living from the briny deep. At Gravesend they fish with what is generally known as the pound net, enclosing an immense space, constructed on the principal of a bread mouth, gradually leading the fish onward, until they find themselves entrapped in a circumscribed apartment, from which they are easily taken. Occasionally, an unwelcome visitant is found in these places in the shape of a shark or a devil fish, and, as a consequence, he comes in for no gentle usage at the hands of the capturers.



On other parts of Long Island shore, the fishing is done by means of the seine, a process as old as Father Adam, and unnecessary to describe. Of course at different seasons, and under different circumstances, the haul varies, but occasionally the draught is sufficiently miraculous to disturb even the equanimity of the stolid fishermen themselves.

With this general summary we commend the fish market to every New Yorker, or visitant of the city, with a certainty that there are many things as well worth seeing as on any other visit to the institutions.

BIRTHPLACE OF GEN. HOOKER.

ANYTHING connected with Gen. J. Hooker, must, especially at this moment, be interesting. We say "especially at this moment," because the General has just been entering upon the honied path of matrimony, by marrying Miss Groesbeck, a beautiful lady of Cincinnati.

The engraving illustrates the spot of his birth at Hadley, Massachusetts.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF GEN. JOSEPH HOOKER, AT HADLEY, MASS.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT AT AUBURN.

ANOTHER of those terrible disasters that have of late made traveling an expedition more dangerous than going into battle, occurred upon the New York Central Railroad, at Auburn, on Saturday, Sept. 30th, an illustration of which we give this week. Our correspondent says: "On visiting the scene of the disaster on Sunday morning, a terrible sight was presented by the shattered and crushed cars, fragments of which were strewn for several rods along the ground. There were hundreds of people present during the day, and all expressed their astonishment at the fact that none of the passengers were killed or fatally injured by the terrible plunge. There was nothing of the running gear of the cars left intact, while the sides and ends were crushed in and smashed up fearfully. Many of the passengers were thrown nearly the entire length of the cars, hurled to the front, and jammed together by the shock, when they were so suddenly checked in their rapid speed. One of those most seriously injured, a gentleman named Francis Worden, was bruised beneath the debris of a wrecked car, one of its timbers lying across his chest, and another across his forehead, almost crushing him beneath their weight. He was finally rescued, with a dislocated hip and many severe bruises."

THE CENTRAL PARK.

"THERE is nothing connected with this world-known spot but has interest. We have heretofore given illustrations of many points, and this week we give the arbor, casino, and zoological department.

The arbor is constructed in the true rural style of architecture, open top, the requisite shade being entrusted to the vines, which cluster up its sides and over the trellised roof.

The casino, the name of which tells its own story, is near the arbor, and both are within sound of the music which is discoursed from Dodworth's band, one of the finest in the world, every Wednesday and Saturday afternoons.

The zoological collection already has assumed fair proportions, though it is comparatively a new idea in connection with the Park. Officers of vessels arriving from foreign parts, and travelers or citizens of New York sojourning abroad, send animals and birds to swell the collection, until it numbers several hundred specimens, foreign and domestic. Every few days the newspapers chronicle the addition of something alive to join the happy family dwelling there, and the Park managers have endeavored to make it as picturesque as possible.

The Park is, altogether, getting to be a great institution, and those who live a quarter of a century more will see in its growth one of the most elegant spots ever produced by Nature, aided by the hands of man.

MUSCULAR CHRISTIANITY:

A Story of Bishop Selwyn.

IN the autumn of 1857 I spent a few days in a country parsonage, and on a Sunday morning, at breakfast, the pastor's wife received a letter, which her tittering told us must be a tit-bit.

"Ah, uncle," said she, "here are clerical doings exactly to your taste."

The writer, a lady in a distant country, narrated that there had lately come into the next parish a new vicar, a very fine young man, who at school had no superior either in Greek or in boxing, and who at the university won honors for his classics, and silver cups for his boxing. He was beginning in earnest the work of an evangelist among a long-neglected, vicious and brutal people. He had a plan, and a will; but many worthy folk were fearing that his zeal was without knowledge—or wisdom, at any rate.

One of his first measures was to open a school in a remote part of the parish, and get the room licensed for week-day preaching. But all the drunkards rose against such unheard of proceedings. They would run after him, cursing and hooting, and discharging volleys of soda and other missiles. Finding remonstrance vain, he adopted another course on the Wednesday evening in the week before I heard the story.

Making a stand in the middle of the road, at the entrance of the hamlet, just as the storm arose, and facing the savages in the face, he addressed them thus, in a firm, quiet voice, which commanded their attention:

"My good fellows, I love borne this patiently for some time, but now must put a stop to it; and I'll do it in your own way. Choose your best man, and we'll fight it out. I beat you, you'll give up, you know."

They looked at him unbelievingly; but, throwing his coat on a bush, he added:

"I am in earnest; send your man."

The ruffians laid their heads together; and then a burly giant stepped forth, and stripped, and made a furious dash at his professed challenger, who quietly parried the unskilful blows, and played with them for a few seconds. But then, a fist was planted in the peasant's chest, and he lay at full length on the ground. Quickly gathering himself up, however, he sprang to his companions.

"Now send your next best, and I'll go through the lot of you."

Again their heads drew together, and another threw down his jacket, going to work, however, with a more cautious energy. But at once a stalwart stretched him on the road.

"Your next!"

Once more a conglomeration of dense pates was formed.

"Bill, thou tek him!"

Bill eyed the hero askance, and shook his head.

"Theo, Jim!"

A shake of the head from Jim also.

"Dick, thee'l tek the parson!"

A shake more decided and stiff.

"Nay, nay; I've seo thee hung fust."

And now the first one who was vanquished stood forward, and, like a brave man, called out:

"I say, parson, yo're a rare young un, yo ar. I've tell thee what: we're going to hear thee preych."

And they all followed him along the little street, and the writer, and heard the Word quietly; adding, it remains to be seen what will become of the fight.

What did become of it? I heard, a long time afterward, that from that day the men doffed their hats, and the women curtsied, and the children looked awe-stricken, when they met or passed him; that the church and schools were filled; that the beerhouses were nearly all shut up; and that a great moral and religious reformation was in progress. That gentleman had previously been the instrument of a like change in an equally demoralized parish. I may add that a few years back he was deemed the fittest clergyman in the church to go out as bishop to a scene of great personal danger in a heathen country.

A FIGHT WITH A SHARK.—Recently one of the navvies employed on the Broadstairs Works, near Westenson-super-Mare, Eng., was looking down over the "tip," when he espied a large fish close to the shingle, at the foot of the cliff. He at all speed he made his way to the spot, and the fish remained within arm's length of the edge of the water. The man, thinking he could pull it ashore, had laid hold of its tail, but soon found it had more power in its native element than he gave it credit for, and with a flap of its fins it pulled him knee deep into the water, and, moreover, turned upon him, showing a pair of huge jaws, armed with three rows of teeth, which he savagely snapped at him. The navvy, however was not to be scared so readily. Holding on by the tail of the creature, he sang out lustily to some of his comrades, and three others went to help t; and the strange and really formidable fish. It was fo tuns'g for the man that it did not succeed in biting him, for the fish was nothing less than a shark, from five to six feet in length, and an arm or a leg would not be worth much if once fairly within the reach of its jaws. The first man who arrived at the spot seized hold of the dorsal fin. The monster now became more violent, and pulled the two men further into the brine, and it was not until a third rendered assistance that they succeeded in dragging the fish ashore. The final struggle was fierce and exciting. The shark, finding that it could not bite the men, snapped at everything within its reach. Catching hold of a large pebble, it ground at it savagely, leaving the mark of its teeth in the solid stones, and breaking them with the violence of the effort.

THE WHITE FEATHER.—Each country has its fashions, which are sometimes opposite one to the other, and means things quite different.

THE ARBOR, CASINO AND ZOOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT, AT CENTRAL PARK, N. Y.

Thus, the white feather which, in England and the United States is, figuratively speaking, a symbol of cowardice, is in France, the highest proof of gallantry and honor. The Africain, a paper published in Algeria, informs us that the Emperor, in his late visit, has granted to Gen. Desvaux, celebrated for his bravery, the right to carry the white feather on his hat—an honor exclusively reserved to Marshals of France or Division

A GROUP OF DEER AT CENTRAL PARK.

Generals who have commanded an army corps. Three French Generals only are enjoying that favor—the Count of Palikad, de Martinprey and Desvaux.

SIR LASCELLES WRAXALL, in his "Scraps and Sketches," relates the following story about gambling at Baden-Baden: "One gentleman at Baden-Baden, a Russian, was so elated after an unparalleled run of good of his repast this time by want of funds, he paid for a spread for twelve beforehand; but this luck was very bad, and he actually went back, and, after some negotiation sold the dinner back at half-price. The money he received was, of course, very speedily lost."

AMERICAN EAGLES AT CENTRAL PARK.

"IDEAS," said Voltaire, "are like beards: men get them when they grow up, and women never have any."

fortune, that he went and ordered a glorious feed for himself and friends at the restauration; but during the interval, while dinner was preparing, he thought he would go back, and win a little more. His good fortune, however, had deserted him, and he lost not only all his winnings, but every farm he was possessed of, so he was compelled to countermand the dinner. On the arrival of his remittances, determined not to be baulked

Ancient Luxury.

THE excavations at Pompeii are going on with an activity stimulated by the important discoveries made almost at every step, and the quantities of gold and silver found, which more than suffice to cover the cost of the work. Near the Temple of Juno, of which an account was recently given, has just been brought to light a house no doubt beonging to some millionaire of the time, as the furniture is of ivory, bronze and marble. The couches of the triclinium, or dining-room, are especially of extreme richness. The flooring consists of an immense mosaic, well preserved in parts, and of which the centre represents a table laid out for a grand dinner. In the middle, on a large dish, may be seen a large peacock with its tail spread out, and placed back to back with another bird also of elegant plumage. Around them are arranged lobsters, one of which holds a blue egg in its claws, a second an oyster, which appears to be fricasseed, as it is open and has a fat piece, and a fourth, a small vase filled with fried grasshoppers. Next comes a circle of dishes of fish, interspersed with others of partridges, hares and vegetables, all have their heads placed between their fore feet. Then comes a row of sausages of all forms, supported by one of eggs, oysters and olives, which in its turn is surrounded by a double circle of peaches, cherries, melons, and other fruits and vegetables. The walls of the triclinium are covered with fresco paintings of birds, fruits, flowers, game and fish of all kinds, the whole interspersed with drawings which lend a charm to the whole not easy to describe. On a table of rare wood, caved and inlaid with gold, marble agate and lapis lazuli, were found amphorae still containing wine, and golden cups of onyx.

A Strange Ceremony.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Bombay Gazette writes: "The other day I witnessed a scene of a really shocking nature, the principals being a living woman and a dead man, of the Camsutee caste. The relation that had existed between the living and the dead was of a left-handed nature. They had lived together for many long years as man and wife, when, after suffering from a febrile attack for only four short days, the man died. Agreeably to the peculiar custom of their caste, it was imperative, ere the corpse could be removed for interment, that the sacred rites of matrimony should be performed. The sad intelligence was soon communicated to the neighboring residents, and the loud and vehement hammering of tom-toms had the desired electric effect of collecting a host of friends and acquaintances, and a fluctuating stream of passers-by to the spot. A guru, or priest, being summoned, and the necessary preparations for the celebration of the nuptials being hurriedly completed, the ceremony commenced. The inanimate form of the man placed against the outer wall of the verandah of the house in a sitting posture, attired like a bridegroom, and the face and hands were smeared with liquid turmeric. The woman also was clothed like a bride, and adorned with the usual tinsel-ornament over the face, which, as well as the hands, had been daubed over with yellow. She sat opposite the dead, now addressed to it light and unmeaning words—as is customarily done upon such occasions—and then chewing bits of dry cocoanut and squirting it on the face. And thus the ceremony proceed-d and continued for three or four hours. At length, as the sun was nearing the horizon, the nuptial-ceremony was brought to a close, and the preparations for the interment commenced. The dead was divested of its bridal attire, then bathed, and finally laid upon a bier, and covered with a cloth of silk. The face was next rubbed over with some red powder, and in the mouth were placed some betel-leaves. The widowed bride then looked her last at the shrouded form of him whom never more she would behold, when, amid agonising shrieks and deafening tom-tomming, the bier was lifted up, and the funeral cortège, proceeded in the direction of Siom; one man—a near relative of the deceased, I presume—preceded the corpse, throwing, at intervals, a hand ful of pice to the right and to the left, which were being eagerly picked up by a troop of little urchins."

THE Tower of Babel, on which late accounts announce that a cross was recently placed by a missionary consists now of only two of the eight stories formerly erected. The remains are, however, visible from a very great distance. Each side of the quadrangular basis measures 200 yards in length, and the bricks of which it is composed are of the purest white clay. With a very slight brownish tint, which in the sun assumes a wonderfully rich hue, scarcely to be imitated by the painter. The bricks, before being baked, were covered with characters, traced hand-rarely with the hand, in a clear and regular style. The bitumen, which serves for cement, was derived from a fountain which still exists near the tower, and which flows with such abundance that it soon forms a stream, and would invade the neighboring river did not the natives from time to time cut free to the stream a channel, and the whole quickly until the flames should cease for want of aliment.

HOW WOLVES CAJOLE AND CAPTURE WILD HORSES.

WHEREVER several of the larger wolves associate together for mischief, there is always a numerous train of smaller ones to follow in the rear, and act as auxiliaries in the work of destruction. Two large wolves are sufficient to destroy the most powerful horse, and seldom more than two or three are seen attacking them may be a score in the ring. It is no less curious than amusing to witness this ingenious mode of attack. If there be no horses, or but little cover around, two wolves approach in the most playful and careless manner, lying, rolling and frisking about, until the two confidence and familiarity will be completely put off his guard by curiosity and familiarity. During this time the pair, spurred on their hind-quarters, look on at a distance. After some time spent in this way, the two assailants separate, when one approaches the horse's head, the other his tail, with a shyness and caution peculiar to themselves. At this stage of the attack, their frolicsome approaches become very interesting—it is in right good earnest; the horse knows it well, and the latter is the real assailant, and keeps his eyes steadily fixed on the assailant to avoid his attack, making a strict act to each evolution of the wheel. Will-Gatlin, Hon. Buffo, Shirt, Pack, Sam Patch, Mrs. Gen. &c., requires no Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET out of order, and will last a lifetime; being equipped it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is the only small Family Machine that will do the work like Others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work is always right side up. Call and see Machine.

"This beautiful Machine takes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can run it."—The Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patent.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Indacements sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

COSMOPOLITAN
JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.
Great Gold Jewelry Sale.

67 ALL JEWELRY GOLD. Read advertisement on agents wanted column. Office, 176 Fulton Street, cor. CALKINS & CO., 858 and 860 Broadway, New York.

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one known. Address
SHAW & CLARK,
522-38 Biddeford, Maine.

Cough No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM. Infallible remedy for Coughs, Bronchitis, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-575

Pile Remedy

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY.
TOO OLD A BIRD
TO BE CAUGHT WITH CHAFF.
BY MRS. GORE.
Price 50 Cents.

Also new editions of the following by the same author: Heroine, Romance of Diplomacy, Dowagers, Castles in the Air, Peers; or, Fortune's Frolic. Price 50 cents each, mailed free of postage, on receipt of price.

F. A. BRADY, Publisher,
22 Ann street, New York.

HORRORS OF REBEL PRISONS

All Soldiers, Relatives of Soldiers, and Persons wanting a New, Beautiful and Illustrated History of all the Rebel Prisons, so famous for the horrors endured since for 31 Splendid Sketches, which, by a novel arrangement, are printed on one sheet, 36 by 26 inches, accompanied by a book; the whole being a complete pictorial historic description of all the Rebel Prisons and Stockades. Price, single copy, from $2 to $5 each. Liberal terms to boosellers and canvassers. Send for a copy upon sending $1 by mail. Address
HOPKINS & CO., Publishers, 74 Bleecker street, N. Y.

Fortune! Fortune!!

Full instructions by which a person can master the Art of Ventriloquism in a few hour's practice, and make a world of fun and a fortune. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address
FRANKLIN & CO.,
526-9 Calhoun, Illinois.

False Moustaches that cannot be detected, 75 cents and $1 each. Sent free on receipt of price. Circulars free. Address McCONNELL & CO., Box 5403, New York.

Love! Love!!—The best known how to gain undying love of the fair sex. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address
526-9 J. F. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

MUSIC OMNIBUS.

No. 3, contains 1,000 Pieces of Music for the Violin, Cornet, Clarionet, or Flute. Price $1 25 cents. Mailed post-paid.

VIOLINS,

Including Bow, Strings, Boxing, &c., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:
GERMAN, red, brown, $12, $14, $16, $18, $20.
MITTEWALD, double lined, $8, $7, $9, $11.
FRENCH, blocked and lined, $8, $10, $12, $15.
ITALIAN, inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $25.
OLD MASTERS, very fine tone, $30, $40, $50, $75 to $300.

All orders, large or small, promptly attended to.
FREDERICK BLUME,
tf 208 Bowery, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM.
IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented March 14, 1865. THE ONLY RELIABLE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is SCIENCE in operation, uses the straight needle, and makes the Celebrated Lock Stitch. Remember the latter is the real sensible, and keeps his eyes steadily fixed on the assailant to avoid his attack, making it strict act to each evolution of the wheel. Will-Gatlin, Hon., Buffo, Shirt, Pack, Sam Patch, Mrs. Gen. &c., requires no Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET out of order, and will last a lifetime; being equipped it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is the only small Family Machine that will do the work like Others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work is always right side up. Call and see Machine.

"This beautiful Machine takes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can run it."—The Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patent.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Indacements sent free.

Address all orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

COSMOPOLITAN
JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.
Great Gold Jewelry Sale.

67 ALL JEWELRY GOLD. Read advertisement on agents wanted column. Office, 176 Fulton Street, cor. CALKINS & CO., 858 and 860 Broadway, New York.

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one known. Address
SHAW & CLARK,
522-38 Biddeford, Maine.

Cough No More

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM. Infallible remedy for Coughs, Bronchitis, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.
524-575

Pile Remedy

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

ALB UMS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Holding 24 Pictures, and sold at 75 cents. Albums of all descriptions free by mail on receipt of the price.

C. HUGHES,
Album Manufacturer.
102 CENTRE STREET, N.Y.

GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION
BY THE
NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION
713 BROADWAY, N. Y.

12 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from $250 to $800
12 Mechanic's Rosewood Pianos, " 125 to 225
150 Music Boxes, " 15 to 40
100 Silver Revolving Pastel Castors, " 15 to 35
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets, " 15 to 35
100 Cake Silver Tea and Table Spoons, " 15 to 30
100 Gold Lever Watches, " 75 to 150
150 Diamond Rings, " 50 to 100
200 Vest Chains, " 10 to 30
500 Ladies' Gold Watches, " 60 to 85
500 Silver Watches, " 25 to 50

Diamond Pins, Gold Bracelets, Coral, Florentine Mosaic, Gold Pencils, Cases Ladies' Sets, Gold Pens, with Gold and Silver Extension Holders, Sleeve Buttons, Sets of Studs, Vest Chains, Vest Patent Chain and Charms, Gold Rings, Gold Thimbles, Lockets, Silver Baskets and Stands, Silver Goblets, Cups, &c., &c., of every description, of the best make and latest styles, valued at

$2,000,000

To be Sold for One Dollar Each without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

Distribution is made in the following manner:

CERTIFICATES, naming each Article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these Certificates, naming a certain Article and its value, will be delivered at our office or sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, on receipt of 25 cents. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it draws, and can then pay ONE DOLLAR (OR TO FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and can then send ONE DOLLAR and receive the Article named, or can choose any other one Article on our List of the same value.

NO BLANKS—Every purchaser gets value. Parties dealing with us may depend on having prompt returns. Goods sent by express will be immediately sent to any address by return mail or express. Entire satisfaction guaranteed. Sole Certificates not to be distributed for 22.

AGENTS WANTED. Send a stamp for a Circular. All letters should be addressed

T. BENTON & CO., Box 5507, P. O., New York.

Writing Paper, Envelopes,
Blank and Memorandum Books, Cheap, at
522-33 LEACH'S, 89 Nassau street, New York.

Agents WANTED Agents

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 521-31

$3.00 ALBUMS. $3.00

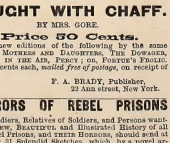
Large Album, 40 Pictures, Gilt, Relief Sides, finely finished, for holding 80 FULL SIZE Card Photographs. Sent by return mail for $3.00. The neatest and cheapest Album in the market. TRADE and agents supplied. $24.00 per dozen. NEL. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 50 cents, postage stamps, please send your address for interesting catalogue.

To Beautify the Complexion,
USE SHULTS' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.

The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a beautiful transparency to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. It is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents. Address
C. F. SHULTS,
524-36 285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

THE GREAT GIFT SALE.

BY MRS. A. J. D.



Oh, say, have you been to the Gift Sale to-day?
Have you seen all the things they are giving away?
From the grandest piano in splendid rose case,
To a ring which the humblest purse might grace.
There are sets of silver and watches of gold,
Bracelets, brooches, and ear-drops in numbers untold,

And beautiful ornaments made for the hair,
For the matron, the belle, and the beauty to wear.
And glittering diamonds unchangeably bright,
For ever reflecting the beautiful light.
There are scarfs and mantillas with their fingers of steel,
That obedient sew at the turn of the wheel,

And the pale, weary seamstress is weary no more,
When you hear its glad song as you enter her door,
But, perhaps, you're thinking the price is quite nice,
For those who are able to pay them their price."
"Their price!" my dear friend, they are given away,
For which cause only the dollar to pay.

The poorest may now with the wealthiest share
If only to Dunn & Co.'s homes they repair.
Or address through the mail, if they live far away,
C. M. Dunn & Co., Box 87 Fifty-fifth Avenue, Chicago.

67 Certificates 23 cents each; 5 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 100 for $15. Send stamp for circular.

SOMETHING ENTIRELY NEW!
Novelty, Utility and Beauty.

BARNES' PATENT CRAVAT-HOLDER.

Prices range from 62 cents to $5 per pair.
For holding the Necktie and Collar together instead of pinning or sewing them.
Good inducements given to Agents in all parts of the country.
For terms and circulars address with stamp,
BARNES, ROBINSON & CO.,
P. O. Box 141, Providence, R. I.

Just Published.

A new book on Matrimony which instructs every one how to marry whom they please, without regard to age, sex or personal appearance. Price 50 cents. Address McCONNELL & CO., Box 5,403, N. Y.

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S
Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., holds being the very best chimney chimney ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE uproots hair from low brow, crow's-foot, and any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale face and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old establishment, 453 Broadway.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations has been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Collender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co. Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$6 ELEGANT $8 WATCH.

Fine Imported Watches for the Retail Trade at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. A BEAUTIFUL Double Case Silver Watch, small size, ornamented Engraving, with Chain, Key, and Gold Locket to each, $30 per Case of Six. Sample one, free by mail, for $6.

An ELEGANT Gold Plated Engraved Double Case Watch, Fine Time Keeper, Gold Chain, Key, &c., to each, $42 per Case of Six. Sample, free by mail, for $8.

A Superior Hunting-Case Gold Plated Watches, Jeweled, with Improvements, Regulator, per Case of Six, $60. Sample, $12.

Silver Compound Hunting-Case Watches, Magic Cases, Jeweled, &c., per Case of Six, $60. Sample, $12.

Very Best Silver Hunting Levers, Jeweled, Case of Six, $72. Sample, $15.

Fine Stout Silver Levers, Full Jeweled, Superior, per Case of Six, $80. Sample, $20.

Enamel Dexter Watches, Extra Silver Cases, Large Jewels, Fancy Styles, per Case of Six, $104. Sample, $25.

Imperial Watch, with Thermometer, Compass, Calendar, Second Hand, Fine Jewels, Gold Cases, Engraving, &c., Stem, Heat and Time Indicator, imitation of $200 Gold Watch; small size, $60. Sample, $15. Large, $80. Gold and Silver Watches of every description. Catalogues sent free. Safe delivery of all goods guaranteed. Address

HARRY ANDREWS BROTHERS, Importers,
102 Nassau St., N. Y. Established 1855.

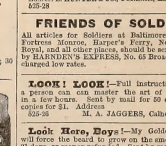
CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERYBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without tying. Send 25 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 521-33

Tin Type and Ferrotype Albums—for holding 60 pictures. $1.50; 40 pictures, $1.25. Send postpaid. TRADE PRICES $12.00 and $9.00 per Doz. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York.

1,000,000 Purchasers Wanted.

Articles of great value and unique merit free. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 522-31



Only 60 Cents.

The Art of Painting Photographs in Water Colors. Bound in morocco; also a full set of Paints and Brushes. Sent by mail for 60 cents. Address
CRAWFORD & WILLIS,
524-7 No. 347 Broadway, New York.

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, N. Y. off

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM

SEWING MACHINES,
625 Broadway, New York. o

RESTIDIGITATION

Or, MAGIC MADE EASY.—Just Published, New Book, just out. The Secrets of Conjuring and Magic Explained. Price 25 cents. Just published, "Hoffman's Modern Magic." Tells how to do it and how to find out put in a pound into her body; how to cut off your nose; how to eat fire; Laughing Gas; Ventriloquism; Second Sight; Mesmerism; Hat; and nearly 200 other astounding Magical, Chemical, and Mechanical Secrets. Price 25 cents. Just published, "Jim Crow Jr.'s Original Comic Songs and Burlesques." Nearly 30 songs; eight for 25—mailed free. Satisfaction guaranteed. Address C. HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N.H. 525-28

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harrison's Landing, Newport News, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Orders charged low rates. 0000

LOOK! LOOK!—Full instructions by which a person can master the art of Ventriloquism in a few hours. Sent by mail for 50 cents, or three copies for $1. Address
525-36 M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Illinois.

Look Here, Boys!—My Golden Compound will force the beard to grow on smooth faces in 21 days, or money refunded. Sent by mail for 50 cents, or three packages for $1. Address
525-36 M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Illinois.

Pimples, Moth, Freckles, Sunburn, Ringworm and Tetter vanish magically by the application of DR. GRAFF'S Sun Flower Extract, warranted. Price $1. For sale only by Dr. DE GRAFF, Medical Lab., Albany, N. Y. 524-28

Spanish Curling Cream, Warranted to Curl the most straight or Stiff Hair. Mailed for $1. Address GEO. BLACKIE & CO., 713 Broadway, N. Y. tf

COMIC CARD PHOTOS.

Of the latest and best subjects. Agents wanted in every town. Send 10 cents for sample and catalogue to H. SIVINGTON & CO., No. 660 Broadway, New York.

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of whiskers, mustache, or money refunded. Sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

HOW TO GROW WHISKERS.

Any person can have a splendid set of whiskers, mustache, or hair on the smoothest face or head in from 20 to 40 days, by using Professor WOOD'S CELEBRATED RESTORATIVE. Sent by mail, securely sealed, from observation, on receipt of 25 cents, or 3 packages for 50 cents. Address
PROFESSOR WOOD,
524-7 Box 5,643, New York.

Important Publications for the Year.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANACS.

NEARLY READY

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

This most valuable work contains as much useful information as an octavo volume, and is indispensable to every household. In addition to the reading matter it is embellished with upwards of 50 beautiful illustrations by the first European and American Artists, executed in the highest style of art. It also contains a splendid lithographic portrait of President Lincoln, besides four beautiful pictures printed on plate paper. The illustrations comprise a great variety of subjects in art, science, natural history, incidents, scenery, adventure, botany, &c.

Price 50 Cents.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

This beautiful and useful companion for the ladies supplies a greater quantity and diversity of reading matter than has ever been presented to them. It is indeed the only Lady's Illustrated Almanac published, and contains over 50 exquisite engravings of great variety, excellence and interest. The reading matter is a complete Lady's Book-of-the-Year, adapted for all classes. It is also embellished with a most splendid and correct Photographic portrait of Mrs. Gen. Grant, as well as four large engravings printed on plate paper.

Price 50 Cents.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Comic Almanac for 1866.

This amusing Almanac, the only one of the kind published in America, contains numerous illustrations by Newman, Beller, McLean, John Leech, Howard, Tunnell, Fiske, Stephens, Grant, Keene, Crenson, &c., besides comic literature, jokes and astronomical knowledge made easy, &c.

Price 13 Cents.

A copy of either one of the above Almanacs will be given to every annual subscriber to FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, or FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.
THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,
Worth $500,000!
To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and as to be sold without any regard to cost or regard. Send 28 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, by return mail. We want an Agent in every Regiment and Town in the Country.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the mysteries of bold sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 sold. Secretly sold. Address
tf T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

Something New.
For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
tf 82 Nassau street, N. Y.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,
Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Microscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of any lady, together with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can attest. She will send, when desired, a written and a gurantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By sending age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 25 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
524-526 P. O. Drawer 203, Albany, N. Y

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of
PROF. DE BREUY
FRISEUR ET COIFFEUR.
One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy curls, to be used by the fashionable ladies of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does not injure the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars mailed free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 32, Troy, N. Y.
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

AGENTS!!!
$10 Per day made selling the Sketches entitled the "SOUTHERN PRISONS OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS, and Scenes from Life as PRISONERS OF WAR," with key of 32 pages. It is dedicated to heart-stirring, historical work that has ever been presented to the public, and will be purchased by everybody. Copies sent free to agents on receipt of $1. Call on, or address with stamp, DUFFIELD & CO., 74 Chamber street, New York.

The Great Money-Making Article!
Everybody needs it. Agents or Solicitors can make $10 a day. Sample, with particulars, sent free by mail, for 25 cents. Address
000 E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

SAVAGE & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF LANTERNS AND BURNERS,
286 Greenwich St., New York.
Offer varieties of the latest Improved Kerosene Oil Lants no; also Burners of the CELEBRATED SAVAGE AND CO. NO-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted immediately. Send for circulars.
524-25 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N. Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.
The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Shuttle Tension. They make the Genuine and Elastic Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.
FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
505 Broadway, New York.

A GIFT FOR YOU
AT THE PHILADELPHIA GIFT BOOK PUBLISHING HOUSE.
The Eleventh Year of the Enterprise.
NEW BOOKS AND NEW GIFTS.
A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK.
A new Classified Catalogue of Books just issued, of over 35 pages of books in every department of Literature, with full instructions for forming Clubs, &c., &c.
The best place in the world to buy books is at the "EVANS ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK SALE."
Catalogues sent free on receipt of red stamp. Address
G. G. EVANS,
523-28 639 Chestnut st. ecd, Phila.

$5,000 a Year can be made with the instructions which I send out. Sent free for $1. Address
W. FRIZZELL, Baltimore, Md.

GEORGE L. CANNON'S AIR WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS IN KITCHEN RANGES &c.
CIA BROADWAY NEW YORK. BETWEEN BLEECKER & HOUSTON STS.

Art of Enameling—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. World-French Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite.
1,000 different kinds. Send stamp for a catalogue.
000 VICTOR DELAPO, 89 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circulars.
000 PIERRE BIDON, 27 Ann St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufactures of Photographic Materials,
WAREHOUSE AND SALESROOM,
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.
In addition to their well-known stock of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, which is unsurpassed for the following, viz:
Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Of these we have an immense assortment, including
VIEWS OF THE WAR,
Catalogued and classified, forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE GREAT UNION CONTEST
Mull Hats, Dutch Caps,
Yorktown, Pontoon Trains,
Gettysburgh, Masked Batteries,
Fair Oaks, Lookout Mountain,
Savage Station, Chickamauga,
Fredericksburgh, City Point,
Fairfax, Nashville,
Richmond, Petersburgh,
Peep Bottom, Belle Plain,
Monitors, Chattanooga,
Fort Morgan, Atlanta,
Charleston, Mobile,
Florida, &c. Strawberry Plains,
&c. &c.
Invention and Portrait Cards, Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, Fancy Cards, Illustrating Every Subject. Also, a large and varied assortment of Stereoscopic Slides. Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp.

Photographic Albums.
We were the first to introduce them into the United States and we manufacture them in every variety of style and binding, ranging in price from 50 cents to $25. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in quality and durability to any in the market. They will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.
ALBUMS FOR CARTES DE VISITE, 20 PICTURES.
The Trade will find our Albums too most profitable to handle. They can fly.
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.
We have on hand, and are constantly adding to, over Five Thousand different subjects (the whole collection now numbering nearly 10,000), being nearly all those published in the United States, viz:
Ten Ne.-Gems 100 Lincoln Family 450 Statesmen,
100 Brig. Gens. 100 Major Gens. 150 Clergymen,
175 Colonels, 75 Navy Officers, 125 Authors,
40 Admirals, 50 Prize Fighters, 100 Prominent Women.
Including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statuary, &c., &c., and a large variety of Fancy Heads. An order for One Dozen Pictures from our Catalogue, will be filled for $1. Sent by mail, postage paid.
Photographers and others desiring to sell our Cards, will find it much to their pecuniary advantage to call upon us, or send for our Catalogue and Terms.
Liberal discount to the trade.

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,
A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off or injure the skin; remains permanent for years and cannot be detected. Price $1. 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation.
HUNT & CO., Perfumers,
000 133 South Seventh Street, Philadelphia.

ARCANA WATCH.
An Elegant Novelty in Watches.
The cases of this watch are composed of several different metals combined, which produces a beautiful mottled appearing on exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana. They are so beautiful that they have been mistaken for gold—eight the cost. The cases are beautifully designed and are engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Cases, and will stand the test-ion of gold as to defy detection. The movements are manufactured by the well-known Mr. Abner Welch Company of Europe and are superbly finished, having improved plates, fancy dial and pinions, jeweling regulator, fine dial and skeleton hands.
These watches are all Hunting Cases and of three sizes, the smallest being for Ladies. A case of six will be sent by Mail or Express for $125. A single one sent in a handsome case for $25. They will readily sell for three times their cost. Also just issued a very superior finish and elegant watch which we call set $30 each, or $170 per case of six. These are the largest sizes and for Ladies and Gents. We are sole agents for this Watch in the United States and the genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark. Persons ordering watches, C. O. D., will please remit 25 per cent of the amount with their order. Orde a for any kind of watches promptly and faithfully filled. Address ARCANA WATCH CO., No. 62 FULTON ST., New York City, Importers & Dealers in Watches or every description.
625-26 Successors to Girard W. Duvaugh & Co.

WANTED AGENTS.
Salary $100 per month. Address E. R. LOCKWOOD, Detroit, Michigan, with stamp. 526-7

Employment for All!
Agents wanted. Send 25 cents for particulars. E. M. MILLER, Beaver Falls, Pa. 526-9

Short-Hand Without a Master.
By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be obtained in a few hours. Fifty-first Edition. Just published. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. 526-9

JOB MILLER, JR.
A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c., &c. Price 10 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. 526-9

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scurvy is the offspring of the sluggish circulation of the blood, stomach, tainted by air, laughter, depression of spirits, always attended with the worst cases of cutaneous eruptions are speedily and radically removed by these medicines—the Ointment cleanses the skin, and the Pills purify the blood, stimulate the liver, and promote digestion.

Curl your Hair.
One application will curl your hair into beautiful curls and set its months; satisfaction given or money refunded. Price 50 cents. Address M. A. DAVIS, Calhoun, Ill. 526-9

AGENTS WANTED.
$10 A Day can be Easy Made $10
By selling Engravings, Card Photographs, and Stationery Packets. Our Stationery packages excel all others. Each packet contains Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencil, &c., and Jewelery worth a dollar at retail, price only 30 cts. We will send Agents 100 Packages and a Silver Watch for $17. We have a large assortment of Steel Engravings and Portraits, very popular and saleable; will send 100 assorted kinds for $15 but will realize $30; will send a sample lot for $5 that will sell for $15. Send stamp for catalogue, terms, etc.
000 HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman street, N. Y.

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S PIANOFORTES.
99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to advantage. Read the Hymeneal Repository, a Guide and Medical Advisor, by WM. EARL, M.D., 200 pages. Mailed in plain wrapper on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

SELPHO'S PATENT LEG & ARM.
516 BROADWAY.

The most perfect substitute for lost limbs ever introduced. LIKENESS 25 YEARS. Send for Pamphlet. SOLDIERS SUPPLIED FREE by order of the SECRETARY OF WAR. 526-7

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.
Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.
Treating on "Psychologic Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate with the making love, and marrying any person they wish, irrespective of age or previous condition. Sent by mail for 50 cents, by E. D. LUCKE & CO., Box 1525, Portland, Maine.

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.
Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc.; supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself, after being put to great expense through ignorance and quackery. Sent free, inclosing a postpaid, addr. ssed envelope, single copies may be had of the Author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, Esq., Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y. tf

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW and USEFUL INVENTIONS of great value to families; all are very great profits. Send 25 cents and get 80 pages; or 25 cents and get 80 pages and a sample gratis.
517-29 EFIRD, IM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!
MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of any lady, together with the date of marriage. This is no humbug, as testimonials without number can attest. By stating age, height, color of eyes and h ir, and inclosing 25 cents, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address Miss JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 38, West Troy, N. Y. 526-7

Royal Havana Lottery.
Official Drawing of September 5, 1865,

No. 11,250	drew	$100,000
No. 10,239	"	50,000
No. 4,993	"	30,000
No. 9,745	"	10,000
No. 12,211	"	5,500

Being the five capital prizes.
Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.
TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIRCULAR WHISPERERS or any other trait. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Ointments and Curing Fluids; Gambling Exposed; Yankee Notions, &c. Make your fortune by Agreement to Ladies; how to gain the Love of any one, &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 4007 P.-O., New York. 526-29

WHISKERS
AND MOUSTACHES
Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using
DR. SEVIGNE'S
RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.
The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. It has been used by the ele of Paris and London with the most flat ering success.
The ma ic of all preparations will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money paid for them will be refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials sent free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 32, Troy, N. Y.
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.
Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (62 views), $1 25 per pack; $10 per dozen; also Mixed Buck Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price. Address FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.
tf

Mysteries of Happiness.
This the most wonderful and curious work of the 19th century, is sent everywhere, post-paid, for 25 cents. Don't fail to send for it and obtain the greatest book of the age. Address CARL MASON, Station D, New York City.

Every Man his own Printer.
CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $16, $16, $23 and $66. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, $25, $40, $45 and $75. Send a Circular to the LOWEST PRESS COMPANY, 79 Water street, Boston. tf

The Great New England Remedy!
Dr. J. W. Poland's
WHITE PINE COMPOUND
Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of six years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which it is said it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures
Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Healing the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.
For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.
GEO. W. SWEET, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass.
Burnham & Co. Sole Agents, No. 36 John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Petre & Rosson, Havana, Agent for Cuba.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE.

THE POCKET SEWING MACHINE,
Specially adapted for Quilting, Embroidering and Braiding.
Easily used—being held in the hand, and traverses the material to be quilted or embroidered; works with great rapidity, and gives entire satisfaction. Follows any design stamped on the cloth. Send for circular, to any part of the United States. Plain Steel Machine, $5; Heavy Silver Plated Machine, $8. State Right for sale. Address A. S. GILCHRIST, Secretary Pocket Sewing Machine Company, 17 Wall street, New York. tf

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?
MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of an order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau St., N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed
From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1. By S. C. UPHAM, 28 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-27

Freckles, Tan and Pimples
REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 28 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-27

Asthma Cured.
Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,
and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of 20 years' family years' standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid by my address. S. C. UPHAM, 28 South Eighth street, Phila. 'Circulars sent free. 525-27

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 photographs of Rebel Generals for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

A CURIOSITY!!
Free to All. A Rare Treat.
Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GIFT PAPER, rendered free with valuable information. Send 6 cents. CHARLES E. MACKEY,
207 Broadway, New York.

Adventures of Jeff Davis.
A most comical book, with over 100 engravings; only 15 cents; 10 for $1; sent free. Address HUNTER & BRO., Hinsdale, N. H. 524-7

Agents Wanted.
Live Agents wanted everywhere. If you want employment and a good chance to make money, send your address and receive particulars, free by return mail.
BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK,
524-7 14 Chamber's street, N. Y.

$90 A Month.
Agents wanted for six entirely new articles, just out. Address O. T. OAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine.

$1. WHISKERS. $1.
For One Dollar I will send, secure and postpaid, the "Grecian Compound," highly perfumed, which, if used as directed, will force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in five weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. If entire satisfaction is not given, or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box 316. F. L. SCHULTZ, Lansingburgh, N. Y.
525-27

New Books, New Books, and Sporting GOODS. New styles Cards for Visits. Popular 25 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. R. MANCHES, 638 Broadway, New York.

Sexecology, or the Secrets of Success. How to make a fortune, Win the Affections of any one you choose, Marry the Matrimonial Match, Be Healthy and Beauty, Psychologic Fascination, Matrimony Made Easy, How to Make French Brandy, Jamaica Rum, Liquor Coloring, and over 40 original receipts, either of which will enable a person to make a fortune. All in search of a legitimate business should read this book. Sent by mail for 25 cents.
EVANS & CO.,
tf Box 1,510, Philadelphia.

$75 PER MONTH and all expenses paid to Agents. Address H. E. HERRINTON & CO., Detroit. 526-7

Clergymen, Teachers, The Press,

Unite in saying that the new juvenile magazine

Our Young Folks

Is the best magazine for the young ever published in America. It is filled with attractive illustrations, and its articles, in prose and poetry, are by the best writers for children in the country.

It is sold at the low price of $2 a year. Each number contains 64 pages, beautifully printed. A liberal discount to clubs. Send 20 cents for specimen copy and circular to the Publishers, TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

o

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make it very profitable by selling our great, new, and unrivalled extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gifts and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Sworn Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. County rights free, sales enormous, thousands realized, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.

M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers,
102 Nassau street, New York.

o

SMOLANDER'S

COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF

BUCHU.

Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, DIRRHŒA, DROPSY, &c. Price ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. BARNES & CO., and P. C. WELLS & CO., New York. BERLEIGH & BOURNE, Boston, Mass., General Agents.
520-3to *

ITCH! SALT RHEUM! ITCH! SCALD HEAD! ITCH! TETTER! ITCH! SCALD HEAD! ITCH! SALT RHEUM!

Cured by Reide's Crimson Ointment. Price, 35 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Solo Agents.
520-3to

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money in the JOHNSON PEN, warranted for one year, 11 carats fine; also every variety of Penholders on hand. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office, No. 15 Maiden lane. 519-3to

THE DAYS OF BRASS JEWELRY ARE OVER.

THE COSMOPOLITAN

Jewelers' Association.

Capital, $2,500,000.

Great One Price Gold Sale.

SELL NO BRASS OR SO-CALLED PLATED JEWELRY.

WARRANT ALL JEWELRY GOLD, OR NO SALE!

Let it be distinctly understood that this is emphatically a GOLD SALE on a one price system, and that not a single article of brass or plated jewelry is included in the whole immense stock. This Association has been organized on an original and peculiarly attractive system, and upon such a scale as to challenge, with their immense resources, the competition of the world. Read carefully for sale at the one nominal price of two dollars for each and every article, without regard to value.

500,000

Pianos, Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings, Setts of Rich Silver-ware, Fine Gold Jewelry, Photograph Albums, &c., WORTH $3,500,000.

All to be sold for two dollars each, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive. Affording the people throughout the whole country, far as well as near, the opportunity never before offered to order direct from the manufacturers, and thus obtain the finest of jewelry, richest of silver-ware, and the choicest of albums and fancy goods, a gold or silver watch, or even a piano, for the insignificant sum of two dollars, or an equivalent piece of one-fifth the value. To convince the most sceptical of the truth of this assertion, we guarantee to send any article in exchange for the least article they may get for $2, a Splendid Richly Chased Engraved Silver Hunting Case, or Casket, Sewing case, valued at $10, or a beautiful 50 Picture Morocco Photographic Album, valued at $6.

THE PLAN OF SALE.

Sealed advertisements, describing every article and its value, are well mixed and sent without regard to choice to our customers. Regular sums and valuable receipts, worth many dollars, are sent at the depot of the Association by mail with the sealed advertisements free to any address, postage paid, for 25 cents.

ALL ARTICLES SOLD AT TWO DOLLARS EACH.

WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE!!!

On receipt of advertisement you receive what you are pleased to name, and then it is at your option to pay two dollars and take the article, or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, or any article of jewelry on our list, warranted Gold, for $2, and if they do not choose to pay more than $2 worth for it not satisfied they have the privilege of taking a splendid album, Silver Butter Dish or Castor, worth from $6 to $10, in exchange for any article as before stated.

Price of the Gold Sale Receipt and Song Packet only 25 cents each, or 5 for $1; 12 for $2; 30 for $5; 100 for $15; and sealed advertisements sent free with each packet. Agents wanted. Send stamp for circulars and catalogue of articles.

CALKINS & CO., Managers,
Headquarters, 588 and 590 Broadway, N. Y.
Or if nearer you, 36 South Fourth st., St. Louis, Mo., or 83 and 85 Madison st., Chicago, Ill., where numerous Gold Jewelry Banners have been opened. o Valuable Receipts.

EDITOR OF FRANK LESLIE'S: DEAR SIR—With your permission I wish to say to the readers of your paper, that I will send, by return mail, to all who wish it (free), a recipe, with full directions, for making and using a simple VEGETABLE BALM, that will effectually remove it, tan days, Pimples, Blotches, Tan, Freckles, and all Impurities of the Skin, leaving the same soft, clear, smooth and beautiful.

I will also mail free to those having Bald Heads or Bare Faces simple directions and information that will enable them to raise a full growth of luxuriant Hair, Whiskers or a Moustache, in less than 30 days.

All applications should be served by return mail, without charge. Respectfully yours,

THOS. F. CHAPMAN, Chemist,
No. 831 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

ANDY JOHNSON WARMING UP THE FROZEN SNAKE (COPPERHEAD) OF REBELLION.

"There now! Poor thing, it begins to fel a little like its old self. (Aside.) I hope, however it won't bite me."

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

fig. 1. To the Military Men, Tourist and even the Civilian, these "good predictions" are of the utmost importance, being a saving of time, annoyance, and the best protection to the throat against atmospheric causes possibly more or irritate the neck of the wearer. They are infinitely cheaper than paper or the Saint Linen Collars, and neither can approach the same substance of their independent requisites, adapted alike for Ladies, Gentlemen and also Young Masters.

They are sadly adjusted, instantly washed with Soap, Water and Sponge, and fit for use in thirty seconds. The time is rapidly approaching when the "Gentleman's Furnisher" will be complete without the [next Cut of Mail] the American Steel Shirt Collars, Cuffs and Bosoms, which are made of the best steel, highly polished and tempered of the very finest wire, and will always carry well.

Sold, adjusting Enamelled "Snow White" Linen Bosoms, $1 and 50 per doz. Same model, fine, and $1 Bleeken Bosoms, $1.25 and $1.50. Brown, with band, $1.50. Gents' Steel Shirt Collars, $1; Cuffs, $1.50 per pair. Same, Ladies' Steel Collars, $1; Cuffs, $1.50 per pair. Steel Studs and Sprigs. Sent by mail, free of postage, to any part of the United States. Reference, Publishers and Subscribers. 79 Nassau st., N. Y.

THE LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING EMPORIUM
OF
THOMAS AND MOIRISETT,
No. 845 Broadway,
SUPPLIES EVERY ARTICLE A LADY, CHILD, or INFANT REQUIRES, in the furnishing of their TOILET or WARDROBE.

Decalcomanie, a New Process to Embellish Porcelain, Wood, Glass, Silk, Velvet, Leather, &c. Can be learned by every one at F. E. VACQUEREL'S, 811, Broadway. 524-7t

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—The advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc. The only object of the advertiser in sending the prescription is to benefit the afflicted and spread information, which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
o Williamsburgh, Kings County New York.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,
Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts THREE of different powers for $1. Address
OOO F. C. BOWEN, Box 926, Boston, Mass.

A Great Chance for Agents.

What the people want.—The Standard History of the War, complete in one large volume of over 1,000 pages, splendidly illustrated with over 150 fine portraits of Generals, battle scenes, maps and diagrams. This work has no rival as a cash, lucid, complete, authentic and reliable history of the war. Needing another equal to three large octavo volumes. Send for circulars and see what we say.

JONES, BRUS. & CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa.; Cincinnati, O.; Boston, Mass.; or
ZEIGLER, MCCURDY & CO.,
Chicago, Ill.; St. Louis, Mo.

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $50 per acre, payable within four years.—Good business openings for manufactories and others. Churches, schools and good society. Ill-health the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. Descriptive pamphlets free. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. R. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

To all wanting Farms.

$1,000,000 Worth
OF
Watches, Jewelry, and Silver-ware,
To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive:
100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches.....each $125
500 Silver Watches.....each $20 to 35
10,000 Gold Pens and Silver Case.....each $ 5 to 8
And a large assortment of Jewelry and Silver-ware.
The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:
Certificates naming each article and its value are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents—6 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5.
Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. BROWEN & CO.,
o No. 36 Beekman st., P. O. Box 4276, N. Y.

To all Buyers of Jewelry.

B. T. HAYWARD'S,
208, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Can be found a full and complete assortment of GOLD & PLATED JEWELRY, WATCH CHAINS, LOCKETS, BRACELETS, &c. Also Headquarters for Army, Navy, and Masonic Badges and Emblems.

☞ The Trade are respectfully invited to call and examine the Stock. o

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,
One Dollar Each.
(Patent applied for June 20th 1865.)

AN EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A detailed unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and superseded by NEVER-KNOWN RIVAL, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. Correct in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." All attempts to imitate are an imposition. Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold Silver-proof Cases, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Sole depot for the country. All orders must be addressed to

J. W. DELAMERE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
o 294 and 296 Broadway, N. Y.

No Medicine is so Popular AS DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER.

Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer
Renews the Hair.
Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer
Restores gray hair to the original color.
Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer
Prevents the hair from falling off.
Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer
Makes the hair soft and glossy.
Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer
Does not soil the skin.
Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer
Has proved itself to be no preparation for the hair over presented to the public. Price $1. For sale by all druggists. o

ARMY WATCH. $10

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Cut Hands, "English Movements," and Correct Timekeeper, with small accurate "Minuteman Chronometer" indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in dark case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat wrapper, with a BEAUTIFUL VEST CHAIN, for only $10.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Minuteman Arrangement, specially adapted to the Army. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.

English and American LEVERS from $23 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.

Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20

$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and putting up the Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions cost $20. L. L. TODD & CO., 29 Nassau street, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.
519-3lo

The National Park Bank
of New York.
Capital,...$3,000,000 | Surplus,...$1,200,000

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

J. L. WORTH, Cashier.
New York, August 21, 1865. 519-3lo

Buy Me and Try Me.—Only 5 cents (five cents). J. G. ISELIN, 80 Nassau street, N. Y. tfo

Ladies and Gentlemen—If you wish to Marry you can do so by addressing me. I will send you valuable information that will enable you to marry happily and speedily irrespective of age, wealth or beauty. All letters strictly confidential. Send desired information sent by return mail. Please enclose postage or stamped envelope, addressed to myself. Address SARAH B. LAMBERT, Greenpoint, King's County, N. Y. 525-3to

STAMMERING

cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address H. G. L. MEARS, 377 West 23d St., N. Y. ecwo

These cases of scanty, retarded growth, the person over 18, the Balsam of the Tennessee Swamp Shrub has been found to excite the Beard, Moustache, &c., to a fine and vigorous growth. (See Testimonials.) The delicacy and a small sample of this Balsam sent sealed on receipt of return postage.

JOHN HAWKINS, 915 Broadway, N. Y.
o

For a Perfume
Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-3to

STEINWAY & SONS,
Manufacturers of
Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,
Warerooms, No. 71 & 73 East 14th St.,
Between Union Square and Irving Place,
NEW YORK. tfo

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 10 cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 000o 1130 Broadway, New York.

CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Restores Gray Hair.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer makes Hair grow on Bald Heads.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Stops Hair from Falling Out.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Prevents Headache.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer is elegantly Perfumed.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer is all that can be claimed as a dressing.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer possesses all the merit claimed for it.
A single trial convinces the most sceptical of its value. If, after a thorough trial of two bottles it does not give perfect satisfaction, the money will be refunded.
Sold everywhere at 50 cents.
Six bottles for $5.
DR. F. B. CLOCK,
Proprietor,
Manchester, N. H.
H. T. HELMBOLD,
Drug and Chemical Warehouse,
594 Broadway, N. Y.
525-3to General Agent, New York City.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with the disease, and yet the story of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell, for from long experience of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicines, DARBY'S GREAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and we challenge the world to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. They are not a whisky drink.—Indianapolis Gazette.

H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist, 594 Broadway, New York, Agent. 526-3to

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address
C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.
o

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.
Price 26 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Solo Agents. 520-3to

The United States News Agency.
123 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.,
Supplies Newsdealers, Booksellers and Stationers, with everything wanted in their line, at as low prices as any house in the United States. Packing done at the lowest rates. Particular attention paid to collecting back numbers of newspapers, magazines and periodicals. Send for a price list.

M. T. COZANS,
S. Y. SCOTT,
W. J. BUNCE, } Managers.
o

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 527—VOL. XXI.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 4, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. $2 WEEKS $1 00

Repudiation Revived.

WHOEVER assails the public credit is an enemy to his country. It is indifferent in what mode it is assailed, the criminality and the odium of the act are the same. The doctrine of repudiation, of which the arch-rebel, now corroding in Fortress Monroe, was the apostle and high priest, and which Mississippi has the undying disgrace of putting in practice, did more to damage the interests and retard the development and prosperity of the country than all other causes combined. It kept capital away, embarrassed enterprise with doubts and fears, and sowed distrust among men in all matters connected with finance. Many years were requisite to counteract its baleful influences, and start the country anew on its career of prosperity. In time, the very word, "repudiation," became odious, and recalled to mind only a hideous moral disease, which once threatened the constitution and life of the public body. Few, probably, would desire to restore the financial and commercial distractions which prevailed when States openly violated their solemn contracts, laughed at their obligations, and appeared insensible of the disgrace of disregarding their plighted honor. Few, probably, would care to see the country in that humiliating position before the world which she occupied when the doctrines of Jeff. Davis were accepted by States, and acted on by individuals, and when foreign capitalists kept close watch on their purses when an American came near, as if he were a thief or a pickpocket. Fewer still would wish to encounter the hurricane of sneers, and jibes, and contemptuous, and indignant utterances which we all had to endure, in the silence of conscious guilt, when repudiation was rampant, and before rebellion began.

Yet there are evidences that the spirit of repudiation still lives, and is insidiously operating to weaken, if not destroy, the public credit, upon the careful preservation of which, under our present heavy debt, our financial and material prosperity mainly rests. We allude more particularly to the movements, in various parts of the country, and among some factions of the Democratic party, to disaffect the people with the conditions upon which the money was raised to put down the rebellion, and which were integral and necessary parts of the contract between the Government and those who purchased its securities. To raise the enormous sums necessary to carry on the war, it was indispensable, not only to assure lenders of the interest on their money, but to hold out special inducements to them to advance their money freely. Among these was an exemption of Government securities from State and local taxation. The propriety of this special enactment is not, nor need it be, a subject of discussion. It is equally unnecessary and unprofitable to discuss the question of its necessity. It is enough for us to know, that it forms part of the contract between the Government and the holder of its securities. The faith of the nation is pledged to it. It cannot be touched by legislation. Congress cannot vary it. The Executive has no control over it. It can only be affected by repudiation.

The men, therefore, who seek to interfere with this provision of the compact between the nation and its creditors are simple repudiators. They might demand, with equal propriety, that the interest on Government securities should not be paid, and that the principal of the national debt should be disavowed. The direction of their action is indeed to this end, and this is probably their ultimate object, but which they hesitate to acknowledge.

We care not to what party, or section of a party, these repudiators belong. In every case they are traitors to the interests and welfare of the country, who should be crushed under the weight of an outraged public opinion. We know not if men may be made legally amenable for conspiring to destroy public credit, but they can, and ought, to be held strictly amenable to the sentiment of the community, and shunned like lepers. The very whisper of their doctrines should be hushed by the stern voice of reprobation; and any candidate for station, however low, who is tainted with them, should be taught at the polls with what detestation their doctrines are regarded by an honest and virtuous community.

Repudiators are always demagogues of the basest kind. They do not approach, or attempt to approach, the better part of the people, the worthy, the industrious, and the intelligent, but make all their advances to the idle, the vicious and the ignorant. They do not attack the contracts of the nation on the ground of impolicy, but proceed upon the insulting, unworthy and preposterous allegation that they were made in the exclusive interest of a class, and with the intent of creating an aristocracy of Government security-holders, at the expense of, and for the repression of the poor! It is the vicious, old, and, we had hoped, utterly obsolete cry of Capital versus Labor, the Rich against the Poor, which used to be raised with so much effect in Tammany Hall, when that structure was consecrated to agrarianism, and controlled by ruffians. Thus we find a convention of so-called Democrats in this city declaring, by formal resolution, that an obligation contracted, and a faith plighted, in a period of necessity, and for the salvation of the nation is "a most unjust discrimination against the rights of the masses of the people, tending to create a moneyed aristocracy in our midst;—"to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer," and pledging the efforts of those present to reverse those obligations, and violate that faith. It is simple rubbish to talk of doing this in a lawful or "legal" way. The Constitution declares that there shall be no legislation to "impair the obligations of contracts." In Ohio, the Democratic candidate for Governor, while admitting that the Government was obliged to obtain money, at whatever sacrifice, to support its armies in the field, and that it was obliged to hold out special inducements to obtain it, as it had a right to do—we say this candidate, happily repudiated by the people of that State, did not hesitate to declare that the contracts then made should not be regarded as binding. He seemed to think they should be treated as if made under duress—to be repudiated when the danger they were entered into to serve had passed away!

VOODOOISM AT MOBILE—STRANGE SUPERSTITION OF THE NEGRO.

We believe the people of the United States are far too intelligent to be deceived by the old State cry of demagogues since the organization of society—the Rich against the Poor. Of course Government bonds cannot be held by those who have not the money to pay for them; but it is an unfounded assumption that our untaxed national securities are held exclusively by capitalists. They are scattered in sums varying from $50 upwards, all through the land. They may be found in farm-house and work-shop, in garret and cellar, in the hands of the day laborer and the home maid, and are held by hundreds of thousands of brave soldiers as an acknowledgment from the nation of their services. If any allegation, or any obligation less than another, ought to be esteemed sacred, it is such as the nation undertook in its late terrible but successful struggle. If both, above all other, is to be most scrupulously maintained, it is that which was passed to preserve the nation's life. If honor has not ceased to be the highest boast of manhood, or gratitude the noblest of sentiments, the will of the nation expressed with its frown any attempt to undermine the public credit or depreciate the value of its securities, based on the faith and honor of the country. The spend-thrift may squander the heritage of wine press of war; they have lived and died side by side for that which money cannot buy; they equally share the honors and benefits of a regenerated and consolidated country, and accursed be the hand that is raised to sever the bonds of sympathy between them, and thrice accursed he who seeks to check our glorious career of prosperity, or bar the avenue to greatness, or lower the good name of the country, by suggestions near or remote of that fell word Repudiation! Let it die with the wretched, black, bankrupt old man who first dared breathe it in America.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 4, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscript should be written on one side of the leaf only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

Laws of the Pave.

In all civilized communities law is too often at fault in securing statutes of the government of certain cases, or too dilatory in enforcing them when once made. In their absence custom comes imperatively to the rescue, and lays down laws that are recognizable even in a court of justice.

Among these customs that have taken the force of legal enactments, is the law of the pave. Statutes have been enacted which cover the greater points of travel, and define the rights of the individual, both on foot and in the vehicle; but it is the law of custom that calls for the observance of the smaller amenities, and makes their observance necessary as laws for the protection of property.

In London a policeman's first duty is to attend to these laws of the pave, to see that the sovereignty of the individual is protected, to see that each and every person regards the "keep to the right" maxim, or the "move on," or "move out of the way. The result is, that no groups of two or three selfish people can gather upon the sidewalk, and with half an hour's bad chat throw out an entire line of pedestrians, numbering, perhaps, several thousands. A few stupid porters are not allowed to block up the sidewalks with boxes, or heap it with coal, to the detriment and danger of every passer-by, for hours.

In this country we do not acknowledge these laws of the pave, and we do not believe that in any street in the Union, except Broadway, is even the law of "keep to the right" acted on it. Even upon Broadway, some stupid countryman, or ignorant city-bred, who does not get on its pavement more than once a year, will make their way against the tide, and in doing so, throw out the whole line of pedestrians, without a check from a policeman, or a hint from a passer-by to set them right.

There was a time when we could justly have complained of the fairer portion of creation for an undue monopolization of the streets, by spreading their shirts over the pave, but that time has passed by, and the ladies have taken to once more room to tread without encountering a carpet of silk, or making it a matter of hourly fear that a misstep would leave the silken robes of scores lady fair under our feet.

We hold that every one violating the imperative customs that give each person an equal right to the highway and nothing more, should be rigidly enforced by the police, no matter whether they are legal enactments or not. From the Teutonic searcher after rags and bones, who scratches in mash barrel, and by no scrubbing, ever succeeds in getting dust that he may achieve an old rag or bone, to the fair dandizette, who, with her two or three friends, posts herself midway on the sidewalk, and, with her back to the street, discusses what Mrs. S—— wore last Sunday, or what a shocking story that is about Miss C——, we advocate the "move on" principle. They have been allowed to impose long enough. If a man carry a cane or an umbrella, the carry it awkwardly, he is a subject for attention. When he has put out the eye of one passer-by, and knocked a tooth down the throat of another, it is too late.

The duty of the police is to defend the greater number from the usurpations of the few, for whatever may be the size of a majority, though it is no less an outrage, still as it is claimed, vox populi vox dei.

Politics, like misery, sometimes makes strange bed-fellows. The latest illustration is the speech of Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, Plymouth Pastmaster-General, before a Democratic meeting in this city on the 18th of October. Probably the principal reason why Mr. Beecher signed to this speech, will be that derived from his allusions to Mexico. In these he bit a popular chord, and whatever may be his views on other matters, he must be taken as an exponent of the public on the question involved in the French outrage on American soil. United States Minister Campbell, Mr. Blair said, referring to the oft-repeated declaration, "we cannot undertake another war":

"I say we must for our own sakes, when a foreign monarchy attempts to plant a republic on our confines, and the overthrow of its free institutions the accompaniment and the only means designed to rule over one. The avowal of the purpose of the invasion in the Declaration that it was "accordant to the Latin race" over the southern section of our continent, by a French King, is a flat challenge to the wreck of Republican Government in Mexico, admonishes us that we have the Monroe Doctrine is no safeguard to their own freedom but in driving out the military tyranny which has taken foothold at our most exposed portals."

Grand Woo Gow is the musical name of a Chinese giant exhibiting in London. He repeats instructive passages from Confucius and other Chinese philosophers, and occasionally delivers a wise paragraph or aphorism of his own, such as:

"The fish dwell in the depths of the waters,
And the eagles in the midst of heaven;
The one, though high, may be reached with an arrow,
And the other, though with a hook, says curry.
But the heart of a man, at a foot distance,
Cannot be touched.
Yet I trust my heart is known to you. It is full of thankfulness for your kindness, and kindness is more binding than a loan."

Mr. Seward, in reply to a request from an eccentric public speaker to be permitted to contradict the statement that the arrests of Fenians in Ireland were made by his advice, says curtly: "I cannot depart from my habit of leaving my vindication against calumnies to an intelligent country and a candid world."

The London Athenæum has discovered that "Ulysses Grant is a man of genius; a soldier of new ideas; one who will be found to have contributed fresh materials to the art of war."

The priests in Ireland hate Fenianism, and denounce it, which they have the right to do, but they think the most effective denunciation is abuse of the American Government, which is improper. Archdeacon O'Reilly, for example, while waving his flock against "the brotherhood," found it necessary to assert that the Americans had in their war placed the Irish in front, to be "mown down like grass, thus sheltering themselves from the fire of the enemy," and that the Generals who had led the victorious armies could be designated, and therefore the Union is a "black Republic" and hostile to Irishmen!

A belief is sometimes expressed that now-a-days people marry later in life than they did formerly; but if this is the case in certain classes of society, it does not obtain among the people of England generally, for the proportion of young persons who marry has never been so high as during the year 1863, and, with very few exceptions, the rate has been annually increasing during the last 20 years. In 1841, in every 100 marriages, 4·38 of the men, and 13·29 of the women, were under 21 years of age. In 1861 these proportions had risen to 6·61 and 19·00 respectively. Some notion of the state of education in England may be obtained from the tables whence we have extracted the above statistics. It seems that in 1863, 132,345 men and 116,694 women wrote their names at marriage; 41,262 men and 57,461 women signed with marks; that is, 76·15 in a hundred men wrote their names and 24·85 made marks. In 100 women, 49·6 wrote their names and 53 made marks. These proportions are precisely the same as in the previous years, and cannot be regarded as satisfactory. We should like to obtain the statistics of Scotland, as an illustration of the comparative education and presumable intelligence of the English and American people. In Canada last year, 1864, the state of education estimated by this standard is very defective. Half the women who married in Wales and Lancashire signed with marks.

William Orland Bourne, editor of the Soldiers Friend, published in Boston, offers $200, $150, $100, and $50 for the best specimens of letter-hand writing by soldiers who have lost their right arms in the war. Specimens to be sent in by the 1st of January next. They are to be written on letter paper, with a page about 8 by 10 inches, and inch and a half ruled to be in every case, if practicable, original compositions. Selections will not be refused. But in every one there must be a touch of the author's experience, giving the time of enlistment, company, regiment, list of battles, when and where wounded, and residence, etc. The committee of award are Gov. Fenton, Gov. Hoyt, Gen. Meade, Dr. Holland, William Bryant, George William Curtis, William E. Dodge, Jr., Howard Potter, and Theodore Roosevelt, Esq.

A letter of Robert Ould, the rebel agent for exchange of prisoners, to Brig.-Gen. Winder, has been published with the report of Judge Ould says of the exchange arrangements made by him:

"The arrangement I have made works largely in our favor. We get rid of a set of miserable wretches, and receive some of our best men in their stead."

How the Union prisoners were made "miserable wretches" let the records of Libby and Andersonville tell. But the "Judge" adopted the same treatment of rebel prisoners as was practiced by Ould, and Winder, and Wirz, it is doubtful if they will have any cause to "get rid of material I owe now." In this exultant statement we have the best disproval of the rebel charges of cruelty towards the Southern prisoners. It is not improper to add, in this connection, that the passage from Old Chipman's argument before the Wirz Military Commission:

"This is the record of history against the chivalry of the South. Let the memories of those who would defend these atrocities by recrimination, charging American prisoners with like cruelties, be forever hereafter be closed. Fort Delaware and Johnson's Island, with their 'Point of Rocks,' are answered with 93 per cent.! Look upon that picture and then upon this, and tell me, gentlemen, where to stay! Let my mind, be it warped never so much by treason and rebellion, revolt at the thought of a 'point of rocks' or 'damned custom hath brazed its soul that it be proof and bulwark against' scars," it must believe; it cannot deny these things."

Observations made in Massachusetts show that September was the dryest month known in that State for 40 years. What is true of Massachusetts is true of the whole United States generally. It is true, also of England, where the month was cloudless, hot and unhealthy—the thermometer having ranged repeatedly above 90 degrees in the shade, and 125 degrees in the sun. There was absolutely no rain throughout the month, but the fall of dew was unusually heavy. The loss on one occasion is estimated at a ton and a half per acre. But for this fall there would have been a drought—which, as it is, promises to be very severe to a dangerous extent. The dry weather, however, in the north of Europe rendered the harvesting easy, and in many parts the wheat crop is of almost unique richness. So great and good indeed is the produce, that the wine merchants, who raise their prices whenever a fine vintage is probably call it a special year, and raise them again.

There is one man in Harper's Ferry who did not leave the place during the war, notwithstanding the numerous alternate occupations by the Union and rebel armies. Nor was he frightened away by bombardments or skirmishings. "I don't know," he says, "as the war's done me much harm. Five years ago I was the poorest man in Harper's Ferry, and now I'm the richest: for everybody else having run away. I wasn't worth nothing then; I ain't worth nothing now; so I'm square. Judge, have you any terbakker about ye?"

TOWN COSSIP.

We are nearing election week, and Patrick and the boys are getting excited on the politics. Under the new law of registry a certain day is set aside, and each aspirant for the honor of saving his country must enter his name on the list of voters, or be cut out in the cold. The effect of this law in the cities will be to diminish the vote about one-half. Our people are proverbially careless about voting. They seemed to have reached the conclusion that it is useless to struggle against the corruption of the ballot-box, and why they may vote nearly get into office and wicked men have away. Therefore, when there is a double ration, first of registry, and last of attendance at the poll, the listless idea prevails, and the vote is lost, unless the election is one of deep importance. The result is that the more respectable portion of our people do not vote, while every poltroon elder, who has all his time on his hands, can register frequently, vote early and vote often. "I say, Aldy," says one of this stripe, to an obsequious alderman a few days since, "I've got a vote in the seventeenth, an' one do six sixth; what ye goin' to give now for 'em?" We have always thought that the voting should be done by the Indies. If it were, there would be no clinking the duty, but every maid, matron and widow would be on hand, not only to vote, but to register. Woman believes in her public duties, even though her private ones are ever so much neglected.

We have also had an eclipse this week, and a large per centage of the population have been blacking up their noses, in fanatic efforts to look at the collision of the sun and moon through bits of smoked glass. A large number of persons came in from the rural districts, to have a good view of the affair, but how they were pleased with a New York eclipse we have not heard.

Among the newspaper records of the week, we see that one Col. Allen sues Gen. Ortega, the Vice-President of Mexico, now in New York, for some several thousand dollars, which the claims Gen. Ortega should be cobbin for agitating the Mexican recruiting scheme.

We pretend to know nothing, at this present, but viewing both sides of the question dispassionately, we conclude, firstly, that it is somewhat, as Gen. Ortega says, a plan to get money. As Gen. Ortega who got up the Mexican Emigration scheme were nothing more nor less than broken-down politicians and adventurers of Indiana, who looked upon it simply as a means to replenish their pockets. On the other hand, this city, and all the other large cities are full of Mexicans, who talk much and do little. They have plenty of promises, but no cash; and they have not, as yet, the means, to enter into contracts with anybody, to give away boundless estates and church properties, which they never did and never will have, to any one but their own men, and to Mexicans and fight their battles. All this they are to get as soon as victory perches on their banners; or, in other words, when the city of Mexico is taken, and "loyal" hands are in power. We think, however, from the shrewd prophesy so far, it will be duly easy, barely as to time and inch and pound, to say in every case, if practicable, original compositions. Selections will not be refused. But in every one there must be a touch of the author's experience, giving the time of enlistment, company, regiment, list of battles, when and where wounded, and residence, etc. The committee of award are Gov. Fenton, Gov. Hoyt, Gen. Meade, Dr. Holland, William Bryant, George William Curtis, William E. Dodge, Jr., Howard Potter, and Theodore Roosevelt, Esq.

A letter of Robert Ould, the rebel agent for exchange of prisoners, to Brig.-Gen. Winder, has been published with the report of Judge Ould says of the exchange arrangements made by him:

"The arrangement I have made works largely in our favor. We get rid of a set of miserable wretches, and receive some of our best men in their stead."

How the Union prisoners were made "miserable wretches" let the records of Libby and Andersonville tell. But the "Judge" adopted the same treatment of rebel prisoners as was practiced by Ould, and Winder, and Wirz, it is doubtful if they will have any cause to "get rid of material I owe now." In this exultant statement we have the best disproval of the rebel charges of cruelty towards the Southern prisoners. It is not improper to add, in this connection, that the passage from Old Chipman's argument before the Wirz Military Commission:

"This is the record of history against the chivalry of the South. Let the memories of those who would defend these atrocities by recrimination, charging American prisoners with like cruelties, be forever hereafter be closed. Fort Delaware and Johnson's Island, with their 'Point of Rocks,' are answered with 93 per cent.! Look upon that picture and then upon this, and tell me, gentlemen, where to stay! Let my mind, be it warped never so much by treason and rebellion, revolt at the thought of a 'point of rocks' or 'damned custom hath brazed its soul that it be proof and bulwark against' scars," it must believe; it cannot deny these things."

Observations made in Massachusetts show that September was the dryest month known in that State for 40 years. What is true of Massachusetts is true of the whole United States generally. It is true, also of England, where the month was cloudless, hot and unhealthy—the thermometer having ranged repeatedly above 90 degrees in the shade, and 125 degrees in the sun. There was absolutely no rain throughout the month, but the fall of dew was unusually heavy. The loss on one occasion is estimated at a ton and a half per acre. But for this fall there would have been a drought—which, as it is, promises to be very severe to a dangerous extent. The dry weather, however, in the north of Europe rendered the harvesting easy, and in many parts the wheat crop is of almost unique richness. So great and good indeed is the produce, that the wine merchants, who raise their prices whenever a fine vintage is probably call it a special year, and raise them again.

There is one man in Harper's Ferry who did not leave the place during the war, notwithstanding the numerous alternate occupations by the Union and rebel armies. Nor was he frightened away by bombardments or skirmishings. "I don't know," he says, "as the war's done me much harm. Five years ago I was the poorest man in Harper's Ferry, and now I'm the richest: for everybody else having run away. I wasn't worth nothing then; I ain't worth nothing now; so I'm square. Judge, have you any terbakker about ye?"

TOWN COSSIP.

We are nearing election week, and Patrick and the boys are getting excited on the politics. Under the new law of registry a certain day is set aside, and each aspirant for the honor of saving his country must enter his name on the list of voters, or be cut out in the cold. The effect of this law in the cities will be to diminish the vote about one-half. Our people are proverbially careless about voting. They seemed to have reached the conclusion that it is useless to struggle against the corruption of the ballot-box, and why they may vote nearly get into office and wicked men have away. Therefore, when there is a double ration, first of registry, and last of attendance at the poll, the listless idea prevails, and the vote is lost, unless the election is one of deep importance. The result is that the more respectable portion of our people do not vote, while every poltroon elder, who has all his time on his hands, can register frequently, vote early and vote often. "I say, Aldy," says one of this stripe, to an obsequious alderman a few days since, "I've got a vote in the seventeenth, an' one do six sixth; what ye goin' to give now for 'em?" We have always thought that the voting should be done by the Indies. If it were, there would be no clinking the duty, but every maid, matron and —Cotton planters of Southern Illinois may now be seen at any time smiling all over their faces at the result of the season's operations. Enough has already been marketed to pay the present crop twice over, that of last year. The growth of weed is enormous. It is by no means a rare thing to find cotton stalks ten feet in height, well branched, and hanging full of bolls. There is one drawback from this extraordinary growth—farmers, having calculated for the usual growth, about half that of the present season, have set their cotton too thick on the ground, and in consequence the bolls do not open so readily as they would if they were less shaded.

—An extensive fire is sweeping over Dismal Swamp in Virginia. It is probable that thousands of acres have already been burned over. A pillar of smoke by day, and a pillar of fire by night, mark the scene of the conflagration. It is not unusual for the swamps to get on fire after a drought. Careless hunters are usually the incendiaries. It is a well-known fact that this swamp is full of bears, deer, wild turkeys and other game.

—— The negroes of Alexandria, Va., are a very industrious race. They have within the past four years built about 1,200 dwellings, on leased lots mostly, and contributed, it is said, about $5,000 towards religious and educational establishments, and are now liberally contributing to support new enterprises of like character.

—— A negro poet writes the following verse to the Louisville Democrat:

"I'se cold and hungry—naked too;
I'se got no home to go to,
Oh! what mus all us niggers do?
We got no home to go to.
Old massa turn'd his back on us;
If we go back dar'll be a fuss;
De white man's made the matter wuss—
I'se got no home to go to."

—— Information has been received at Washington that 600 Spencer rifles in boxes were seized by the Canadian authorities at Niagara city lately. The contents of the boxes were accidentally discovered in overhauling the railroad freight. The authorities report it a case of Fenian smuggling.

—— A favorite question of the young men to the young ladies of Mobile is, "Has your father been pardoned yet?" finding out from the answer whether or not he comes under the $20,000 clause of amnesty proclamation, and thence calculating the probable amount of the damsel's solid charms.

—— A number of the most prominent clerymen of Philadelphia have recently formed a base-ball club, and on Saturday last made their appearance in public as athletes, in true club style—belts, caps, and all. They exhibited much agility, and their presence on the ground was the means of attracting thither a large number of spectators.

—— At Gen. Grant's reception in Cincinnati, the otherday, a tall, lank, sunburnt man pressed forward to take Gen. Grant by the hand, and said to him with marked emotion as he did so, "When Lee surrendered to you I was in his army, but you are my general now."

—— An old lady in Springfield, Mass., 81 years of age, fell and dislocated her shoulder last week. It was set the same evening, and on the second day she made her bed and walked a mile. She was evidently one of the "old stock."

—— Young men in Lawrence, Kansas, have to marry to get shelter from the weather, the landladies there take none but married people. The unfortunate youths say it is a conspiracy between the young ladies and the boarding-house keepers.

—— It is stated that all the members of the jury in the case of Mulchcaley vs. Dr. H. I. Bowditch, of Boston, in which it will be remembered the former sued the doctor for $10,000 damages, for branding him with the letter "D" during the recruiting for the war, were unanimous in favor of returning a verdict for the plaintiff, but disagreed as to the amount. Several placed damages at $10,000, as claimed, others at $500, and several others at still lower figures.

—— The Boston Post says that Mrs. Caroline Marden, of Medford, Mass., while returning home from Boston, on Sunday last, had her pocket picked of a small sum of money. On reaching home the lady discovered a $300 diamond ring in her pocket, which the rogue had doubtless accidentally dropped while accomplishing the theft.

—— A Harrisburg paper tells of a man who has failed in business four times, been upset in a stage coach, and thrown down an embankment of 60 feet; fell head foremost through a hatchway in a store at Reading; has been married three times, and is the father of 21 children. Yet he "still lives," and is in business at Harrisburg.

—— It is stated that the counsel of Jefferson Davis has expressed a desire that his client be accorded immediate trial. The desire comes originally from Davis, who, it is said, has declared that he has "no fears for the issue," and that, therefore, the Government will do him a great favor by arraigning him at the earliest possible moment. It is also reported that the recent favorable change in his every-day life was mainly the work of the President, and at this hour he has almost everything that he could ask save liberty itself, and the presence of his family about him.

—— The State Department has received dispatches from the United States Consuls in Europe, showing that the cholera is rapidly on the decline in Italy, Constantinople and elsewhere.

—— The notorious guerrilla, Champ Ferguson, was hanged at Nashville, October 20. The execution was strictly private.

Foreign.—A young Italian girl has just rid her country of an infamous brigand chief named Mouisa, for whose capture alive or dead a large reward had been offered. A few evenings since Mouisa went to a lone house near Monteforte, in the district of Avellino, occupied by a farmer and his family. After imperiously demanding many things which the poor people could not supply, the brigand consented to accept a good supper. While he was eating it in the presence of the terrified farmer and his wife, their eldest daughter approached the table as if to arrange the dishes, and suddenly plunged a poinard into the brigand's neck, killing him on the spot. For this daring deed the young woman received the reward offered by the prefect, amounting to $1,000.

—— Abd-el-Kader made a speech at a Free Mason's entertainment in France, the other day, which, as coming from the mouth of a Mussulman saint and warrior, possesses interest. We give an extract: "In the persons here present I thank Free Masonry in every country. I consider Free Masonry as the first institution in the world. In my opinion every man who does not profess Free Masonry is an incomplete man. I hope that one day the principles of Free Masonry will prevail throughout the whole world, and from that day forward all the nations will be at peace."

—— An amusing little episode recently occurred in a railroad car in England. Shortly after the train had left the depot, an old lady jumped up and addressed a gentleman seated behind her, with "How dare you? What are you at?" The astonished gentleman replied that he had done nothing. The lady again seated herself, but in a few moments arose, full of rage and terror, and declared her neighbor was a "villain," and on arriving at the next station was about to have him arrested, when, luckily, the cause of her agitation was discovered—in the shape of a goose, which, placed in a basket under the seat occupied by the lady, had, during the voyage, amused itself by pecking at her "understandings." The discovery of the criminal created great laughter among the passengers.

—— An extraordinary accident recently occurred at Birmingham, England. A charwoman was cleaning some attic windows, which are about 40 feet from the pavement, and as she was leaning out, suddenly became giddy, and fell forward into the street. At the time she fell a man was passing by, and she came with all her weight upon him. He was knocked to the ground, but she fell upon her feet, and, with the exception of some slight contusions, was found to be uninjured. The man, however, was insensible, and was taken to the hospital, where it was ascertained that he had received a severe concussion of the brain.

—— The London Court Journal says: "We regret to learn that Mr. Dickens, who is now in Paris, has had a sun-stroke. He was quite insensible for some hours, but we are happy to say speedily recovered, and is now quite well again."

—— A woman named Boursier, at Champlitte (Haute Saone, France), has an extraordinary talent for killing vipers. She discovers their retreat by her sense of smell, and then attracts them to the surface of the ground by the aid of a liquor of her own composition. On their appearance she squirts on their heads a small portion of the liquor, which stupefies them, and so they are easily killed. Between the 1st of May and the 10th of September of the present year, she destroyed 3,274 of these reptiles, for which she received 818f., the premium for the destruction of vipers being 25 centimes each.

—— We have news from Hayti that the only vessel that President Geffrard had employed in the blockade of the rebel ports, was recently taken by a party of 300 men, in three schooners, who went in search of her, and after a few shots, boarded and captured her. Strange to say, she is reported to be a steamer, but having no guns. She had done the rebels a great deal of damage by capturing their supplies. They are much elated over their prize.

—— Travelers arriving from Nice, at Marseilles, France, are fumigated in a room set apart for the purpose, in order to disinfect them from the cholera.

—— The largest army in the world, in proportion to its population, is that of a country which, for more than 50 years, has had nothing to do with war, except in a civil war of very short duration—Switzerland, to wit. This little republic has a population considerably less than that of London—2,510,404—and has an army one-third larger than that of Great Britain, 198,291 men. This includes the militia, but not the Landsturm, or army of defence, which comprises all men under 45 years capable of bearing arms. However, there is this great difference between the two countries, that whereas in England every soldier is estimated to cost $500, the Swiss soldier costs but $5 per annum.

—— Messrs. Dumas and Benôit have obtained a prize from the Academy of Sciences at Paris, for a photo-electric lamp, to be used in mines. It is composed of a generator of electricity, of a coil and tubes; by these means a stratified electric light is produced, which allows the workmen to see about them in the coal galleries. The generator is composed of discs moistened with a solution of bichromate of potash. The whole apparatus is very portable, and it is found that the cost will not exceed half a farthing per hour. A larger and more complicated lamp has been made, which may eventually be used with the same safety by miners.

—— A convention has been entered into between France and Bavaria, giving reciprocal advantages to the authors and artists of the two States. Works of art and literary productions are to be admitted free of duty in both countries, on the exhibition of a certificate of their origin, and the authors will stand on the same footing as those of the country into which they are introduced. The convention came into operation on the 1st of July, and is open for the adhesion of any other State now belonging to, or which may hereafter join, the Zollverein.

—— The Tycoon of Japan lately passed through the foreign settlement of Kanagawa, exhibiting himself to the eyes of the barbarians. He was preceded and followed by a body of troops, armed with the Enfield rifles and bayonets, stepping to the music of military bands. His majesty rode on horseback, and was pointed out as a young man in the centre of a cavalcade of high officials, his surcoat of buff, embroidered with gold, with a large crest on the back.

BASE BALL ILLUSTRATED.

We present our readers this week with the finest illustration of our national game yet published. The ball-playing fraternity have become so numerous a class of the community, that we deem it but justice to devote this space in our journal to an illustration of their game, and of some of its most prominent supporters and exemplars in the metropolis and its vicinity. On some future occasion we purpose giving a series of portraits of those who especially excel in the two departments of base ball; at present, however, we have limited our seleciton, with two or three exceptions, to those who, at the same time that they were formerly distinguished members of their club, have this past season taken active part in the games played.

The most prominent picture of the series is the portrait of the lamented Creighton, who, without doubt, was the finest ball-player who ever trod a base ball field. He died suddenly, in the fall of 1861, from a severe rupture sustained in a cricket-match at Bedford, Brooklyn, and his remains were interred in Greenwood, where a handsome monument stands over his grave, erected to his memory by the Excelsior Club, of which he was a member. The portraits around the centre of the picture include those of veteran ball players, who yet take active part in the contests of their clubs, among whom we may name Messrs. J. W. Davis, P. O'Brien, Thos. Miller, J. B. Leggett, Thos. Dakin and A. J. Bixby. Of the younger school of veterans are C. E. Thomas, John Grum, B. Hanegan, Mort. Rogers, R. Manley, S. G. Leland and D. E. Manson. Of the retired veterans, we present T. G. Van Cott as one of the most noteworthy of the New York clubs, and among the Presidents of the clubs are Messrs. Voorhis and Wildey, the former being President of the National Association, and the latter one of the most efficient Coroners New York ever had. As the picture would have been incomplete without a representative of the press, to which institution the game is so much indebted for its present popularity, we have included the portrait of Mr. Henry Chadwick, the principal base ball reporter of the New York press, than whom, from all accounts, no one has been more persevering or efficient in his efforts to promote the best interests of the game, or more impartial in reporting the contests which have taken place.

VONDOOISM IN MOBILE.

One of those extraordinary spectacles of negro superstition, which we had supposed long since passed away, has just attracted especial attention in Mobile, and a representation of which we give, from a sketch by a correspondent, whose description will give the clearest elucidation of the ceremony:

In the good old days of Louisiana, when Lafitte was doing his quiet little business along the lake shore, and Barararia was synonymous with the Isle of Pines; when gens d'armes stood on the corners of the streets of New Orleans, and watchmen, with club, and rattle, and leather cap were not—in those good old days Vandooism was religiously believed in by all the colored population, and by not a few of those whose color should have been a warrantee of more intelligence. For years past the internal rites of this dark superstition have been conducted near New Orleans, only at long intervals, and with the utmost secresy. The police succeeded, in one instance, some twelve years since, in making a clean haul of the negroes, including the principal Fetish Man, old Obi Woman, natives of Africa, and all the charms, etc., used in the incantations. The negroes were severely punished, and a check given to the practice and the rites of the superstition.

We have heard of such scenes as these being enacted in or near Mobile by the negroes, but never until last night did we witness anything of the kind in this city. In company with a few policemen, we went to a house, situated beyond the gas-works, and occupied by an old negro, who claims to be an Obi man. Approaching the house very carefully, and peering through the crevices of the walls, a wild, weird spectacle was presented. Around a small fire of pine, in the middle of the floor—or room, for floor there was none—and over which was hung a pot, sat a group of negro men and women, entirely naked, their hair or wool twisted into pig-tail curls, and ornamented with sprigs of some kind of herb, intermingled with dried roots, their eyes closed, the master of ceremonies, or High Fetish Priest, with a snake skin around his neck, and his wool grizzled with age and garnished more profusely than the rest, was chanting something in a droning voice, while the remainder of the "congregation" responded, as it were, with a low and a long drawn howl. The old negro with the snake skin clapped his hands, and the whole party rose, and commenced a most furious stamping in a circle around the pot.

This being over, they all squatted down again, and the Obi man resumed his chant, at the same time holding in his hand a covered basket, from which he drew and dropped into the pot, first a dead snake, next a frog, then a young alligator or lizard, and last of all the herbs and roots of his own and the heads of other negroes. Silence was observed by all for some minutes after the last deposit had been made, after which the pot was taken from the fire, and while the nauseating mixture was yet reeking hot, they each dipped the end of the middle finger of the left hand into it, and applied the end of their finger to their tongues; another dip into the pot was taken with the middle finger of the right hand, and certain cabalistic figures described on the breasts, foreheads and shoulders—one assisting the other in the operation. Not a word was spoken until their clothes had been resumed and they had got clear of the house.

Although on high occasions the Fetish, or Obi man, may demand a human sacrifice in his inhuman rites, and which sacrifice is generally a young child, nothing of the kind was attempted in the Vondoo pow-wow of last night. The presence of the police would, of course, have prevented anything of this nature, had it ever been thought necessary by the old negro conducting the affair. Old negro women were sometimes "used up" as "material" in these meetings, at Vondooton, near New Orleans, one of whom escaped the sacrifical knife, on one occasion, and caused the arrest of the whole gang.

The Abbe Domenech, in his "Missionary Adventures in Texas and Mexico"—a translation of which, from the French, has just been published by Longman & Co., Paternoster row, London—gives some strange particulars relative to a sect alleged to be in existence in those climes. The reader must form his own opinion after perusing the following extracts from the priest's work:

"A European living at Matamoras had seduced a Mexican young woman, under promise of marriage; but at the moment of the marriage ceremony he began to hesitate, and ended by retracting his engagement. The girl's parents manifested no symptoms of resentment, but to all appearances they continued their social relations with the seducer, who was soon persuaded that all was forgiven. One day, however, he was invited to dine; and after dinner giddiness, accompanied by violent headache, seized him. He cried out that he was poisoned, escaped, and made the best of his way to fling himself into the Rio Grande, opposite Brownsville. At this point there are always passers-by, promenaders and barilleros. He was rescued from the water, his life was saved, but his reason was gone. Picked up by a Frenchman, and conveyed home, he filled the house with cries of terror. Every one who met his eye was a poisoner. He refused to take any nourishment; he got away; flung himself once more into the river, and was once more rescued. It was then that a colored woman, who had lived a long time in Louisiana, declared that this derangement presented all the features of that which proceeds from the absorption of liquids, drugs, or perfumes, known only to the sect of the Vaudoux. She told how her mother becaume suddenly deranged after visiting the house of a Vaudoux; and declared, with confidence, that if the unfortunate could be prevailed upon to contract the promised marriage, his derangement would cease. The result verified the prediction; for after a visit paid by the young man, in a lucid interval, at the house of the young woman's parents, his reason came back, and the marriage was celebrated."

In reference to the sect of the Vaudoux, at New Orleans, the Abbe says:

"I was told the following, regarding some of their ceremonies, as they are often celebrated at New Orleans, at the Suburb Treme, in an isolated house, surrounded by a fence of boards, and one storey high. One room composed nearly the whole house. At the further end of it, towards the east, was raised an altar, covered over with red woollen cloth. This altar was hollow, and filled inside with rattlesnakes, congos, and other venomous reptiles, which would crawl out during the dance, glide about the room, and entwine themselves about the persons of the dancers. The Vaudoux undress, without doubt, in a closet on the ground floor, for they enter quite naked by the door to the left of the altar. There they join hands and form a ring, while a negro takes his post in the centre, burns in a perfuming pan a substance that diffuses a thick white smoke through the room, stoops to the floor, perhaps to trace certain cabalistic figures, takes five serpents off the altar, and folds them round his neck and limbs. The ring then puts itself in motion; and the whole company, including the negro, twist and jump about for a considerable time. At length the lights are put out, and the noise ceases as darkness comes on. This sect inspires such terror into the colored population and the negroes who belong to it, that you cannot get them to procure personal and direct information regarding these mysterious practices. I have seen, at New Orleans, in the streets of the Suburb Treme, boxes of tinned iron full of oil, and containing a square-cut stove, the size of which varies with the box. They were placed at nightfall on the window-sills; but it was long before I could get any person to explain to me the reason for the boxes being there. No one remarked them; and it was only during the latter days of my stay in Texas that I found them out to be specifics against the witchery of the Vaudoux."

THE FIREMEN IN GRAND PROCESSION.

We have before illustrated the different firemen's processions that have occurred in various cities, but never have we been called on to give to the public one that could in any degree compare in splendor and numbers, to that which turned out in Philadelphia on Monday, the 10th of October. As an introduction to its importance, we need only say that the line was seven miles in length and took four hours to pass any given point.

From the East, from the West, from the North and even from the South, came the delegates and companies, hose and engine, steam and hand power, with music and without, enthusiastic and proud, they came to join with their Philadelphia brothers in this parade, perhaps the last they will ever make, as Philadelphia is about following in the footsteps of New York and re-organizing her Fire Department.

The day of the celebration broke gloriously over the city, and all the three previous days and nights the different companies had been pouring in, until every hotel and boarding-house was crammed to repletion. Strangers unless they had friends at court, stood a bad chance of accommodation. An ordinary strong hook to hang one'sself up by, or a comfortable place on which to stand all night, for laying was out of the question, commanded nothing less than $5 in greenbacks. All the previous night the streets were vocal, not with "clank of hammers closing rivets up," but with the tramp, tramp, tramp of lodging-seekers, or red-shirted boys on hospitable thoughts intent.

At 8 o'clock the ladies began to show upon the streets, and at 9 the streets were almost impassable on the line in which the procession was to move. At 10, it did move in 22 divisions, each numbering from four to six companies, making a total of 114, included in which were 30 visiting companies. All the steam fire engines of the city—35 in number—were out, and many of the companies displayed for the first time entirely new machines.

A feature in the procession were the ambulances built by the firemen during the war to transport sick and wounded soldiers. Many of these were got up elegantly, not only as regards comfort, but decoration.

The line of Broad street for two miles was one dense mass of spectators. Every window, every stoop and eminence was crowded. On empty lots stands had been erected, and seats commanded high prices. It was estimated as the line passed this street that 12,000 firemen were in procession, with all their machines and paraphernalia. Some of the engines seemed a moving mass of flowers, while the gay silken banners waving in the wind added wonderfully to the beauty of the scene. Another item was the dogs, many of which, belonging to the different companies, marched along in line with all the gaiety and pride of old firemen.

The procession did not cease moving until nearly 9 o'clock in the evening. At night the city was splendidly illuminated, and from almost every hotel and engine house the bands discoursed music. The day ended with the most excellent feeling, and not an accident or circumstance occurred to mar it, or anything to disturb the festivities.

PICKEREL FISHING.

"The melancholy days have come, the saddest of the year," as Bryant sings, and with them has come the season for pickerel fishing.

Pickerel fishing may justly be called the piscatorial sport of America. There are but few localities in which that delightful and gamey fish is not found, and but few followers of the rod and reel who are not posted in its ways and habits and somewhat adepts in the modes of entrapping the graceful and savory swimmer of our fresh water seas.

Fishermen frequently fall to loggerheads about the pike or the pickerel, but it is simply on the designation. The English pike is identical with our pickerel, but the fishers upon our northern lakes have a fish which they call pike, but which is not even first cousin to the green and golden-backed pickerel of the ponds.

The pickerel is one of the most ravenous of fish, and for that he gets the name of the fresh water shark, but this hungriness making him bold, also makes him an easy prey to the angler, who has several ways of entrapping him, the favorite of which is trolling, or spoon fishing, though sometimes this method is followed with line bait, or minnows. A celebrated English fisherman gives this as a well tried mode by which he declares that he loses less fish than by any other:

"To have a float made of cork, six inches in diameter, cut thin. Through the centre of this a white peg is driven, with a wire loop at each end. Having sounded the depth of water, and baited the hook so as to hang just clear of the bottom, which can easily be regulated by the wire loops through which your line has been passed, fix the line by giving it a turn or two round the end of the peg above water; and fix the end on the shore either by pegging it or tying it to a bough. In this manner you can attend to six or eight lines at once, so increasing your chances of fish."

This may seem a tame way of fishing, but it is much like our American mode of raft fishing, wherein a dozen lines are kept going at once by one man.

The favorite places for pickerel in the neighborhood of New York are Lake Hopstacong and Greenwood Lake in New Jersey, or any of the ponds or lakes of this State, in almost any of which, at this season, a skillful fisherman will catch 100 pounds in a day.

A Remarkable Story.—In the steamship Bellona, Capt. Dixon, just arrived at New York, were two steerage passengers, concerning whom a thrilling incident is related. Franz Meyer, aged 23, and his wife, Anna, aged 19, from Canton Soleure, Switzerland, were passengers in the ill-fated ship William Nelson, recently destroyed by fire at sea. In the confusion incident to the efforts to save life, the husband and wife were separated. The husband was picked up by one of the ship's boats, which was soon fallen in with by the brig Mercury. The wife, young and enceinte, was not discouraged at the uncertainty of her husband's fate, but prepared for her own safety. Self-preservation could not suppress her womanly instincts so far as to ignore the feeble cries for help from an infant only 14 days old, left to perish by its distracted parents: but, regardless of her own state, she plunged, with her half-imposed charge, into the sea. For two whole days did this brave young girl support herself and the infant on the remnant of a ship's spar, without food or water, sustaining the infant's life by the moisture from her own mouth. Late on the second day the same vessel in which her husband was saved, having ceased cruising, without hope of rescuing more life, fell in with this heroine and saved her and her little charge. Eventually the family were landed at Havre, France. The Prussian Consul at that port took charge of the infant, as its parents were supposed to have been lost with the wreck. Many ladies at Havre interested themselves to enable this brave young creature, with her husband, again to venture to cross the Atlantic in search of a Western home. Destitute of everything necessary as an outfit, having lost all, the kindness of the ladies at Havre was, doubtless, most acceptable; and on the Bellona, although poverty was apparent, a remarkable cleanliness in the family was quite noticeable. This heroine of real life, during her recent voyage in the Bellona, gave birth to a child. She is a real object of interest to the benevolent ladies of New York.

Army Badges.—The subject of army badges is one that lies near and dear to the hearts of our returned soldiers, and is one of those bits of excusable pride, that will act through all time to come as a connecting memory with the great past. The soldier will have and cherish the especial badge of his corps as a certificate of his service, and wear it on his breast as a means of recognition when the linements of the face have so changed from time, and the gentler arts of civil life, that his comrade in arms may not recognize him on meeting. These beautiful souvenirs of the past are elegantly got up in every conceivable material and style, but none that have been offered to our soldiers, equal those of Hayward, 208 Broadway, who has brought art so to bear upon his work, that he has been enabled to surpass everything else of the kind. That it is so, is evident by public appreciation, orders for his workmanship pouring in from every part of the country.

A Key to Southern Prisons of United States Officers, has just been published by John A. Gray and Green, corner of Frankfort and Jacob streets, consisting of 31 engravings, with descriptive matter, by O. R. Dahl, who was a tenant of the different Southern prisons he illustrates, and took them on the spot. It not only has the merit of being true and graphic, but it will always be regarded as a link in the history of this rebellion much wanted.

What a Beggar Ate.—The Boston Herald informs us that one day, towards the latter part of last week, the wife of a citizen, residing not far from Dover street, was called upon by a mendicant, in the shape of a man some 50 years of age, who told a pitiful tale of hunger, and solicited a dinner. The kind-hearted woman allowed him to enter her kitchen and seat himself at a table, upon which she spread various eatables. The man masticated and swallowed the following articles: About a pound and a half of cold corned beef; seven cold potatoes of middling size; five wheat biscuits; half a loaf of baker's brown bread; four cucumbers, sliced: three large tomatoes, ditto; half a muskmelon; and one whole pie. He sat at the table one hour and ten minutes. Faint hopes are entertained of his recovery.

MAJOR-GEN. MANUEL DOBLADO.

One of Mexico's most distinguished generals and statesmen, died at his late residence, No. 39 East 13th street, New York, age 53 years. Gen. Doblado was born in the town of S. Pedro Piedra Gorda, in the State of Guanajuato, in the year 1812. At an early age he gave such proof of his ability and future distinction, that he was selected by the Common Council of his town and appointed to college under their own supervision and expense.

MAJOR-GENERAL MANUEL DOBLADO.

As early as 1836, Gen. Doblado gave indications of diplomacy and forethought. Discussing with his teacher, Don Lorenzo Avellano, the war which his government was to wage against Texas, he maintained that Mexico was in danger of an invasion from the United States, and that the best policy for Mexico would be to sell Texas to the Americans, as she sooner or later would lose it, which event was confirmed ten years later by the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Belonging always to the liberal party, Don Manuel Doblado has served his country faithfully in the capacity of Governor of the State of Guanajuato, Secretary, and subsequently Judge of the Supreme Court, and in many other positions of trust and importance.

His ability as a statesman was well known to the French, as was proven by the following fact: Marshal Bazaine wrote to him, inviting him to join the empire in its scheme of intervention in Mexican affairs. Gen. Doblado asked an interview with the French general, at the same time informing his government of the proposition which had been made him. But Gen. Bazaine declined the interview, his reason being (as is shown by an intercepted letter from him to Napoleon) that he "preferred fighting to discussing with Gen. Doblado."

When the allied armies of England, France and Spain, under the Convention of London, went to Mexico in 1861, Gen. Doblado filled the position of Minister of Foreign Affairs. In that capacity, in February, 1862, he made, with the representatives of the three powers, the famous treaty of La Soledad, in which it was agreed that in the event of hostilities being resumed, the allied armies, which then were allowed by the treaty to occupy healthy quarters in the interior of the country beyond the stronghold of Chiquihuite, should retire to their former positions. The French, although Count Saligny and Admiral Julien de la Grevtiere signed the treaty, violated it immediately, by advancing on Puebla, where they were encountered and defeated by the Mexican army under Gen. Zaragoza.

Gen. Doblado removed some time ago to this city, where he was still serving his government at the time of his death. He will be deeply mourned by all his republican countrymen, for in him they have lost one of th ir greatest statesmen.

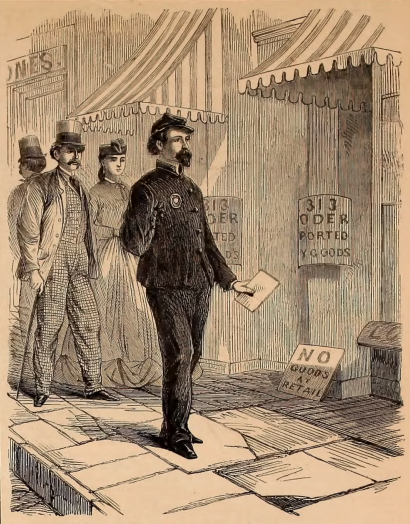
THE SOLDIERS' MESSENGER CORPS

Is one of those good things that have grown from the exertions of the Sanitary Commission through their branch, "The Protective War Claim Association."

It was organized about two months since for the purpose of giving employment to one-armed soldiers who have honorable discharges. So far they have started 23 of them, and in consequence of the success of the enterprise, they are about to make arrangements to organize on a large scale, until they number 1,000. So far it has been only one-armed men, but as the corps grows, it will embrace any discharged soldier who seeks such employment. It has scarcely yet had time for a test, but so far, the earnings of the men reach from $1 to $1 50 per day, with a constant increase. Those established to this time have been in the lower part of the city, and their scale of charges are as follows: To Chamber street and below, 10 cents; to Canal, 15; to 10th, 20; to 23d, 25; to 34th, 30.

Each messenger has to report at the central office, 35 Chamber street, every Monday, that it may be known that he is on duty, and how he is succeeding. The appointments of messengers are made upon their showing an honorable discharge, producing testimonials of character, and getting security, or endorsement to a document reading in this wise. Having done this, they are at no expense whatever, the uniform, etc., being furnished free, and each messenger bearing with him a card from the main office, setting forth his claims:

New York, ... 1865.



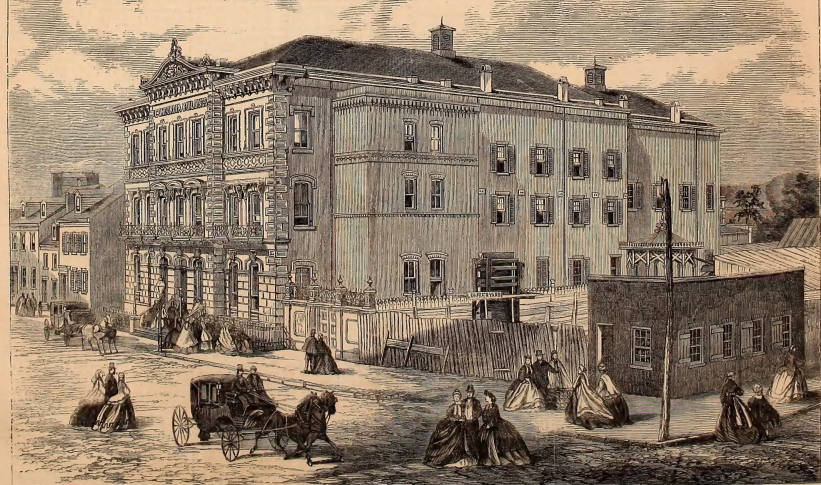
This is to certify that we are acquainted with .....
.....a Disabled Soldier, and that we know him to be temperate, industrious, honest, and trustworthy, and that we hereby recommend him for a position in the Soldiers' Messenger Corps.

And should said ..... receive such appointment, we hereby agree to become responsible to the Soldiers' Messenger Corps for the return of the Uniform furnished gratuitously to said ..... or to pay to said Soldiers' Messenger Corps, the sum of fifteen ($15.00) dollars, the cost price thereof, in the event of said ..... resigning, or being discharged from said Corps.

.....

.....

A French gentleman who was caressing a dog, one day, remarked, "I love de dogs, de cats, de sheep, de pigs,—in short any ting vat is beastly."



THE SOLDIER'S MESSENGER CORPS.

THE CONCORDIA.

The Germans of Baltimore have added to the architectural beauties of that city an opera house, which they have called "The Concordia," an elegant building now, nearly finished.

The Concordia is situated upon Eutaw street, with a front of 70 feet, and 160 depth. Of its architectural style and beauty, each person can judge by our illustration.

The main hall is 87 feet in length, and 68 feet in width, and will be finished in the very highest style of art. The balance of the building is occupied with dressing and exercising rooms, a gymnasium, library, refreshment rooms, and various apartments that render it the most complete affair of the kind in the country. With the faculty of the German population for enjoying themselves, it will be strange if they cannot do it in such a palace as that just built.

CONCORDIA BUILDINGS, BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

PICKEREL FISHING.

THE TOKEN.

BY SARAH HOWARD WEBB.

ONCE, in a desert region, drear and lone,
A cloister rose, of dark and massive stone;
Whose inmates were a holy brotherhood,
Whose fame for prayer and penitence had stood
Above all others, and whose chiefest care
Was still for their last summons to prepare.

Shut in by vast old woods and savage rocks,
They dwelt secure from earthly passions shocks;
So near the pearly gates of their blest home,
That oft celestial messages would come
Through the bright portals—and at midnight hour,
When the deep, solemn bell from moss-grown tower,
Would summon from their lowly cells to prayer,
The pious brethren, angels met them there.
So very near were they allied to heaven,
So much from earth was every pure heart riven,
That their great King, a token sent of love,
When He would call them to His courts above.
A token reach'd by shining angel hands
Of loving welcome to immortal lands—
A pledge of life eternal, and of peace—
A mystic emblem of a soul's release
From pain and sorrow, to a clime all fair,
Where naught is heard of woe, and naught of prayer;
But praise, and joy, and endless bliss are won
By alms and penitence in this life done.
And when the time would come, that one must pass
Through the dark door of death unto his last
And long-desired home, in that bright land,
A pure white rose plucked by an angel hand
Was dropt upon his seat; and meekly there
Received it, when he came to midnight prayer.
Once, as they enter'd at their wonted hour,
The pale and lovely rose, that mystic flower,
Lay on the seat of him—the youngest there.
Why does he start aghast? why that dread stare
In eyes so mild? Oh! can it be for him?
Must he pass through the portal sad and dim
Of the dark grave! just in life's glad bright morn?
Oh! rose, thou bear'st for him a piercing thorn!
He is not ready: life is all too sweet
For him, death's silent messenger to meet
Without a shudder; his dim lonely cell
Could not youth's aspirations wholly quell;
Fasting, and vigils, have not chill'd his blood—
Why this untimely call to meet his God!
Why should he be taken, while the ripened saint
Longing to go, is left, all weary, faint,
And ready for his change to bliss on high—
While he—oh, no! he could not, could not die!
He glanced around, none had the token seen,
None knew that on his seat it e'er had been;
An instant, and its pearly petals lay
On his next neighbor's, who, all bent and gray,
Beheld it with calm joy; a sweet release
That called him to a home, where all is peace;
Reverently in his bosom placed the flower,
And to his cell retired, to wait the appointed hour.
Woe! woe! the convent's bell tolls out for both,
The aged saint, and he, the youth so loath—
One, sank all gently, in the arms of death,
The other in fierce agony resigned his breath,
In terror, and in anguish, in despair—
And the white rose with all its petals fair
Besprinkled o'er with blood is lying there
On the still'd heart, to rest beneath the clod,
While the affrighted spirit soars to God.
Never again, did holy angels bear
The pure sweet token to the brethren there;
Silence and sorrow settled o'er the scene,
They passed from earth, as they had never been,
One, by one, mournfully and still—
And naught is heard, save the low murmuring rill,
Where once the midnight mass swell'd on the air—
Naught seen, but mouldering ruins scattered there;
The moonbeams glimmer through the crumbling wall—
Decay, and death, and silence—that is all.

LET WELL ALONE.

CHAPTER I.

IN one of the pleasant parlors of the Clarendon Hotel, somewhere about ten o'clock at night, there were seated, at a table well stocked with fruit and wine, three gentlemen, whose style of dress and easy manner were sufficient evidence that they belonged to the first class of New York society. So indeed they did, for the oldest of the three, a man about thirty-five, was a well-known banker of Wall street, famous for the costly dinners he gave at his splendid mansion to his male friends, for being a bachelor he was necessarily limited in his invitations.

Delmont was a man of the world, and looked it. His father had retired from the influential firm he had established, leaving to his son its entire management and profit. Despite his love of pleasure, he was an admirable man of business, and had been so successful during the last five years, that he had doubled his originally large fortune.

The second of the group was Beaufort, a singular compound of earnestness, frivolity, fashion and good temper. Six years ago he had married a most lovely woman, and it would appear that the absence of children had only been the means of increasing their mutual attachment.

The third and last, was a man, evidently not more than twenty-five, although the glittering "shoulder-straps" of a colonel decorated either shoulder. It was Charles Seymour, a gentleman beloved by the many, hated by the few, handsome, accomplished and brave; yet with all his good qualities, he was of a jealous and discontented nature, though nothing would have wounded him more deeply than to have hinted to him that his discontent sometimes approached even the confines of envy. Yet this was the fact, and he overshadowed, with a self-made gloom, much of life's sunshine.

He had been engaged to Miss Josephine Thornton for three years, but various circumstances had compelled him to postpone their marriage.

At the commencement of the war he occupied

"SIR, ALLOW ME TO OFFER YOU THIS UNEXCEPTIONABLE WEED,"

the position of 1st lieutenant in the regular army, for which he was well qualified, having received a West Point education.

He had made several campaigns against the Indians, and had the reputation of being one of the coolest and most courageous officers in the service, although imbued with many Southern tendencies, like too many of the gallant spirits who receive their education at the great military academy of America. But when the hour came, his sense of honor, and love for the Union, kept him faithful to the good cause, and he at once was actively employed.

Miss Thornton, his fiancé, was a brilliant, dashing brunette, with a small fortune, which was entirely under her control, as her parents had been dead several years. Seymour had nothing except the uncertain expectation of inheriting an uncle's wealth, and his army pay.

"So, Seymour, you've got back for fifteen days," said the banker Delmont, filling his glass for the ——th time.

"Yes, I tried for thirty, but it was simply an impossibility. They are rather 'too playfully fond of me,' down there, to dispense with my company very long," was the half sagacy, half laughing reply.

"Rather inconvenient, Seymour, to be such a favorite—in that quarter, but not in another."

"I don't understand."

"How about the Thornton?"

Seymour bit his lip.

"We won't talk of that, if you please. How is cousinex?"

"Capital; making money as fast as possible. I can't help it. The Canadian, here, wonders at my zeal, but I'm in a mill, and must go round when the wheel does."

"Perhaps you might wish to escape from the mill, if you had a wife like mine," said Beaufort, as gallantly as if the fair lady herself had been present.

"Perhaps!" and Delmont shrugged his shoulders incredulously, while the young colonel went off in a storm of delight, in which a certain young lady figured largely.

Fifteen minutes later, he was alone, and with their gay voices still resounding in his ears, the handsome soldier leaned his head moodily on his hand, and went off into another dream, or rather soliloquy, very bitter one this time.

"Why has fate been so unkind to me?" he questioned, in utality. "Am I less fitted to receive her love than either of those two men? Delmont is rich; Beaufort has a wife, next to Josephine the most charming of women, while I, for want of a few thousands, which Delmont would never miss, am compelled to risk my life hourly on the battlefield, without even the consolation of having Josephine my widow if I fall. Yes, if I fall she will forget me better, after all, that I should. What pleasure have I in life? I would rather be a hack-driver than what I am. He, at least, is independent. I suppose I ought to be; yet I don't see what I've got to be contented about. Now, if I was Beaufort, or Delmont! Heigh, ho!" and the young officer gave a most doleful sigh.

"However, I think I'll solace myself with a cigar"—examining a well-worn cigar case—"not one, of course; that's my luck!"—fining. "I'll go out and get one—must have one."

He had already risen and was reflecting on the peculiar appearance of his hat, when he thought that he heard the door open, and the next instant a very deep, but sweet and serious voice said:

"Sir, allow me to offer you this most unexceptionable weed."

Had his Satanic Majesty himself, appeared before Seymour with a cigar in his hand, he could not have been more startled. He turned around, and there, a little to the left, sat a pale, thin gentleman, in black, with a winning smile he repeated his offer, and held out a most tempting regalia.

"Who are you?" demanded Seymour, fiercely. "What do you mean by this intrusion?"

"I have come after you," was the serene reply.

"After me!" he was fairly staggered at the coolness of the fellow.

"Yes; don't get excited. I heard you bewail your fate, for your window is open, as you perceive, and I have come to help you. But, pray, take this cigar—it will compose you; then listen to me."

Seymour, whose indignation, strangely enough, had been gradually evaporating under the influence of the silvery voice of the stranger, mechanically took the cigar, mechanically lit it, mechanically puffed away for a few puffs—and then sat mechanically gazing at the mysterious intruder.

"I was attracted, my friend, if you will permit me to call you so."

Seymour made a gesture of impatience.

"No? have it as you will, then. I say I was attracted by the extraordinary eloquence of your regrets. I declare, I never heard a more touching Jeremiah," and the stranger paused a moment, smiling more sweetly. "But, alas! how little do we know what we ask!"

"I know what I have asked," replied Seymour, imperceptibly melted at both smile and tone.

"Permit me to differ from you. I know this from my own experience."

"Nonsense!" ejaculated the young officer, half inclined to eject the intruder with even less ceremony than he had used in entering, yet conscious that he was constrained to listen. "When I ask for bread, don't I want it?"

"Analogies always lead astray," said the stranger, drawing more from his pocket and lighting it. "You said that you would be happy if you were your friend's Beaufort or Delmont, did you not?"

"Certainly, I did. Is not one as rich as Cœsus, and the other the possessor of the loveliest wife in the city? If gold and beauty cannot make a man happy, he must be a fool."

The mysterious stranger drew a long breath at his cigar, and then slowly sent the smoke up into the air, where it formed a weird picture of a throbbing, human heart. He then threw himself back a little, and regarded Seymour with eyes, whose supernatural keenness were softened by a genuine pity. "No one knows the weight of a burden until he carries it."

"There are exceptions to every rule," was the dogmatic answer. "But I will tell you why I am tired of living myself, and why I maintain that Delmont and Beaufort are happier than I."

The mysterious stranger looked thoughtfully at him.

"You need not go to the trouble of a long explanation. I understand it all. But won't you take a glass of wine with me?"

As he said this, he drew a slender crystal flask from his pocket, and filling two glasses from it with a clear golden liquor, quietly handed it to the young officer, taking the other himself.

"How do I know that it is not poison?" inquired the recipient, suspiciously.

"Are you not smoking the cigar I gave you?" was the brief but significant answer.

"True."

And touching glasses with the stranger, he drained the one he held, as unhesitatingly as that individual himself, and then, with half pleasant thrill ran through his frame as he did so.

The stranger resumed:

"How do you know that Delmont is rich?"

"Because all the world says so. Is he not the great banker of Wall street? On this point I happen to be better informed than you."

"Well, suppose I should open him rich. How do you know that he is happy?"

"He cannot help being happy. I should be if I were rich," was the natural reply.

"You think so; but that does not prove that your millionaire friend is happy. Take my advice, forget Josephine and your cousin. Be content, and you will be happy."

"I would be content, most sapient of Mentors, if I were Delmont or Beaufort. I would make money enough for Josephine and I to be happy on all our lives."

"I have half a mind to try you," said the stranger.

"What do you mean?"

"That I am half inclined to punish you for your absurd discontent, and still more absurd wish to be somebody else."

"I suppose you mean to transmogrify—transmute Beaufort or Delmont into some one else—that is Delmont," and for the first time that evening, Seymour laughed heartily.

"You are a most unpertarnable stranger, "how would you like to be Beaufort, he has both beauty and gold."

"Beaufort, certainly. Mrs. Beaufort is a charming woman, and he lives in fine style; besides, they are so fond of each other."

"Then you would prefer to be no matter, I am used to it. Will you take another cigar?"

"No, thank you," tossing the remainder of the first with a flirt, "and, indeed, I am strangely drowsy. I think, sir, it is time you released me from the pleasure of your company. There is the door. I trust we may have pleasanter modes of address, but—really—I am so very—very sleepy."

Even as he spoke, his head dropped heavily upon the table, and in a moment more he was as soundly asleep as he ever had been in his life.

The stranger arose, walked to the sleeper, and laying a hand remarkably white and slender upon his forehead, uttered a few words, bent over him a moment, and then left the room as noiselessly as he had entered it, while the only sound that broke the silence of the apartment, was the heavy breathing of the young officer.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Seymour awoke the next morning, he found himself in a very handsome bedroom, lying upon a luxurious couch, whose downy pillows half stifled him, accustomed as he was to a soldier's pallasse.

At first thought was, that he was still dreaming, but on glancing around the room, and perceiving the portrait of a most lovely woman over the mantel-piece, he recognized it as Mrs. Beaufort, it flashed upon him that he must have drank so much wine the previous evening, that he had visited home with Beaufort, and been put to bed there.

After a good laugh at his obliviousness, and considering that he was now with the mysterious stranger in black simply one of the dreams of wine, he was yawning and discussing the propriety of getting up, when the door was opened, and Beaufort's valet, Jean, entered the room; in his hand he held a cup of creamy chocolate.

"I have brought you de chocolate, sare," said Jean.

"Much obliged to you, Jean, but I never drink that article," replied Seymour, politely.

Jean shrugged his shoulders. "Mon Dieu! you are très funny, sare," and he disappeared. "What can he have meant by saying that I was too funny," he exclaimed aloud, himself. In about five minutes Jean re-entered the room with all the materials for shaving.

"Now, sare, are you ready to be shaved?"

"Why, you impudent fellow, I have not shaved since the battle of Bull Run, and I don't mean to till the rebellion is put down. Do I look as if I needed shaving?"

"Vy, sare, you are too funny; I shave you every morning."

"That is a lie!" retorted the irate officer, and as he spoke he raised his hand to stroke his moustache, when to his horror, indignation and astonishment, he found that his face was almost as smooth as that of a girl of nineteen.

"What do you mean by this?" he cried, furiously. "Your master shall pay for this insult! Send him to me this instant!

Jean repeated his deprecatory shrug.

"Ah, sare, it is always so when you dine vid dat friend of yours, Seymour. His vine is très vife—très vinuscrus!"

"What! do you dare to tell me to my face that my wine is bad?"

As he said this he sprang from his bed, and the unlucky and astonished Frenchman would have suffered rather severely if he had not succeeded in escaping through the door, which, fortunately for him was open.

"It is well that I didn't catch the fellow!" he muttered, wrathfully, stalking to the glass. "Shave my beard! Well, that is cool."

So saying he drew near the glass, but almost staggered back the instant after. The face reflected there was not his own. He turned to see if Beaufort had looked over his shoulder, but no; there was not a soul in the room. He sat down, gazing fearfully into the glass, and then the interview with the mysterious man in black came over him. Rising, he began the room in a state of mind bordering upon frenzy, paler than he had ever been on the battlefield, and muttering at intervals between his clenched teeth:

"It was no dream! Good God! I am bewitched—I am bewitched!"

Pausing at last before the portrait of Mrs. Beaufort, the contemplation of her beautiful face restored him a little, and his native fun and fondness for adventure began to predominate over his amazement and horror.

"At least, if I am Beaufort, Mrs. Beaufort is my wife. I'll have a kiss. Ah! that reminds me! If I am B., and able to kiss Mrs. B., he is Seymour, and able to claim the same delightful privilege of Miss Thornton. Egad! that's not a pleasant thought. I'll go and warn her against him. In the meantime I must see Mrs. Beaufort," and in range they left.

Jean made his appearance.

"Where is my wife?"

"In de drawing-room, sare."

"Inform her that I wish to see her immediately, on urgent business."

Jean bowed and withdrew. In a few moments he returned with a note, which ran as follows:

"If Mr. B. wishes to see Mrs. B., he must come to her; but she would prefer Mr. B.'s making his communication to Mr. Horace Bell, Mrs. B.'s legal adviser."

The colonel was confounded.

"Ah! I see, my friend and lovers have had a quarrel. Please tell Mrs. Beaufort that I have a present for her which I think will please her."

"Very well, sare," and he again vanished.

The rustle of silk was heard, the door opened, and Mrs. Beaufort, as beautiful as an houri, stood before him, but with a look in her brow was corrugated into a frown, and the full red lips wore an expression of icy disdain.

"I had hoped, Mr. Beaufort," she said, haughtily, "that, after your brutal and insulting conduct, I should not again be compelled to enter your presence. I have only done so now to inform you that not a single thing this morning to arrange the terms of our separation. Your last villainy has decided me."

"My villainy!" cried her amazed listener. "Are you dreaming! What villainy?"

"What do you call an attempt to supplant your most intimate friend in the affections of his betrothed? Double villainy, too, in a married man."

"Madam!"

"Sir, not a word! Did I not read the superscription of a letter to her only yesterday. Your creature there," indicating Jean with a wave of her hand, "I think he said I knew your handwriting—I read it, as was my right——"

"And may I ask to what young lady you refer?" curiosity and a sense of personal injury beginning to banish amazement.

"To Miss Josephine Thornton. Have you so many attachments of that description, that——"

"My dear madam——"

He was fully aroused now.

"Do you mean to say, madam, that your villain of a husband has had the cool to insult my betrothed wife with one word of love?"

Mrs. Beaufort grew pale with passion.

"You have read the letter I am dead!"

It was too ludicrous. Everything but the absurdity of his position vanished, and a shout of irresistible merriment interrupted the exasperated wife.

"Sir!"

The young soldier could not resist the temptation of that face, its beauty heightened tenfold by the anger that flashed from the haughty eyes and the scorn that curled the proud lip. Even as she spoke he threw his arm round her waist, and gave her a hearty kiss before she was at all aware of his intentions.

The next moment a ringing slap echoed throughout the apartment, and with a scarcely articulate "This insult shall be avenged!" Mrs. Beaufort swept out of the room, leaving rather an unpleasant souvenir of her visit in the shape of a well-defined hand, in white relief, on the soldier's bronzed cheek.

For a moment he stood gazing after her with a countenance "more in sorrow than in anger," then sat down, and, scowling, with comic ruefulness, exclaimed:

"What a Tartar!"

A suppressed laugh fell upon his ear, and turning round he saw Jean. The thought flashed across him that it would be well to extract as much information as possible from the valet.

"Mr. and Mrs. Beaufort have a large very well."

This was not to be disputed, so Jean only said:

"I wonder, sare, you not give up making love to Miss Thornton when your wife like it not."

"Give up Josephine! Never with life!" cried Seymour, enthusiastically; then, recollecting that he was Beaufort, but Beaufort, he was about to proceed with his questioning, anxious to discover the extent of Beaufort's villainy; but Jean, imagining that his master was ridiculing him, would only bow and shrug his shoulders in a manner that highly exasperated his interrogator, who was losing his patience pretty efficiently when the door bell rang, and Jean was called from the room. In a few moment's he re-entered with a letter in his hand.

"Sare, here is a lettaire from the young lady herself."

Seymour snatched the epistle from the valet's hand, speechless with indignation at this evidence of his Josephine's treachery—yet a suspicious mist obscured the delicate characters even after he had opened the letter.

"Why was I not shot years ago?" he groaned mentally. "Little did I think to live to discover that my best friend was a traitor, and Josephine false to me—oh, my angel!"

The last ejaculation was caused by the perusal of her epistle. And can you wonder?

"Mr. Beaufort—If you ever dare to address me again on such a subject, your life shall pay the forfeit, for my affianced husband, Colonel Seymour, will not hesitate to avenge such an insult.

"JOSEPHINE THORNTON."

The happy man sprang to his feet, kissing the letter with a transport which Mrs. Beaufort could not have witnessed, while Jean rushed unnoticed out of the apartment to inform every one in the house that their master had received a letter from his lady-love, which had driven him mad, for he was kissing the letter, and had given him a greenback with two cool XX in the corner.

Mrs. Beaufort's indignation at Jean's communication was intense, and we are afraid that if her recreant lord had been near her he would have been treated to a fit of hysterics. We are not sure, in fact, that she was not contemplating a swoon—it looked very much like it—when the door half rang, and Colonel Seymour, coming down the stairs at the moment, anxious to try the effect of sunshine and outer air upon his new personality—stepped to the door and opened it.

The elegant Delmont stood before him.

"How are you, my boy? What! come to be your own Confessor—well! to be doctor-keeper in the halls of Beaufort than a dweller in—what's the name of the place?"

The colonel, who was really glad to see Delmont, replied with a laugh:

"Well! never mind where. How are you?"

"Oh! as well as any one can be after dining at Seymour's."

His host looked at his astonishment.

"Ah!" continued the banker, with a smile, "You may pretend to forget it, but you, yourself, have said a dozen times that Seymour gives such wretched dinners, and such bad wines that——"

"It's a lie!" retorted Seymour, savagely. "I'll have satisfaction for this. Insulting me to my very face!"

The banker's amazement was ludicrous.

"Why! my dear Beaufort!"

The word "Beaufort," recalled Seymour to his senses.

"Fool!" said he to himself. "I am not Seymour. Oh, that villain in black, and his accursed wine! What could ail me? I look a ghastly smile, "Excuse me. I forgot myself."

"I should rather think you did," was the answer. "But, as I was about to say, over and over again, that, if it were not for insulting Seymour, who is brave if he is a——"

"How dare you!" cried the officer's lips, but checked himself this time.

"What ails you this morning?" exclaimed the astonished millionaire. "You are like a cask of powder; any one look to you and you explode forthwith. But let us go to your smoking-room. I've some fine news for you. Poor Seymour! if he only knew how I was getting on with his lady love."

"Ah!" ejaculated Seymour, but he mastered himself sufficiently to give another ghastly smile, and then walk calmly to Beaufort's smoking-room, where he found Jean arranging the cigars.

"You may go, sare," said Seymour.

"Me fly, sare!" answered Jean, and crept away noiselessly.

Seymour slammed the door after his guest had entered, threw himself into a chair, took a cigar, and told his millionaire friend to take another, locked at himself in a convenient glass, and seeing there the living image of Beaufort, resolved to be careful, control his feelings, and personate Beaufort to the life.

And this self-control was needed, for then and there, he heard such a revelation of intended villainy as almost bewildered him. He learned that the Monday previous, Delmont had laid a wager of ten thousand dollars with Beaufort that he could compromise Seymour in Miss Thornton's book. Coolly, Delmont unfolded his plans, frequently alluding to Miss Thornton in a way that sent the hot passionate blood to Seymour's cheek, as he heard something worse than the rest, and forgetting prudence, everything, in his fury, he sprang at the banker's throat, like an enraged lion.

"Beaufort!—are you mad! you'll choke me," gasped the terrified millionaire, struggling to free himself.

The talismanic word, Beaufort, brought him to his senses, he relaxed his grasp, and threw Delmont from him as he had been a child, then seated himself in his chair, in a state of mind bordering on frenzy.

Delmont, opposite, glared on him for a moment, then hissed out:

"Beaufort, our friendship is at an end. Your wife, for the one she have advanced because due to-morrow; prepare to pay it, or I will strip you of your borrowed plumes. You rascally adventurer, all the world know that Beaufort is an impostor, a swindler and a beggar."

"You are right," was the bitter reply, "Beaufort is a swindler and a beggar."

"You seem to have an intimate knowledge of your own character," sneered the banker, as he rose from his seat.

"Perhaps so," replied the counterfeit Beaufort.

"Remember, you have no bitterer enemy than I, and also that I will have my money. You shall hear from me again," and he left the room.

For almost an hour after his departure the poor colonel sat, leaning his head upon his hands, almost bereft of reason. One moment he cursed the stranger in black, who had brought all this evil upon him; the next he reflected that if it were not for him he should never have known the villainy of his two friends, nor been able to save Josephine from their clutches, as he hoped to do now.

His reflections were interrupted by the entrance of the valet.

"Sare, a gentleman to see you."

"What is his name?"

"Colonel Strange, sare, I think he say."

"Show him in," replied Seymour, briefly, for he suspected his errand.

The colonel entered, and after apologising for the unpleasant nature of his errand, said:

"I have come on behalf of my friend, Mr. Delmont, to demand satisfaction. As you struck him, an apology is out of the question. His terms are that you meet him, the weapons to be pistols; or that you will allow him to horsewhip you in Broadway."

"I will meet him to-morrow morning, at five o'clock, at any place you may appoint," was the calm reply.

After taking a glass of wine, and conversing a few moments more, the colonel took his departure, apparently happy at the prospect of the morrow.

Once more alone, the young officer commenced to anathematize his own folly and discontent, which had brought him to the by no means delightful predicament in which he now found himself.

"And that black rascal who bewitched me, if I had him here, I would put a bullet through him in no time."

The words had scarcely left his lips, when three distinct raps were heard at the door, and to his satisfaction and yet horror, the mysterious stranger stood before him.

"You see I do not desert you in your misfortunes," observed the stranger, in a low voice. "Are you cured of your discontent?"

"I should rather think I was," replied our hero, with great bitterness. Here I am, about to be branded in all the papers by an enraged wife, have got to pay another man's note for some fabulous amount of money, and, lastly, to be shot at by a fellow to-morrow morning, for being somebody else. Here is a divorce, ruin and a duel, all through you."

"Rather say through your own folly," insinuated his imperturbable visitor.

"Well," was the impatient reply, "recrimination is in vain, can you help me?"

"Certainly."

"Will you change me back to Seymour?" questioned the delighted and excited soldier.

"In heart, soul and mind you are Seymour," was the cold reply.

"I mean strip off this cursed outer shape of that rascal Beaufort. I want to be myself again."

"That is more than I can do for you at present."

"What can you do?" eagerly inquired the soldier.

"What do you say to being Delmont? You can't be any worse off."

"Well, that will not mend the matter. He is as great a rascal as Beaufort."

"Yes; but he has not a wife, and is rich. You are to fight a duel to-morrow; Delmont is rich, and if you are transformed into him, you need not fight the duel. Beaufort is in debt."

"True," groaned his unhappy personator. "I will be Delmont, since you cannot restore me to my original shape."

"Reflect a moment. Remember, I do not advise: you may be worse off after the change than before."

"Impossible!"

"Then you are Delmont," announced the stranger.

After a silence, during which you might have heard a mouse stir, he then left the room as noiselessly as he had entered, while Seymour, looking in the glass, was startled to see there reflected the face of Delmont.

Taking up his hat to walk straight out of that house of perdition, intending to go down to the office of Delmont & Co., in Wall street, to draw a cheque for half a million, to be devoted to the lifelong comfort of himself and his Josephine.

CHAPTER III.

Pursuing his way down Fifth avenue, a thousand fears and speculations haunted him. While he had been Beaufort, who had that individual himself been? Now that he was Delmont, who was the bona fide D.? Were they one, or both, plotting against his Josephine? Perhaps even now she might be calling upon him for aid. The thought was madness. And walking rapidly to her well-known dwelling, he rang the bell and announced himself as Mr. Delmont.

Once shown into the parlor, where he had spent so many happy hours, his fears melted away, and he felt sure that all would be right after all.

In a few minutes Miss Thornton entered, and, forgetting his external appearance, he rushed to meet her, and was about to give her his usual greeting kiss, when he was recalled to his miserable reality by the young lady's indignant voice:

"What do you mean by this insult, sir? Leave the house immediately, unless you can behave yourself properly while in it."

The poor soldier turned away in despair.

"I came to warn you, Josephine," he said sadly. "You must believe me and remember what I say. Delmont and Beaufort have plotted against your happiness and honor."

"Are you mad, Mr. Delmont, to denounce yourself?"

"Yes, Josephine, I am mad, I believe. I am bewitched; I am not Delmont, but Seymour, your betrothed, who loves you better than his life. I have been metamorphosed ——"

"And you expect me to believe this, sir," cried the young lady, with flashing eyes, as she rang the bell violently. A servant entered.

"Show this gentleman the door, and do not admit him again," and she swept out of the room."

Cursing the mysterious stranger, the young officer followed the attendant, and left the house. Words cannot describe the feelings that swept like a whirlwind through his breast; he was only recalled to reason by observing his own well-known figure approach. He turned down another street to watch his own shadow. To his horror he saw him walk up the steps and ring the bell of the house he had just left.

Breathing an anathema against everybody and everthing, he hurried away, hailed an omnibus, and was soon put down at the corner of Wall street, from whence he walked rapidly to the splendid banking house of Delmont & Co., and passed through into the private room of the head of the firm. No one was there, but the next instant Sherman, his head clerk, came in.

"Sherman, I want some money to-day," he said, resolving to make hay while the sun shone.

Sherman shrugged his shoulders, and looked grave.

"Draw me a check," said Seymour, "for sixty thousand dollars, and I will sign it. Get me the money at once, as I expect a gentleman in half an hour."

"Dear Mr. Delmont," replied the old clerk with a look of dismay and anguish, "Have you forgotten that frightful balance sheet I showed you yesterday?"

"What balance sheet? We will talk of that after I have drawn the money."

"Sir, are you not aware that our account is already overdrawn from the bank?"

Had a thunderbolt fallen at the counterfeit Delmont's feet, he could not have turned paler, or given a greater start.

"Then I am a bankrupt; then I have not a cent at my bankers."

"No!" whispered a ghostly voice in his ear. "Did I not warn you of falling from bad to worse?"

Seymour glanced around with a shudder of fear, but no one was present beside himself and the old clerk, who soon broke the silence with—

"Honored sir, forgive me if I put a question to you."

"What is it?" said Seymour, gloomily.

The old clerk hesitated a moment, then said timidly:

"Is the note of Colonel Seymour for ten thousand dollars genuine?"

"Let me see it," cried the unhappy man.

"This," said the clerk, producing a promissory note for ten thousand dollars, payable at thirty days, purporting to be signed, G. Seymour, and due the day before.

"I never gave that note; it is a forgery!" cried our hero, indignantly.

"Alas! I feared so!" broke from the lips of the clerk. "We are ruined—irretreviably ruined and disgraced. Flight is now all that is left for us."

And overcome by his emotions, the old and faithful cashier of the great house burst into tears, and sobbed like a child.

A moment after, the door opened, and Beaufort's valet, Jean, entered the room. Making a very low bow, he advanced to Seymour, and holding out a letter, said:

"Monsieur Delmont, my mistress, Mrs. Beaufort, told me to wait for an answer."

The counterfeit banker looked at the note, fancied that he recognized the handwriting, and tearing it open, read as follows:

"Dearest Delmont—Send me a check for two hundred by Jean. I shall soon be released from my brute of a husband, and then shall place my hand at your disposal, you well know you have long had my heart. Meet me at the usual place.
"Marian Beaufort."

The colonel drew a long breath. "Here's another pretty discovery. What a precious set of rascals the human race are! How lucky I don't belong to it." Then the state of his finances sobered him. Taking a pen, ink, and a sheet of paper, he wrote as follows:

"My Dearest Marian.—I accede to your request with joy. I have given the sum you require to Jean, but cannot meet you at the usual time and place, for I am quite certain that we are watched. I will see you to-morrow at any place you may specify. Yours, Delmont."

Sealing this, he handed it to Jean, who, stowing it away in the depths of his vest pocket, departed.

The colonel gazed after him with a smile of malicious delight. "I think this will make me even with Mrs. Beaufort for her amiability this morning, and also repay Jean for his impudence. She will accuse him of taking the money, and, besides, be frightened at the thought of discovery. Beaufort will probably hear of it as well. Very good!" Then turning to the old clerk, he gently requested him to leave the room, as he wished to be alone. After his departure, the soldier threw himself back in his chair, and muttered:

"Fool that I am, why was I not content with being myself? I was happy, honest, single, and though poor, yet patience would have carried me through in the end. And what a hideous picture of fashionable society does my experience present? Beaufort and his wife, whom society quotes as models of conjugal affection, at daggers points—each false to the other, each as bad as the other. Delmont, whom all the world thinks a millionaire, is a bankrupt and a forger. Egad, I am in for it. A duel and a divorce were bad enough, but ten years in Sing Sing for forgery is worse, and the joke is that I shall be punished for forging my own name. Oh, that man in black! If I only had him here, I would strangle him if he would not change me back into myself."

Here his soliloquy was interrupted by a slight tap on his shoulder. He looked up, and lo! there was the mysterious man, who seemed to be the monster of his fate. His countenance was, however, unusually anxious, and in a low voice he said:

"Wretched repiner at the behests of Providence, fly! You have not a minute to lose—the officers of justice are coming even now. The forgery has been discovered. Reproach me not. I warned you."

Even as he spoke the door was burst open and Sherman rushed in.

"Fly!" he whispered, sharply. "The officers are here."

And the voices of strange men pierced through the thin partition, confirming his words.

"Where shall I fly?" cried the wretched Seymour.

"This way," replied the man in black, touching a spring in the wall.

The panel flew back to allow the entrance of the two, then resumed its former place noiselessly. Looking around him our hero found himself in a little apartment about five feet square.

"You are safe now for half an hour," whispered the stranger. "At the end of that time they will discover this place. I give you your choice: to await that discovery and its consequences, or to end your cares in this?" and he held up a small phial filled with some strange green liquid.

"Is there no escape?"

"None," was the icy reply. "You have brought it upon yourself."

"Then give it to me, villain!"

"Certainly," and the mysterious man watched his victim, with a look of ill-concealed delight, as he swallowed the deadly draught. But the look changed to one of surprise when a moment after the desperate man sprang at him with murder in his eyes.

"Die as I die!" he hissed in the stranger's ear, as he grasped his throat; but even as he spoke, his hold relaxed, and he fell heavily against the panel. The stranger smiled compassionately now, bent over the corpse, and vanished through the windows, just as the officers, hearing the blow, burst open the panel and entered the recess with a cry of triumph.

CHAPTER IV.

How Seymour became himself once more he knew not. Be this as it may, he still remembered his hideous experience as Beaufort and Delmont, and was full of thankfulness that he was Seymour again, even while he reflected on his disheartening prospects. For his old friends he now entertained the bitterest hate; nor was he totally able to exonorate his own Josephine. She had concealed from him the fact that both Beaufort and Delmont had been for some time attempting plainly to supplant one whom they knew to be her affianced husband, when it was her duty to have informed him; instead of doing so, he had the direct evidence of his own senses that she still continued to receive both these men with apparent cordiality. This was the most painful discovery he had made, for he would have rather had her cruel and merciless to them, than as merciful as she evidently was. At last he resolved to write a letter to her, upbraiding her for her withholding from him the villainy of the two he thought his friends—as for those two he never expected to see them again. Delmont he felt sure had poisoned himself in the secret recess, and Beaufort would not be likely to call again after his remarks upon him. He was about to write his letter to Josephine when, to his inexpressible indignation, the door opened, and Beaufort entered. But indignation was changed into amazement when his treacherous friend advanced, saying, as warmly as ever:

"Well, Seymour, how do you feel this morning?"

"Sir, your impudence astonishes me."

"What do you mean?" inquired the puzzled Beaufort.

"This," cried Seymour, excitedly, "that if you come near me, I will make you feel the weight of my arm."

Unable to divine the cause of the alteration in his old friend's manner, Beaufort stared, then went on pleasantly, supposing Colonel Seymour to be indulging in a bit of acting.

"Come now, for business. My wife has called for the fair Josephine."

The rage of his listener was intense, but controlling himself, he said:

"I wonder, sir, at your audacity in pronouncing that name after your behavior."

"What do you mean, Seymour?"

"How does your divorce case get on?"

"My divorce case?" echoed Beaufort, blankly.

"Yes, and why don't you pay Delmont what you owe him? You are the real murderer of that wretched bankrupt. Sherman, his clerk, confessed it to me yesterday."

"Seymour!" almost shouted Beaufort, "are you mad, or have you drank so much that you are unconscious of what you are saying?"

"Neither!" was the enraged reply. "Defend yourself, sir!"

But a voice in the hall at that moment paralyzed him.

"Don't trouble yourself, Sambo; I'll announce myself," and Delmont entered with a countenance as serene as usual.

The poor distracted Colonel turned away abruptly, and walked to the window, while Beaufort and Delmont greeted each other as if they had never been on the verge of fighting a duel.

"What are you running away for, Seymour?" cried Delmont, pleasantly.

"Am I not welcome, Delmont?" said Beaufort, in a troubled voice. "This is a very serious case. I came here half an hour ago, and find our friend Seymour nothing less than mad."

"Mad!" ejaculated Delmont.

The voice of the banker recalled Seymour to his senses.

"Wretch, forger, thief!" he cried, turning and confronting the astonished men. "How did you come back to life after drinking that poison."

"Sir!" was the polite reply. "It is you who have been drinking."

"Gentlemen, let me say a few words to you, and put an end to our present unpleasant state of ambiguity. When I gave that little dinner yesterday, I fancied I had two devoted and faithful friends. After they had gone, a tall, thin man in black came to me and offered to—"

At this moment the door of Seymour's outer apartment opened, and a couple of glorious laughs rang loud and clear like a beautiful bell, and two beautiful women entered. One was Josephine Thornton, the other Mrs. Beaufort.

"Here we are. Did you get tired waiting for us?" cried both together.

Poor Seymour! never was mortal more painfully bewildered. All his former friends, but now well proven enemies, were present. As Miss Josephine approached him, he said huskily:

"Miss Thornton, your presence here adds an additional torture. It is one I had not deserved or calculated on. Oh, Josephine! Josephine!"

"What is the meaning of this?" murmured the young girl, bewildered and terrified.

"The meaning is this," cried the now desperate soldier. "That I have discovered you all. Go on with your divorce, Mr. and Mrs. Beaufort. You must have been somewhat astonished that Delmont's letter did not contain the two hundred dollars you wrote for."

"The man is mad!" ejaculated the now indignant Mrs. Beaufort.

"Am I? Here is the letter, madam;" but it was not to be found. "You have picked my pocket," cried Seymour, bewildered.

"Sir!" exclaimed Beaufort, "this demands vengeance."

The two stood glaring at each other, when the mysterious stranger entered and placed himself between the two furious men. Fixing his eyes steadily upon Seymour he made a few mesmeric passes over him. A moment more and a gentle melancholy settled down over the young officer's face; his eyes lost their fire, and turning away he sank into a seat, pale, and apparently strengthless.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said the mysterious man quietly, "your friend is now restored to his original frame of mind. He has had a bitter experience, and he will be all the better for it."

"Explain," cried one and all.

"Certainly. Last night, passing the door, which happened to be slightly open, I heard Colonel Seymour bewail his unhappy fate. He longed to be somebody else—either a millionaire or a married man. I entered and mesmerized him. He has had a mesmeric trance, in which he has fancied himself some one else. He is now I hope quite cured of his discontent."

"Most decidedly," cried the now recovered officer; "if my dear friends will forgive me. The delusion is past, and Richard is himself again."

With a polite bow the man in black smiled at the ladies and walked out at the door like any other mortal. The next Sunday Miss Josephine Thornton became Mrs. Colonel Seymour.

In conclusion, we trust our readers will recognize and admire the moral of this romance, which is—let well alone, and be content with your condition in life, unless you, yourself, can make it better.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A lawyer having found a purse, and returned it to the owner, one of the papers says it may be honest and honorable, but it is exceedingly unprofessional. The delinquent defends himself on the ground that there was nothing in it.

A rich petroleum operator, gaunt as a skeleton, and ignorant as a hodman, went to an artist the other day to have his portrait taken.

"Will you have it taken in oil or water-colors?" inquired the artist.

"Ile, of course," replied he. "It comes to me more natural; and, besides, it makes me look fatter."

Heartless Attempt at Bigamy.—A gentleman, who was courting, on inquiry was found to be wedded to his own views.

A certain dissatisfied wife says that her husband is such a blunderer that he can't even try a new boot without "putting his foot in it."

Our rural contributor writes us word that he has enlarged his establishment, and now keeps a head of oxen, a head of hen, and several head of cabbage, while he is trying also to keep-a-head of the times.

The young lady who lost her little pink bow from her jockey-hat, has found a big brown one under a beaver.

Wanted by a bachelor jeweler—a wife with a neck of pearl, ruby lips, brilliant eyes, golden hair, a silvery tongue, and a perfect jewel of a temper.

A chaplain was once preaching to a class of collegians about the formation of bad habits.

"Gentlemen," said he, "close your ears against bad discources."

The scholars immediately clapped their hands to their ears.

Never look at the girls. They can't bear it; they regard it as an insult. They wear their feathers, furbelows and frills, merely to gratify their mammas—that's all.

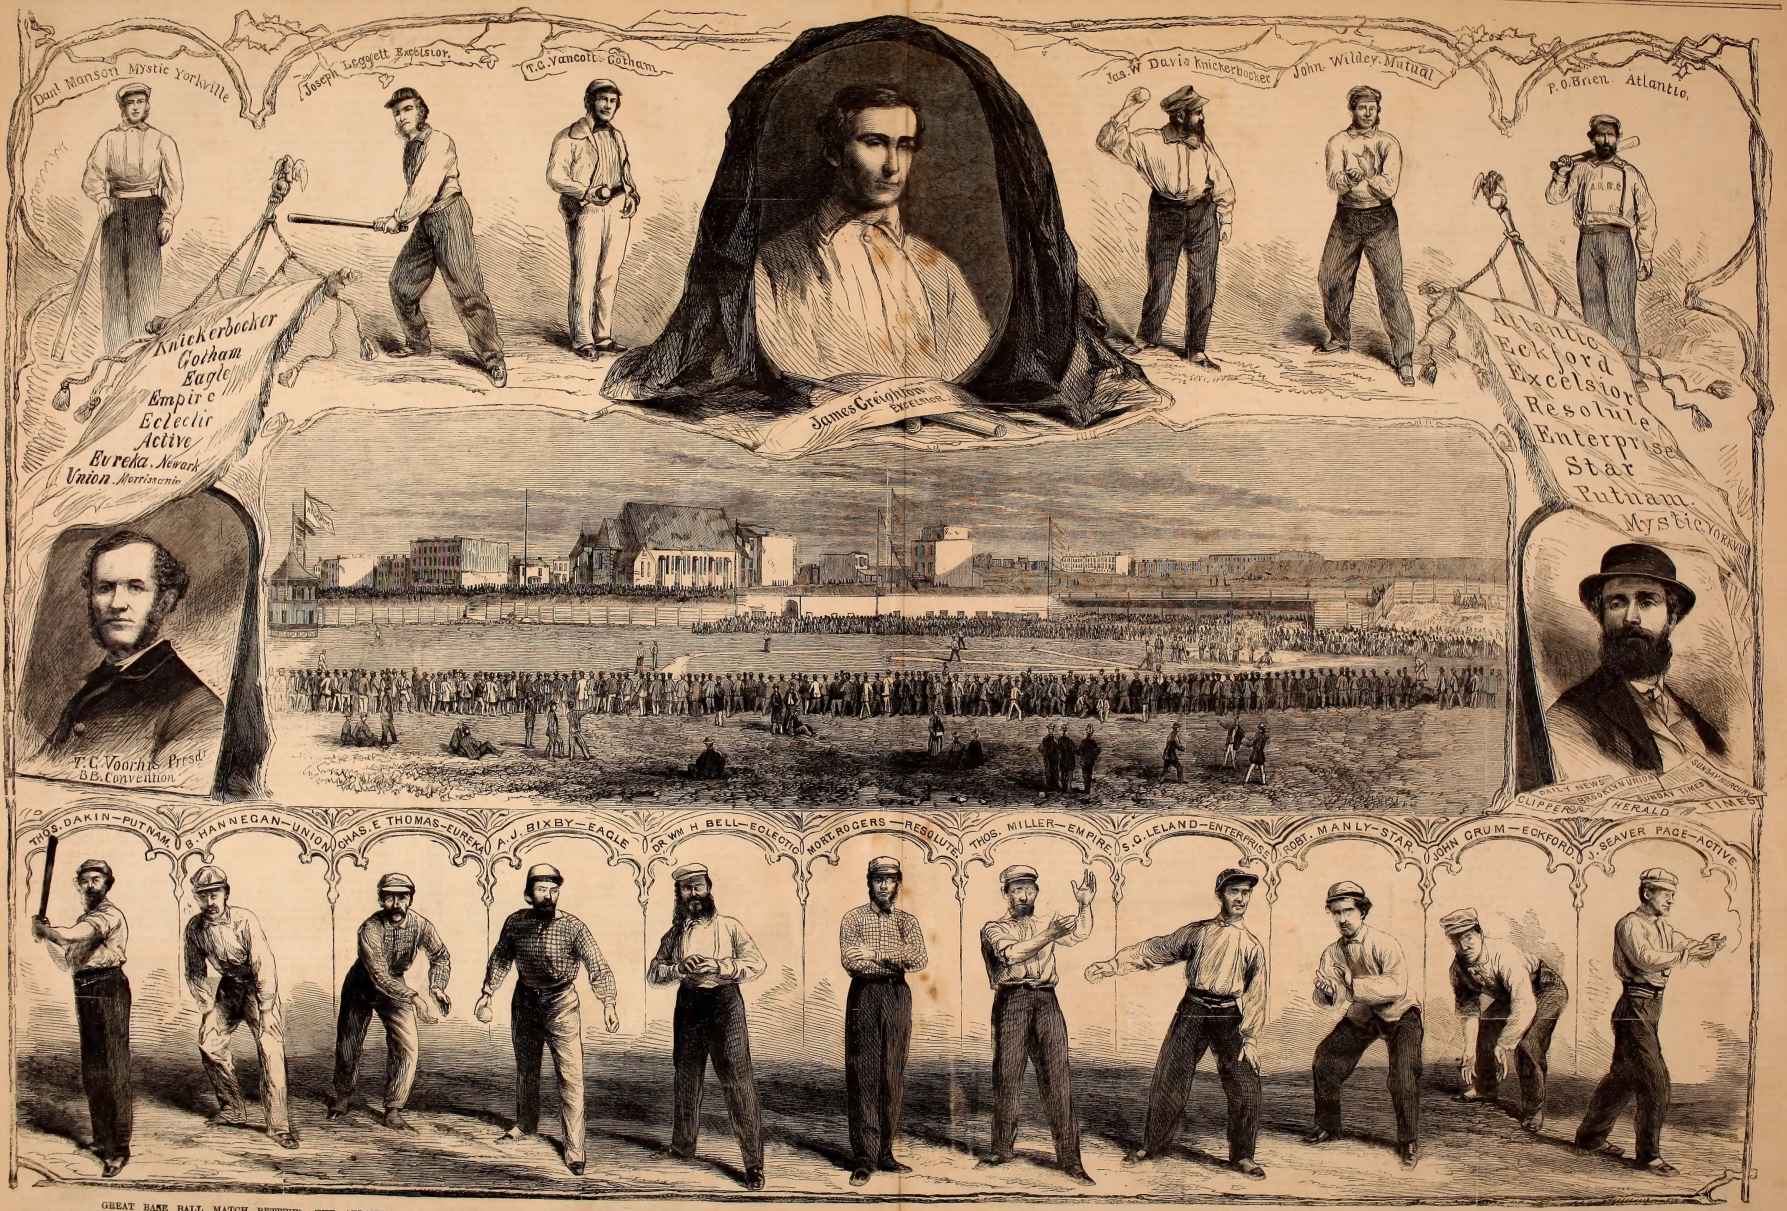
"Pa," said a lad to his father, "I often read of people poor but honest; why don't they say rich but honest?"

"Tut, tut, my son," said the father, "nobody would believe them."

The Place for Him.—"What do you intend to do with Jefferson Davis?" asked an Englishman of an intelligent returned soldier the other day. "It would be blasted cruel to be hanging him, you know. Now, what do you intend to do with him?"

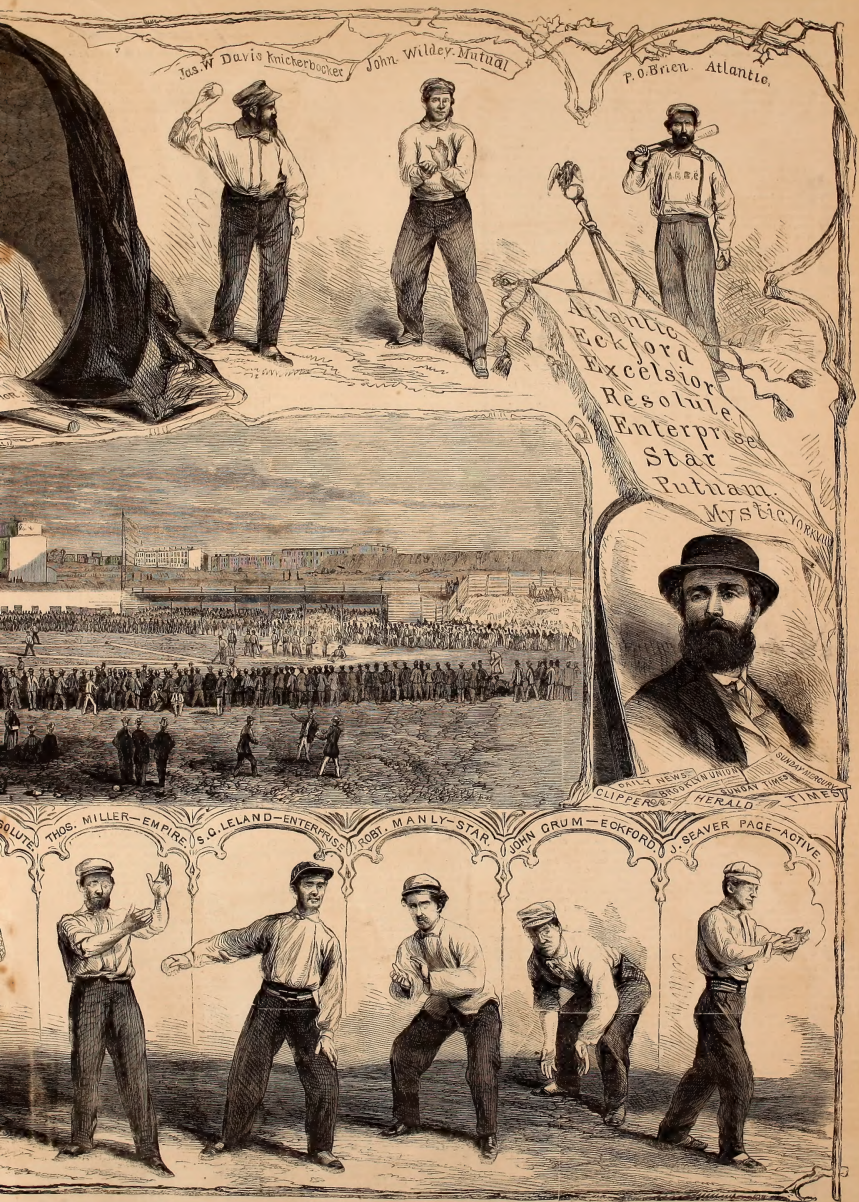
"Borrow St. Helena from Her Majesty, your Queen, and chain him there as you chained Napoleon, you know," was the reply. John Bull could not see the point.

A young lady, from the rural districts of Hoosierdom, lately visited Chicago with her beau. Getting into a city railroad car for the first time, she took a seat, while her lover planted himself on the platform, beside the driver. Very soon the conductor began to collect fare, and approaching the rustic maiden, he said:



"Your fare, miss?"

The Hoosier rosebud allowed a delicate pink to manifest itself upon her cheeks, and looked down in soft confusion. The conductor was rather astonished at this, but ventured to remark once more:



"Your fare, miss?"

This time the pink deepened to carnation, as the rustic beauty replied:

"Wall, if I am good lookin', you hadn't ought to say it out loud afore folks!"

GREAT BASE BALL MATCH BETWEEN THE ATLANTIC AND ECKFORD CLUBS OF BROOKLYN, AT THE UNION BASE BALL GROUNDS, BROOKLYN, E. D., OCT. 13, WITH PORTRAITS OF THE LEADING PLAYERS OF THE PRINCIPAL CLUBS OF NEW YORK, BROOKLYN AND NEWARK.

D., OCT. 13, WITH PORTRAITS OF THE LEADING PLAYERS OF THE PRINCIPAL CLUBS OF NEW YORK, BROOKLYN AND NEWARK.

WAIT FOR ME.

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

Wait for me, love!
When you reach the silent and silver strand,
By the banks of the river wide and grand,
That flows this side of the beautiful land,
Wait for me.

Wait for me, love!
I will journey on down the western side,
And meet you there by the mystic tide,
By the silent river, deep and wide,
Wait for me.

Wait for me, love!
When the boatman, silent, and cold, and pale,
Rows over his bark with its snow-white sail,
We'll leave together this sorrowful vale,
Wait for me.

Wait for me, love;
We will tread together the beautiful shore,
When the silent boatman rows me o'er.
To part, my darling, oh, nevermore!
Wait for me.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.—PHILLIS'S STRANGE SUBMISSION.

"Now, then," said Sleuth, addressed to his cousin, on the morning following the day of his gift in the aldermen's bed-chamber, "I can let you off with a clearer conscience to see to this matter of the alderman's grandchild. Tell the man to get out the gig to take you into London, and there you'll get the stage to Leeds. You and I will walk on a bit further, and the gig can overtake us."

"Very well," said Sleuth; "I'll be ready in a few minutes," and he went out, thus cresting fresh delay.

Sleuth had a little secret business to do before he started, which, if understood by Anthony, would have opened his cousin's obvious turn-bless. Sleuth had, for some time past, fixed an hour of the previous day for his departure, and carefully informed Phillis of it, and wished her good-bye when it came. Hence, when Phillis spoke to the peddler, she thought he must have gone; but later in the evening she saw him again, and saw that he lingered about in parts of the house where he might not expect to see Phillis. The idea of Sleuth's secret coat caused Sleuth's imagination. Yet he had not committed himself by a single word to Phillis that implied acknowledgment of knowledge or lost such a garment. Perhaps his continuing to act with the same reservation might be the one fact that would ultimately induce her cause to think of the matter as important, and then she would herself get rid of it, if she had it. He saw that; but he also saw that, if discovery were imminent, through her possession of the coat, then he might, by devotion to her, still keep off the ruin. And tossing between these thoughts, he was even now planning to try one last shot before his departure.

He went into the stable yard and ordered out the vehicle. While it was getting ready, he paced up and down where he knew Phillis must see him. Presently she appeared at the window, and gave him a rather sad smile. He returned it, after a furtive glance all round, with a look so full of devotion, that Phillis could not but again smile, and more genially.

When the gig was ready, Sleuth jumped in, took the whip and reins, and said to the man:

"I'll take it round to the front, while you fetch down a portmanteau and hat-box from my bedroom, but be quick."

Then, as the man ran off for the things, Sleuth drove away, with a parting wave of the hand to Phillis and the housekeeper, and so made Phillis believe he was gone.

But it so fell out that that young lady had been waiting for her lover's departure to get herself out of a difficulty. There was a man whom no one had seen enter the house, and who now met us a little room where no one was likely to see him, if he did not stay too long. The very instant Phillis had turned herself Sleuth was gone, she ran up to her bedroom, and took from her box the very brown paper parcel that had been seen by Sleuth, and which had set his speculations at work, slipped it under her gown, pinned it fast, but also held it there by putting her hand through the pocket-hole.

As she turned the corner, at one end of the corridor, in her breathless haste, whom should she see but Sleuth turning the corner, at the opposite end, running with equal speed and anxiety towards, no doubt, the same goal—her box—that Phillis was leaving.

Indeed! ejaculated she. "I did not anticipate this, but again I have caught him. What will he say now?"

"That's right, Phillis," murmured Sleuth, panting for breath. "I thought you'd understand me, and come."

"Understand you, Richard?"

"Yes, to be sure—that I wasn't going away all those days without—without——"

He hesitated so long to finish his sentence, that Phillis could not help echoing the word:

"Without——"

"One sweet kiss, to be sure, from my affianced wife."

Phillis looked at him a moment in doubt and reproach, forgot her parcel and the doubts and fears connected with it, and threw her arms round his neck, and wept, saying:

"Richard, I believe you deceive me, but I cannot help playing the fool too as I don't know it. God bless you and keep you true. I should be a desperate and wicked woman if you were to play me false."

And then, with something like real affection, Sleuth did take leave of her, inly cursing his unlucky fate, that compelled him to go with the mystery of that parcel still unsolved.

Not caring to let Anthony see anything of these little peculiar movements of his about the house, he accompanied Phillis down towards the kitchen quarters, intending to get out into the stable yard, and from thence re-enter the house to tell Anthony he was ready. But Phillis began to slacken her speed.

Always suspecting motives, because conscious how he was himself continually giving cause for suspicion, Sleuth leaped to the rash conclusion that there was something or somebody below he was not to know of. Of course, therefore, he persisted in his first plan, and was now hurrying in Phillis's face and attitude—the hand fixed in the pocket—that confirmed his expectation.

As they met some three yards from the stone passage in the basement, Sleuth thought he heard the faintest possible kind of a cough from a little room on one side—one of the offices of the house. But instantly Phillis began to talk to him in a somewhat loud and excited key, and upon subjects that seemed to Sleuth rather absurd, even though well calculated to keep up the idea of the social distance between herself and him if they should be overheard.

Had that cough been an intimation of some kind to her? Was Phillis making the person who emitted it aware that she was not yet alone?

"Dear me, Phillis, I never knew you had one in that room," said Sleuth, turning to look her straight in the face.

"Did you?" said Phillis.

She went in. But Sleuth did not wait for her report, but followed her. A man sat there—a small, insignificant-looking man, a common city burglar—for even that idea had just entered Sleuth's busy brain.

"Oh, I say, I forgot you! It'll be ready soon," said Phillis to the man. Then, turning to Sleuth, she said, in explanation: "He's going to take some things for me to a dyer—Sleuth's dad."

And then she returned to the passage, followed by Sleuth, who still noticed that hand in the pocket, and now also saw the bulky look of her dress.

Sleuth was obliged to accept her statement, whether he believed it or not.

"If," mused he, "it be only what she says, she won't mind letting the man have it before I go; if it be what I half fancy still, she won't risk anything of the sort. I must get to the bottom of this hold of the man and satisfy myself somehow, when once out of her sight."

Suddenly he had it, without the least notion of how to justify his words:

"Phillis, I have something to tell you, that I intended to tell you when I came in from walk. Give this man whatever he waits for, and let him go; and I'll run back here in a few minutes."

"And you will not forget?" she says, unstirred to venture to meet again while things are in this state between us—nobody knowing. Good-bye!" She slipped away, and Sleuth could only then return to Anthony, and meditate how still to lay hold of that parcel.

The two young men met out together, and happened to pass by a door that led to a gate in the wall, they were unnoticed. But Sleuth was just able, on reaching the high road, to see a man making very rapidly off with a small bundle, which was the identical parcel in brown paper he had seen in Phillis's box.

"Is it the right?" Sleuth asked himself, with painful misgivings that he had lost his last chance of securing that dangerous garment.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—WITH THE TIDE.

The early choristers have taken their places on the stone lions at the doctor's gates, and along the vried and fruit-laden wall of the garden, and are trying their parts timidly before the great anthem begins.

The little door in the wall is open, for the old gardener is there this morning, with his pot and pipe. Suddenly the little door is darkened by a form which he does not at first recognize. As soon, however, as he does, he starts, turns his chair away, and he perceives it to be no other than Mr. Anthony Maude, his brother's master, the wheelwright, whose acquaintance he has not yet made.

"Good morning, Branch," says the visitor. "How are you? You've been laid up, I hear."

Branch is much beholden to Mr. Maude for the inquiry. He has been laid up. Not only badly, were all for having his leg off, but Branch resisted the medical," and kept his leg, which he is thankful he did, as he would never have been spared to—— and his gray eyes wander over Mr. Maude's face and form, by way of finishing the sentence.

The little path by the fruit wall is delicately cool and shady, and Anthony is glad to loiter there a while. Branch, for he goes more slowly along, feeling half-pleased and half-annoyed with himself for having come. What excuse can he offer for coming so early? He has the newspaper, certainly, and it contains an account of the inquest, and speaks of "the admirable conduct of the learned doctor throughout the whole affair." But is the newspaper sufficient excuse? Anthony feels doubtful. He stands still on the path, poking with his cane at a piece of gum on a little drawer-knob, and reviewing his own private reasons for this early visit without much satisfaction.

There is a little fact connected with the path by the fruit wall, which, although Anthony does not notice it, it will be as well to mention. It is this: The mignonette, which borders it, gives out more scent than it would do if it had been merely shaken by the bees. Something else has stirred it this morning, bending down its pointed heads, and leaving the little path by the fruit wall full of odor—the bum of Clarissa's dress, which, if Anthony were not so intent on the cherry tree, he might see fluttering at the turn of the path. But he goes on poking at the gum, asking himself if he would not be in a better state to meet the "charming man" after a few glasses of wine, and deliberating as to whether he had not better now leave the newspaper with his compliments, and return to a comfortable breakfast with Mrs. Milton. Hementally follows Branch into the kitchen, and hears him give the name of his arrival, and hears the same news carried to the doctor, who, of course, will dispatch a servant instantly to invite the "charming man" to breakfast. Still poking the gum, Anthony imagines the "charming man" to have entered the breakfast-room, sees him having helped himself, and——

Anthony is slashing at the cherry tree with his cane so furiously, that there is a cry of:

"Mercy! mercy! Mr. Maude! My cherries! my cherries!"

And before he can recover from his shame at being caught in such a moment and warm rush of pleasure at the sight of her, Clarissa and he are shaking hands frankly, like old friends. Her beauty is so kind, and genial, and welcoming, that the "charming man" becomes a myth, and fades out of Anthony's path like the mists at the coming of the sun.

He has never seen her before, except in her riding-habit. How lovely he thinks her in her fair, unpuckered morning dress, fresh, simple, and graceful as the border flowers that have dried their night tears on its hem!

"Well, now you are welcome," says Clarissa, laughingly, interrupting him as he stammers an excuse for coming so early; "and as for an hour, I suppose I must take your apology as a hint that I have been neglecting you on having adopted our country habits so soon."

"Is it, then, a habit; are you always out so early?" asks Anthony.

"I don't know that I care to confess it to you if I am," answers Clarissa; "you city people are so fond of scandal, and so unkind."

"Do you know," observes Anthony "I think conceiving is one fault I don't possess—the only one, perhaps, with which to envy."

"Indeed I shall not," says Clarissa, quickly, "for if you are without that fault, you are without a great many others also."

Anthony looks pleased at her heightened color and earnestness. With a keen sympathy, he divines the meaning of it in an instant—sensitive shame of the country—and feels that he would give half he possessed to unsay a certain little word of three letters that he once said in connection with the doctor. But as that is impossible, he comforts himself by remembering that only Dick Sleuth heard it, and says to Clarissa:

"And now, may I know if you always take such an early walk as this?"

"May I know how my cherry tree has offended you?" she says, archly.

Anthony only laughs, as he does not feel he can say much on the subject of the cherry tree, and looks delightfully confused.

"This is a place after my own heart," he says.

"Do you like it better than your own?" asks Clarissa.

"A thousand times."

The blackbirds and thrushes sang their loudest and merriest from the tops of the walls; the rosary, Clarissa declared, had never seen such a blaze of beauty before. Anthony praised everything, and Clarissa thought him in every fresh spot she took him to see, that Clarissa could not refrain from taking him to all her favorite haunts.

There was the cool, rocky little nook, earthysmelling and always dark, she told him, till the primroses came; and Anthony never forgot that nook, but remembered it always gleaming with the primroses, and always dark, while she was telling him, her foot slipped, and she clung to him to save herself, only an instant, but that instant made Anthony feel as if he had already become a reality—a something that would remain with him as a great joy or a great pain. When they came out into the full light again, he was strangely silent.

"I am afraid we are making you keep too long a fast," said Clarissa. "Were you up very early?"

"Yes," answered Anthony, thinking of his restless hours with the same sort of interest that a man thinks of the first symptoms of a disease by which he is attacked.

"Three!" exclaimed Clarissa. "In that case I must remain greedy no longer. Look here what I have been gathering from you, and trying to get an opportunity to devour. I suppose I must share it with you now."

With much laughter and confusion Clarissa drew a cloth from her pocket, containing a piece of snowy bread.

"He who has always obliged to provide myself with," said she. "I find I can't survive on fruit alone till papa's breakfast. May I get you to pick some of those pears, to eke it out?"

Clarissa spread the cloth on a low wall on the side of the garden that looked down over the river. The breeze blew so freshly here that Anthony insisted on tying over Clarissa's head a little lace veil she had with her, and so absorbed was he in thinking how well it became her, that Clarissa had to remind him he was eating more than his share of the bread.

Then he declared he would eat no more, and Clarissa insisted on his walking on the grass, while she ate. As he turned away from the river with Clarissa, the very birds seemed to be singing the same refrain as the river—"With the tide! with the tide!"

The trees whispered it, and the fountain in the rosary echoed softly, "With the tide! with the tide!"

But the rosary is not empty; there is something in it besides the fountain and the statue. Anthony sees this something—sees it to be a man, a gentleman, lounging there. Clarissa sees him too, and then she and Anthony exchanged looks, and he cannot but notice that she looks embarrassed.

"A friend—Mr. Robertson," says Clarissa, in a low tone.

Mr. Robertson saw them, and immediately advanced. As he approached, with an easy, quiet manner, that had, however, nothing in it of affectation, Anthony scanned him closely, and saw a man probably older than himself, but not much so, and who was—as Anthony could not but acknowledge—in every outward respect his (Anthony's) superior; or, at least, if he did not exactly draw that conclusion for himself, he drew it for Clarissa.

Mr. Robertson bowed with extreme politeness as he and Anthony were introduced to each other, and Anthony could not, of course, but respond, while having his politeness would induce him, after a few words, to move off, and leave him and Clarissa to pursue their converse.

"Allow me, Miss Pompus, to conduct you to your father," said Mr. Robertson, offering his arm with the air of having been, in a sense, her lord and master from time immemorial. Clarissa took it; after a moment's pause, she said with a smile:

"You will go in, Mr. Maude?"

"No, no, I thank you. Excuse me to the doctor, and—— Oh, I forget; yes—please give him this paper;" and then Anthony could not find it, and being already terribly confused, and in a rage with himself for being so, stopped, and saw something like a smile in Mr. Robertson's face. He hunted no longer for the paper—he forgot it. He blood leaped to his cheek, and he was about to blurt out some very impolite remark, when he remembered himself in good time, and then, remembering Mr. Robertson's politeness, took off his hat, bowed low, and waited to let them pass, he and Mr. Robertson exchanging significant glances the while.

They moved away; and then Anthony, as he turned to take his solitary walk homewards, began to grind his teeth with vexation that he had come at all.

"It's nothing that I should make a fool of myself before a woman—a bitter coquette she must be—but that I should choose the time of day to betray the doctor's 'charming man' does, I confess—"

Anthony stopped what he was going to say, and shut his mouth with a click of the teeth, as to finish his sentence satisfactorily, made another lunge at the trunk, and did it so viciously that he broke his stick, and stood there with the broken end in his hand, laughing at his own folly.

"If the doctor, now, were to tell me it is I who am the coquette, I think of us would have the best of the contention?

"So that's he. Truly a most polite gentleman—Clarissa's father. I'll never speak to her again; no, never. She is evidently playing the fool with me."

But, even in his anger, he knew by instinct just the spot where the trees would give him one more glimpse of her, and he stood still and looked.

There they stood, looked back; but, unlike Lot's wife, was left still in the flesh, to feel all the bitterness of repentance for his error.

There they stood, Clarissa and her friend, on a corner of the lawn, laughing as if they would kill themselves. He looked at them a minute, and then, in rage and pain too bitter to find vent in words, scrambled towards the great gateway where Branch, with rake in hand, stood like a rude medieval rat-representation of the angel with the flaming sword. And so Anthony passed out of his Paradise.

"No, I'll never see her again!"

And Anthony, as he strode through the pretty Eddington lanes, in making this assertion for the fiftieth time, turned and glared defiantly at a miserable laborer, "shock head" fellow, as if he thought it seemed inclined to contradict him.

The sun was blazing down upon him without mercy; and the dust, which had accumulated, or moved only to stir the blinding dust that lay inches deep on the Eddington roads.

"How I hate this sort of scenery!" he said to himself, and again looked fiercely at the willows, as if, with their bolt upright air, they showed too much vulgar astonishment at his changeableness, for he remembered, as he thought to admire the view on that very spot but an hour ago. But he had been going with the tide then, though he had not known it. He was all different now—quite different.

He was glad when his walk ended, and he felt grateful to get home. Indeed, he had a sharp words with himself when he caught sight of Mrs. Milton, straining her eyes in search of him, at the garden end, where she entered the premises—that being nearest—and saw everything looking so homely, cleanly and peaceful. There was Jubilee, with the kennel, reading, with a low, awe-stricken voice, a horrible murder case to Esau, who lay in his favorite posture—his chest to the ground, and his chin in his hands—looking up into Gibbs's face with breathless interest, in which was mingled a childish envy of Gibbs's wonderful stock of words of wonder he could read without spelling, and the manner in which he pronounced his "coolds" and "woolds," which evidently struck Esau as a masterly piece of scholarship. The bulldog sat near, looking perplexed and troubled by their absorption, and kept getting up, and wagging his tail, and resettling himself in a business, sometimes giving a yawn or whine at the most exciting parts of the narrative, or energetically licking Esau's face, as if he would say: "Do come out of this." The young mare had turned herself as far round in her stall as she could, and was looking at them through the open stable door with a placid, lustrous eye, and rattling her chain to make them notice her. The horrors which Gibbs was spelling out as Anthony entered, gave, by force of contrast, an additional charm to this little picture of domestic peace.

Mrs. Milton had seen her master coming, and when he entered the breakfast-room was there to meet him.

"Dear—dear, Mr. Anthony, what a heat you're in! There, sit down. It's too much for you to go all the way to Pettersham before your breakfast—it is, indeed!"

"How did you know I've been to Pettersham?" asked Anthony.

"How do I know? Why, the milk-boy saw Branch's brother at the gate, and he told him that you'd asked him to show you the grounds, and then had walked off with the young lady; and he thought he saw you on the river-steps, and supposed you were going to row home—which, I suppose, you've done, as you're in such a heat; and no wonder, in this broiling sun, and against the tide, too, wasn't it?"

Her words—against the tide—had been on Anthony's tongue all the way home; he bent down and rested his hot, dusty brow on her shoulder a minute, and said:

"Yes, old lady, it was. It was all against the tide, and I'm tired—tired as a dog."

CHAPTER XXIX.—JOHN HARRIS'S CASKET.

ANTHONY'S resolution never to see Clarissa again remained unshaken all that day, which he spent in lounging about the garden, and writing a long letter to Sleuth—a letter in which were several bitter mysterious expressions, that rather puzzled its recipient. In the evening he read the county news to Mrs. Milton from the newspaper—which had never got into the doctor's hands after all—and kept her up late at backgammon, which she had learned to play with the alderman.

He awoke late the next morning, with a feeling of indescribable dreariness. He went round to the stable-yard, but found anything but a scene of peace. Gibbs was quarreling with Esau: Esau was impudent; the mare was shying right and left; the paddock pony was neighing tremendously; the bulldog was barking at him; and the old St. Bernard's howling piteously, and Anthony was glad to escape into the garden. He tried to take pleasure in doing little things the alderman used to like to do. He even took one of the little pots of the dahlia-sticks, to look for the earwigs; but the forbidden image rising sweetly before him at that very instant, he forgot what he was doing, and the earwigs ran up his sleeve, which made him so angry, that he dashed the pot to the ground, and broke it to atoms.

Branch came with a very red face to pick up the pieces, and Anthony tried to mollify him by asking questions about the flowers, concerning which he was very ignorant.

"That thur, sir," said Branch, pointing to an elegant little heath that Anthony was admiring, or pretending to admire—"that thur is the only one o' the sort in this country, sir, with the acception of one, which is whur my brother is, at Dr. Pompess's, sir. Your uncle brought 'em over from furrin parts, and Miss Pompess takin' such a fancy to it, he called it by her name, and give her one o' the plants. You'll see the name on this, if you look, sir—here: 'The Fare Clare-ease-us;' on'y your uncle's put it in Latin, sir. Poor gentleman!"

Anthony seemed to have got up on purpose to offend everybody that morning. He offended Gibbs by not interfering about Esau; he offended Branch by picking one of his rarest flowers, breaking his pots, and laughing at his Latin; and very deeply offended Mrs. Milton by sitting all breakfast-time looking dreamily at a spray of heath, with tiny white sweet-scented bells, shaking at every movement, in his hand, instead of doing justice to her delicious coffee and home-made rolls.

After breakfast, when he was alone, Anthony sat looking at the flower still.

His resolution had remained firm one whole day and one whole night, though there had risen round it great waves of tender remembrances, protestations and longings, that tossed and disturbed, and threatened to swallow it up. But now, as he sat looking at the flower-spray, the thought that his uncle—the only man that Anthony as a child had loved—the thought that he had known and felt affection for Clarissa, bore down upon his struggling resolve and sunk it, and in its place there rose another resolve, to whose cry of "I will see her!—I will see her!" every pulse of his heart made passionate response.

"I will see her. I will know the truth from her own lips. If she has promised to marry this man, she has acted a lie to me, and I'll know whether she has or not. I don't believe it; I know I don't believe it, though I try to persuade myself that I do. Perhaps she'll try to shirk it; but I'll see her, do what she may."

The mare was had out, and soon Anthony found himself in the Eddington lanes once more; and oh! those abominable willows!

Anthony could almost have gnashed his teeth a them, and called them fools, and asked them if a man hadn't a right to change his own mind; and then, when he found what he was thinking of, he burst into a laugh, and said:

"How hideously they cut those trees!"

The great gates at Pettersham, and the lions, and the rich old wall basked in the full morning sun, and seemed to be enjoying a golden trance, from which Anthony, by his pull at the bell, rudely woke them.

The doctor was at home. Anthony had almost hoped he would not be; but a strange timidity seizing him as he stood at the door of the breakfast-room, he half wished Clarissa might not be there.

And yet, what a bitter disappointment it was to find his half-wish granted—to see the doctor sitting alone in the oriel window, one leg gracefully supported on a crimson rest, Clarissa's two little white poodles occupying the sofa, Clarissa's picture smiling at him from the wall, and nothing more!

No matter, he would see her somehow.

"Hem! My dear boy, I'm delighted to see you. But, hem! Anthony, how came you to leave us in such a hurry yesterday, eh? Bad boy, bad boy! Robertson expressed great regret; he liked you—hem! he decidedly liked you."

Anthony did not feel, at that minute, that he could return Mr. Robertson's compliment, but he said all he could in acknowledgment; and then the doctor asked him if he had seen the Pettersham Herald, and the fulsome praise its editor had lavished on a certain gentleman in the neighborhood, who, Anthony soon discovered, was a sort of rival of the doctor's, a scholar and magistrate, and man of great wealth—a Mr. Macguire. Anthony had not seen the Herald, but he had seen the Hengston Courier, which that week had a spirited article attacking the views of the gentleman in question, and bravely upholding the doctor's. Anthony repeated most of the clever things it said, till the doctor roared again, and in his heart voted Anthony a most delightful young man.

And all this time Clarissa never came, nor was her name mentioned.

At last the doctor rose, and said:

"Well, what do you say to a ride, my boy?"

Anthony's spirits rose, but the doctor sent them down again, by saying, as he went to the door:

"Clarissa won't go, she isn't very well to-day."

Anthony busied himself with the collar of one of the poodles, and, not in a very firm voice, expressed a hope that Miss Pompess was not seriously indisposed.

But the doctor did not hear him; he had gone.

The moon rising suddenly from the clouds never appeared half so lovely to a benighted traveler as did the doctor's face to Anthony, when, a minute after, he put it in at the door again, and said:

"I say, Anthony, go and tell Clarissa about Macguire and the union diet, will you? It'll amuse her. Come, I'll take you to her."

All down the long, bright passages, Anthony seemed to be walking on air; but when they stood still at a certain door, and the doctor opened it, and spoke a few words in a low, highly-amused tone of voice to some one inside, all Anthony's timidity returned. Then the doctor came, pushed him in, whispered—

"Don't forget the joke about Macguire's speech at the dinner last week." And the next instant Anthony heard the door close behind him.

Clarissa sat in a low chair, near the window. As she gave him her hand, Anthony did not think she looked ill, but a little weary—perhaps a little sad; at all events, there was a new charm for him in her eyes and in her smile, that turned all his anger away.

He sat down near her without speaking a word. His eyes wandered about her room with a tender reverence for the pure and beautiful tastes it spoke of, and once almost started, as he saw standing in a place of honor John Harris's casket.

When he looked at her again, he thought she must have seen the direction his eyes had gone in, for her color deepened, and she looked at her book confusedly.

Why was she sad? he wondered; and a flattering voice whispered—Was it not that she had seen his annoyance and pain yesterday morning, and been grieved by it? But, then, that heartless laughter! No, her sadness could have nothing to do with him.

"Well," said Clarissa, dropping her book, and looking up with a smile, "what about Mr. Macguire and the union diet? Papa will be ready before you've told me."

"Miss Pompess, will you forgive me if I tell you I haven't come here to speak of Mr. Macguire and the union diet?"

"Oh, willingly. If you knew how heartsick I am of that man's name—if you heard it half as often as I do—you wouldn't ask me the question."

"Well, but," said Anthony, feeling he must dash into the subject at once, "I'm afraid what I am going to say may be still more disagreeable to you, but I have made up my mind to ask you a question. I fear you may, perhaps, think it a rude one, but it is serious to me that it should be answered by you—by you alone. I want to ask you if something I have heard is true—to ask you if——"

There was a knock at the door. A servant came in, carrying a bouquet of white and red moss rose-buds and a note, which she laid on the table by Clarissa, saying:

"With Mr. Robertson's compliments."

Clarissa blushed crimson, and took the flowers, and bent over them as if to hide her confusion. Anthony watched her so savagely, that happening to look up and meet his gaze, she lowered her eyes again, and took up her book with an air of cold displeasure.

"You are forgetting your note," said Anthony.

"No, thank you; not forgetting it."

"You prefer reading it alone, I imagine?"

"Perhaps I do."

"In that case it will be an act of rudeness on my part to make you defer that pleasure by staying any longer."

"Not at all—it can wait."

He had risen, but he stood still, looking at her as she caressed the flowers, and a bitter feeling of self-contempt came over him as he remembered how he had nearly broken his neck in getting her a little wreath of jasmine, that hung low down over the river wall, yesterday morning, and how coldly she had taken it.

"She shan't keep poor Harris's casket," he said to himself; "she isn't worthy of it." Then going and laying his hand on it, he said to her:

"May I beg the return of this? I think I had no right to part with it."

Clarissa's lashes fell a little closer to her cheek, but she merely bowed, saying coldly:

"As you please."

Anthony still remained near it, and he was just touching the spring by which it opened, when Clarissa rose, and came hastily towards him.

"Mr. Maude, may I request you not to open that?" she said.

Anthony was immediately seized by a violent inclination to see what was inside.

"May I not look at the inscription?" he said, retaining it in his hands.

"You will have time enough to do that when you have it back; for the present there are things of my own in it. It shall be emptied to-day and returned to you. Mr. Maude, you surely would not open it, after what I have said?"

She was so agitated that Anthony, as he looked at her, became possessed of a strange thought, that sent a delicious thrill of hope through him.

"Just one peep at the inscription," he pleaded.

"Would you be so ungenerous, so unkind, as to open that, when I entreat you not?" said Clarissa. "I cannot believe that you would."

"But it seems as if I couldn't help it," protested Anthony. "Look here, it is opening almost of itself."

"Mr. Maude, if you open that—if you dare to do so——"

She stopped suddenly, unable to go on, and stood before him pale and haughty, and with a look of passionate entreaty in her eyes.

Anthony felt mad to open it.

"I'm afraid I must," he said. "Besides, you have said 'dare,' and Mrs. Milton could tell you how ill the word dare agrees with our family."

The lid was partly raised, but he paused with it half way, and looked at Clarissa.

"You would forgive me if you knew the strength of my temptation," he said.

"I shall say no more, Mr. Maude," replied Clarissa, haughtily. "Perhaps I have already said too much. I now leave it simply to your honor."

Anthony shut the lid, and put the casket back in its place.

Clarissa held out her hand, smiling, but positively with tears in her eyes.

"You don't know how much I thank you," she said. "You don't know what you have spared me. But I shall not forget it—I shall never forget it."

"Clarissa," said Anthony, holding her hand tightly, "spare me also what you can—much, I fear, you cannot—but tell me, answer me the question I came on purpose to ask you, and which I must have answered by yourself."

"Hem! Come, Anthony," cried the doctor, "we are waiting. Oh, you are saying good-bye. Well, Clarissa, wasn't it delicious about Macguire and the union diet? Isn't the man's true character coming out now?"

"Mr. Maude will kindly send us the paper," stammered Clarissa.

Anthony had gone down without speaking a word, and flung himself on his horse.

THE AMERICAN GAME OF BALL.

The Grand Matches of the Season of 1865.—The Last Contest between the Eckford and Atlantic Clubs.

IN the brief history of base ball—the national game of ball of America—there has been no season to compare with the one about terminating, either in the brilliancy of the games played or in the rapid extension of base ball in public favor. The season of 1860 saw base ball one of the most popular sports of the day, and the noted Excelsior Club at the head of the list of prominent organizations. In that year, however, excellence, in a practical knowledge of the game, was confined chiefly to the leading clubs of the metropolis and its immediate vicinity. Now, however, the clubs of Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington on the one side, and those of Albany, Hartford, Boston, &c., on the other, enter the list with our metropolitan clubs, and creditably hold their own in the tourneys which take place, if they do not carry off the honors.

Among the prominent contests of the season of 1865 have been those for the title of the so-called championship of the United States. We say "so-called" from the fact that there is no recognized title of champions in base ball in this country, no more than there is in cricket in England. In the latter country, while the prize ring dog fighting, rat catching, &c., have their authorized contests for champion-belts, &c., cricket—the national game of ball in England—is wisely counted out of the lists, and why? simply because cricket is a game designed for recreative exercise only, and not a game kept alive for the pecuniary benefit of either classes or individuals. For the same reason our national game is preserved from the evils attendant upon championship matches, and thereby obstacles to its permanent establishment in popular favor are avoided. The National Association of Base Ball Players, which is the sole authority in all matters appertaining to the game, recognizes nothing of the kind, and we trust it never will. That a nominal recognition of such a title does exist all are aware, its chief prominence being derived from the writers of the daily press, whose object is to impart a notoriety and importance to certain matches, for the purpose of creating an excitement in regard to them, which otherwise would probably not exist. One of the strongest arguments against any official recognition of the title lays in the fact that all the discreditable occurrences on the field which have been recorded against the game; all the attempts to bribe players either to leave their clubs for rival organizations, or to "sell" games in which they participate; and, in fact, all the ill-feeling which has been engendered between prominent clubs can be plainly traced to those contests for the championship. The fact, too, that these matches afford such opportunities for the gambling fraternity to embark in ventures connected with them, tends greatly to change the sport from one engaged in for recreation and exercise only, into one in which pecuniary advantages are alone the incentive.

In no season, perhaps, in the history of the game, have the evils above alluded to been more plainly manifest than during the present; and the result has been that those of the base ball community who have the best interests of the game at heart, and who desire to see it established on a reputable as well as permanent footing, have come to consider that the time has arrived for contests for the championship to be ignored and discouraged by all who do not desire to see the game made a means of livelihood, or a corps of base ball players organized whose principal object is to play ball for money. That contests for the palm of superiority can be carried on between rival organizations without anything occurring to mar the harmony of the occasion, or to detract from the attractive character of an exciting trial of skill between noted experts in the game, has been conclusively shown in the series of games played by the Excelsiors in Washington, Baltimore and Philadelphia a few weeks since, and more recently by the Atlantic and Eckford clubs, the latter of which our artists have so finely illustrated on a preceding page. But these are exceptional instances. The contests of the Excelsior vs. Atlantic, in 1860; Atlantic vs. Mutual, in 1862; Eckford vs. Atlantic, in 1863, &c., are recorded as strong arguments on the other side of the question. An effort will be made, however, at the coming Convention of the National Association, to have the title of "Champions" officially recognized. That the effort will fail we have not the least doubt, and, therefore, this championship question may be regarded as an outside matter entirely, and one neither the National Association or the game should be held responsible for.

Eckford vs. Atlantic.

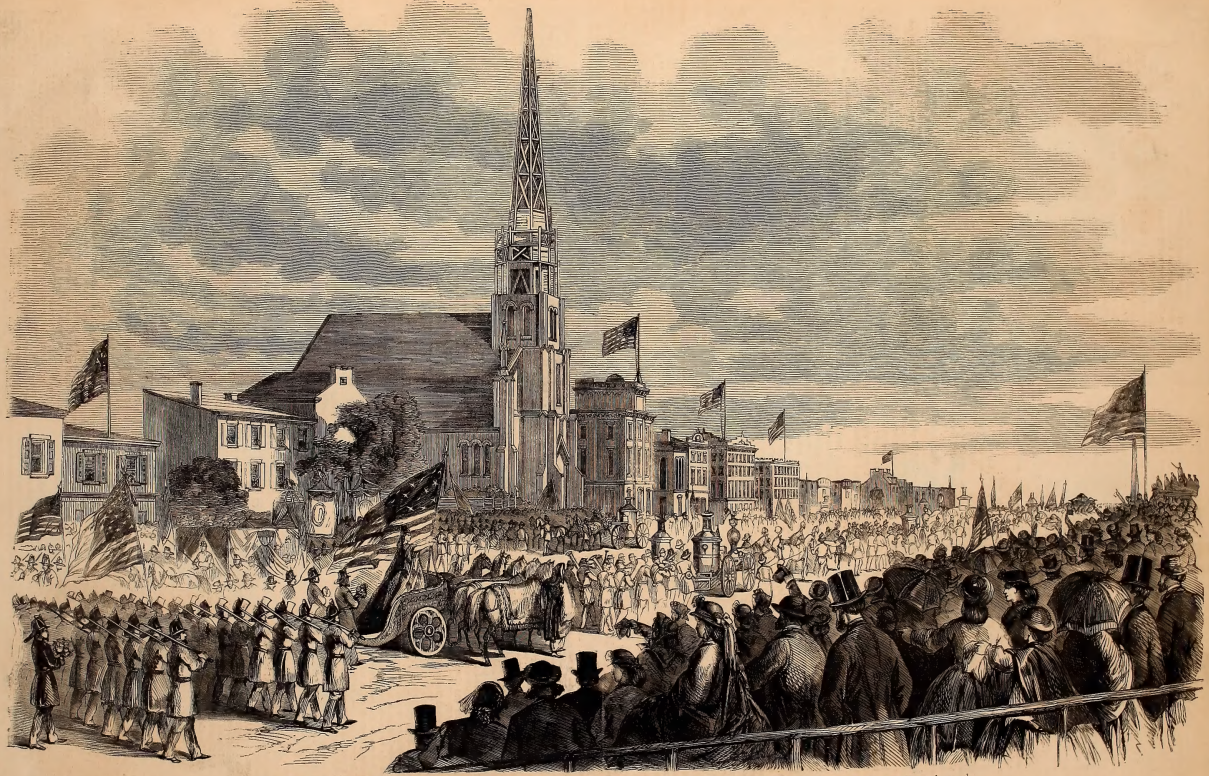
Probably no match of the season attracted more attention, or was regarded with more interest than the one, an illustration of which is the prominent feature of this week's paper. The Eckford Club, which, in 1863, concluded its second year of unbroken triumphs, by winning every first-nine, second-nine, and amateur game its members participated in, by means of one of the evil practices we have alluded to—so says one of its most esteemed members—lost the services of the majority of its leading players, and from the close of 1863 to the latter part of the present season, was obliged to take a secondary position in the ranks of our metropolitan clubs. Lately, however, by valuable acquisitions from the junior fraternity—and not from senior organizations, be it remembered to its credit—the Eckford Club has partly resumed its former high position, a splendidly earned victory over the celebrated Mutual Club being among the most striking proofs of its resuscitated strength as a playing club. This triumph, it was, that gave such importance to the match "Eckford vs. Atlantic," which took place on Friday, Oct. 13th, on the well-known Union Ball Grounds, Brooklyn, E. D. An assemblage of spectators were collected within the enclosure on this occasion, which surpassed in numbers any previous gathering of the kind at the same locality, and what is more, the contest was marked by the utmost decorum on the part of the spectators, and the most friendly intercourse between the contestants; in fact, it proved to be the most creditable contest in this respect ever recorded among the championship matches.

The friends of the Eckfords, judging from the excellence of their play in the Mutual match, calculated greatly upon a similar result on this occasion; while on the other hand, the Atlantics entered upon their task with more anxiety as to the result, and less confidence in their ability to obtain a successful issue than we ever before saw them do. The game, however, had not progressed far before two things were plainly manifest to the initiated, viz., the fact that the Eckfords lacked confidence in their ability to successfully cope with the Atlantics, while the latter soon perceived that the game was in their own hands, and that there was no need of fears as to the result. Suffice it to say, that after a contest of between two and three hours duration, the Atlantics were declared the victors, by a score of 35 to 8. Of the play, on the occasion, on the Atlantic side, the splendid fielding of C. Smith and Crane, in their respective positions, merits high praise. Smith caught three foul balls on the fly in masterly style; assisted Start in putting out two players at 1st base, and cut off the career of one of his opponents at 3d base from a fine throw of Start's, thereby completing a handsome double play. Crane's fielding in picking up sharply batted balls, and passing them accurately to the 1st base, was also praiseworthy, he doing this five times, besides marking his play with a pretty fly catch. Pierce, the captain of the nine, played at short field on this occasion and in good style. Norton, late of the Star Club, occupying the position of catcher, and it is one he fills with a grace and agility of movement, and a degree of skill which gives promise of his excelling even his "illustrious predecessor." He put out seven of the Eckfords in style on foul balls. Start, at 1st base, was, as usual, perfectly reliable, as the capture of no less than a dozen of his opponents at his post fully proved. The out-field, too, was effectively played, Galvin, at centre field, marking his play with a splendid running catch of a fly ball. Of the pitching of Pratt, the result speaks highly, as all victories are largely attributable to excellence of play in this position.

On the part of the Eckfords we regret not being able to speak in such high praise of their play, the fact being that scarcely one of them did himself justice on the field on the occasion. Fox's fielding at 3d base, marked by a splendid fly catch, the ball coming direct from the bat, and three sure throws to the bases which resulted in outs, besides making two other catches on foul balls, and Zettlein's excellent fielding in his position in putting out two players at 1st base and his good pitching, were the most noteworthy instances of good play on the Eckford side. Kline succeeded in capturing nine players at 1st base, A. Mills secured three at 2d base, and Swandell and Snyder took a fly ball each well. The veteran Manolt had no chance afforded him to catch anything, and Beach was too much in want of practice to play up to his former high mark. C. Mills, who played so splendidly in the Mutual match, was not up to the mark in this game, although he managed to secure five foul balls. The score shows who excelled in securing runs, but the best batting on the Atlantic side was divided between Pierce and Pratt, and on the Eckford between Fox and A. Mills. The duties of Umpire were impartially and satisfactorily discharged, and except in the rather one-sided character of the score the game proved to be a very interesting one indeed. We give the score below:

ATLANTIC.	O.	R.	ECKFORD.	O.	R.
Pierce, s. s.	2	6	Manolt, l. f.	4	1
C. Smith, 3 b.	1	6	C. Mills, c.	4	0
Start, 1 b.	2	5	Zettlein, p.	5	0
Chapman, l. f.	4	3	Fox, 3 b.	2	2
Galvin, c. f.	3	4	Swandell, r. f.	2	2
Crane, 2 b.	3	1	A. Mills, 2 b.	2	1
Pratt, p.	5	2	Kline, 1 b.	2	1
S. Smith, r. f.	6	2	Snyder, c. f.	4	0
Norton, c.	1	6	Beach, s. s.	3	1
Total	27	35	Total	27	8

RUNS MADE.



INNINGS	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
Atlantic	4	3	0	2	6	10	6	0	4	—35
Eckford	3	0	0	0	1	0	1	3	0	— 8

Umpire—Mr. Brown, of the Mutual Club.
Scorers—Messrs. Mowlem and Pidgeon.
Time of game—Three hours and ten minutes.
Fly catches—Atlantic, 9; Eckford, 7.

The following are the games played between the first Nines of the above Clubs from September, 1857, to October, 1865, during which period the Atlantic defeated the Eckfords nine times, the Eckfords returning the compliment six times:

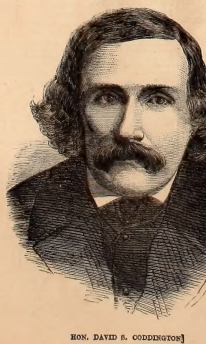
Date		Year		Atlantic		Eckford
Sept.	15th,	1857,	Atlantic	26,	Eckford	17.
Oct.	22d,	1857,	"	29,	"	11.
July	8th,	1859,	"	25,	"	15.
Sept.	8th,	1859,	"	16,	"	22.
Oct.	12th,	1859,	"	22,	"	12.
Oct.	15th,	1860,	"	17,	"	15.
Oct.	22d,	1860,	"	15,	"	20.
Oct.	29th,	1860,	"	20,	"	11.
Aug.	11th,	1862,	"	14,	"	20.
Aug.	18th,	1862,	"	39.	"	5.
Sept.	18th,	1862,	"	3,	"	6.
Sept.	2d,	1863,	"	10,	"	31.
Sept.	8th,	1863,	"	11,	"	21.
Sept.	21st,	1865,	"	28,	"	23.
Oct.	13th,	1865,	"	35,	"	8.
Total				304.		239.

THE BIRD OF THE TOLLING BELL.—Among the highest woods and deepest glens of Brazil, a sound is sometimes heard, so singular, that the noise seems quite unnatural; it is like the distant and solemn tolling of a church bell struck at intervals. This extraordinary noise proceeds from the Arawonda. The bird sits at the top of the highest trees in the deepest forests, and though constantly heard in the most desert places, it is very rarely seen. It is impossible to conceive anything of a more solitary character than the profound silence of the woods, broken only by the metallic and almost supernatural sound of this invisible bird, coming from the air and seeming to follow wherever you go. The Arawonda is white, with a circle of red around its eyes, its size is about that of a small pigeon.

FIREMEN'S PARADE AT PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 16TH—COUNTERMARCHING ON BROAD STREET.—FROM A SKETCH BY THOMAS HOGAN.

M. LECOMPTE AND THE OTARIA.

HON. DAVID S. CODDINGTON.



"Death loves a shining mark" is a saying which has lately received a new illustration in the sudden decease of Mr. David S. Coddington, of this city, who died in Saratoga, on the 2d of September, 1865. He was born in New York, September 21st, 1824. A comparatively young man therefore, still there are few men of maturer years whose loss is more severely felt in metropolitan circles. Precocious almost beyond precedent, Mr. Coddington entered Union College at the early age of 14 years; subsequently studied law with George W. Strong, an eminent member of the New York bar, and was admitted to practice on attaining his majority. Naturally of a weak constitution and nervous temperament, he was not well fitted for prosecuting his profession, and possessed of ample means, he devoted himself rather to the study of history and general literature, thus acquiring a fund of information and illustration which gave great variety and interest to conversational powers intrinsically brilliant. Following the political creed of his father, who will be remembered as at one time Postmaster of New York, he attached himself to the Democratic party, and made his first appearance in the political arena, in a speech supporting Martin Van Buren for the Presidency, in the autumn of 1840, when that gentleman became what was called the "Free Soil Candidate," in opposition to the regular Democratic nominee, Gen. Cass. Although said to have been vigorous and original, Mr. Coddington does not seem to have been encouraged in his political aspirations, if he had any, and remained his student life, emaining silent before the public, but obtaining great ocial distinction, until 1855, when he delivered an address at the Burns' Centennial Festival in New York, which was accepted as the feature of the day. This was followed by a very brilliant Fourth of July oration, at the tomb of Jefferson, Monticello, Va.

On the breaking out of the rebellion he assumed no doubtful ground, but threw his whole weight into the scale of the Union. On the occasion of the great meeting in Union Square, a few days after the attack on Sumter, and which signalized the great uprising of the people, and demonstrated to the Southern leaders that the instincts of patriotism were stronger than the traditions and influences of party—at this meeting Mr. Coddington made a speech lofty and sonorous, replete with the spirit of the time, rumouning the devotees of Republicanism to the rescue and support of her imperiled standard. Physical defects and impaired health alone prevented him from taking the field with the many his eloquence had nerved "to do or die."

In 1861, Mr. Coddington was elected to the State Legislature from one of the most intelligent and refined of the city districts, when he devoted himself with great industry and ability to the interests of the metropolis. His speeches were few but pertinent and pointed, and only less powerful than those which he afterwards delivered at the various war meetings in the city, at times when the arms of the Government required to be sustained and strengthened. His best political effort, however, was a speech in favor of the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, and in repudiation of the nomination of McClellan and the so-called "Peace Platform," of the so-called Democratic Convention at Chicago, in the autumn of 1864. It was equally sarcastic, persuasive, and logical, and was generally accepted as the most effective effort of the political campaign. Its effect would have been greater, had it been delivered at an earlier day. Late as it was, it produced a deep and wide impression.

After the fall of Charleston Mr. Coddington went to that city, for the benefit of his health, and was there called on by the officers of the garrison and the few loyal citizens of the place, to deliver an address on the occasion of the death of Mr. Lincoln. It is an eloquen, eulogy on the virtues and services of the late President and a careful and spirited analysis of the origin and purposes of the war, and of the results brought about by its successful termination.

Mr. Coddington spent most of the summer at his favorite resort, Saratoga, where his presence was always a pleasure to the hundreds of sojourners of versatility and originality, and where he died, calmly and without giving a sign, after a brief and apparently trivial illness, as we have said, on the morning of Sunday, September 3, 1865. Had his physical powers been equal to his mental requirements and capacities, David S. Coddington might have left a name, as an orator and, perhaps, as a statesman, among the very first on the list of those whom the nation delights to honor. As it is, he has left an unsullied character, an honorable reputation as a public speaker, and a warm appreciation among all who knew him. It is the lot of but few men to do more.

HON. DAVID S. CODDINGTON.

Maria Devote Ortesa, a Corsican young lady, shot her seducer, who had declined to marry her, who is, however, likely to recover. The relatives of the young man stormed the lady's house, in order to wreak upon her the Corsican system of revenge, or vendetta, and it required all the power of the police to save her from danger.

OTARIA OR SEA BEAR, WITH DETAIL OF STRUCTURE.

THE SEA BEAR OR SEAL.

There are few of our readers who have not at some time seen a specimen of the common seal, but there are few who know enough about the characteristics of the animal to think that it is capable of a high degree of training, and is of a gentle and impressible disposition.

The London papers are just now eloquent over a specimen exhibiting there under the care of M. Lecomte, but we are not sure, after reading of all its accomplishments, that it is any in advance of the one now at Barnum's Museum, who exhibits a high degree of intelligence. This is what they say of M. Lecomte's seal:

"Whenever M. Lecomte enters the cage the seal shuffles up to him, and follows him about with his nose at his master's heels, exactly like a well-bred bulldog. If M. Lecomte sits down, the seal comes and lays his head on his knees: if he gets up, the animal gets up also, and waddles after him with the peculiar walk adopted by these creatures. It is easy enough for M. Lecomte to enter the cage, but not so easy to leave it. The seal is so jealous that he will not suffer his master to leave him; and if he suspects any intention of going out of the cage, he scuttles to the door, stands against it, barks at his master as if in remonstrance, pushes him away from the door, and is so determined that only by stratagem can escape be made.

"When it is engaged in climbing, it first stands erect, as represented in the large engraving, its fore-feet against its master's breast, and then, with a curious and violent twist of the body, hitches the right hind-foot on his left knee. With another twist and wriggle it lifts itself fairly off the ground, and makes good its position. When M. Lecomte places his chair on the platform, and the seal mounts on his shoulders, the group has a most remarkable and picturesque effect. With equal ease the animal clambers into a chair; and it is scarcely possible to conceive any combination of objects which is more incongruous than a seal sitting in a Windsor chair.

"On the platform there is a cannon, formed by mounting an old-fashioned pistol in a gun-carriage. At the word of command the seal fires the cannon by pulling a string attached to the trigger. The animal cares no more about the report than does a horse which has been trained by Mr. Ravey. The fire of the cannon, too, is a reality, and not a mere sham produced by a simple cap, or a flash of powder in the pan.

"Encouraged by fish as food, Otaria performs a whole series of feats. If its master throws his cap to the farther end of the cage, the seal fetches it back again. If he calls it, the creature straightway ascends into his lap and tries to kiss him. I should think that to any one who was not very fond of the animal this performance must be rather disagreeable.

"Then its master enters into conversation with it, and as the animal has a vast variety of barks and grunts at command, a sort of dialogue was maintained without much difficulty.

"'Would Otaria salute the demoiselles?'

"Certainly it would, and expressed his acquiescence by voice and gesture.

"'Would he go to Mexico?'

"Certainly not. Dead silence first, and then a most enormous and staccato bellow doing duty for the negative.

"'Would he salute the Empress?'

"An affirmative active one grunt.

"'Would he cry "Vive l'Empereur!"'

"Another tremendous roar, which was interpreted as the loyal cry demanded.

"The name of Sea Bear is given to the animal on account of its decidedly ursine aspect. Several of the seals are in a similar manner called after the names of terrestrial animals to which they bear a resemblance either actual or fancied.

"A figure is given of the end of one of the fore-limbs showing its general form, and the manner in nails at some distance from the end of the toes. On the same illustration are also shown the little projecting ears from which the animal derives its name of Otaria; and the artist, who has given much time to the study of the creature, has also drawn the eye as it appears by day and night, showing how the pupil is contracted by day and expanded by night. When the Otaria moves about its whole body falls into curves and folds, so that the animal would scarcely be recognized by those who had only seen a stuffed specimen, with its distended and disproportioned skin. Even the shape of the bones is visible under the covering of the limbs, and every movement only seems to bring out some fresh effect."

SWIM FOR LIFE ON THE LIMPOPO.

A new writer on the animal world has sprung into existence, who takes an entirely original course in his story-telling. He does not relate his tale of adventure as a man, but placing himself in the shoes—providing they ever wear shoes—of the animal itself, he speaks by their mouth, and converses with them, and so renders his sketches in the form of autobiography. Here is the story of a hippopotamus who hunts down a man who has wounded him. He has pursued the poor fellow to the river Limpopo, into whose water he dashes, the beast after him:

"All this time he was slowly swimming along—more slowly every moment; for, excellent swimmer as he was, he was now quite spent, and blew the water constantly by reason of his carrying his nose so low. As at first, he carried his knife between his teeth, but presently he stopped, and spying a little crack in the flat rock, sprang up fiercer than ever to reach it, in hopes of being able to lodge his hand within it, and so haul himself out of reach of us, his pursuers, who, seeing how nearly drawing to a close the game was, had come up to within ten yards of him; but his longing eyes had made the crevice larger than it was in reality, and he could not, try all he knew, lodge within it a single finger. Then, for the first time, he bethought him of his long knife; taking it from between his teeth, he planted the blade in at the hole, where it held fast, and though it was of bad stuff, it served him better than the best, for it beat with his weight instead of breaking with it, and gave him good handling. Now was his chance. At the spot where the knife was stuck, it was but a space of a foot and a half to the top, and had he been fresh and nimble, it would have been as nothing to have swung himself high and dry; but, bad luck for him, he was neither fresh nor nimble. It was as much as he could do to hold on to the knife-handle, hoping presently that his strength would come back and enable him to make the spring that should save him. And so it would have saved him had he been able to accomplish it, for I could never have followed him; but it was not my purpose that he should accomplish it; so, as he hung like a plantain from a bough, I leisurely paddled up and plucked him.

"'Pulled him down, poor wretch!' said I; 'pulled him down, after all his pains and suffering to plant a hobbist where he did?'

"There you are wrong,' replied the hippopotamus, with a more horrible grin than he had hitherto perpetrated; 'I let him keep his holdfast. If no left it, it was no fault of mine. Indeed, I gave him a better chance than he had before.'

A SWIM FOR LIFE ACROSS THE LIMPOPO.

"'What do you mean?' I asked.

"'Why, that I relieved him of a good half of the weight that depended from the knife-handle,' replied the hideous brute; 'I nipped him off at the waist as neatly as ever you nipped a carrot.'

"'Bit him in two!' I exclaimed, with horror.

"The hippopotamus, instead of replying, opened his jaws to their full extent, and brought them to again with a clap like that of one paving-stone let fall flat a-top of another, an act, as the reader may well imagine, more terribly expressive than any number or sort of words."

AN ANECDOTE OF QUEEN VICTORIA AND PRINCE ALBERT.—On one occasion, when the Queen and the Prince, with the Prince of Wales, then a young boy, were strolling on the beach near the palace, on the Isle of Wight, the latter, always a proud and haughty youngster, presuming upon his heirship to the throne almost before he was out of petticoats, had strayed away a little distance from his parents, when they heard his voice and another in angry altercation. It seems that the young prince had discovered another boy, about his own age and size, engaged in gathering periwinkles, and his basket, partly full, was standing on the beach. This basket, out of sheer wantonness, the Prince of Wales had viciously kicked over. The young fisherman saw the act, and immediately rushed out of the water and confronted its perpetrator, when this dialogue occurred:

Young Fisherman—"What did you do that for?"

Prince of Wales—"Because I chose."

Young Fisherman—"I've a great mind to thrash you for it."

Prince of Wales—"You darn't. Don't you know who I am?"

Young Fisherman—"No; and I don't care."

Prince of Wales—"I'm the Prince of Wales."

Young Fisherman—"I don't care if you are the Prince of Wales. You knocked over my periwinkles—and take that." And straightforward the young fisherman's hand made acquaintance with the cheek of young royalty.

The Queen and Prince Consort saw and heard all, and, approaching the rival combatants, told their son that he was in the wrong, and compelled him to ask pardon of the ragged periwinkle gatherer, and gave him a sovereign in recompense for the injury he had done him.

ADVANTAGES OF OBSCURITY.—Says Cowley: "I love and commend a true good fame, because it is the shadow of virtue; not that it doth any good to the body which it accompanies, but it is an efficacious shadow, and like that of St. Peter, cures the diseases of others. The best kind of glory, no doubt, is that which is reflected from honesty, such as was the glory of Cato and Aristides; but it was harmful to them both, and is seldom beneficial to any man whilst he lives; what it is to him after his death I cannot say, because I love not philosophy merely notional and conjectural, and no man who has made the experiment has been so kind as to come back and inform us. Upon the whole matter, I account a person who has a moderate mind and fortune, and lives in the conversation of two or three agreeable friends, with little commerce in the world besides, who is esteemed well enough by his new neighbors that know him, and is truly irreproachable by anybody; and so, after a healthful quiet life, before the great inconveniences of old age, goes more silently out of it than he came in (for I would not have him so much as cry in the exit); this innocent deceiver of the world, as Horace calls him, this muta persona, I take to have been more happy in his part, than the greatest actors that fill the stage with show and noise; nay, even than Augustus himself, who asked, with his last breath, whether he had not played his farce very well."

WHAT IS IN THE BEDROOM?—The importance of ventilating bedrooms is a fact which everybody is vitally interested in, and which few properly appreciate. If two persons are to occupy a bedroom during a night, let them step upon weighing scales as they retire, and then again in the morning, and they will find that their actual weight is at least a pound less in the morning. Frequently, there will be a loss of two or more pounds, and the average loss throughout the year will be more than one pound. That is, during the night, there is a loss of a pound of matter, which has gone off from their bodies, partly from the lungs, and partly through the pores of the skin. The escaped material is carbonic acid, and decayed animal matter or poisonous exhalations.

Barnum's New American Museum,—BROADWAY, between Spring and Prince streets. This Establishment does not advertise in the New York Herald. Every Evening and Wednesday and Saturday Afternoons. The dashing and accomplished Equestrienne, OCEANA, the CZARINA OF THE HIPPODRAMA, in the Romantic Spectacle of MAZEPPA; OR, THE WILD HORSE OF TARTARY. Thrilling and perilous flights by the TRAINED HORSE "TARTAR." Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday afternoons, VICTORINE; OR, I'LL SLEEP ON IT. The charming Comedienne and Vocalist, MISS KATHLEEN O'NEILL, in songs, stories, etc., of "Ould Ireland." W. B. HARRISON, Extemporaneous Singer. The identical LINCOLN LOG CABIN built by ABRAHAM LINCOLN in Macon county, Illinois. MISS ANN ELIZA LEAK, born without arms, Crochets, Braids Hair, Embroiders, etc. Three of the Tallest Giants in the World, and prettiest Circassian Girls ever seen. Gen. Grant, jr., the Smallest Dwarf ever exhibited. Bohemian Glass Blowers; two Glass Steam Engines in motion. Professor Hutchings, Lightning Calculator. Three-Horned Bull. Cosmoramas, Stereoscopticans, Learned Seal, Happy Family, Grand Aquaria, 100,000 Curiosities, &c. Admission, 30 cents; children under ten 15 cents.

Now Ready.

Charles Dickens' New Story.

Charles Dickens' New Story.

FRANK LESLIE'S BUDGET OF FUN,

FOR DECEMBER,

Contains Dickens' New Story of

"How they Tamed the Colonel."

In Fever and Ague and all intermittent fevers, according to the statements of countless witnesses, the Red Jacket Bitters break up the paroxysms with absolute certainty, and speedily restore the strength of the patient.

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS

A full size Album holding 50 pictures sent free by post for $2.

An Album holding 100 pictures, $5.

Albums from 50 cents and upwards sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

C. HUGHES,

Album Manufacturer.

102 CENTRE STREET, N. Y.

Fortune! Fortune!!

Full instructions by which a person can master the Art of Ventriloquism in a few hour's practice, and make a world of fun and a fortune. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address

FRANKLIN & CO.,

526-9 Calhoun, Illinois.

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address

SHAW & CLARK,

521-33 Biddeford, Maine.

THE GREAT EMPORIUM

FOR

ARMY, NAVY, MASONIC, FIREMEN, POST-OFFICE, BASE BALL, RAILROAD, POLICE, FENIAN

AND SOCIETY BADGES OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

Coin Silver, $1 50.

Coin Silver, $1 50.

Coin Silver, $1 50.

Army of the Cumberland Badge.

Coin Silver, $2.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,

208 BROADWAY, N. Y.

I will send the Regulation Badge (Coin Silver) for either Corps or Division of the Army, with your Name, Regiment and Company handsomely engraved thereon, on the receipt of $1 50; or a Small Gold Badge, beautifully enameled and engraved, for $2; or a Beautiful Coin Silver Cavalry Badge for $2; or Small Gold for $2. I will send a Solid Gold MASONIC Pin for $2. I have also a complete assortment of Jewelry of every description. Agents wanted everywhere, to whom especial inducements are offered; with each order I send my wholesale illustrated circular.

COSMOPOLITAN

JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.

Great Gold Jewelry Sale.

☞ ALL JEWELRY GOLD. Read advertisement on page 112. Certificates 25 cents; Circulars free. CALKINS & CO., 558 and 560 Broadway, New York.

CoughNoMore

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle. 524-575

Pile Remedy

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

1st. To the Military Man, Tourist and even the Civilian, these "novel productions" are of the utmost importance, being a saving of time, labor and money. Being manufactured on strictly scientific principles cannot possibly chafe or irritate the neck of the wearer. They are infinitely cheaper than paper or the finest Linen Collars, and neither can approach the snow whiteness of these indispensable requisites, adapted alike for Ladies, Gentlemen and also Young America.

They are easily adjusted, instantly washed with Soap, Water and Sponge, and fit for use in thirty seconds. The time is rapidly approaching when no "Gentleman's Wardrobe" will be complete without the (novel Coat of Mail) the American Steel Shirt Collars, Cuffs and Steel Shirt Bosoms. For sale by First Class Houses throughout every part of the civilized world, also in general use everywhere.

2d. Self-adjusting Enamelled "Snow White" Linen finished, $7 and $9 per doz. Samples mailed, 75c. and $1. Illusion Stitched, $1 25 and $1 50. Byron, with band, $2 50. Gents' Steel Shirt Bosoms, $5; Cuffs, $2; Suitable Neck Tie, $1. Ladies' "Steel Collars," $1 50; Cuffs, $1 50 per pair. Send "size" and "price." Trade supplied. BILLON & FOGGAN, Inventors, Patentees and Manufacturers, 78 Nassau St., N. Y.

TRY THE BEST.

A new Quarter of MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER, the Leading, Best and most Popular Agricultural, Literary and Family Newspaper in America, commenced Oct. 7. Now is the time to subscribe. Send $3 for a year—or, if you wish to know more of it first, the 13 numbers of this quarter (Oct. to January) will be sent, on trial, for 50 cents. Try the RURAL, and see if it is not like a honey-comb, having sweets in every cell. Address

D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

Randall's Practical Shepherd

Is by far the best, as well as the latest, work on American Sheep Husbandry, and should be in the hands of every flock master on the Continent. Twenty editions already sold! It is a large 12mo. volume of 454 pages, illustrated, printed and bound in extra style. Sent post-paid on receipt of price, $2. Address

D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

Persons with Violins,

Who wish a good collection of Music, will find it in "WINNER'S EXCELSIOR COLLECTION. Price 75 cents.

Excellent Duets for Piano and Violin, will be found in the "UNION COLLECTION." Price 75 cents. Both of the above are published by

OLIVER DITSON & CO.,

277 Washington street, Boston.

Of all Collections of Piano Music

That contained in the "HOME CIRCLE" is admitted to be the best that can be obtained in book form. It includes every variety, from the simplest to the most difficult, and has something suited to the taste and ability of every player. It is printed very clearly on good white paper, and cannot fail to prove satisfactory in every way to the purchaser. Two vols. Price of each, in boards, $2 50; cloth, $3; cloth, gilt, $4.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

There is no Book for Choirs

Superior to the "HARP OF JUDAH," by L. O. Emerson. Seventy-five Thousand Copies have already been sold, and the book gives the greatest degree of satisfaction to all who have used it. For Choirs, Singing Schools, Conventions and Singers at Home, it is a collection of music that is universally liked. Price $1 38 a copy; $12 a dozen.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION

BY THE

NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION,

713 BROADWAY, N. Y.

12 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from	$250	to	$500
15 Melodeons, Rosewood Cases	125	to	225
150 Music Boxes	15	to	45
100 Silver Revolving Patent Castors	15	to	40
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets	15	to	35
500 Sets Silver Tea and Table Spoons	15	to	30
100 Gold Hunting-case Watches	75	to	150
150 Diamond Rings	50	to	200
200 Gold Watches	60	to	100
300 Ladies' Gold Watches	60	to	85
500 Silver Watches	25	to	50

Diamond Pins, Gold Bracelets, Coral, Florentine Mosaic, Jet, Lava and Cameo Ladies' Sets, Gold Pens, with Gold and Silver Extension Holders, Sleeve Buttons, Sets of Studs, Neck Chains, Vest Chains, Plain and Chased Gold Rings, Gold Thimbles, Lockets, Silver Baskets and FINE JEWELLERY of every description, of the best make and latest styles, valued at $500,000!

To be Sold for One Dollar Each without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

Distribution is made in the following manner:

CERTIFICATES, naming each Article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these Envelopes, containing the Certificate or order for some Article, worth at least One Dollar at retail, will be delivered at our office or sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, on receipt of 25 cents. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it draws, and its value, which may be FROM ONE TO FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and can then send ONE DOLLAR and receive the Article named, or can choose any other one Article on our List of the same value.

☞ NO BLANKS.—Every purchaser gets value. Parties dealing with us may depend on having prompt returns, and the article drawn will be immediately sent to any address by return mail or express. Entire satisfaction guaranteed in all cases. Six Certificates for $1; thirteen for $2.

AGENTS WANTED. Send a stamp for a Circular. All letters should be addressed

T. BENTON & CO., Box 5567, P. O., New York.

THE GREAT GIFT SALE.

BY MRS. A. J. D.

Oh, say, have you been to the Gift Sale to-day?
Have you seen all the things they are giving away?
From the grandest piano in splendid rose case,
To a ring which the tiniest finger might grace,
There are tea setts of silver and watches of gold,
Bracelets, brooches, and ear-drops in numbers untold,

And beautiful ornaments made for the hair,
For the matron, the belle, and the beauty to wear,
And glittering diamonds unchangeably bright,
For ever reflecting the beautiful light.
There are sewing machines, with their fingers of steel,
That obedient sew at the turn of the wheel,

And the pale, weary seamstress is weary no more,
When you hear its glad song as you enter her door,
But, perhaps, you are thinking "all this is quite nice,
For those who are able to pay them their price."
'Their price!" my dear friend, they are given away,
For each article only One Dollar to pay.

The poorest may now with the wealthiest share
If only to Dunn & Co.'s house they repair,
Or address through the mail, if they live far away,
C. M. Dunn & Co., five fifty-eight in Broadway.

☞ Certificates 25 cents each; 5 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 100 for $15. Send stamp for circular.

Make Your Own Soap

With B. T. BABBIT'S Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker, warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or ley in market. Put up in cans of one pound, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest in the market. B. T. BABBIT, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington street, New York. 527-390

KUSTEL'S PROCESSES OF SILVER & GOLD EXTRACTION,

For general use, and especially for the

MINING PUBLIC

Of California and Nevada, with full explanations and directions for all metallurgical operations connected with silver and gold, from a preliminary examination of the ore to the final casting of the ingot. By GUIDO KUSTEL. ILLUSTRATED. 1 vol., 8vo., cloth $8. For sale by

D. VAN NOSTRAND,

No. 192 Broadway.

Send for catalogue of mining books.

The West Indian Hair Curler, warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair, on the first application, into short ringlets or waving massive curls. Sent to any address on receipt of $1. Address

THE HENDERTON HAIR CURLING CO.,

Box 5,251, New York Post Office.

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Sal Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., beside being the very best shaving compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE uproots hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body safely and quickly—warranted. LIQUID ROUGE, for pale lips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated faces. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Callender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co, Boston; Johnson, Detroit; Keyser, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$6 ELEGANT WATCH. $8

Fine Imported Watches for the Retail Trade at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. A BEAUTIFUL Double Case Silver Watch, small size, EXCELLENT TIME-KEEPER, with Chain, Key, and Gold Locket to each, $30 per Case of Six. Sample one, free by mail, for $6.

AN ELEGANT Gold Plated Engraved Double Case Watch, Fine Time-keeper, Gold Locket, Chain, Key, &c., to each, $42 per Case of Six. Sample, free by mail, for $8.

FINE DOUBLE HUNTING-CASE Gold Plated Watches, Jeweled, with Improvements, Regulated, per Case of Six, $60. Sample, by mail, $12.

Silver Composite Hunting Case Watches, Magic Cases, Jeweled, &c., per Case of Six, $60. Sample, $12.

COIN SILVER Hunting Lepines, Warranted, per Case of Six, $72. Sample, $15.

FINE SILVER English Levers, Full Jeweled, Superior, per Case of Six, $90. Sample, $20.

ENGLISH DUPLEX WATCHES, Extra Silver Cases, Large Jewels, Fancy Styles, per Case of Six, $104. Sample, $25.

IMPERIAL WATCH, with Thermometer, Compass, Calender, Attachment, Fine Movement, Jeweled, Complete, a Storm, Heat and Time Indicator, imitation of $200 Gold Watch; price, per Case of Six, $90. Sample, $20.

Gold and Silver Watches of every description. Catalogues mailed free. Safe delivery of all goods guaranteed. Address orders

CATELY BROTHERS, Importers,

102 Nassau St., N. Y. Established 1855.

CURIOUS FASTENERS

FOR EVERYBODY'S USE. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without tying. Send 25 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y. 521-33

Tin Type and Ferreotype Albums.—For holding 80 pictures, $1.50; 40 pictures, $1.25. Sent postpaid. TRADE PRICES $12.00 and $9.00 per doz.

W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York.

Holloway's Pills.—The estimation in which these medicines are held by the public, steadily increases their demand. They act directly on the system, removing all obstructions, renovating the springs of life, purifying the blood, and totally eradicating liver complaints, indigestion, pain in the side and general debility. Sold everywhere.

ARTHUR'S. HOME MAGAZINE.

TERMS: $2 50 a year; 3 copies for $6; 5 copies, and one to the getter-up of club, $10. Single numbers for sale by news agents throughout the United States. Two volumes a year, beginning in January and July. Address

T. S. ARTHUR & CO.,

527-32 323 Walnut st., Philadelphia, Pa.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent post-paid for 25 cents; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cents; 50 Photographs of Statesmen and Generals for 25 cents.; 100 photographs of Female Beauties for 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address

527-31 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

A New and Valuable Book Just Published. Every female should have a copy to avoid suffering, trouble, expense and imposition. Sent by return mail on receipt of price, $1. Address J. C. MILTON & CO., Publishers, 208 Broadway, N. Y. 527-8

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of October 10, 1865,

No. 7445	drew	$100,000
No. 19384	"	50,000
No. 15891	"	25,000
No. 16705	"	10,000
No. 13796	"	5,000
No. 9217	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Prizes paid in gold. Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

IVORY AND PEARL.

Sleeve Buttons, $1, $2 and $3. Ivory and Pearl Jewelry, $3, $4, $5 and $6 per sett each. Ivory and Pearl Belt Buckles, $1 50 to $6 each. Wholesale and retail. WILLIAM M. WELLING, Importer and Manufacturer, 571 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SUITS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDDS, ETC.,

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive—as certificates, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time give our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country. J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

269 Broadway, New York.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental acquirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unerring rules of sexes—an extraordinary book, of great interest. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address

tf T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

☞ Something New. ☜

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.

S. W. RICE & CO.,

tf 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, has now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of any person, with the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, in sealed envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address

Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,

524-26 P. O. Drawer 292, Albany, N. Y

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS produced by the use of

PROF. O. PHELPS BROWN'S

FRISER LE CHEVAUX.

One application warranted to curl the most straight and stubborn hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Europe and America for many years, with results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and prepaid, $1. Circulars and testimonials free. Address

BEEBER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,

P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.

516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

AGENTS !!!

$10 Per day made selling the Sketches emitted from the NEGOTIATING PERSONS OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS, and Scenes from Life as PERSONIFIED OF WAR," with key of 24 pages. It is decidedly the best ornamental, historical work that has ever been presented to the public, and will be purchased by everybody. Copies sent free to agents on receipt of 75 cts. Call on, or address with stamp, HOPKINS & CO., 74 Beecker street, New York.

The Great Money-Making Article.

Everybody needs it. Agents or Soldiers can make $10 a day. Sample, with particulars, sent free by mail, for 26 cents. Address

699 E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

SAVAGE & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS OF LANTERNS AND BURNERS,

286 Greenwich St., New York.

Fifty varieties of the latest improved Kerosene Oil Lanterns; also Patentees of the CELEBRATED

SAVAGE AND CO. NON-CHIMNEY BURNER. Agents wanted unanimously. Send for circular.

524-25 SAVAGE & CO., 286 Greenwich St., N.Y.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,

523-53 806 Broadway, New York.

A GIFT FOR YOU AT THE PHILADELPHIA GIFT BOOK PURCHASING HOUSE.

The Eleventh Year of the Enterprise.

NEW BOOKS AND NEW GIFTS.

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK.

A new Classified Catalogue of Books just issued, of over 50 pages of Books in every department of Literature, with full instructions for forming Clubs, &c., &c. The best place in the world to purchase Books is at the "EVANS ORIGINAL GIFT BOOK SALE."

Catalogues sent free on receipt of 2 ct. stamp. Address G. G. EVANS,

525-28 630 Chesnut street, Phila.

$8,000 a Year can be made with the instructions which I send everywhere for $1. Address

524-27 W. FRIZZELL, Baltimore, Md.

GEORGE L. CANNON'S AIR WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS, KITCHEN RANGES &c.

614 BROADWAY NEW YORK. BETWEEN BLEECKER & HOUSTON STS.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin. Whelf French Skin Enamel, for whitening, beautifying, and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, and is necessary to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite 5,000 different kinds. Send stamp for a Catalogue.

000 VICTOR DELAPO, 99 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de Visite, latest importations. Also, New Books and Engraving Articles. Send for Circular.

000 PIERRE RIBON, 37 Ann St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our manufacture of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we are headquarters for the following, viz.

Stereopes and Stereoscopic Views.

Of these we have an immense assortment, including

VIEWS OF THE WAR,

Obtained at great expense and forming a complete

PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE LATE UNION CONTEST

Bull Run, Dutch Gap,
Yorktown, Fenton Trains,
Gettysburg, Hanover Junction,
Fair Oaks, Lookout Mountain,
Savage Station, Chickahominy,
Fredericksburgh, City Point,
Fairfax, Nashville,
Richmond, Petersburgh,
Deep Bottom, Belle Plain,
Manitoa, Chattanooga,
Fort Morgan, Atlanta,
Charleston, Mobile,
Florida, Strawberry Plains,

&c. &c.

American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, &c., &c. Also, Receiving Stereoscopes, for public or private viewing. Sent by express, at our risk and expense, on receipt of Stamp.

Photographic Albums.

We were the first to introduce these into the United States and we warrant them to possess a quality in great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50. Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior to any others manufactured, by whatever they will be sent by mail, FREE, on receipt of price.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER. ☜

The Trade will find our Albums the most Saleable they can buy.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS.

Our Catalogue contains over 1,000 PORTRAITS different subjects (to which additions are continually being made) of Eminent Persons, viz.:

100 Statesmen, 200 Authors, 100 Actresses,
100 Military Heroes, 200 Actors, 100 Opera Singers,
100 Naval Heroes, 200 Other Celebrities, 150 Divines,
60 Artists, 130 Beauties, 50 Prominent Women.

Also, a large variety of Works of Art, Nudes, &c.

Including reproductions of celebrated Paintings, Statuary, Paintings, Statues, &c. Catalogue sent on receipt of Stamp. An order for three Photos from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1.25, and sent by mail, free.

Any Photograph not in our Catalogue will be sent to order, will please forward the name of the person with stamp enclosed.

☞ Photographs sent C. O. D. to any part of the country. ☜

Beauty.—Hunt's Bloom of Roses,

A charming, delicate and perfect natural color for the cheeks or lips; does not wash off; defies the skin's romance paramount for years and cannot be detected. Price $1. 18 cents by mail, securely packed from observation. HUNT & CO., PERFUMERS,

000 123 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Short-Hand Without a Master.

By which the method of taking down Sermons, Lectures, Speeches, Trials, etc., may be attained in a few hours' leisure. Fifty-first Thousand. Price 25 cents. Send orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York.

JOB MILLER, JR.

A Book crammed full of Jokes, Comical Stories, Witty Sayings, Funny Puns, Laughable Conundrums, Humorous Poetry, &c. &c. Price 10 cents. Sent orders to P. O. Box 3,410, New York. 526-5

Curl your Hair.

One application will curl your hair into beautiful curls and last six months. Will not stain gives or need be refunded. Price 50 cents. Address M. A. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill. 526-5

Writing Paper, Envelopes,

Blank and Memorandum Books, Cheap, at

522-13 LEACH'S, 80 Nassau street, New York.

Agents WANTED Agents

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 675 Broadway, New York. 521-32

$3.00 ALBUMS. $3.00

A Fine Album, two Gill Chaste, Relief Side, and finished, for holding 60 FULL SIZE Card Photographs. Sent by express for $3.00. The cheapest and cheapest Album in the market. TRADE and Agents supplied. $24.00 per dozen. NEE W. C. WEMYSS, 675 Broadway, New York. Ladies and Gents, please send your address for interesting catalogue.

To Beautify the Complexion,

USE SHULTZ' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.

The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn, in from four to six days. It whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a freshness and transparency to the complexion which is perfectly natural, and without injury to the skin. No toilet is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents. Address

P. F. SHULTZ,

524-30 385 River street, Troy, N. Y.

1,000,000 Purchasers Wanted.

Articles to suit everybody. Catalogue sent free. W. C. WEMYSS, 675 Broadway, New York. 522-33

Only 60 Cents.

The Art of Painting Photographs in Water Colors. Bound in morocco; also a full set of Paints and Brushes. Mailed free for 60 cents. Address

CRAWFORD & WILLIS,

524-7 No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Love! Love!—The secret how to gain an loving love of the fair sex. Sent by mail for 5 cents. Address

526-9 J. F. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED.

$10 A Day can be Easy Made $10

By selling Engravings, Card Photographs, and Stationery Packets. Our Stationery packages excell all others. Each packet contains Paper, Envelopes, Pens, Pencil, Seal, and Jewellery worth a dollar at retail, price only 50 cts. We will send Agents 100 Packages and a Silver Watch for $17. Also, a fine assortment of Fancy Envelopes, Pens and Portraits, very popular and saleable; will send 100 assorted kinds for $13 that will realize $50; will send a sample lot for $5 that will sell for $15. Send stamp for catalogue, terms, etc.

0 HASKINS & CO., 50 Beekman street, N. Y.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry. Why every woman should marry. All may marry to know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by Dr. J. B. FOWLER, 180 pages. Mailed in sealed envelopes on receipt of 25 cts. Address 12 White Street, New York.

SELPHO'S PATENT LEG & ARM.

516 BROADWAY.

The most perfect substitute for lost limbs ever invented. Examination Free. Send for Pamphlet. SOLDIERS SUPPLIED FREE by order of the SURGEON-GENERAL. 526-7

HOW ALL MAY MARRY.

Courtship Made Easy. New Edition—Illustrated.

Treating on "Psychologic Fascination," showing how any person of either sex can fascinate, win the undying love, and secure any person they may desire, irrespective of age or personal appearance. Sent by mail for 50 cents, by S. D. LOCKE & CO., Box 1918, Portland, Maine.

The Confessions and Experience of an Invalid.

Published for the benefit and as a warning to young men and others who suffer from Nervous Debility, etc., supplying at the same time the means of Self-Cure. By one who has cured himself after being put to great expense through medical imposition and quackery. By inclosing a postpaid, addressed envelope, single copies may be had of the author, NATHANIEL MAYFAIR, 24½, Brooklyn, King's County, N. Y. tf

6,000 Agents Wanted, to sell SIX NEW and STARTLING INVENTIONS; sure to please families; all pay great profits. Send 15 cents and get 56 pages; or 25 cents and get 92 pages. Sample gratis.

517-29 EPHRAIM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE !

MISS JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Horoscope, guarantees to produce a correct picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, together with the date of marriage. This is no humbug, as thousands can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, color of eyes and hair, with a lock of hair, with stamped envelope, plainly addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address Miss JENNIE M. FRANKLIN, Box 3,667, West Troy, N. Y. 526-27

The Book of Wonders tells how to make CIDER without apples or any other fruit. It also contains the Hunter's Secret, how to catch Fish and all kinds of Game; how to make all kinds of Liquors; all kinds of Cigars and Smoking Mixtures; Gambling Exposed; Magic; Colloquium Made Easy; Information of importance to Ladies; how to make Candies, and many others. &c., &c., &c. Sent, securely sealed, for 25 cents. Address Box 3057 P. O., New York. 525-29

AND

MOUSTACHES

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by the use of

DR. SEVIGNE'S

RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.

The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Roots and Hair in a manner heretofore unknown. It has been used by the elite of Paris and London with the most flattering success.

The names of all purchasers will be registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Send stamp for circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

HENRIOT, SAUNIER & CO., Chemists,

P. O. Drawer 21, Troy, N. Y.,

516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newberne, Fort Hoe, Hilton Head, and elsewhere sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 63 Broadway. Suiters charged low rates. 000o

Pimples, Moth, Freckles, Sunburn, and Tan positively removed by the application of DR. GRAFF'S Sun Flower Extract, warranted. Price $1. For sale only by Dr. DR GRAFF, Medical Hall, Albany, N. Y. Sent by mail. 525-28

Spanish Curling Cream, Warranted to Curl the most straight or Stiff Hair. Mailed for $1. Address GEO. BLACKLE & CO., 713 Broadway, N. Y.

COMIC CARD PHOTOS,

Of the latest and best subjects. Agents wanted in every town. Send 10 cents for sample and catalogue to H. IRVINGTON & CO., No. 680 Broadway, New York.

Shults' Oxgont, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid for 60 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

The Great New England Remedy!

Dr. J. W. Poland's

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicte'd throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of six years' use in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the trees from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Pain in the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would learn the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWETT, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. Burnhams & Van Schaack, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, Wholesale Agents for the West; Pelre F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE.

THE POCKET SEWING MACHINE,

Specially adapted for Quilting, Embroideries and Braiding.

Easily used—being held in the hand, and traverses the material—being held in the opposite direction; works with great rapidity, and gives entire satisfaction. Follows any seam stamped on the cloth. Sent by mail to any part of the United States. Plain Steel Machine, $5; Heavy Steel Machine, $6. State the kind you like. Address A. S. GILCHRIST, Secretary Pocket Sewing Machine Company, 17 Wall street, New York. tf

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent free by mail to any address on receipt of an order.

HUNT & CO., 133 Nassau St., N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed

From all parts of the body, in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER." Mailed to any address for $1, by S. C. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 525-37

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE AND PIMPLE WASH." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 520-37

Asthma Cured.

Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure in a few days by use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Cases of from ten to twenty years' standing yield at once to its potent influence. Sent postpaid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 23 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free. 525-37

A CURIOSITY ! !

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GREAT PAPER, just published at the Literary Bureau. Sent Gratis. CHARLES E. MACKEY, Literary Bureau, New York.

Adventures of Jeff. Davis.

A most comical book; just out; 40 fine engravings; only 15 cents; 10 for $1; sent free. Address HUNTER & BRO., Hinsdale, N. H. 524-7

Agents Wanted.

Live Agents wanted everywhere. If you want employment and a good chance to make money, send your address and receive my circular, free by mail.

BENJAMIN W. HITCHCOCK,

524-7 14 Chamber's street, N. Y.

$90 A Month.

Agents wanted for six entirely new articles, just out. Address G. T. GAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine. 522-48

WHISKERS. $1.

$1. For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the Celebrated Canadian Whisker Dye, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face in six weeks, or upon bald heads in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction in all cases or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address

P. O. Box, 210. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburgh, N. Y.

525-37

New Books, New Books, and Sporting GOODS. New styles Cartes de Visite. Sample 36 cents. Catalogues sent Free. Address J. F. JAGGERS, 608 Broadway, New York.

Sensealogy, or the Secrets of Success. How to make a Fortune, Win the Affections of any one you choose, the Matrimonial Agent, St. Rech, Guide to Beauty, Ladies' Book, Marriage Guide, Parlor Magic Easy, How to Make French Brandy, Jamaica Rum Liquor Coloring, and over 40 original receipts, either of which will enable a person to make a fortune. All in search of a legitimate business should read this book. Sent by mail for 25 cents.

EVANS & CO.,

tf Box 1,315, Philadelphia.

$75 PER MONTH and all expenses paid by the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine Agents. Address S. S. HERRINTON & CO., Detroit. 526-7

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (24 views), $1. 50 per hundred; $10 per dozen; also Mailed Back Playing Cards at $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price. Address

FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.

tf

Clergymen, Teachers, The Press,

Unite in saying that the new juvenile magazine

Our Young Folks

Is the best magazine for the young ever published in America. It is filled with attractive illustrations, and its articles, in prose and poetry, are by the best writers for children in the country.

It is sold at the low price of $2 a year. Each number contains 64 pages, beautifully printed. A liberal discount to clubs. Send 20 cents for specimen copy and circular to the Publishers, TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

o

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $20 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gold and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to establish agencies. County rights free, sales enormous, demand increasing, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements, free.

M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers,
o 102 Nassau street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED

To canvass for our new, beautifully illustrated, and thrillingly interesting volume of army experience, CAMP FIRE, AND COTTON FIELD, by THOMAS W. KNOX, Herald correspondent. Full of startling incidents, amusing Anecdotes, ingenious Stratagems, Life in Camp and Bivouac; together with ample and reliable directions to those who design engaging in Cotton culture at the South. Send for circular.

tfo BELFORD, CLARKE & CO., 19 Beekman street, N. Y.

DON'T FAIL TO NOTICE

B. T. HAYWARD'S

o CUTS INSIDE.

SMOLANDER'S

COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF

BUCKU,

Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, &c. Price ONE DOLLAR. Sold by D. BARNES & CO., and P. C. WELLS & CO., New York. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents.
520-35o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by Reide's Crimean Ointment. Price, 35 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents.
520-35o

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the least money is the HUSSEY PEN, warranted for one year, 14 carats fine; also every variety of Penholders on hand. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office, No. 13 Maiden lane.

THE DAYS OF BRASS JEWELRY ARE OVER.

THE COSMOPOLITAN

Jewelers' Association.

Capital, $2,500,000.

Great One Price Gold Sale.

SELL NO BRASS OR SO-CALLED PLATED JEWELRY.

WARRANT ALL

JEWELRY GOLD, OR NO SALE!

Let it be distinctly understood that this is emphatic ally a GOLD SALE, by an association of manufacturers, on a one price average system, and that not a single article of brass or plated jewelry is included in the whole immense stock.

250,000

Piano, Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings, Sets of Rich Silver-ware, Fine Gold Jewelry, Photograph Albums, &c.,

WORTH $2,500,000.

All to be sold for two dollars each, an average price of one-fifth the usual cost, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

Inclosed $2 WORTH FOR $2, THE PROOF.

☞ We guarantee to send any customer in exchange for the least article they may get for $2, a Splendid Rich Chased or Engine Bosom Gilt Dinner Dish, or Cutter, Jos plate, valued at $10, or a beautiful 80 Picture Morocco Photographic Album, valued at $6, and you have the possibility of getting a

Fine Watch or Piano.

Send 25 cents for the Golden Envelope, containing valuable principle and songs, and one of the sealed Certificates, which are well mixed and taken out regardless of choice. On receipt of this will inform you what you can get for $2, from a Butter Dish or Cutter, worth $10, to a Watch or a Grand Piano, worth $1,000. Also will be sent our circular, containing list of articles and full particulars. I also want to agents, to whom great inducements are offered. Five envelopes sent for $1; 11 for $2; 90 for $15. Address

CALKINS & CO., Managers,
850 Broadway, N. Y.

Or if nearer you, 36 South Fourth st., St. Louis, Mo.; or 83 and 85 Madison st., Chicago, Ill.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 900 TIMES, mailed to any address for 50 cts
BOWEN & CO., Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Try Ward's India-Rubber Enameled
PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS,
ALSO, WARD'S FRENCH PRINTED
PAPER COLLARS & CUFFS,
AT ALL GENTS' FURNISHING STORES.
The Trade supplied at
No 387 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

BRITANNIA.—"Now hurry up, Hibernia, take off those things and clear away—I expect some French visitors."

HIBERNIA.—"Hurry up yerself, yer old divil! Arrah, now, you'll do yer own dir-rir-ty wor-r-rk yerself in future. Sure an' I've got a Faanian young man that's going to set me up Independent."

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND
SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

THE LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING EMPORIUM
OF
THOMAS AND MORRISETT,
No. 848 Broadway,
SUPPLIES EVERY ARTICLE A LADY, CHILD, OR INFANT REQUIRES, in the furnishing of their TOILET OR WARDROBE.
520-26o

Decalcomanie, a New Process to Embellish Porcelain, Wood, Glass, Silk, Velvet, Leather, etc. Can be practiced by every one at P. E. VAUQUERET & SIL, Broadway. 524-7o

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S PIANOFORTES.

99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

GROVER & BAKER'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch
SEWING MACHINES,
495 BROADWAY, N. Y. otf

WHEELER & WILSON'S
HIGHEST PREMIUM
LOCK STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
625 adway, New York.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOSTADER'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and can by adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. They are not a whisky drink.—Indianapolis Gazette.

H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist, 594 Broadway, New York, Agent. 526-36o

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address
o C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.

Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-35o

For a Fortune
Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-33o

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $25 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufactories and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, on an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

$1,000,000 Worth
OF
Watches, Jewelry, and Silver-ware,

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive:

100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches.....each $125
500 Silver Watches.....each $30 to 35
10,000 Gold Pens and Silver Case.....each $ 5 to 8

And a large assortment of Jewelry and Silver-ware. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

Certificates naming each article and its value are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents—5 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5. Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,
o No. 36 Beekman st., P. O. Box 4270, N. Y.

"A Scientific Wonder."

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 29th 1865.)

AN EXACT AND RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and warranted to DENOTE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong—It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be fast or too slow. Correct in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by "Royal Letters Patent." All attempts to imitate are an imposition. Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to J. W. BELLAMY & CO., Sole Proprietors, o 294 and 300 Broadway, N. Y.

o Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers.

STEINWAY & SONS,
Manufacturers of
Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,
Warerooms, No. 71 & 73 East 14th St.,
Between Union Square and Irving Place,
NEW YORK. tfo

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, per return of 10 cents.
Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D.,
000 1130 Broadway, New York.

To all wanting Farms.

Address as orders to
FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,
Office, 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$7 ARMY WATCH $10

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Cut Hands, "English Movements," and Correct Timekeeper, with an accurate "Miniature Calendar," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat case, with A BEAUTIFUL VEST CHAIN, for only $10.

A neat SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Miniature Calendar, &c., specially adapted to the Army. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.

English and American LEVERS from $25 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.

Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20

$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and putting up the Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions cost $20. L. L. TODD & CO., 39 Nassau street, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.
519-31o

The National Park Bank of New York.

Capital.....$2,000,000 | Surplus.....$1,200,000

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

F. L. WORTH, Cashier.
New York, August 21, 1865. 519-31o

Buy Me and Try Me.—Only 5 cents (five cents). J. G. ISELIN, 80 Nassau street, N. Y. tfo

250 RARE RECEIPTS

Containing many Secrets and much valuable information never before made public, including over 100 receipts now in exclusive use by the celebrated Metropolitan Hotel of this city. Price 20 cents; mailed, postage free. Address HUTCHINSON & CO., Publishers, 850 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

CLOCK'S

Hair Restorer Restores Gray Hair.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer makes hair grow Bald Heads.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Stops Hair from Falling Out.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Prevents Headache.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer is elegantly Perfumed.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer is all that can be claimed as a dressing.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer possesses all the merit claimed for it. A single trial convinces the most skeptical of its value. If, after a thorough trial of two bottles it does not give perfect satisfaction, the money will be refunded.
Sold everywhere at $1 per bottle.
Six bottles for $5.
DR. F. B. CLOCK,
Proprietor,
Manchester, N. H.
(H. T. HELMBOLD,
Drug and Chemical Warehouse,
No. 594 Broadway,
526-36o General Agent, New York City.

MUSIC OMNIBUS.

No. 3, contains 1,000 Pieces of Music for the FLUTE, VIOLIN, CLARIONET, or FIFE. Price $1 25 cents. Mailed post-paid.

VIOLINS,

Including Bow, Strings, Boxing, &c., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN, red, brown, tyrol, $3 50, $3, $4.
MITTEWALD, double Rib, $5, $7, $9, $11.
FRENCH, blocked and lined, $6, $8, $10, $12, $15.
ITALIAN, inlaid, $12, $14, $16, $18, $20.
OLD MASTERS, very fine tone, $30, $40, $50, $75 to $100.

All orders, large or small, promptly attended to.
FREDERICK BLUML,
tf 208 Bowery, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE ABOMINATION OF
PRACTICAL, UTILITY AND
EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

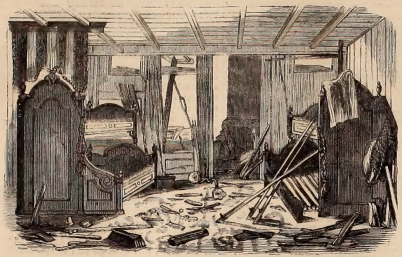
Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a novel, wonderful and Elegant Invention of Novelty; is noiseless in operation, uses the smallest needle, and will sew as much cotton as any machine. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with unparalleled rapidity. Every machine is stitched to each evolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Baffle, Quilt, Bind, Braid, and do fine work, &c.; requires no Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and is the only practical family machine; it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is not a small Pocket Machine positively but is a first class work like others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work must pass Perfectly Flat like all Table Machines.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is as easily understood that it can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.



Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Indacements sent free.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 528 VOL. XXI.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 11, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

THE CATASTROPHE ON BOARD THE STEAMER ST. JOHN, ON SUNDAY, OCT. 29.

STATE ROOMS NOS. 121 AND 123.

THE SCALDED FIREMAN LEAPING OVERBOARD.

THE CORONER'S JURY IDENTIFYING THE BODIES PREVIOUS TO THEIR REMOVAL FROM THE STEAMER.

MRS. SEARLES RECOGNIZING H[illegible]

THE SCENE IN THE GRAND SALOON.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 11, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the lea only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby s[illegible] trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

American Credit Abroad.

IF the credit of States were the exact measure of their solvency or financial capacities, we should find little stimulus to our vanity in the prices which our national securities command in foreign markets. The latest advices from Europe state American six per cent. gold interest bearing bonds at 67½ to 68, while British consols bearing but three per cent. command 88 to 89—a difference of 20 per cent. against the United States. Now as the United States has always paid the interest on its obligations, and has undoubted and increasing ability to continue to do so, and to pay the principal of its debt when due, it is a matter of curious inquiry, how it is that its securities are regarded as worth less than one-half those of Great Britain? We say less than one-half, because bearing double the rate of interest, all other things being equal, they ought to command double the price, whereas they command only about three-fourths the price. That British securities should command a better price relatively in the British market, than foreign securities, of equal intrinsic value, is not unnatural, but without special reason the difference should not exceed two or three per cent.

Among European States the credit of Great Britain stands first. Holland is next to England, Belgium and France come next, Denmark follows, and a little below Russia and Sweden are about on the same level. Then come Spain, Portugal, Austria, and, much behind, Italy. The United States and, Italy are as nearly as possible on the same level, in respect of financial credit.

Among American States, the credit of Brazil, previous to her recent complications, stood at par. We speak now of her 5 per cents., and in face of her present troubles, she has secured a considerable loan at 74. Next to Brazil, and for the moment above her, stands Chili, then come Peru and Buenos Ayres—the latter, even, ranking considerably above the United States!

With a grander territory, a more active and intelligent population, vaster resources, a more vigorous industry, unbounded enterprize, second to no country on earth in all the elements of power, with a population on the whole of higher morality—how is it that the credit of the United States stands below bankrupt Austria, effete and sapless Spain, and wretched Brazil?

Conceding all the detraction from her credit due to a vast accumulation of debt, State as well as National, and all that may result from monarchical and commercial hostility, still there must be something beyond all this to bear down the securities of the nation to their present absurd level in the foreign markets. They should be sought for, as the advertisements say, "children should cry for them," as at once the safest and best investment on earth, in the way of plighted governmental faith. Not that we think it desirable that our obligations should be bandied about in foreign markets. We regret that a single dollar's worth of American paper is held abroad, and that its value should, ever so remotely, depend upon whether any "prince or potentate" may happen to sneeze at an inauspicious moment, or bow coldly to some foreign minister. We are rather grateful than otherwise, that Louis Napoleon should prohibit the quotation of American stocks on his Parisian Bourse, lest Frenchmen might be tempted to withdraw their garlic-scented francs from those rentes on which his ricketty throne mainly rests. We are far from unhappy to know that the house in London through which the United States has transacted its foreign business for several decades, with heavy profits as well as prestige to the establishment, has never said or done aught to enhance the value of American securities or the credit of the country. It does not surprise us to read in the daily journals, that on the Sunday after the first battle of Bull Run, in 1861, the American agent of the house to which we allude, called upon the proper Secretary at Washington, and requested the Government to give security for the amount due his principals on account. The balance was about $40,000. The Secretary informed him that the Government would not probably break up before business hours the next day, and that he must request him to call again.

This kind of animosity, jealousy, or what not, after all, cannot account fully, or even in considerable part, for the discredit in which American securities are held in Europe. The onus of the former, as well as actual state of facts in this respect, rests mainly on the wretched criminal now awaiting trial, for the highest offence known to our laws, in Fortress Monroe—we mean the man whom we last week characterized as the apostle and high priests of Repudiation. When communities began to act on his teachings, and from his example, then public credit began to suffer. It has never fully recovered from the shock which he and his associates inflicted. The odium which he and those like him brought on the American name and credit still endures, even when the men and the measures which drew it down have been forgotten, or only live to be the exponents of a greater infamy and a darker atrocity.

It would be fortunate indeed for us, and for the world, if the unclean brood of Repudiators, born of Jeff. Davis and the scum of the Democratic party, were in the same category with their leader, within the limits of four heavy walls, and with no outlook except towards a well-earned gallows, not too far distant, nor too likely to remain unused.

The forms of Repudiation are as multifarious as those of murder. The criminality is not less in fact, when it takes the downright, and, perhaps, the more manly form of absolute and distinct refusal to meet a solemn obligation, than when it proposes and advocates, through the basest of appeals, framed with devilish skill, to operate on the ignorance and passions of men, measures that may vary or detract from, even to the extent of an iota or a tittle, the compacts and contracts of the country. The distrust in American faith originally created abroad by Jeff. Davis and his followers, strengthened by the mendacious representations of adventurers and schemers from this side of the Atlantic, and which, at one time, promised to be overcome by a fairer dealing, and the substitution of a class of public men of higher honor, has already been revived, and will be deepened when the news of the action of certain factions, desecrating the name of "Democratic," come to be known in Europe. Men abroad will be unable to understand, as we do, how contemptible these factions are, and how thoroughly their doctrines are detested by the people at large. A nation's honor and credit, like the virtue of Cæsar's wife, ought to be above suspicion. But they will be, and ought to be, suspected, when men can be found to advocate, as they are advocating in various parts of the country, the Repudiation, in part, of the agreements entered into between the Government and its creditors. To insist on taxing the evidences of debt created by the nation during the period of its peril, against the stipulations then made, differs in degree only from claiming the right to refuse to pay both interest and principal. It may suit a demagogue's purpose, before a debased and alien community, to advocate a policy, or rather an outrage on public morality, like this; but it must not be forgotten how such advocacy must react on the interests of the nation, not to speak of its reputation.

Let all right-thinking Americans ask themselves, first, how it is that the credit of the United States is below that of wretched Austria and abject Spain, below even that of anarachical Peru and unexplored Buenos Ayres; and, secondly, how far its discredit is due to the toleration of demagogues and repudiators, whether reduplicating themselves as rebels, or seeking to obtain power and still further degrade the nation, under the shelter of a popular party designation? These are practical questions, involving not alone grand material interests, but, what is of more consequence, the national character.

The Demand on Great Britain.

A FORMAL demand has been made by our Government on that of Great Britain for indemnity for the damages inflicted on American shipping and commerce by the Anglo-rebel pirates Alabama, Shenandoah, etc. This has led to a long and able correspondence between Earl Russell and Mr. Adams, U. S. Minister in England, which has been published. This correspondence commences with a letter from Mr. Adams in April last, and closes with another from him of the date of September 18th. The total result is that Great Britain denies any responsibility in the premises, refuses in advance any submission of that question to arbitration, and suggests the creation of a commission, to which shall be submitted "all claims arising during the late civil war, which the two Powers shall agree to refer." To this Mr. Adams responds, without at all receding from his broad demand at the outset, that he will refer the suggestion as to a commission to his Government, intimating, at the same time, a suspicion of Earl Russell's good faith in making it, as from the course of the discussion he must discover that it would probably be declined. In other words, he suspects Earl Russell of a design to avoid meeting a great international issue, on the decision of which the integrity and consistency of public law must rest, by substituting a minor one—a comparatively petty one of dollars and cents.

The grounds of complaint and demand for reparation were submitted by Mr. Adams in the following clear and compact shape:

1. That the act of recognition by her Majesty's Government of insurgents as belligerents on the high seas before they had a single vessel afloat, was precipitate and unprecedented.

2. That it had the effect of creating these parties belligerents after the recognition, instead of merely acknowledging an existing fact.

3. That this creation has been since effected exclusively from the ports of her Majesty's kingdom and its dependencies, with the aid and co-operation of her Majesty's subjects.

4. That during the whole continuance of the struggle in America, of nearly four years in duration, there has been no appearance of the insurgents as a belligerent on the ocean, excepting in the shape of British vessels, constructed, equipped, supplied, manned and armed in British ports.

5. That during the same period it has been the constant and persistent endeavor of my Government to remonstrate in every possible form against the abuse of the neutrality of this kingdom, and to call upon her Majesty's Government to exercise the necessary powers to put an effective stop to it.

6. That, although the desire of her Majesty's ministers to exert themselves in the suppression of these abuses is freely acknowledged, the efforts which they made proved in a great degree powerless, from the inefficiency of the law on which they relied, and from their absolute refusal, when solicited, to procure additional powers to attain the object.

7. That by reason of the failure to check this flagrant abuse of neutrality, the issue from British ports of a number of British vessels, with the aid of the recognition of their belligerent character in all the ports of her Majesty's dependencies round the globe, has resulted in the burning and destroying on the ocean a large number of merchant vessels, and a very large amount of property belonging to the people of the United States.

8. That, in addition to this direct injury, the action of these British-built, manned and armed vessels has had the indirect effect of driving from the sea a large portion of the commercial marine of the United States, and to a corresponding extent enlarging that of Great Britain, thus enabling one portion of the British people to derive an unjust advantage from the wrong committed on a friendly nation by another person.

9. That the injuries thus received by a country which has meanwhile sedulously endeavored to perform all its obligations, owing to the imperfection of the legal means at hand to prevent them as well as the unwillingness to seek for more stringent powers, are of so great a nature as in reason and justice to constitute a valid claim for reparation and indemnification.

In his correspondence, Mr. Adams makes no suggestion of arbitration in the premises, but makes his demand and appeal directly to the British Government, on the broadest grounds of equity and international law. Earl Russell seeks to change the issue so squarely and fairly put, and assumes what he had no right to assume, that the United States would itself consent to submit its clear rights in the premises to arbitration. Availing himself of a reference to the willingness of the United States to submit some specific and minor issues to arbitration, contained in a letter from Mr. Adams, as long ago as October, 1863, he proceeds to decline that mode of settling the new and broader issues now raised, and in respect of which the United States has made no proffer of the kind. He also takes occasion to decline peremptorily to make any reparation or compensation for the action of the Alabama, well knowing that the reclamation on the part of the United States was not circumscribed to the injuries inflicted by that vessel alone. Why this limitation, it is hard to say, except, we suppose, the puissant Earl intends to leave an open question in case of need, through which he may escape future pressure. His language is as follows:

It appears to Her Majesty's Government that there are but two questions by which the claim of compensation could be tested. The one is: Have the British Government acted with due diligence, or, in other words, with good faith and honesty, in the maintenance of the neutrality they proclaimed? The other is: Have the law officers of the crown properly understood the Foreign Enlistment Act, when they decline, in June, 1862, to advise the detention and seizure of the Alabama, and on other occasions when they were asked to detain other ships building or fitting in British ports?

It appears to Her Majesty's Government that neither of these questions could be put to a foreign government with any regard to the dignity and character of the British Crown and the British nation.

Her Majesty's Government are the sole guardians of their own honor. They cannot admit that they may have acted with bad faith in maintaining the neutrality they professed. The law officers of the crown must be held to be better interpreters of a British statute than any foreign government can be presumed to be. Her Majesty's Government must, therefore, decline either to make reparation and compensation for the capture made by the Alabama, or to refer the question to any foreign State.

Her Majesty's Government conceive that if they were to act otherwise, they would endanger the position of neutrals in all future wars.

Her Majesty's Government are, however, ready to consent to the appointment of a commission, to which will be referred all claims arising during the late civil war, which the two Powers shall agree to refer to the commissioners.

Mr. Adams, holding always in view the dignity and magnitude of the issue, and appreciating, with true statesmanship, the importance of the principles involved, and the necessity among civilized nations for their correct interpretation, declines being turned aside from his purpose of having them vindicated, by the pettifogging expedients and evasions of Earl Russell. He tells the Earl to excuse his earnestness, for, "upon a correct decision in this controversy may depend the security which the commerce of belligerents will hereafter enjoy on the high seas, against the hazard of being swept from them through the acts of nations professing to be neutral, and bound to be friendly."

And adds:

"If it can be fairly established as a principle of the international code, that a neutral power is the sole judge of the degree to which it has done its duty under a code of its own making, for the prevention of gross and flagrant outrages, initiated in its own ports by the agent of one belligerent in co-operation with numbers of its own subjects, and perpetrated upon the commerce of the other on the high seas; if it be conceded that the neutral, upon reclamation made for the injuries thus done by reason of the manifest inefficiency of its means of repression, which it has at all times the power to improve at will, can deliberately decline to respond to any such appeal, fall back upon the little that it has attempted as an excuse, and thenceforward claim with justice to be released from the inevitable consequences that must ensue from its inaction, then it must surely follow that the only competition between neutral Powers hereafter will be, not which shall do the most, but which shall do the least to fulfill its obligations of interdiction of the industry and enterprize of its people, in promoting the conflicts that take place between belligerents on the ocean. If this be once recognized as good law through the authority which the powerful influence of her Majesty's Government can attach to it, I dare not venture to foresee how much reluctance there may be on the part of the people whom I have the honor to represent to accept and act upon it."

In another place Mr. Adams significantly suggests to Earl Russell that there is another commerce on the seas, offering quite as tempting prizes to freebooters, fitted out in neutral ports, as was afforded to British pirates during our late war. Having suffered from laxity in international faith and disregard of neutral obligations, we seek to fortify the former and make the neutral obligations imperative. If England does not concord with us now, when held to an accountability—which, when she permitted the outrages on our commerce to take place, she never supposed we should have the ability to hold her to—then she may look to suffer more severely even than we suffered, when next embroiled in domestic or foreign war. Mr. Adams paints the consequences of the refusal of Great Britain to act justly in this matter, and we hope the doughty Earl is pleased with the picture!

"If," says he, "the examples thus set by her Majesty's Government should come to be generally adopted, and the principles of neutrality upon which it rests be recognized as a part of the code of international law, then it is not difficult to foresee the probable consequence. A new era in the relations of neutrals to belligerents on the high seas will open. Neutral ports, in that event, will before long become the true centres from which the most effective and dangerous enterprizes against the commerce of belligerents may be contrived, fitted out and executed. The existing restrictions upon the exploits of daring adventurers will rapidly become obsolete, and no new ones will be adopted. Ships, men and money will always be at hand for the service of any Power sufficiently strong to hold forth a probability of repayment in any form, or adroit enough to secure a share of the popular sympathy in its undertakings. New Floridas, Alabamas and Shenandoahs will appear on every sea. If such be the recognized law, I will not undertake to affirm that the country which I have the honor to represent would not in the end be as able to accommodate itself to the new circumstances as Great Britain."

Curiosities of the Census.

A STATE census has been going on during the year, and is now, we believe, complete. It is so, at least, so far as the city of New York is concerned, and its results are singular and inexplicable. There is a palpable discrepancy between them and the results of the census of '60. That gave the population of the city (exclusive of Brooklyn and the other dependencies of New York) at 813,669; this places it at 722,569; which would indicate a loss, in five years, of 91,100. It is clear that the census of '60 was erroneous, or that '65 is wrong; for nothing is more certain than that the population of the city has largely increased since 1860. Its growth, in the extension of streets and increase of buildings, as well as in business, during the few years past, has been great; all implying a corresponding augmentation of population.

There is one hypothesis upon which this apparent decrease may be accounted for. In the Spanish American States it has always been found next to impossible to get an accurate enumeration of the people. The ignorant part of the population, which is vastly the larger part, invariably look upon the census as preliminary to conscription or the levying of contributions, and either fly on the approach of the census taker, or make false returns to his inquiries. We have known a whole village evacuated on the arrival of a traveler and the production of his note book; and it is not too much to assume that a very considerable part of the lower orders in New York, after having been put through two or three enumerations, preliminary to the several drafts made during the war, have evaded giving correct returns to the census officers. This hypothesis is supported by the circumstance, that the wards showing increase are precisely those occupied by the better and more intelligent classes, and those showing greatest decrease by the lower orders and foreigners, who would be most apt to mistake the purposes of the census. There is another hypothesis, namely, that the officers of the census failed to do their whole duty, but of this we have no evidence. It, perhaps, might be worth the while to consider how far the extravagant advance in rents may have contributed to drive people of moderate means to reside in Brooklyn, Williamsburg, Hoboken, Jersey City, and other places. But whether the census of '60 was wrong, or that of '65 is so, we repeat, it is absolutely certain that the population of New York is now greater than ever b.fore, and constantly and rapidly increasing. We recently alluded to the predominance of females in some of the Eastern States and in New York. The excess in the State, in 1860, was 11,000 females. The excess in the city of New York was 19,741. It appears that there are now 44,587 more women than men in the city; an increase in the excess of 24,846.

There is another curiosity of the census. It is that while there were 12,574 negroes in New York in 1860; there are but 9,069 in 1865, a decrease of 3,505. This is the practical commentary on the senseless cry raised by demagogues hostile to the war, that its result would be to fill up the city with negroes, and bring negro labor in depressing competition with white. Only the most infamous envy ready to excite the ignorant and drunken mob of foreigners to riot, arson and murder in the summer of '63. Let the colored people have equal rights before the law, and the whites here in the South, and they will rapidly disappear from the North.

"How Would You Feel?"

The great organ, or rather framer of public opinion in England, the London Times, 4a lecturing the United States on international comity and the duty of "neutrality," all apropos of the Fenian organization here. It "entreats" Americans to look themselves, "in all honesty, what they would feel if they were to hear of volunteers mustering in myriads on the Canadian frontier, for instance, and before the eyes of the Canadian authorities, for the invasion of the United States?"

How would we feel? Why, precisely as we did when the mob of Halifax rescued the pirates of the Chesapeake from the hands of the officers of the law, and set the murderers free. As we did when Burley and his associates organized in Toronto their buccaneering expedition on Lake Erie. As we did when confederate cans e or from Canada to St. Albans to rob and murder. As we did when, from the same direction where they received sympathy and support, expedition after expedition of incendiaries landed on our cities, and sought to burn them to the ground. As we did when assassins from Canada, where they organized their plans and obtained the money that was the price of blood, stole to Washington and struck down the head of the nation! It would cause no novel sensation to hear of "volunteers mustering on the Canadian frontier." We only say be in double quick time to hear of things far worse than that of Lords and Commoners conspiring once more with the agents of rebels in England, of fleets openly fitting out for years on our coasts, and of a "neutral" government watching for a favorable moment, a great rebel victory, or national defeat, to intervene for the dismemberment of our country. If the Fenians could neither hope for, or desire us, to do more in their behalf, than practice strictly British neutrality. It would fill their souls with unutterable mirth and contempt, and would hold the commerce of Great Britain under the French or Belgian flag, and light up the seas with the blaze of burning vessels!

The leaders of the Times, apart from their ludicrous audacity, are uncalled for. When Fenianism, or any other ism, shall here take such a form as to compromise the duty which the United States owes to other nations, the Government will know how to act, and will act with all good faith and energy. There will be neither open or covert support of rebellion, nor any attempt at neutrality between the assistance. That the Irish in America will sympathize with the Irish in Ireland, is natural enough, and that their sympathy will find a rather noisy expression, is to be expected. Substantially, however, it will be very disproportionate to the declamation it has elicited, or may call forth. Great Britain is not yet in such imminent peril from anything on this side the water, as to render action on the part of our Government necessary, either for her safety, or the preservation of our neutrality.

"Sydney in America," or bits at the newly rich in this country, form a staple subject in the English periodicals, and one may learn more about petroleum and petroleum princes from foreign sources than he can obtain from the largest experience at home. The "shoddy aristocracy," it might be supposed from reading their periodicals and probably is supposed by their readers, to be the dominant portion of the American people, giving their parties and wonderfully vulgar dances from London periodicals, may regard the typical youth of the country, can, perhaps, be inferred from the following "authentic anecdote," of "Tommy," a lucky petroleum:

One day, when Tommy was "doing" New York, he strode into Tiffany's magnificent jewelry establishment on Broadway, and startled the assembled salesmen with a loud—"Show us a diamond!"

"Here is one, sir," responded an elegantly modulated voice from the "diamond department." "Eighty dollars, sir."

"Don't not such a speck as that! Something bigger!"

"Allow me to show you this; very pure stone, sir, one hundred and sixty dollars."

"Nonsense—bigger!"

Herewith the gentlemanly salesman (whom I have always suspected to be a noble lord under difficulties) produced a brilliant about the size of a small pea. "Exquisite stone, sir—first water—eight hundred."

"Look here!" cried Tommy, becoming exasperated, "if I can't see a diamond without a glass I can't buy it, and you haven't not say so."

At my lord, had paused, half-vexed, here, by way of totally annihilating his rough customer, brought out the Koh-i-noor of the store. "Will that suit you, sir?" nodd stely his sister, price, fifteen thousand dollars!"

"That's something like it!" cried Tommy, decidedly mollified. "Is this the tip-top biggest?"

It is, sir," replied the salesman, gravely, thinking his beard at the same time as if to say, "Now, my rustic friend, that's the most magnificent diamond you ever saw in your life."

"You ain't got nothin' bigger now?"

"Nothing, I assure you."

"Then I'll take it!"

My lord, I grieve to say, lost his presence of mind, and stared; and in that moment, he produced a bag full of "greenbacks"—counted out the money, and the sale was concluded.

In Bakewell, Derbyshire, England, exists the following epitaph on "Philip Roe, died September 12th, 1813, aged 92 years:"

The vocal powers here let us mark
Of Philip our late parish clerk;
In church now see how he's arrayed
With clearer voice say, "Amen!"
Who now will lead the church's song?
Like him can make the roofs resound?
Who can supply his place so long?
The tow—so soon here lies his bones,
Requiescat in pace, is now his parish shrine
Till Angels wake thee with such notes as these.

The mighty short of self-gratulation which went up in the British Islands over the abolition of slavery in America, has hardly yet died away in the West Indies. The mighty lamenting for millions of slaves in America hardly raises a murmur of applause. On the contrary, whatever can be said to belittle the magnitude of the gift is freely uttered. An exception is found in Dr. McLeod, who, in a recent speech, delivered in Glasgow, said:

"When that mighty result took place, the emancipation of four millions of the human race, he was amazed, he confessed, at the want of thankfulness, the greater denomination of thankfulness and rejoicing that had been shown in this country. He had a day of thanksgiving in Britain. It would have been worthy of the land, but hardly had there been any recognition of it."

TOWN COSSIP.

We cannot always gossip of pleasant things, and consequently must not begin by talking about the cholera. Within a few days our authorities have waked up to the fact that as that terrible disease, approaching at the usual speed, is now in Germany, from Turkey to Egypt, and f om thence to Southern Europe, until it is at Madrid, only fifteen days' journey off, that there may be a possibility of its reaching here, and have accordingly offered to imitate some steps for its check, if not its prevention. Boards of commissioners have met and agreed to memorialize the government for the construction of a hospital at Sandy Hook for the reception of cholera patients, and to do what is, as far as it goes, but there are better things than that. We are not of those who believe in daily reports of a case having already occurred here or there, but we think, under any circumstances, that sanitary measures can not be too strict. There is no reason why we should not, and we know that they want cleaning, but we hold it of more importance that we should have clean houses, and say one to each of the visitors who visit the most tenement houses of our city poor, and say whether there is not "room for improvement" in many and all of our over-crowded city. In some of the tenant houses, the sewas that exhales from the sewer scrubbed floors, and the whole atmosphere, are such as to defy the ability of life to endure, and the most robust constitution must sink under the daily repetition of the fetor they could exist under a system of cleanliness and pure air. We had a notable example before us in New Orleans a short time since, when the municipal times almost de-populated from yellow fever, and which, before the breaking out of this rebellion, looked forward to the cholera every year, and the taking off of a large proportion of its population, as a certainty. Now, under the military authority of our military and martial law, it has become a city as healthy as New York, and has passed through several summers without a recurrence of the disease.

In spite of contracts and general thievery, our streets are kept tolerably clean, considering that New York is naturally the dirtiest city in the world, from the dirt and undrainable nature of its site, and that it is useless to make it one of the healthiest, is to improve the dwellings of our poor. Let the city and devise some means to keep them clean, and we need have no fear of cholera or any other epidemic.

It may possibly be of interest to those disposed to be cheerful, to know what number of deaths occurred from violent causes in this city, and also to know that in 1849 the first case originated at No. 29 Baxter street, then the Five Points, and that in 1854 it started within a few doors of the same place:

Deaths.	Suicides.	Murders.	Drowned.	Burned.	Run over.	Killed by Accident.	Executed.	Homicides.
1832 3615	...	...	...	1197 1295	451	93	...	...
1844 3731	...	...	...	1431 1301	451	93	...	...
1849 6071	1261	2508	83	775 2626	1452	161	16	17
1854 5053	1054	2048	83	1	1	1	1	1

We believe it safe to say that we are likely to be free of the pestilence this fall and winter, but none can tell what next spring may bring forth. Meanwhile, without being alarmed, New York may as well wash her face and make ready for the visitor, if he should call, as he probably will at least, to overshadow Uncle Sam's. The first case that we have heard of is reported "in the lung of the Irish Republic—that is to be, some of these days—but probably has been bedeviled to death already by the head yet of its being quoted in Wall street. The other is that of the "Irish Republican Brotherhood," which though regarded by capitalists in a different light, has been for some time, and is now already busy and made to a large share of this loan by bankers and capitalists in this country. The first meeting of those approaching who on the Jones government will be called by our own. We are not so sure but the Mexican loan, as it is offering at 65 cents on the dollar in greenbacks, and 7 per cent. interest in gold, is a good investment.

A magnificent fact, in connection with this matter, was the natural ori of the Mexican flag, in front of the financial agency, No. 71 Broadway, by the 8th Regiment, N. Y. S. N. G., on Wednesday last. The regiment halted in front of the office, formed a square, and presented arms, while their band played the national airs of both Mexico and Juarez, and grounded arms as heartily at the mentions of the name of Maximilian. The logic very like sympathy.

It may be interesting to our country readers—our city ones know too much about it already—to hear by some-what informed as to what it costs a New Yorker to live, and what they can get for their produce by bringing it to this market. In the first place, we have to confess that coal has, within a week, fallen $1 per ton, to $8 cash. But the price is not to be taken too much that because it has fallen $1 per ton, wholesale, that the consumer gets it any less. Oh, no! There has been a sale of 36,000 tons, ranging from $10 to $11 88 per ton, which is the average price of coal.

Next comes oats. Best rates at from 74 to 78 cents per bu.; for mixed, 72 to 74 cents; feed, 66 cents; mutton, 25 cents; pork, 24 cents; lish, cels, 20 cents; halibut, 20 cents; sheep's head, 40 cents; and so forth. Veg-tables: potatoes, 35 cents per half peck; turnips, 25 cents; onions, 25 cents per peck; and $12 per hundred. Fruit: apples, 80 to 75 cents per half peck; cranberries, 25 cents per quart; pears, 25 cents per peck; figs, 25 cents per dozen, and all things else in proportion.

In engaging in these observations, we see that one of the New York ladies a dvocates the establishment of "Female Clubs," and we agree as are now and have been for many years in the cities of Europe. The idea is not a bad one, and would be observed at its too democratic. Many families in good circumstances would be glad to have but their small economically by a good dinner at home, without being obliged to go and to restaurants, at their own prices, and pay enormous prices. In the present low tide of our domestic cooking, it would be a great convenience, and would ward away a host of dyspeptics and colics. We do not despair of yet seeing the day when a number will call at our domicile in the morning, take our order and the time for delivery, and send us the meals in a tidy, piping hot, and prompt, at a less cost than we could go to market and get it ourselves.

Though it is quite a little out of our regular way, yet we cannot refrain from a few lines to Holofern, and noticing a little exploit of the past week, wherein a countryman came to the city with a spectacular load for receiving a bribe of $15. O tempora! Oh, Mores! If a countryman goes to a house of ill-fame, he is robbed of fifty! We ask Mr. Becker, the great swindler, to convene New York, get in our Common Council, and we promise him that he can do it for $10 per head, after having his little financial preca utions.

We were reminded, a few days since, to a scene that is an apt illustration of daily city life, and yet a scene that is not known to the country. It was in the police office of a coarse, red-faced woman, about 40, and a girl, about 14, with a pretty face and pleasing manner. They were arraigned at the Court of Sessions for stealing twenty pairs of boots. They were charged with "grand larceny." The complaint "guilty" the daughter, on being questioned, pleaded not guilty, and said that the mother or what she was there for. Judge Kelly ordered the mother to be taken back to the Tombs, and the girl to stand. Then came the scene. The child clung to the mother, shrieking in agony, and piteously begging, "Don't, don't you!" "I must go with my mother!" until she was almost in hysterics. The mother, with a coarse laugh, tried to get her left—left, perhaps, to rejoin the mother when she comes out—to the care of the matron of the professional thief, for such is the mother's means of livelihood.

"From grave to gay, from lively to severe."

There has been a very successful revival at Wallack's this week, and a new opera at the Academy. The last we have not yet visited, but the first we have, and the first we shall give here. It is called "The Needful," and is full of the humor which is the specialty of Lester Wallack.

The plot is that of a managing mother (Mrs. Heck, by Mrs. Vincent), who, having failed to get her daughter off, gets several other people into unpleasant predicaments, out of which they are got by Abraham Stone (Mark Smith), a retired tal'ow chandler. The fun of the piece lies chiefly in the first two acts, in the psychological study of Mrs. Heck, who has dosed her husband to that degree that he is not able to declare his will, and in the fact that he has a mania for the love of liberty, and drops his pills, assisted by Abraham Stone, and his place is filled by a Mr. Augustus Bell, evidently generic anywhere else, and the curtain goes down on Augustus Bell, Abraham Stone, Mrs. Heck—crisis, altercations, soil suit and have a run.

The performances are all first-rate.

Blind Tom, the negro pianist, is still puzzling the musical firmament, and drawing wonderful houses to hear his wonderful music.

On Thursday evening, Oct. 26th, Miss Cecelia P. Whelan made her debut as a reader at Hope Chapel, Fifteenth street, Broadway. She gave the following scene in Romeo and Juliet, assisted by Mr. J. B. Brown, as Friar Laurence: "Romeo," by an unknown writer, a scene from "Ingomar," another from "Macbeth," and three of "Three Warnings," by Tennyson, ending with Longfellow's "Famine." Miss Whelan is young, only 18 years of age, and has a fine figure, and fine delivery. She is, undoubtedly, destined to high rank as an elocutionist.

NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.

Proclamation by President Johnson.

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God, during the year which is now coming to an end, to bless these United States with general peace, concord of civil war, and to permit us to secure the blessings of peace, unity and harmony, with a great enlargement of civil liberty; and whereas the Chief Executive Power has also, during the year, graciously averted from us the scourge of war, and the fell spirit of civil strife, while our granaries are full of the fruits of an abundant season; and whe-eas right-ousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby recommend to the people thereof that they do on the day observe the first Thursday of December as a day of National Thanksgiving and Prayer of the Universe for these deliverances and blessings.

And I do further recommend that on that occasion the whole people make confession of our national sins against His infinite goodness, and with one heart and one mind implore the Divine guidance in the ways of national virtue and holiness.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the twenty-eighth day of October, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Sixty-five, and of the Independence of the United States the ninetieth.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic—A correspondent claims for Amherst the distinction of having graduated a colored youth some twenty years ago, as it was the first instance of the kind in this country. In 1826 a young colored man, named Beaswurm, graduated at Bowdoin, and a few years after became President of Hayti.

—A thrilling scene occurred at Philadelphia, on the 31st ult., by the breaking of the axletree of a horse railroad car, which was crowded with passengers. The car was precipitated with great violence against a lamp-post, and several persons were injured. One of the musicians had a shoulder blade broken, and several children were also injured. Fortunately no accidents damaged.

—A man, while engaged in watering the streets of New Haven, Conn., with a hose, on Thursday, was astonished at finding the water suddenly cease to flow. He subsequently detached the hose from the hydrant, in the mouth of which he found a large eel, two and a half feet long, and six inches round the body.

—The Manchester (N. H.) Union tells a story of the second wife which is worth repeating. A lad 14 years of age, who was found hanging by the neck, in a shed, near the State line, said that he had dogged a flogging from his father for reminiscence at school.

—As Alabama, Mo., correspondent says that the schooner Brazilian, on which had been delivered mixed corn by a number of unlicensed peddlers, has proved a sorry success. They have been going to Brazil "in about a week" for more than the month elapsed.

—The freedmen of Lynchburg, Va., have made a formal appeal to their former masters, to enable them to emigrate to Liberia, for the purpose of carrying "the light and civilization they have received in this country to that benighted and long-neglected land."

—Hogs are very plentiful in Connecticut. The works of the Woodbury Cutlery Company, in Hanover, have stopped last week by cole getting into the waterwheel. The pigs destroyed were taken out by the head, weighed respectively seven and five pounds each!

—In Arkansas, a negro preacher was buried, according to the report of Lieut. Hamlin, a greater number of whites than of the British soldiers put together who perished on the bloody fields of the Crimea, Waterloo, Salamanca and Victoria and New Orleans.

—"Matrimonial infelicities" are frequent in British county, Mass., judging by the fact that 400 divorces have been granted in five years.

—Gen. Grant has given Kirby Smith permission to return home on parole. He is at present sojourning at Galveston, Texas. It is stated that Kirby intends to renew his allegiance to the U. S. Government.

—The wines and liquors of the Hon. Thomas C. Amory were sold at auction in Boston, on Thursday, and brought immense prices—brandy selling as high as $20 per bottle, and port wine at $10 per bottle. The sale realized $25,000.

—During the summary ry of the accounts of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, it appears that the receipts of receipts over expenditures is found to be more than $850,000.

—The Mississippi Legislature has referred to the Judiciary Committee a bill to amend the act to submit terms the collection of debts, and securing to creditors the interest thereon during the rebellion.

—A dispatch from Washington says: "It is now positively announced that the trial of Jefferson Davis has been decided upon, and the arrangements have been made accordingly. The charge will be that crime of treason, and will take place either in this city or Richmond, before the United States Supreme Court."

—On the 16th of September the anniversary of Mexican independence, the Emperor Maximilian published a decree by which he abdicates his throne in favor of Mexico. The same Imbrido, however, refused a decree which declares that the Emperor will be the only member of an Empire he was "her men" and altogether the person who is to govern it.

—The Secretary of the Treasury announces that "The Commissioners of the British West India Islands being full, Assistant Treasurers and National Banks will receive their subscriptions."

—One of our Western exchanges is in a bad fix. Having dunned a delinquent subscriber, he not only refused to pay, but threatened to flog the editor if he stopped the paper.

Truth. Why was hung at Portsmouth, N. H., ninety-seven years ago, for child murder, and it is a singular fact that the person who caused her execution was hung for the same crime in the same place. Betsy Eastman, of Salisbury, N. H., now 103 years old, was one of the witnesses, and still remembers well the circumstances. The teacher was absent one day and left Betsy in charge of the school. She left the little school-house, saw a loose board in the floor, which she raised, and found a child, partially, and evidently covered by remains of a dead infant. She told what she had seen, and suspicion rested upon the girl. The child of the teacher, who manu-red it to conceal its birth. She was hung and died game.

—A German named Noun, while gathering grapes in a swamp near St. Louis, Mo., a few days since, was fatally bitten by a rattlesnake named Kryn, who, coming to the vicinity. Krone observed a flock of birds on a tree, and supposing that they were being followed by a grape, and immediately Noun, with blood streaming from his mouth, ran, exclaiming to his ground, and expired on the spot.

—The Rev. Father Mansett (Col. Pipes) is ready to receive applications from Lecture Committees for the winter season on "Scripture monology of "Sketches of Travel in many Lands." Apply by letter at St. Denis Hotel.

—The Germans in Texas have again raised a cotton crop of superior quality to any grown by slave labor. The agricultural papers commend it highly, and they now appear very prompt to acknowledge that which they denied and ridiculed as a swindle.

—We noticed a list of more than forty women recently appointed as Postmasters, mostly in the western part of Virginia.

—One of the camels imported by the United States and placed in the Park by Gen. Beale on the way to California's captains all through the war to carry the baggage of a volunteer company.

Foreign—A letter from Magdeburg says that general discontent pervades the working classes in Germany in consequence of the question of universal, by, political questions. The agitation is greatest in the Rhenish provinces. Herr von Bismarck has also at Creveld, in Westphalia, which has become an important manufacturing district. The workingmen openly display their hostility against Herr von Bismarck, who, in his speech, has declared himself opposed to universal suffrage for the feudal system. At Dusseldorf and at Solingen the two parties have engaged in tolerious.

—A butler in Herefordshire, England, recently stabbed himself four times in the stomach, with a carving knife. He was found by his master in the kitchen, and upon being asked for what reason he committed the act, he replied that the knife was dull and a carving-knife was lying before me. The devil came up and tempted me to murder, and, after a severe conversation, he told me I must put the knife into my stomach, and I did so. I then thought I would endeavor to put the shaft of the knife up against the wall, and thrust myself upon the point. I am sorry now I took his advice, and I shan't try it on again."

—A sailing frigate of the French Imperial Navy, the Iris, Capt. Jouet, arrived at Brest on the 20th of August, after accomplishing a complete voyage of circumnavigation in nine months and 19 days. There is no example, we believe, of such a voyage having been made in so short a time. The Iris sailed on a stream, about 135 miles a day.

—A man named Bubleer, residing at Berne, lost his life in a singular manner. It appears that he was in the habit of shooting pigeons to perform, and sometimes greatly ill-treated them. Recently he brutally broke the wing of one of his pigeons with a gun, and, while doing so, one of his large dogs sprang forward, caught the bird in his mouth, and bit him so severely that he died on the following day.

—Recently, at Magdeburg, Capt. Cubey, of the Royal Bavarian Pioneers, died of a wound received in a duel. It was only after each of the duelists had fired a shot that the seconds, being shot at a distance, fled. It had been agreed beforehand that one of them, at least, should be killed on the field.

—At a meeting of bankers, in Frankfort, Germany, it came out that about three hundred millions of U. S. Bonds were held in that city and its immediate vicinity, and that nearly every bond held on the continent of Europe was the property of persons residing in or near that city.

—The shop-women of Paris, who have heretofore had no day of rest, are petitioning their employers for a respite on the Sabbath, alleging that a is necessary for them, both morally and physically.

—The dictionary of the Hawaiian language, recently published, contains 15,000 words. The general resemblance between the Polynesian languages and the Malay and other Asiatic tongues, has engaged the attention of comparative philologists.

PASSENGERS AND CREW OF THE SHIP TITANIA RESCUED BY THE U. S. GUNBOAT FLORIDA.

FOUNDERING OF THE TITANIA.

FROM a sketch by an officer of the gunboat Florida, we give an engraving of one of the most thrilling disasters at sea that has happened for many years, the wreck of the brig Titania, which left Philadelphia on the 9th of Oct., bound for Mobile, with a cargo of coal and hay.

On the 13th she encountered a heavy gale which caused her to spring a leak. Both her pumps were manned, but in spite of every effort the water rapidly gained, even though all her deck load was thrown overboard. All hands worked with desperate energy to keep her afloat, but after two days of almost superhuman labor the water was found to be 11 feet in her hold, and all hope of saving the vessel was dismissed.

A raft was rapidly constructed of about 10 feet square, and on the 16th the passengers and crew, 10 in all, embarked. There was one woman of the party. Two hours after leaving the ship down she went, and the luckless people upon the raft were tossing about at the mercy of the winds and waves. The weight upon the raft sunk it one foot below the waves, and what was not washed away was saturated thoroughly. For 24 hours they tossed about thus until, in latitude 32 degrees 20 minutes, longitude 74 degrees, they were found by the U. S. gunboat Florida, Lieut. Maies, commanding, who took the starving party on board, helpless and almost lifeless from exposure.

Sailor-like, no sooner were the shipwrecked on board than a subscription was raised for them, which amounted to $361, of which one-third was awarded to the female passenger, and the balance divided among the crew.

DESTRUCTION OF THE MICHICAN CENTRAL DEPOT.

ONE of the most fearful fires that has ever occurred in this country, as far as regards the destruction of property, occurred at Detroit on the 18th of October, destroying the freight depot and sheds of the Michigan Central Railroad, and property to the value of $1,500,000. This is given as the origin of the fire:

A train of cars was loading with freight in the second section, or room, of the depot, devoted exclusively to goods going to Chicago and further west. Four or five cars were already filled, and another had been partially loaded, when it was discovered that a hogshead of varnish had been broken, and its contents were spreading over the car. The work of unloading the freight, to prevent its damage by the varnish, was at once commenced, and while going on the light in the hands of one of the workmen, came in contact with the varnish, and in an instant the whole car was filled with smoke and flame. The fire spread with terrible rapidity, so that all efforts to stay its progress by the means at hand were utterly fruile. In the excitement of the moment, the burning car, with those ahead of it on the track, were run from where they were loading—near the Third street end of the depot—to the westerly end of the structure, into the open air. The burning material dropped from the car as it passed, thus firing the building at numerous points at once.

At the front, the heat was intense, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the passenger depot, proper, could be saved. It was on fire for almost its entire length. While this part of the building was burning, the fire spread westward along the dock, destroying everything in its way. At the farther end of the freight depot, there was a wooden shed, probably 200 feet in length, stored with cotton, tobacco and flour, all of which was destroyed.

The freight depot, was an immense brick structure, about 800 feet in length, but all that now remains are the bare walls—everything else being in ruins.

THE OLD LANDMARKS OF NEW YORK CITY—HOUSE, No. 97, CORNER OF PECK SLIP AND WATER STREET.

MEETING OF THE FENIAN CONGRESS AT PHILADELPHIA.

WE illustrate this week a subject that has been attracting considerable attention on both sides of the water, and especially been a source of vexation to John Bull, who is just beginning to wake up to the fact that his genteel position during our rebellion is rebounding on himself.

On Monday, the 16th of October, the Fenians, a powerful organization of Irishmen, created for the purpose of assisting to obtain freedom for their native land, convened in Congress at Philadelphia. Six hundred delegates were present, who organized by electing Col. John O'Mahony as President, with a strong staff of officers to support him, some of whom were gallant soldiers in our late Civil war. The enthusiasm was intense, and the participators did not let it run away with their effectiveness, but proceeded to business with promptitude. A scheme of organization was adopted to take effect in every part of the United States, and arrangements made for the issue of bonds to raise money. The Congress remained in session ten days, and broke up in perfect harmony, having achieved all the purposes for which it met.

A TRAGIC WEDDING.—The town of Kaschau, in Hungary, has just been the scene of a tragic event. A gentleman of the environs was to be married to a young lady of the town, and on the day fixed for the wedding the bridegroom and his friends went in procession to Kaschau, preceded by a band of music, and firing rifles as they passed along. During the repast, which was served after the ceremony, one of the guests jested with the bridegroom on the sudden disappearance of the bride, who had gone to her mother in the kitchen. The husband went to find his wife, and—seeing her in the midst of a group of women—he requested her to return to the dining-room. She playfully refused, and ran away, laughing as she went. Her young husband then took up a rifle, and—aiming at her—cried: "Come here, Irma, or I will fire!" The bride laughed, and replied: "Fire, if you like." The rifle went off that instant, and the poor girl fell mortally wounded; she died three hours later—after assuring her unhappy husband that she felt certain he did not know the rifle was loaded.

BURNING OF THE MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD DEPOT, DETROIT, OCT. 18.—FROM A SKETCH BY M. A. BRENNAN.

"BOX NO. 4."

BY DELIA DENNISON.

SLOWLY and sadly I walked down the lane
When the evening sun was low,
Following the grass-grown foot-path
Which led to the village below.
My heart felt a strange foreboding,
I could not divine wherefore,
For to the post-office I was going,
To peep into "Box No. 4."

The village was never so lonely,
The streets were never so still,
The brook was never so sluggish,
And never so lazy the mill.
On the pavement I halted a moment,
Then passed through the half-open door,
And with step neither firm nor steady
Walked up to "Box No. 4."

I tapped on the glass pane slightly,
The post-master gave me the mail,
He spoke to me cheerily, kindly,
And asked what made me so pale?
One thin, yellow letter he gave me,
This only—and nothing more.
I knew 'twas for me, for I saw it
While it lay in "Box No. 4."

I took it with hand that trembled,
My heart beat with joy and with fear,
Yet I tried to walk away calmly,
And choked down the rising tear.
A stranger hand had inbrowed it,—
My heart grew sickly and sore—
Oh, why was it sent to me then?
Why came it to "Box No. 4?"

My Charlie had been wounded in battle,
A minnie-ball in his side,
And comrades had tenderly nursed him,
Else he ere this had died.
But now in the hospital lonely,
He knew that his warfare was o'er—
He knew this would be the last letter
He should send to "Box No. 4."

The papers had said "severely,"
But I had hoped they might be wrong,
And so my poor heart took comfort,
Though the days were dreary and long.
But now his farewell came to me,
In his loving language of yore,
In the fervent, tear-stained letter
Which came to "Box No. 4."

I neither screamed nor fainted,
But walked through the lane as before,
And in my lone walk homeward
That letter I read o'er and o'er.
I knew that I now was a widow,
Though his name I never bore,
But he had said I should in the letters
Which had come to "Box No. 4."

A year have I been a widow,
Though the weeds I cannot wear,
But my heart is draped in mourning
And the grief lies hidden there.
And sometimes that tear-stained letter
I bring out and read once more—
That letter which made me a widow,
Which came to "Box No. 4."

Tim Maguire's Shoes.

A LEGEND OF AINROFILAC, AND THE OLD TIMES.

BY J. W. WATSON.

WE never could understand why we have not as good right to fairy tales, and legends of giants and genii, in this, our good land of freedom of everything else. To rectify this want, I shall go back to the old, old times, in New Orleans, perhaps, or we will say so for the sake of our story—a thousand years, more or less ago.

Well, a thousand years, more or less ago, there lived somewhere about Carondolet street, an honest cobbler, Tim Maguire by name. Now I call Tim a cobbler, because, though he aspired to the name of a shoemaker, he was a mighty bad one, and when Tim got the chance to manufacture such an article, it was generally a pair of brogans, of the right old country style, that made no pretention to elegance, but were intended to hand down from father to son, as a heir loom.

Fortunately, perhaps, for Tim Maguire, he had neither wife nor children dependent on him, or possibly they may have suffered somewhat, for though Tim could have done very well at other work, he declared that until he retired on his "forin," he never would drop the last and lapstone, and the result was that he went on pegging and hammering away, just managing to hammer enough out to keep him from starvation. Strange to say, Tim did not seem to regard this wifeless, childless state, as a blessing, and he never put up the shutters of his little crib in Carondolet street, and went upstairs to his wretched little room, but he inwardly mourned because he had no one with whom to share his semi-starvation. The neighbors, almost as poor as Tim's own self, would have it that there must be some witchcraft about the cobbler's living, for though he was never seen to buy food, or to go to a restaurant, he would accept nothing at their hands, therefore they argued that Tim Maguire never ate, and, indeed, the poor man's appearance went a long way towards confirming the rumor, for month after month, and year after year, he withered and dried, until at last, it was a marvel that Tim did not blow away.

One day a brilliant idea struck Tim Maguire. He had done nothing for a week, and it really seemed that people must have given up wearing shoes. So Tim gathered together all the money he was worth in the world, and determined to buy leather, and build a pair of shoes on speculation. The leather was bought, the shoes were made, and marvelous ones they were for weight and strength, though if the truth must be told, they were rather eccentric in shape, somewhat defying the casual glancer to tell which was the heel, and which the toe. Nevertheless, Tim admired them much, and gave them the place of honor in his little three foot shop window, out of which they glared with wondrous importance on every passer-by. Very soon Tim Maguire's shoes became the talk and laugh of the neighborhood, and when those who set up for wags, would have an especially factious joke, they would ask their fellows, "How are Tim Maguire's shoes?" or "Has Tim Maguire sold his shoes yet?" until, at last, the very children had it as pat as a by-word, and would scream into the cobbler's little shop, when he would be hammering away, the offensive words.

For months and months, and even going to years, the shoes lay in the window, and nobody even seemed to think it worth their while to ask their price, until at last, one day, the light of the little window was somewhat darkened, and Tim looked up to see an old man, tall and erect, with white hair, and deep, gray eyes, looking in admiringly at the shoes. Tim's heart jumped up into his throat at the sight, and he said to himself, as though by instinct, "There's my cushtomer, be dad!" but just as he said this, the old man, with one more glance of admiration at the shoes, went away, and left Tim's heart on the rebound. The next day, strange to say, the old man re-appeared at the window, the same as before, and looking in on the shoes, once more Tim exclaimed, "Now, he's my cushtomer, shure!" but no sooner were the words out of his mouth than the old man vanished in an instant. Tim didn't take the disappointment so much to heart as on the day before, but went on hammering and whistling away, as merry as possible.

The next day, at the identical hour, the window was again darkened, and there the old man stood, but by this time Tim's faith was gone, and after just looking up, he went on hammering and whistling away, until, in a few moments, the door opened, and in marched the old man. He gave a good stare around the shop, and then addressed himself to the cobbler:

"Stranger, could ye jist mend up this yere pair of brogans I have got on, while I wait for 'em?"

"Faith, so' I can!" was Tim's cheery answer; "anything'n a job these hard times!"

And with that, as soon as the old man put them off, Tim took them up, and went to work with a will, stitching and hammering, while the old man all the while sat and eyed the pair of shoes in the window. At last he broke out with:

"Them's a mighty nice pair of shoes you got there, stranger."

"Indade, and ye may say that," was Tim's quick reply, "they can't be bate in all Louiszanner!"

"Now, how much do you want for them ere shoes?" was the old man's next question.

"Jist pit 'em on yer feet," said Tim, stretching out his hand, and passing the shoes over to the old man; "an' if they fit yees, we'll never quibble about the price."

The old man put on the shoes, stood up, and

"THEM'S A MIGHTY NICE PAIR OF SHOES YOU GOT THERE, STRANGER."

gazed at them with a pleased look, stamped in them, and then saying:

"They're a mighty nice pair of shoes. I'll just take a little walk in 'em, and if they suit my fit I'll take 'em," opened the door, and stepped out into the street.

Now Tim Maguire was as honest as the sun, and being so honest, he never dreamed of any one being otherwise, especially such a fine-looking old man, and so good a judge of shoes; therefore, when a quarter of an hour had passed and he did not return Tim was not surprised, but when half an hour was gone he thought it a little strange, and when three quarters still stranger, until an hour and a half was gone, and the old man did not come back, though his old brogans were mended and ready for him, then Tim thought it very strange, though he felt confident of the old man's return, and began making up his mind what he would have for supper out of the money he would pay him.

Tim sat thinking of this, when some of the neighbours' children came in need, and how to help in his door, "Tim Maguire, have you sold your shoes yet?" when in an instant they saw that the shoes were missing. Had the moon fallen, it could not have created greater astonishment, and away they went to tell their fathers and mothers of the wonderful occurrence. It was only the twinkling of an eye when several of them were about the shop, and with great interest began to ask Tim where his shoes were?

"An' where doze ye think they air?" was Tim's proud answer, "why sould av coorse! D'ye think the boot would be mixed up or anything else like yerselves, that don't know a good pair of brogues when they see 'em?"

And Tim, all but the whole story, pointing out the old brogans in confirmation, and ending off by declaring that he was then waiting for the old man to return and pay him, at which ending all the shoes smiled their fare approval into their cheeks, and went away rubbing their hands for very glee.

That night passed, and the next, and the next, and many more, but still the old man did not come back, and Tim was obliged to contant himself with inwardly cursing the old fellow's delay. The children had now got a new cry. They would come to Tim's door, and would shout, "Hey, Tim Maguire, how are you, that bought your shoes?" At first Tim would start up when this was called, and casting one glance at the old brogues hanging on the wall, would resume the entrance of the old man, but soon he got over this, and paid no more attention to the boys in the street than of old; but at last, one day, a year after this occurrence, Tim he heard the shout distantly, and as it drew near, and more near, the door was darkened, and sure enough in walked the old man. The boys had identified him, and upon his left, way down the street, and had accompanied him to the very shop. Tim's first impulse was to give the old man a sound scolding, but when he saw him walk in, and with a nod, as though he had been but a few minutes out of the shop, seat himself, Tim thought better of it, and turning the door, to shut out the inquisitiveness of the little boys, he took down the old brogues from the wall, and putting them into the old man's hand, said—

"A bether bit o' mindin' than that ye niver saw. May Shaint Patthrick desert me, if they aren't honestly doin'!"

"Ye're a fine fellow and an excellent cobbler, stranger," answered the old man. "And now I ain't going to pay by asking the price of these old here shoes of yourn! Just take that; and as to the old boots, give 'em to the fust beggar that comes along, for the old man thrust two double eagles into Tim's hand.

"Holy father!" almost shrieked Tim, "are ye goin' to make a present av the gould mines av Mexico. Ow, murther! may the heavens be my bed for ivir an' ivir, amen!" and Tim, after rubbing his eyes with the back piece, for luck, at a sign from the old man, thrust them far down into the pockets of his tattered pantaloons.

"And now, stranger," said the old man, looking earnestly at Tim, "I hain't got better ask me to take supper with 'you to-night, and have a little talk?"

Tim, for an instant, looked at the old man in an astounded and somewhat waggish manner, but when that person took from his pocket a couple more double eagles, and putting them into Tim's hand, said:

"Do you just git a little bits ready in that room of yourn, and I'll step down a drop to shout a nod o'clock, and bring with me a taste of jist as good old rye as ever you swallowed in these diggins." Why, then Tim won't astonished a bit longer, and as soon as the old man had disappeared, set himself about clearing up his room, after which he went to a neighbour restaurant, and ordering what to Tim's ideas was the most sumptuous supper he had ever known, had it all ready at nine o'clock, when promptly on the stroke of time, along came the old man.

They both ate heartily. Tim enough to last him for a week, and the stranger not enjoyed it. After which Tim brought out his tobacco, and the old man filling his short corn-cob pipe, Tim filled his dhudeen, and they smoked and talked. The old man had been a traveler. He knew the Mississippi from the Falls of St. Anthony to its mouth. He knew the Rocky Mountains from a Digger, and could tell some queer stories of each; and "hair fighting, to say nothing of certain interesting bowie-knife and revolver experiences, in enlightened circles. Tim was delighted, and yet every little while the memory of how strange it was for him to keep away that whole year, and then so strangely return, would struggle up, and at last summoning all his courage, Tim determined to ask him. The old man was silent for a few minutes, puffing away vehemently at his pipe, and then said:

"I was in hope, stranger, that ye wouldn't ask me to 'plain anything, but as ye hev asked me, I spose its only right that you should know, seein' as how you've been brought into the matter, after a fashion."

Tim nodded an approval of the old man's remark, and once more filling up their tumblers he waited for him to go on.

"You must know, stranger, that I'm from Arkansaw originally, and that I once had a grandmother in that or section of country. In consequence of which I've allers been a sort of believer in dreams, even though I didn't understand 'em. Wal, one night, a little over a year ago, I dreamed that I was a standin' on the bank of the Mass-sippi, and all ter once an angel thing, with wings, and him fixin', came and right down on a stone nigh on to where I was. I stood, and stared awhile, until the creetur got up, and coming right up to me, he says, he says like, 'that's my name, 'do ye seek to be rich?' yes, ma'am, I answered, not scarcely knowing whether the creetur was a man or woman. With that it says: 'Go forth from hence, and search until ye shall find a maker of shoes, whose name shall be Tim Maguire. From him must you steal, mind I say steal, a pair of shoes. You must put them on, and yielding to their guidance, go forward. They shall lead you into the land of Australia, where the mountains are of gold, and where the sands of the rivers are of the same, mixed with gems. In this land you can make as much money in one year or day as will suffice any man for a lifetime. But remember that one-half of all thou gettest must be given to Tim Maguire.'

"With that it vanished, and I woke up. This 'ere dream troubled me con-siderable, but I waited, and that night the same thing came over me, and on the next night I dreamed it for the third time, and so I thought it was about time to set out and find Tim Maguire. I announced to the country, lookin' for Tim Maguire, and never found him until the day when I came across your shop. You know the rest, and that I was fool'nate enough to steal them air shoes of yourn, and to think myself to 'em, and on they went, until at last they brought me up in this land of Auroffie, where in one day I gathered there as much gold as would serve me all my life, and so here I am to share it with you," and suiting the action to the word, the old man slapped a big fist of clinking gold upon the table, made Tim's eyes stick out like a lobster's, and for a while frightened him speechless. But soon he began to calculate, and to think, and this thought coming forth in words, he said:

"An' sure, what's one little bag like that? I'd like to see it jist into that same counthry mesilf, an' thry me luck."

The old man's face grew gloomy as these words, but he only answered:

"You know, stranger, the thing wouldn't work with yez. Ye see, ye haven't got a pair of shoes to steal."

"Oh, bedad!" said Tim, laughing, "I don't covet yer govil, but faith I'd like to take a thrip into that same land meself!"

The old man looked serious for a minute, and then said:

"Timothy Maguire, I was in hopes you wouldn't press me on this point, but as you have, I'm obleged to tell you more. Do you see that bottle? holding up a tolerable pocket piece to view, "Wal! while I was filling up the shoes, there to Aimrofine, that ar angel came to me again one night, and after warnin me, 'Don't forgit Tim Maguire!' went on to say 'If he should desire, after receiving from you his share of the gold, to come to this land, he has nothing to do but swallow a mouthful from that bottle, and his wish will be accomplished, but he had better not!' and with that she was off, leaving the bottle in my pocket."

Tim seized the bottle with eagerness, pulled out the cork, and without even waiting to smell the contents, swallowed a mouthful. In a moment everything in the room began to whirl around, and, almost instantly, Tim found himself standing in a wild country, with no one in sight. With a stout heart, away he started, and after a long journey at the gates of a magnificent city, filled with people, but all moving like machines, and having a rich, golden color, he saw a tall, awkward roll of white cloth of trouble and care about them. Tim noticed the splendor of the shops, and of everything, but also that everything had a most sickly golden hue as the people. He began to feel hungry, and was anxious to find some restaurant or store, where he could purchase some food, but in vain, there was no such thing in the whole city. Almost famished, he determined to stop the first person he met, and ask where he could get food. He did so, but to his surprise this yellow faced man only stared at him, holding up his hands in horror. At last a voice looking at Tim some time in this way, he said:

"Alas! mortal, how camest thou here? Knowest thou not that this is the city of gold, that everything, even the people, are gold, and that thou canst have nothing to eat but gold?"

This was unwelcome news to one of Tim's appetite, but as he was in for it, he thought that the best way for him to do would be to fraternize with this citizen, and ask his advice, which he did. The citizen, in reply to his questions, said:

"I know not what you can do, unless it be to go unto Ma-m-mon, the king of all this land, and ask his wisdom."

Tim, thinking, perhaps, this was the only way, took the direction pointed out to the palace, and soon stood in the presence of Ma-m-mon, to whom he stated his trouble, ending off with the query—

"An now what'll I do, yer glorious majesty?"

"Marry my daughter!" said the king, in a gruff, positive voice, which made Tim jingle in his brogues, a jump that was repeated in his heart, when with business-like celerity, the beautiful Princess L'Argent was presented before his astonished eyes. With five minutes hesitation, they got over the ceremonials, and Tim Maguire found himself a married man, and being led away by the princess to her own apartments, a leading to which Tim willingly submitted. Arrived at this spot, Tim saw with delight a banquet spread of all the delicacies of the earth, from which he soon selected a good steak and fried potatoes, and fell to. As soon as he did so, the princess joined him, and during the supper informed him that she was the only one in all that kingdom permitted to eat anything but gold, it was therefore that she had been married to him.

In this wondrous land, as the husband of the Princess L'Argent, Tim lived many years, and coming so early in life, he would spurn millions away with his foot, and resisting all pleas to become rich. At last, weary of his life of ease, and desiring once more to see his little shop on Carondolet street, he petitioned the king to allow him to pay it a visit. No sooner was the request asked, than Tim said to himself:

"I have no power to retain thee! Thou hast spurned gold, and are no longer in my power. Thou hast only to rub thyself at any spot, and thou wilt be there!"

With that Tim breathed a silent wish to be back in his little shop, and the moment found himself rising in the air. The princess, emerging that moment from the palace, saw it, and uttered one fearful scream, which as startled Tim that he awoke, and found himself sitting before the debris of the supper, which he had taken that evening with the old man, and the same stone, though on the table, just where he had put it, stood the bag of gold.

And so Tim Maguire had enough to last him all his life, and so he lived in peace and died, as the good legends say, in a pot of grease, all of which is true, and if anybody don't believe it, they can go to Aimrofine and find out for themselves.

THE INEBRIATE.

BY J. B. SWEET.

Oh, these sad repentant moments!
How like wrath from heaven they come!
How by memories I am haunted!
How they strike me nearly dumb!
I am lost! I'm lost—I'm lost
In the loathing sea of sin;
And my burning heart is tossed
By the surge of grief within!

Oh, those pale and tearful faces
Haunt me ever—curse me still!
And they follow me in dreamings,
Turn whichever way I will;
And I hear the plaintive crying
Of the baby at the breast—
And I see my Mary lying
On the pallet, cold and dead!

Give me rum! give me brandy!
Give me whisky! give me gin!
Mix them all together, landlord,
And fill me to the brim again;
And when thus, these thoughts I've banished,
I will dance, and shout, and sing,
Till the fiends have gone howling,
And these memories taken wing.

Ha! the fiery fluid burns me!
Burns into my very soul!
Give me more, before the surges
Of these memories overwhelm me!
And I'll bid defiance, then,
Unto all those faces wan,
To torment me ever more!

While the drunken spell is on.

OUT COLLECTING.

BY NEWTON SOUTEMEYER.

I HAD been clerking for two years for the firm of Valle & Bro., a wholesale house on Main street, St. Louis. It was the summer of 1861; business had been staggered by the first blow of the war. Men were uncertain even of their neighbors, and none knew what volcanic eruption of treason might at any time burst through the feeble overlaying structure of Southern power. Partly through disabilities, but more through apprehension, the life of trade was more thoroughly paralyzed than it has been at almost any time since. Instead of a crowd of merchants, at our counters, from the west and and south-west, as far away as Santa Fe and Albuquerque, we saw only customers here a few small dealers from the rural districts and the "American Bottom," across in Illinois.

"Pringle, step here, Pringle," said Valle, senior, one morning, as he entered the office. I went in and took a seat on the opposite side of his desk.

"You know the times are, Pringle; this way of doing business won't pay, I shall have to tell all our clerks the same thing I am telling you: I am sorry, they are good, faithful fellows, all of them, but then, you see, there is nothing for them to do. I hope this stagnation won't continue long, but we can't afford meantime to keep a clerk idle, and the only thing I can do is to reduce our force to the lowest point and wait the progress of events. Legget" (Legget was book-keeper) "and myself can manage to attend to the salesroom and correspondence, and I will take care of the office." I answered that we had been expecting the same time, been discussing the matter, and had most of us made up our minds where to go.

"Yes, right enough! but, Prindle, what are you going to do? You can't leave your mother. If there was any possible way, I would be glad to keep you."

"There is room enough in the army," I replied.

"Yes, but you can't support her on a private's pay."

I knew that, but my calculations had not ended with a place in the ranks. "The way is open to something better," I answered, after a pause.

"And to many things worse. You may stand for years, and be commanded by men who are in no way equal to you. Don't be in a hurry; if your thoughts are running in that direction, we have a little job which may not be very less dangerous, but it will pay better. Our accounts in the towns up the Osage are all at fag ends. If you want to undertake the collection of our bills, and think you can get the funds down to St. Louis in safety, we will pay you double your present wages, for the time you are engaged in it. It will take two or three months, and, perhaps, by that time, affairs will assume a different aspect."

I accepted his offer at once. I knew it involved a great deal of hazard and responsibility, but it was at a time when I was ready to undertake almost anything that promised excitement and good pay. Beauregard, Lyon's magnificent swoop upon Camp Jackson, the capture of the state, had aroused it all organized bands of rebels, and I hoped, by means of quiet operations, swift movements, and a total disregard of uniform clothes, to escape the attention of the occasional bushwhackers who were just beginning to appreciate the rich field of plunder opened up by war.

Monday, of the next week, I started up the Pacific railroad with a value, containing a seven shooter and a suit of sober-colored homespun, made with homely seams, in that triangular style peculiar to the region in which I was to travel. At Osage Station I took the little packet that plies on the Osage river, and began my work. At each landing, where we had sold goods, I stopped and adjusted the claims of Valle & Bro., in the speediest possible manner—though I was sometimes delayed as long as a week—taking in payments, receipts, notes, and drafts on their commission merchants in St. Louis. The boat went no futher than Waverley; but I was anxious to visit the interior towns in the country. I left my valise, with all the collections I had made, in charge of Mr. Heath, a merchant with whom I was well acquainted, and, who, besides being honest and discreet, was a northern man, and sound on national questions. This was a great point.

People who have not been in the border states during the war, understand very imperfectly how entirely all the affairs of men's lives, at that time, hinged upon their views in this question. I should say I had been in this part of the country before. Had taught school one winter at "Simpson's," a cross-roads and post office about twenty miles from the river, and one winter at Waverley. Simpson's was the ultima thule of my expectations at the time I left it. Had I had any prospect to make there, but it was not far out of my way, and all the way up the Osage, and during the lonely evenings I had to traverse by the road, the memory of the winter I had spent there came over me in a dreamy, Indian summer sort of a way, creating a strong desire to sit once more under the hospitable roof of my bachelor host Alf Simpson, talk over old times with him, and make a note of the progress of little Bertha Simpson, his niece, had made since her school days under my tuition.

I had not as good success in collecting as heretofore, as many of our debtors were not to be found. But they were chiefly small matters, and I found it necessary to hurry on. It was known that Sterling Price, with an irregular force of tatterdemalions, had entered the State from Arkansas, and was moving leisurely forward, determined to overrun the western counties, to "Take Missouri out of the Union, or to take her to h—."

I rode up to Simpson's house, one warm evening in September. A young lady was sitting on the porch reading. I felt certain it must be Bertha, as the figure, a girl I had known as a slender, and her hair was a trifle whitish. The lady sitting before me was plump and well developed, and her light brown hair, soft and silky, was drawn smoothly back, displaying a top head of quicsly proportions. Her eyes (by this sign I knew them), were large, and of that rich dark gray, so rarely seen, yet so beautiful even in women. Her complexion was exquisitely clear, and beneath a pair of pretty lips, a little velvet chin projected, with enough in its shape to one's attention to the possession of abundant self-will. I had seen many women whose beauty was more pretentious, but never one who had ever possessed itself so utterly of my imagination.

"Good evening, Miss Bertha! What are you reading?"

She had been looking at me with that complacent curiosity with which a person usually watches a stranger approaching his door.

"Good evening, sir," she said, slowly, leaning forward in her chair, and looking sharply into my face.

Suddenly a light gleamed in her eyes, and springing up she ran down the steps to meet me.

"Oh, Mr. Pringle, I am so glad to see you. Come again. Come in; Alf will be so glad to see you."

All soon came in. His greeting was such as might be expected from one of those men—there are a few such cases in the desert of human companionship—who seem to be endowed with a second, many goodness. He had obtained the best education his scanty opportunities afforded, and in his intercourse with men, had profited under a small library of standard books, which he had read and re-read till he knew them thoroughly. He had a large searching intelligence and genial nature, made him one of the pleasantest men I have ever known. But I do not think he was to blame for my interest in the secondary generation could hardly have kept me so long away from the watch over my employers' money. I had allowed myself one day for my visit at first, but the evening of the fourth day found me still there.

Alf and his brother, Squire Ben Simpson, were the only two reliable Union men in that neighborhood. They were consequently watched with suspicion, and all the information they could get of rebel movements, was obtained by stealth.

The fourth evening I was sitting on the porch alone. Alf was at the barn, and Bertha had gone down to the store. I saw her returning in a short time, and she hurried up the path to the door, looking alarmed and excited. She drew me into the house and shut the door.

"I am afraid they are going to give us trouble to-night or to-morrow. I overheard them talking at the store about the 'abolition schoolmaster,' and wondering whether he had brought his money along, or left it at Waverley. And Gen. Parsons, who part of Price's army, is only one day off."

It was, doubtless, worse than that—straggling parties must be still further in advance. I knew I must be off at once, if I would save anything. My business was known to them by some means, and that I would be disturbed by some of these rough characters, if I staid another day, I felt certain; and even now, I was fearful that I should be overtaken before I could get safely out of their reach. I loaded my revolver carefully, while Alf was bringing my horse around to the gate.

"Good-by, mother," said I, extending my hand, "we cannot tell what is coming, but I hope to see you again. Till then, may God bless and keep you."

I thought I felt the pressure of my hand returned, and could not resist the temptation to lean forward and kiss the pretty face that did not turn away from me; then hurried down the path and mounted my horse, a large chestnut with a vicious eye, but clean limbs and great endurance.

I plunged along at a furious pace till I came to the bridge over Elm river, a sluggish stream, running through low, wooded banks, and falling into the Osage. In the hurry of leaving, I had forgotten to water my horse, so I turned down the steep embankment in front of the bridge, and rode along a narrow path, beaten out of the clay bank, close by the edge of the water. Springy elm trees and shrubs, growing out of the bank, projected over the path, and out over the still stream. A mass of drift wood, tied up by the bridge, backed the water up some distance, and a thick, green scum covered it like a blanket, except here and there, by the edge, when there was a break. Beneath the scum there was a rush of ice of every size, and beneath the water indefinite fathoms of slimy mud. Ugh! I shudder yet whenever I think of that place! The moon was just rising above the timber, and as I rode along I looked down into the crevice, which the river made through the forest.

I could never imagine anything more horrible, when excited by Gods and Goblins, than what I saw there. It was not a turgid flood like them, rolling on for ever, but there it lay, a ghastly, treacherous mass, creeping in among the drift wood, ready to smother in its remorseless embrace whatever should venture into it. I rode along to the first break in the scum and dropped the reins. My horse, in his eagerness to drink, stepped one foot in the mire, and, as that went down, whirled his head to get a drop himself. But that was a sunk slowly on all fours, the bubbles streaming up along his legs as his hoofs descended through the mud. I had drawn myself up into the saddle with the best-began to sink, and sprang for the bank just as he fell on his side in the opposite direction.

I fell flat in the soft bed, but, fortunately, my hand reached the hard clay of the path. I drew myself out, smeared with the ooze, and flecked with the green froth. But, in my anxiety about the horse, I paid no attention to this. I yelled at him, clapped my hands, and, finally, caught up a club and threw it at his head. He reared his shoulders and dashed out of the water, and, hanging forward, fell again, further out in the stream, where the water was a little deeper and the mud softer. He did not attempt to sink as before, but plunged forward again and again, rolling from side to side, till, finally, his forefeet were planted on the opposite bank. He drew himself out, his haunches glistening with the bluish paste as though they had been oiled. I started down the path to dodge on a run, but the horse did not rest atop when he reached the road, he went off in a long, heavy trot, his head stretched up to the best height of his neck, and swaying from side to side, as if amazed at his own liberty. I heard the stirrup whacking against the saddle as he disappeared among the trees. There was nothing left but to walk. I dared not go back, and I hoped my horse would stop at Squire Bee's, or at least that I might get another there. As I was pushing up through the elder bushes, which grew thickly on the embankment, I heard the thud of hoofs coming from the direction of Simpson's. I crouched in the bushes, and presently there men rode by. I recognized one of them as a huge mulatto-girl, named Boggy, an amalgam of French, negro and Indian blood, who, I knew well, had been here, in a hut near the Elm, by means unknown to the community. His mortal character was fearfully bad, and his reputation villainous; but no great crime had ever been clearly proved against him.

I was sure these three were in pursuit of me, but doubted not they would continue right along on the road to Waverley. I hurried over the bridge and along the road, my anxiety increasing every moment. I broke into a run, and maintained it till I was wet with sweat and nearly exhausted. The distant bleating of the goats, and, in the trees by the Elm, accompanied me as I ran.

I had not gone more than a mile, when three men stepped out from a clump of elder bushes and confronted me. They were the same. They had overtaken my horse—one of them held him by the rein—and were waiting for the others.

"Fork over," growled the big ruffian Bogy, presenting his pistol within a few inches of my face.

I knew my revolver had not been discharged enough to prevent the explosion of the waterproof caps, but I could not make a movement to draw it without that pistol was covering my face. I knew enough of the character of my assailants to expect nothing less than death after, if not before I was robbed, and resolved upon an attempt to escape, however desperate, if I could only beguile the coarse-witted villain into lowering his pistol.

"Don't! Don't! Oh, don't!" I gasped, knocking my knees together in a paroxysm of fear, which, under the circumstances, it was not at all difficult to assume. "For God's sake, don't shoot! Don't kill me! I will give you everything."

The brute was evidently amused. "Them hand out yer cash," he replied, with an oath and a broad grin, but without lowering his pistol. After fumbling in my pocket, I drew out my wallet, and handed it to him.

"Is that all?"

"Yes; all but a little change. Can't you—won't you let me keep that to get home with?"

With a loud guffaw he put up his pistol, and brought his heavy hand down on my shoulder.

"See here, you infernal nigger-worshipper, if you don't shell out everything in two minute, I'll mash yer head on that domick," pointing to a boulder beside the road, "quickest you ever seed anything in yer life."

"Yes, yes, I will," I replied again, fumbling in my pocket.

He took his hand from my shoulder and watched my movements, his body bent forward and his glaring immense tobacco-stained teeth. I clutched the stock of my revolver, and drawing it hurriedly, fired it into his abdomen; his throat, and fired. He fell forward, blood and curses gurgling out of his mouth. I turned upon one of the others and pulled again, but the ball only cut a groove through his cheek. In a second they both surged against me and bore me down, one of them falling heavily upon me. I endeavored to rise, but felt as the load rolled me again, and from that time I knew nothing till I felt myself lifted up and some one calling, "For heaven's sake, Fredin, what is the matter? Are you hurt, brown you?"

It was Squire Bee. My horse had broken away during the melée, and had come up to his gate. He had immediately, with true Samaritan charity, struck back along the road in search of the rider. They helped me along to his house, faint and bruised, but not dangerously hurt. As to Bogy, one ball had not fired upon me from the bush, as was their custom, or even made sure of killing me after I was down, I could never comprehend; but it did not stop to speculate upon it. I was determined to push on to Waverley that night. Squire Bee remonstrated, but could not assure me that the danger would not be greater to-morrow. "If you must go," said he finally, "you shall not go alone. Alick, go out and saddle the gray mare."

I thanked him gratefully, and after swallowing a glass of brandy, we mounted and were off. Two hours' gallop brought us to the edge of Waverley. I found my friend Heath tumbling his goods and valuables on board the little steamer, preparatory to departure for St. Louis. He told me that the Secessionists and rebels would be in Waverley the next day. My values and contents were safe, and with these I, two days after, presented myself at Valle & Bernays' counting-room. Salutations and kisses, and, in three hours more, had enlisted in the first Missouri cavalry, then organizing at Benton barracks. We were mustered into Lyon's mont's army, then following Price in his retreat from Lexington.

One evening, in October, found us in camp, six miles from Simpson's. I applied to the colonel of our regiment, and after representing to him my knowledge of the country, received the following order:

"Lieut. Prindle will take squad and forage for this command, reporting to Quartermaster Judd."

I was not unmindful of my orders, but we did not halt till we reached the now deserted "store." After directing the men to the farms of the most loyal-looking of the few houses in sight, and to two hours, I rode on to Simpson's house. I found his neat farm a wreck; his fences were gone; his fine blooded stock driven off or shot; his barned, and many of the windows of his house battered out. It was dusk when I knocked at the door. It was opened by Mrs. Simpson.

"Prindle! is that you? I am glad to see you," said he, grasping my hand heartily. His story was a plain line of loss and suffering, and nearly have been made desolate by the merciless trend of advancing and retreating armies.

"You have been unfortunate, my dear old friend," but in their retreat they left me as you see, only you can't see the beauty insults they heaped upon us. Everything is gone but the house. We are, compressing his lips, "if it were not for Bertha, I would join your regiment to-morrow, and hunt the feeds up and down the state, as long as I have a breath."

"Where is Bertha?" I asked.

"In the kitchen. I will go and call her."

"No, no, Mr. Simpson, you know your own duty in regard to going into the army, better than I can suggest to you; but as for Bertha, if she is willing, I think Chaugis Gale and I could fix that."

He understood, and after reflecting a little, answered, "Well, if you can gain her consent, I will not object. She is a noble girl, Prindle, and deserves all the loving care the best man in the land can give her."

"I know that," I interrupted, grasping his hand, "and, God helping me, no effort of mine shall be spared to make her happy."

I went to the kitchen myself. I found Bertha, looking a little pale and careworn, but the gleam of joy that illuminated that her results quite was unbroken. To my earnest entreaty, she placed her hand in mine, and answered "Yes," quietly, but with deep feeling that affected me.

"But can you go now, Bertha? I must report at headquarters before twelve."

"You are in camp again by eleven, and going straight to the chaplain's tent, were married by candle-light. Alf Simpson, my brave wife and I went through the wars together. Alf has returned and is fast restoring his desolated homestead. We are in our home in St. Louis, and Bertha is there now, just on the other side of the table, tipping the cradle with her dear little foot, for our company has been recruited a little, we now number three.

THE EXECUTION OF CHAMP FERGUSON.

THE notorious guerrilla and murderer, whose deeds for the several past years, have stained the record of the Southwestern States, was executed, according to his sentence, on Friday, the 20th of October, at Nashville, Tennessee.

If ever the taking of man's life on the scaffold was justifiable, the execution of Champ Ferguson was. He was fairly tried, and a series of the most brutal and unjustifiable murders proven against him. Both before and after conviction, he had every chance and favor offered him, and consideration of treatment, far beyond his deserts. On the morning of the day of his execution, his wife and daughter were allowed an interview. Was a heart-rending scene, and brought tears to the eyes of all who witnessed it. The first thing to her husband and wept aloud, completely surrendering herself to the terrible anguish of her heart, exclaiming: "My God! my God! have I not already suffered enough? Is my agony never to cease? Oh, God, is there nothing that will satisfy Thy justice?" Then she threw suddenly herself up, she exclaimed, "Die bravely, Champ, die bravely!" The daughter, who is represented as a lovely and beautiful girl of sixteen, with large, expressive black eyes, and a sweet countenance, then approached her father and embraced him, who, at her approach, opened his arms, her head falling upon his bosom. For some minutes a death-like silence pervaded the apartment, broken only by the sobs of the heart-broken wife and daughter, but soon the better word of command was given to separate, and the daughter, as the young girl shrieked, "farewell, my poor, poor papa, farewell!" and if I sensexless into her mother's arms.

The sad scene was then taken the place of execution, showing all the time a composure that astonished every one who witnessed it. The charges and specifications were read to him as he stood upon the scaffold, and as each was enumerated, he made some answer denying or explaining it. Before the drop fell, he requested, the officer approached the prisoner, and said:

"In obedience to this order, Mr. Ferguson, it is my duty to execute you."

"I know it," replied the prisoner.

"Do you desire to say anything?" the officer; to which the prisoner hesitatingly replied:

"No, not particularly."

Being asked if he had any final remarks to offer, Ferguson replied:

"I can't speak much; I don't know many things in these days that I can say, and I don't deny anything I have ever done. Don't give me to the doctors to be cut up, when, colonel, I am dead; let my body put in the ground, pointing to his coffin, "and taken to the graveyard in White county, and buried there."

"You shall be," replied the colonel, "and your body shall be sent to your friends. Have you anything more to say?"

"Well, however, you say stop, I'll stop," said the doomed man; "I am under your control; I wouldn't be sure if I should, if I had control, and I must submit. What I am, I am, and I can't help it; but you would not have my body cut up, would you, colonel? I would like to be buried as some as good friends as any man; but they can't help me now. All I have to say is, I don't want to be cut up by the doctors."

The white cap was drawn over his face, and the officer again repeated the question:

"Have you anything further to say?" to which Ferguson replied:

"I have not."

The officer then gave the motion to the executioner to take his post, during which movement, Champ exclaimed, "Farewell, my darling wife;" "Good Lord, have mercy on my soul!" and as the words fell from his lips, the executioner chopped the rope, and the drop fell with the prisoner's body and precipitation into eternity. The fall did not break his neck, but it killed him instantly. After the body had hung for thirty minutes, it was cut down, placed in a coffin, which was turned over to his family, who were waiting at a house adjoining the jail. The daughter, on receiving the body and remains of her father, she exclaimed, in a loud ringing voice, "Well, I hope they are satisfied now."

The trial of Champ Ferguson, Virginian, who had before promised that if the trial went adverse to him, he would tell all, was visited by one of the editors of the New York Herald, who has made a bought a confession, with the understanding that it should not be published until after the execution. In his confession he acknowledged the truthfulness of most of the charges made against him by the court. Alluding to the death of Bill Fisher, a Union victim, he remarked that he had killed him after the most desperate struggle that he ever had in his life. He fell to the body, and Zachry kept shooting, while he would knock the pistol aside; he finally got out his knife and stabbed him in a few times. He also confessed to the cold murder of Boswell Taylor, who, he remarked, ought to have been killed before; to the killing of Atty Taylor, and a number of others, and was then stabbed; to the killing of John Crabtree, Elisha Kozier, Joseph Stover, and a young lad, who he stabbed after he fell to the ground, and numerous others mentioned in the charge. To the same person he remarked: "I was a Southern man all my life, I am yet, and will die a rebel. I believe I was right in all I did. I don't think I done anything wrong at any time. I committed my crimes in a cool and deliberate manner. I killed a good many men, of course, I don't deny that, but never killed a man whom I did not know was seeking my life."

THE DISASTER OF THE ST. JOHN.

ONE of the most fearful disasters that it has ever been our lot to record, occurred on Sunday morning, Oct. 29th, at 10 minutes past 6 o'clock, to the splendid steamer St. John, of the New York and Albany line, just opposite the Elysian Fields, Hoboken.

The greater portion of the passengers were still in their berths, when a tremendous explosion shook the whole boat. The larboard boiler had exploded, carrying destruction to that entire portion of the boat, delaying the staterooms and cabins with 30 tons of boiling water, hurrying 14 persons into eternity, and terribly scalding many more.

To undertake a description of the terrible sufferings and horrible scenes that followed the power of language. The boat was speedily towed to the wharf, and instant aid rendered. The scene was harrowing in the extreme. Amid the groans of the scalded, and glistening ornaments, on the rich carpets, now wet with water scarcely cold, stood revealed a wreck, a dead-house and a hospital. Forward, near the engine-room bulk-head, lay the dead. First, a mother and her two little children. Next, a mother and a sweet child, the husband and father lay at the stern end of the saloon, suffering fortures inexpressible. Next, a mother and wife. By her head sat the husband, silent, suffering untold agony. He was alone—so was their child. He had gone out of the room just before the explosion occurred, leaving his wife alone, and for the last time in life and health. A man lay in the engage. Already were put upon to their long homes, and others lay in the agony of death.

The scalded were disposed of in the after part of the saloon and in two staterooms. Several wife were slightly scalded had gone home, but 16 lay grouped around. Mr. J. F. Cunningham and his wife, and two very interesting little daughters, formed a sad group. The little ones bore their hard lot with much fortitude. It was a sad, sad picture. This family supposed that they were to eat their morning meal at home, but Providence had ordained it otherwise. Mr. and Mrs. Lyons, who were united in wedlock on Thursday last, and had been on their wedding tour, had hoped for a happy return to their pleasant residence in Yorkville; but they, too, lay on the couches in the St. John's saloon, helpless, and endangered fearful horrors. Mr. Corville Archambault, an opulent merchant, lay there. Here his wounds bravely, but when, at length, one of the spectators ventured to break to him the terrible tidings of the death of his wife and child, his seeming stoicism forsook him, and he wept like a child.

The saloon were filled with hot, blasting steam, the floors were flooded with boiling water, and a rush as of mighty roaring waves, shook the steamer from end to end. Quick as thought the boat was cleared, with all its mighty power, torn down a portion of the steamer's cabin, and forced into a depression that separated the pantheon rooms Nos. 121 and 123, smashed to fragments the furniture, scalded and burned and mutilated the poor victims who lay in the dining saloon. In one room, blasted and mangled and slew a mother and child, and in the other a woman was lifted with the upper ceiling, uprooted the flooring of room at, seized the occupant of the lower berth, enveloped him in its blistering folds, and in the same fell, the terrific heat, drove the life from him, and then passing with fearful violence into the adjoining room, No. 63, it blasted the were and life of a lady whose husband lay by her side, separating forever and in the most marked and terrible manner, those whom God had joined together. While the crash of broken glass and fractured furniture above, drowned the death shrieks of these victims, the passengers in the cabin were alarmed by the noise and flightened by the tumult, jumped hastily from their berths and rushed precipitately and foolishly for the saloon. The majority of them were in their night-clothes, and with uncovered feet, stepped instantly into the boiling water which in the saloon were deep enough to open their lungs for the inhalation of the scalding steam. The place was dark, the steam rapidly condensing made it dark as night, and the women and children, scalded, frightened, and panic-struck, cried bitterly for help, and groaned in terrible agony.

Self-Reckoning Scene.

One of those normal, but hardly necessary sequences to troubles of this character was, that the friends of Mr. Hoffman, who was among the unhurt, while his property dressed, his blood soaked away, and he ready for removal, hastened to his wife with the tidings of his condition. Mrs. Hoffman remained but a few days. It was at her interview with him that we spoke. Wildly entering the room, she called, with all the fervor of affection, to his couch, and throwing herself upon him, cried, in the bitterness of her sorrow, with utterances that were appalling to those present and excited, "Oh, murderer, murderer, who turned and tossed in helpless wretchedness. A curious scene, strange to say, thronged the place, intending upon the deepest sorrow of a wife, and regardless of the surroundings of the man, until Capt. Petty drove the crowd out. Even this unexpected trouble was an annoyance which, though thoughtless, was, nevertheless, inexcusable.

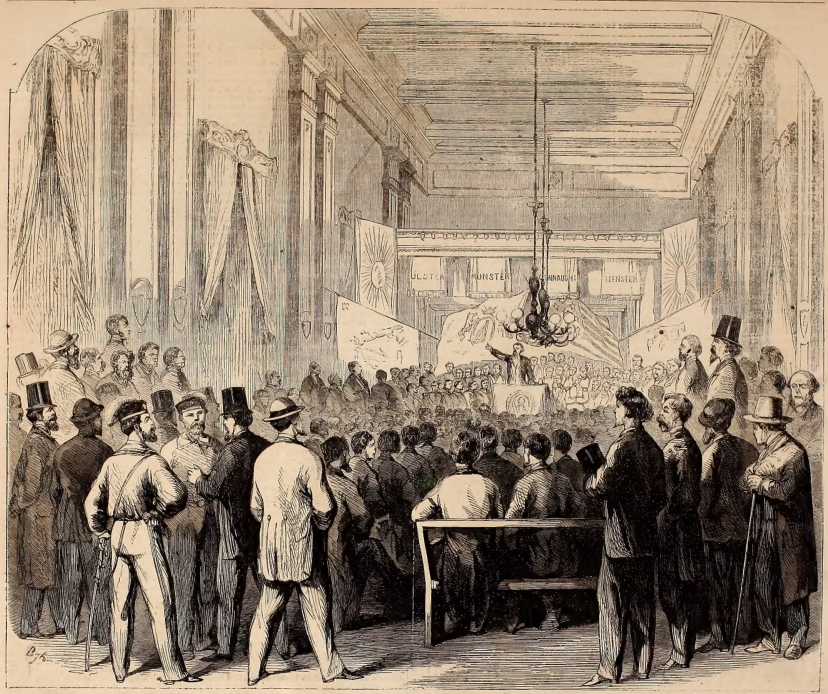
The Scene at the Boiler.

It was at this point, between the butt of the boiler and the wheelhouse, that the two firemen were at work when the terrible explosion took place. Each has presence of mind, sprang overboard, and was lost.

To quote the language of his surviving comrade: "I had been firing all night. I never saw the water about to sit down and take a smoke, when I heard the crash. I looked around the engine room, but, only muffled like, as though it was behind a thick wall. In a second afterwards I saw the steam springing up from the deck. I saw that there was a burning hole followed by gushes of hot water, which dripped down and burned my feet. I made a jump for the gunwale and pinned it, when I saw the wheel to go. I was afraid, I got down from the rail, and limped over to the other side of the boat."

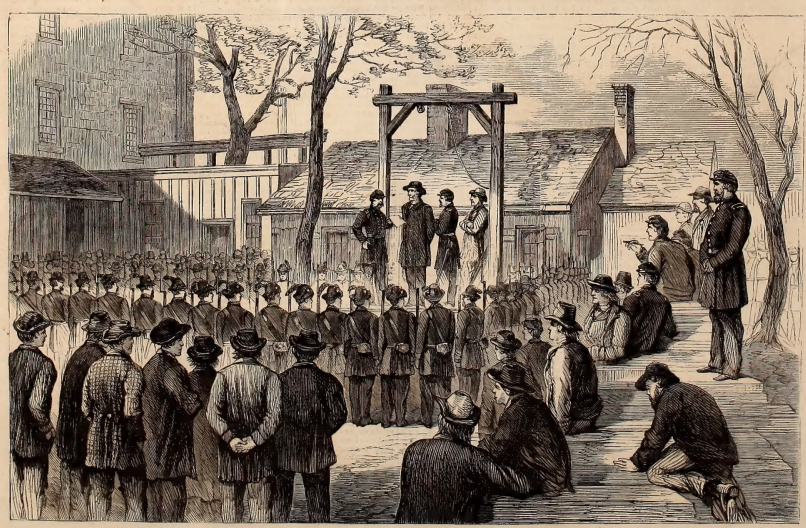
A jury was then impanelled, and a formal view taken of the bodies, the inquest having been set for the 8th of November. At that time the cause of the disaster will be known, and no time to fear that the blame will be attached to the officers and crew from blame. So far, the case seems to be that the boiler exploded from a defect in the iron having shown upon one of the plates, at the exact spot where it broke off. This was not known to the boat constructors, or it may be a circumstance beyond all human foresight.

THE SING SING HOUSE.



We give this week another of the old landmarks of New York, the last of which are rapidly disappearing under the relentless hand of improvement.

The old house, corner of Peck Slip and Water street, so long familiar to the eyes of every New Yorker, is the subject of our sketch, and a glance at the old and time-consecting links binding us to the sturdy times of our fore-fathers. Its quaint gable and shingled roof, moss-grown and decayed, are suggestive of the days when New York cons it at the Park, and the Bowery was a rural retreat. While many of the old relics and some part of the house has not a tongue, that it may tell the story of a hundred years.



The history of this old house is lost. Who was its builder, who was born, who was wedded, and who died in its walls, is a sealed subject. It is said that this old house will have to make way for some pretentious structure, and with it the wealth of many others, and all those who have passed happy or sad hours within it, will only look back upon its memory as a dream.

A KEY to Southern Prisons has just been published by Hopkins & Co., 74 Bleecker street, which has a deep and abiding interest for everybody. It consists of 31 sketches, printed upon one sheet, and by a new process made to form a perfect historic description of those charnel houses of the South. The sketches were taken on the spot by Lieut. O. R. Dahl, of the Topographical Engineers, while a prisoner, and are intensely and strictly accurate.

A SLEEPING-CAR, with 20 berths, lately started out from Cincinnati. Another was added during the trip.

THE FENIAN CONGRESS AT THE ASSEMBLY BUILDING, PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 16.

THE EXECUTION OF CHAMP FERGUSON, AT NASHVILLE, OCT. 29.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. F. WAGNER.

THE GREAT FIRE IN THE DISMAL SWAMP.

NIGHTFALL.

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

THE nightfall brings me calm and rest,
A sweet forgetfulness of life;
And quiet reigns within my breast,
And stills the day's warm strife.

I hold a tryst with memory then;
We look into the vanished past,
And peace drops o'er my heart again—
A peace that will not last.

At nightfall, when the world is still,
I hear the voices of the dead,
And then I feel my heartstrings thrill,
With words that they have said.

Oh! nightfall, wrap me round about,
From all the garishness of day,
And keep the bustling world without,
Oh, keep the world away!

Oh, day pass by and heed me not;
I ask no pitying smile from thee,
One boon alone, to be forgot,
By all the world and thee.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.—ESAU MOUNTS ONE OF THE GATES OF KNOWLEDGE, BUT SLIPS DOWN AGAIN.

IT is just a week since Richard Sleuth went away—a magnificent summer evening—and Esau sits on the stable gate, enjoying it in his own manner. All are busy or away.

Esau, as he sits on the gates, is engaged in studying a fragment of an old corn bill, and over which he sometimes laboriously traces a letter in imitation of one he sees on the bill-heading. If the result be satisfactory, he throws his head back, and takes a long look at it, and rewards himself by a bite of an enormous apple that lays beside his rough copy-book on the tower.

When two or three failures have irritated him, he will look across the side wall, and, in a surly voice, ask Phillis, who sits in the wide porch there, dressed in her best, and singing as gaily as the evening birds, if she can't "hold that row a minute."

For a few minutes all has been perfectly silent, when the creak of a gate makes them both start and look up. It is the peddler who has entered the garden.

While the man stands with one foot on the step of the porch, peering into the passage, Esau regards him fixedly. His apple has rolled down into the road, but he does not seem aware of it, or that he is crushing the charcoal in his clenched hand.

The peddler reaches his hand to the bell. At this instant his eyes encounter Esau's, and, instead of ringing the bell, he comes out of the garden and round to the outside of the stable gates. As Esau sees him approach, he makes a motion as if he would slip down from the gates, but his eyes, bright and startled as the eyes of some wild animal at bay, seem fascinated by the man's face.

"Well, my little man, are you here all alone?"

They remain face to face, staring at each other silently, and there comes into the man's eyes a look, first of suspicion, then doubt, then quick, positive recognition and hatred—a hatred he sees reflected in the boy's bright, unflinching eyes and pale face.

Esau sat still watching him, as an unfledged bird watches the rearing head of a snake against its nest, ruffled, shrinking, motionless in all but its panting breast.

As the bird stretches out its neck to look after the snake when it moves a little away, Esau stretched out his when the man turned from him. He saw that he was moving round to another part of the house, and that he did not look back at him; and then he took his arm from the tower, dropped to the ground inside the gates, made one little piteous motion with his hand to the bull-dog, who instantly leaped to him, and followed him into the stable.

When Gibbs came home that night, he found him lying asleep in a far-away corner, with his arms round the dog, and his face stained with tears.

On leaving Esau, the peddler had gone round to the kitchen, where he, no doubt, gained all the information he wanted; for when he set off on his road again, which happened to be the road to Rimboldon, he walked with a quick, satisfied step, and there was a smile on his face that did not make it more attractive to the few wayfarers who passed him.

* * * * * *

On the same evening of the meeting of Esau and the peddler, Richard Sleuth is alighting from a hackney coach, which has brought him from London to this little wayside inn, where Gibbs is to meet him, in accordance with Sleuth's wish, as conveyed in a brief letter. He looks greatly improved in health and spirts, and he leaps from the dingy, rickety vehicle, with quite a springy movement, as if well satisfied with the result of his inquiries at Leeds. But where is Gibbs with the gig? Sleuth can see nothing of either.

While he goes into the middle of the road to gaze along it, a man, who is one of those hangers-on of public-houses, who are always ready when wanted, or when not wanted, came up, and said, touching his hat:

"Take the portmantey into the house, sir?"

"No," said Sleuth. "I am expecting a man with a gig presently, to fetch me."

As Sleuth spoke, something in the man's voice or manner attracted him. He was gazing at Sleuth, not directly, but with a side-glance that shunned observation. Sleuth looked at him more closely, but the man was quite a stranger. As he stood there, keeping a kind of guard over the portmanteau, Sleuth said to himself:

"Oh, he only wants to earn a sixpence, and is wondering whether I am the man to give it to him."

So again he looked out for Gibbs and the gig, and, as he did so, again became aware of something strange, knowing, almost confidential, in the face of the man who was taking care of his portmanteau. Then Sleuth thought he would, in a quiet way, get round to him in his seemingly objectless pacings to and fro, and have a word with him.

"Not much to do hereabouts, I suppose?" he began, as he reached the man.

"Don't mind that, sir, so long as one gets a profitable job now and then."

"But you don't call this profitable, do you?" asked Sleuth.

"That's as it 'appens. I'm not down on my luck, sir, just at this present."

"What's your name, and what do you do?" demanded Sleuth, growing decidedly embarrassed at the man's behavior.

"When folk ax for me they mostly axes for Bob the Ostler."

"Hem! ha!" responded Sleuth, as if he were perfectly satisfied.

"I say, mister," suddenly was whispered, in a low tone, into his ear, a minute or two later.

"Eh! what?" exclaimed Sleuth, startled, and turning to face this strange person.

But he, instead of presenting the attitude suggested by his words, was looking humbler than ever, as he pointed down the road, in the opposite direction to Hengston, and said, inquiringly:

"Your gig and man, sir?"

Sleuth looked, and saw Gibbs tearing along the road, the horse having broken into a gallop, and up they came to the inn door.

"Beg pardon, sir, for being so behind time," said Gibbs, looking a little flustered, "but Mr. Anthony gave me a job to do. I'll just give the horse a drop o' water, for sure-ly he be all in a muck sweat, and then we'll soon be off agin, and home."

"Very well, Gibbs; and I dare say you can find time to drink a glass of ale, too. This man is an ostler, and will see to the horse for you."

"Allus look to my oss myself," said Gibbs, as he cast a suspicious look at the stranger, who soon disarmed his doubts by his zeal and willingness to be taught all Mr. Gibb's little ways, even in so small a matter as giving a horse drink.

Presently Gibbs disappeared, and Sleuth, not liking the way in which Bob the Ostler had called him "Mister," thought he, too, would go into the bar, and have something "for the good of the house." Thus Bob was left alone.

The instant that worthy personage became conscious that he was alone, he seemed to become instinct with quite a new life. After a rapid glance up and down the road, he led the horse out of the sun to the shady side of the house, where he could not be overlooked. He then pulled from his trowsers pocket a bulky kind of pocket knife, and opened out an instrument of some kind from it, and then, concealing the whole in his sleeve, where he held it with the tips of his bent fingers, he began to take a kind of groomish interest in the animal, examining, rather hastily, his hindquarters, shoulders, and head, and, much more slowly and interestedly, his feet. Did Bob fancy there was a stone in one of them, the near hind leg, that he must lift it up and examine it curiously, and suddenly wrench out a nail and drive it in again better, with the help of a stone, picked up from under the animal! Apparently it must be so, for he looks pleased, and stands off at a little distance to admire the "sperrit" of the "oss," who winces, and lays his ears back, and paws angrily with his fore feet, and can hardly be kept quiet by word of mouth, so Bob goes to him, and holds the rein, and waits.

But, as he stands, waiting for the return of the travelers, what more natural than that he should transfer the interest he had felt in the well-being of the horse, to the question of the proper state and soundness of the vehicle? So, as he stands with his back towards the corner of the inn, and his face almost close to the wheel, he manages to inquire into the efficiency of the linch-pin, by drawing it out, bending it to and fro till it is almost ready to break, and then he restores it to its place, and waits.

Waits—not for long. Sleuth comes forth, wondering whether, after all, this man knew him, and wanted to say something to him, and, if so, what? And while he slowly approaches the gig, half determining to question the ostler once more, Gibbs bustles after him, wiping his lips, and looking very red with his efforts to eat a substantial meal under cover of the profferred ale.

"Took 'im out of the sun," said the man, as he touched his hat with ostentatious respect.

"Now, then, can't yer be still?" Gibbs calls out, seeing the impatience of the horse. "When he do come out, he's in such a doose of an 'urry to get back, there's no holding of 'm," he said to Sleuth, as he took the reins, and got up to the driving seat.

Sleuth did not seem to like his position in the gig while the animal kept on plunging so violently.

"I thought," said the ostler, as he helped to put the portmanteau in place between the feet of Sleuth and Gibbs, "he must have got a stone in his feet, he's been so queer; but there's no stone, and I can't see anything wrong."

"He's right enough, don't you be afeared," said Gibbs. "Let him go, can't yer!"

Sleuth tossed Bob a sixpence, who, strange to say, took, for the moment, no notice of it, but only stared hard at Sleuth with a most significant expression, as if to say, "We aint parted yet," and so the two men drove off.

At first the horse seemed to go pretty well, though decidedly lame. Gibbs was greatly puzzled at the sudden lameness, and, after finding two or three vigorous applications of the whip produced no change in that respect, he proposed to Sleuth to stop, and let him (Gibbs) try to find out what was the matter. And after walking a few yards by the horse's side in order to watch him, and after lifting each of his feet in succession, Gibbs said, suddenly and decidedly:

"We must go back to the inn, sir, and have the near 'ind shoe off. Summat's wrong. I suspect a nail's been driv into the quick—through his stamping on a hawkerd stone, p'r'aps. The poor thing's dead beat. Look at its face!"

They went back to the inn, and thought to have made use of Bob the Ostler to find them a smith, but he was gone. Of course, there was nothing to wonder at in that; but Sleuth did wonder, even though he was silent. Could that strange man have had any wish to delay them at this spot? If so, with what motive?

Let us leave him to pursue this mental inquiry, with all the ramifications of thought, and hope, and fear to which it led, in order to answer Gibb's question to Sleuth:

"What's become of that fellow, I wonder? He's gone now that we want him."

The ostler had watched the gig out of sight before he stooped, with a laugh, to pick up his sixpence, muttering to himself:

"Not too rich to pick up a sixpence just yet! Oh, no!"

He then lounged into the inn, yawned in the fat old landlady's face as he paid her for a pint of beer, and then said, as if the idea had freshly occurred to him:

"I must be moving on into Lunnun now, I suppose."

And then she saw him slowly go out of the house, and pass the window on the right, going in the direction he had indicated.

But the very instant he had reached the corner of the house, he turned, leaped over a little paling into a bit of garden, then again leaped out at the farther side into a field, and stood, just for a moment, to survey the prospect.

The ostler saw nothing of beauty, except a deep, dry ditch, which ran for a considerable distance in a direction parallel to the road to Hengston. That, however, struck him as an object of considerable interest. A few strides took him into it, and then he began to run as if pursued by some wild beast. On—on—on—heedless of the filth in the ditch bottom—on—still on—he swept, straggling over little fences when he got too tired to jump them, till the ditch came to an end, and he must make for the road, which could not be far off.

While he hesitated as to which way to go for the nearest cut, he heard voices, he fancied, and he thought he would go towards them. He thus not only reached the vicinity of the road, but had, what seemed to him a great gratification, the opportunity of knowing that his late acquaintances, the gig travelers, were returning slowly towards the inn.

"All right!" said the ostler cheerily to himself, as if conscious so much filth, and pain, and fatigue as he had endured needed a word of reasonable comfort. "All right!" he repeated. "Now, then, push along; don't let the grass grow below yer feet."

On again he went through the stalks of a field of beans, till he reached the high bank that went sloping down to the road in a primitive fashion, and there he stripped, and did his best to purify himself, evidently thinking he had time, though not much to spare. This job over, on he went for the third time, and with increased speed.

At first he seemed only desirous to cover the ground, but gradually his speed slackened, and he then began to look very curiously into the state of the road, which was a bye-road, little used. The ostler did not, however, actually stop for some minutes after the beginning of this particular examination; and when he did, it was at a place where the road was getting bad—soft and sloppy at the sides, and deep in the ruts that ran through the middle, forming a single track.

He liked the look of the spot apparently, for he not only stopped there, but presently he went up the little bank on one side to look round, and seeing no person, or house, or sign of habitation, he descended, threw off his jacket, drew forth that wonderful knife of his, and with this he dropped on his knees, and began to dig in the rut nearest to him.

The ground just there proved harder than the ostler had reckoned on, and after digging away for some minutes with his usual but still feeble implement—feeble, that is, considering the work of a spade or a pickaxe was required from it—he paused and looked about him with a heated face, dripping with sweat, and an angry brow, as if communing with himself on the propriety of trying to find an easier place. But a quick glance along the road by which he expected the travelers, seemed to show he was thinking of the shortness of his time; and so, rather than have to begin again elsewhere, he worked on with new energy.

And thus, with the knife and his hands, in the course of some three-quarters of an hour, he scooped out an oblong hole, a couple of feet wide, a yard long, and about a foot and a half deep, the ends of the broken rut pointing, as it were, right into its centre.

The ostler took first one look at his work as he raised himself on his knees, and wiped the sweat from his brow with his elbows, which not only enriched his face with various streaks, but with odors that made Bob spit again in disgust at the smell.

But he was in no mood to stick at trifles—this day might be the making of him. Hark! What is that? The gig coming, and he not ready? Bob hopes not, for he really has worked hard to have his meeting with Mr. Sleuth in this place; and if he does not get it here, and now, he does not know when and where he may get it. No, it is not the gig approaching. He no longer hears the sound which he had fancied to be of the wheels.

"Look alive then," says the ostler to himself, and the monition is attended to. Brushwood is collected from the hedges on each side of him, till he has collected a goodly heap. Then he cuts half a dozen sticks, and resumes his occupation and posture. But if "prayer be labor," and kneeling the attitude of prayer, the ostler's prayers, as indicated by his work, must be of an extraordinary kind.

He first fixes the sticks he has cut so as to form a sort of continuous level, a few inches below the road level, their ends stuck into the soil on each side of the hole. Then he lays thinner sticks across the others, and he lays them very close together. Upon this platform he smoothes out the bundle of stuff—twigs, with foliage—he had collected ready; and now there is an even surface, about the same height as the road generally. The last process the ostler finds necessary is to sprinkle over the twigs a layer of stones and earth, which makes the whole, in Bob's opinion, a "good job," though he looks dubiously at the rut, which suddenly ends and begins again without apparent reason. Bob thinks he could have even managed to make a rut go through his work if he had had more time.

"But it'll do," he said to himself; "and what's the use of worriting for more hard work when a job will do?"

But while, after a moment or two of genuine admiration of the effect of his toil, he thinks of another measure as requisite to ensure success, he again hears a sound, which he believes to be that of wheels.

"Yes; and there's the tramp of the oss's feet. I must hide."

He did hide; where, however, he could see without being seen—among some blackberry bushes. What was his vexation to discover presently that the approaching vehicle was not the gig, but a gentleman's carriage! Of course that carriage would have the benefit of the ostler's little arrangement. There would be damage—a row—inquiry—pursuit, the ingenious artificer might even get put into "quod," as he expressed it, and so all his fine schemes come to an end.

To his intense relief, the carriage turned off when within a quarter of a mile or so, perhaps through some lodge gates. Anyhow, the wrong people were gone, and the right ones were no doubt coming. Quick, then, to finish!

He saw, not fifty yards distant, a heap of stones, placed ready to be broken. Away, as if for a wager against time, he runs to this heap, takes a big stone, runs back with it, and deposits it just outside his bit of handiwork. This process he repeats several times, till he sees on each side of the track made by the ruts, stones lying about among the wet rushes in such a position, that if a traveler driving along the road should happen, by any chance, to think of keeping out of the ruts, these stones would be sure to say to him, "Don't."

Thus prepared, Bob again resumed his place in the tree, and waited for his prey.

Seeing nothing of them for several minutes, the ostler began to mutter:

"I a'most wish I'd let the linch-pin alone. If they break down afore they gets here, it'll be but a half-and-half business, and I may whistle for my interview. Hark! Yes—yes. They're coming, and fast—to make up, I dessay, for lost time. How's my knife? There's no knowing what odd fancies may strike him, if we do get all alone by ourselves—his man out of the way—in this lonely place."

So saying, the ostler felt the sharp point of a short but strong blade belonging to that favorite pocket instrument, and while his fingers were dallying with it, his eyes were fixed on the road, and his ears intently listening for the coming gig.

Nearer and nearer he hears the sounds, and now he sees the gig emerging from a turn in the road. He backs himself stealthily into the thick shelter of the blackberry bushes, and waits.

On the travelers come, and at a great pace. The horse's foot has evidently been set right again. It is also evident the travelers have no fear of their linch-pin. Whether its treacherous character has been discovered, or whether it is now about to be put to the test intended by the ostler, Bob himself is not able to decide. But whether the linch-pin be bad or good matters little now, provided only the travelers will keep in the ruts.

They are now but a few yards off, and do not stop. Bob's heart, such as it is, is in his mouth, to use his own notion of the case. A few yards more, another second or two of time, and—ha! there it is! Heavens, what a crash! Out fly the two men, projected head foremost, but in a side direction, from the gig, as if from some devilish instrument of destruction; while the broken vehicle, with a single wheel, is dragged on by the half-frantic horse.

* * * * *

Bob the Ostler, lying hidden in the bushes, like a spider, waiting for his prey, laughed to himself as he saw what had happened.

"Ha! ha! ha! How some folks keep their appointments!"

TREMENDOUS EXPLOSION OF GUN COTTON.—A week ago, there was a tremendous explosion in one of the military magazines in the Steinfeld, near Weiner Neustadt. By some unknown means 600 cwt. of gun cotton, which was kept in the magazine, took fire. The building was blown to pieces, but fortunately no lives were lost. The sentry was thrown off his legs and somewhat hurt, but, being mindful of his duty, he speedily rose and walked, musket on arm, to the guard-house where he reported what had happened. The windows of the houses in the adjacent villages of Solenau, Pottondorf, and Ebenfurth, were all broken.

A RAILWAY TRAIN ATTACKED BY BRIGANDS.—A railway train from Temeswar to Pesth was attacked a few days ago near Orosslasnos by six armed men with their faces blackened, who having first broken into the house of the keeper of the line and plundered it of forty florins and other objects, proceeded to remove one of the rails of the line, in consequence of which the train from Basiash deviated and came to a stoppage. The brigands, issuing from a retreat, were then preparing to pillage the whole convoy, when the employés of the line, mustering in force, and aided by the passengers in the carriages, succeeded in putting them to flight.

DEAD.

THE seasons weave their ancient dance,
The restless ocean ebbs and flows,
The world rolls on through day and dark,
Regardless of our joys or woes!

Still up the breezy western slopes
The reaper girls, like apples brown,
Bend singing to their gleeful toil,
And sweep the golden harvest down;

Still, where the slanting sunlight gilds
The holes of cedar and of pine,
Chants the lone blackbird from the brake
With melancholy voice divine;

Still all about the mossy trucks
Hums all his darge the woodward bee;
Still fitfully the corn-crake's note
Comes to me from the upland lea;

Still round the forest bower she loved,
The woodbine trails its rich festoons;
The chimney-poppies burst and fill
Beneath the silent autumn moons;

Still round her lattice, perched aloof,
In sunny shade of thatched eaves,
The jasmine clings, with yearning pale,
And withers in its shroud of leaves;

Still round the old familiar porch
Her cherished roses blush and peer,
And fill the sunny air with balm,
And strew their petals year by year.

Nor here, within, one touch of change;
The household ways, the ordered care,
The books—the arms on the wall—
The harp—the music—all are there.

No touch of change! I close my eyes—
It cannot be she comes no more!
I hear the rustling of her dress,
I hear her footsteps on the floor.

I feel her breath upon my brow,
I feel her kiss upon my cheek;
Down phantoms of the buried past!
Down, or my heavy heart must break.

Tales of the Bivouac.

BETRAYED AND RESCUED.

BY WILLIAM H. MORRIS.

At the time the rebel army advanced through the Shenandoah valley, previous to the battle of Gettysburg, the garrison of Harper's Ferry consisted of a brigade of infantry, the 12th and fifteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry and a small force of heavy and light artillery. The post was so isolated, that, surrounded by the enemy's cavalry, and communication with the adjoining post at the Monocacy was for many days cut off. An attack was hourly expected, and the troops were constantly on the alert.

Officers of the Signal Corps watched, from the summit of Maryland Heights, the movements of the enemy, and reported by signals the columns composed of many thousands each. It was a grand sight to observe the movements of such masses of cavalry and infantry. At night, the camp fires of the enemy encircled the post, and in the morning the signal officers reported fresh inclosing lines.

The suspense increased each day, and the superior officers met often to discuss the probable intentions of the enemy, and to perfect the arrangements for defending the post in the most effective manner.

The steady, onward march of the vast army, and the absence of any demonstration on the outworks, led finally to the belief that it was not in the programme to attack the place, but to turn it.

To ascertain, as nearly as possible, the intentions of the enemy, it was necessary to send scouting parties out to observe his movements, and as this dangerous duty required men of good judgment and an accurate knowledge of the country, those would were from the best cavalry officers and men at the post.

The road leading over the mountains being one by which the enemy could approach, a small picked party, consisting of Lieutenant C—— and four of his men, was sent to reconnoitre it.

This scouting party officer was peculiarly fitted for such service, as he was familiar with the topography of the country, and had that easy, pleasing bearing, that made friends and allays among the residents who were neutral in the cause, and sometimes even among those who sympathized with the rebellion. He was, besides, a superb horseman, and rode a horse remarkable for his speed, courage, and sagacity. The fame of Brown Bill extended even to that of his owner.

Having received his instructions from General Tyler, then in command, he proceeded along the Sharpsburg turnpike cautiously, until felt his way to the top of the hill where the road crosses the range of mountains and descends into Pleasant valley. Finding the country still clear, he continued to advance until he reached the plain. On reaching a point where the road branched off in three directions, he sent a man on each, retaining one by him. While waiting for their return, he heard the tramp of horses in his rear, and before he could mount his men, a party of eight cavalrymen, in gray uniform came in sight. They at once hailed him with the usual challenge.

Lieutenant C—— wheeled his horse and dashed down the road.

The bullets of the carbines, which the mounted men carried, flew past him, but, as is usual in such cases, when pieces are fired in precipitation, they did not hit him. It became a race for life, and one attended with but little chance of escape, for the direction which C—— was obliged to take was one which led him still further from his own camp, and might at any moment bring him to the tickets of the enemy.

With the speed of the reindeer, his splendid horse, Brown Bill, bounded along the winding road, and gradually increased the distance between himself and his pursuers. On reaching a clearing, C—— left the road and directed his course to a deep stream which winds through that beautiful valley. He knew that its width varied from fifteen to thirty feet, and that few horses would attempt to lean it. Twilight was yielding to the darkness of night, and he resolved to place the barrier of the stream between himself and his pursuers. A few minutes brought him to the bank, and with the lightness of the greyhound, Brown Bill leaped across the chasm and stood unharmed on the southerly side.

C—— with that reckless indifference to consequences, which often leads young soldiers to run great and unnecessary risks when impelled by curiosity, and of improving to the utmost the advantage which he had gained by the daring leap, paused to see if either of the graybacks would attempt the feat. They came on, yelling and swearing, but, on reaching the bank, the horses stopped with a suddenness that nearly threw their riders on their necks, and no urging would induce them to even approach the foaming torrent.

"Ha! ha!" said C——, "give my compliments to Stuart," and turning his horse, he trotted quietly towards the thicket.

"Shoot the Yankee," exclaimed the leader; but, before they could reload their carbines, C—— had entered the woods and was out of view.

After riding about half a mile, C—— turned up a small bridle path, and stopped at the cottage of Mr. James. He knocked at the door very gently, but with a slight emphasis on the second rap. In a few moments it was opened by a young female, who carried in her hand a pitcher.

"I am fortunate," said C——, "to find you at home, as I am hunted by graybacks, and must conceal myself till midnight, when I will try to regain my camp."

"Oh, Charles," she replied, "how could you run such risks when you know our people are in the valley."

"I cannot explain now, for the men will soon cross the stream a few yards above the ford where I did, and will, no doubt, search for me in this vicinity. I only ask can you hide me?"

"There is my father's corn-crib, a lumber-room over the kitchen, and that is not safe, for if the men come here, they will search the house."

"Well, it is the best that can be done, so I will go up there."

C—— then took off his saddle and bridle, and turned his horse loose to eat the rich grass of the meadow. As the animal was trained to run on a release from restraint, Brown Bill rolled himself in some soft earth, and in a few moments so changed his appearance that a casual observer would never suspect him of any especial value or speed. Like most blooded horses he had a lazy indolent look, and was the last animal in the idea of sluggishness and a total absence of spirit.

C—— concealed his saddle and bridle under some loose hay, and placed himself in a position where he could observe the approaches to the house.

"Wait here," said Jenny, "until I sing 'The Sunny Side of the Mountain,' and then come through the kitchen to the loft above. Watch and wait."

Having filled her pitcher, she re-entered the cottage, and C—— waited with more impatience than was pleasant for the signal. Presently he heard the first verse of the song, and with a glance the heads of mounted men. He was about retreating to the woods when he heard the song, and with a noiseless step he passed through the kitchen and climbed the ladder to the loft. This being one of those old cottages which were built when the forest was cleared, and it was composed of rough timbers and coarse boards, and had not given an air of taste by the rose-vines which climbed the porch and covered the house. C—— could observe the room below through the cracks of the floor, and he had nearly taken a position which would enable him to "watch and wait" when he saw the enemy enter the kitchen with a white apron on, and her sleeves rolled up to the shoulders. She hastily uncovered a barrel of flour, and drawing out a bottle, she completed arrangements for mixing bread.

The sudden approach of horsemen, and a loud knock at the door, put a stop to her labors, and with an effort, overcoming her dread, she inquires:

"Who is there?"

"I am King and his men," answered a rough voice.

Jenny opened the door, and said in a cordial manner:

"Why, Tom, where did you come from; I thought you were in London valley?"

"That is well enough," said the broad-shoulder horseman, "but we want to know where that curly-headed Yankee is that we are after; you can tell, I reckon, for he turned up your lane, and he has been here before! Now, Jenny, you are a nice sort of gal, but no young woman can associate with a bluecoat, and not be suspected."

"Thomas King," exclaimed Jenny, with indignation, "you know I am as true to the cause as any soldier in the army of General Lee, and that I would not be found in company with a man who beat farm in Virginia," and then placing her lips close to the ear of the ruffian, she whispered, "he is in the loft here, but he is armed with a pair of revolvers, and is a desperate character. He came to me for protection, and I sent him up there, as being the place where he could be best kept a prisoner, for there is only one window, which is too far from the ground to jump out of, and he can't come down the ladder without being taken."

"Ha! ha!" chuckled King, with a nudge of the elbow, "smart gal."

This disclosure, which C—— overheard, astonished him beyond description. He was a prisoner, and betrayed by a girl for whom he had felt and expressed a romantic attachment, and he had every reason to believe she returned his passion. However, he resolved to defend himself to the last, and preferred death to imprisonment in the loathsome pens of the enemy.

King gave some orders to his men, and a sentinel was established in front of the house. The other men came in, and threw themselves on the floor, where they soon fell asleep, leaving King and Jenny to converse, which seemed, to one, at least, to be interesting.

Jenny placed some cold meat and a brown jug on the table, which King regarded with a grin, and proceeded to satisfy an enormous appetite. He helped himself also freely from the jug, which contained whisky. In the mean time, Jenny put flour and water in a large wooden trough and went through with the work of making bread.

King watched her with interest, making rude compliments at her which evidently pleased at the good fortune of being so near a very pretty girl whom he had long known, and, in his own way, much admired.

"You must help me to make a fire in the oven," said Jenny.

King took some light wood, and a coal from the the fire-place, and kindled the fire. While he was so employed, Jenny hastily rolled some dough into long strips, and formed with them, on the table, the word watch. The pieces were then made to spell the word climb, and were immediately after placed in the oil then forming.

C——, who saw these words, at once surmised her meaning, and proceeded to examine his window and its surroundings. The sentinel occasionally made his appearance beyond the corner, but as his movement up and down his beat was regular, C—— concluded that his movements were to be unobserved. The height from the ground was too great to risk a jump, and even if made, the sentinel would be sure to cause the guard. Above, the eaves were too far to reach, and the sides of the house being smooth there was nothing to grasp, and no way to climb.

At last Jenny had finished her loaves and pies, and they were baked, and taken from the oven. She had now no longer any excuse to remain in the kitchen, and so she took up her candle and said to King:

"I must go to my room now, and will leave you here, as it is warm, and the rain has commenced to fall heavily."

"Good-night, Jenny," said King, and then added, in an under tone, "we will take the fellow at daylight."

Jenny went to her room, and King lighted his pipe and plied another attack on the jug.

C—— continued to watch, and wait, and listen for some indication that would lead to escape. An hour of suspense passed, and still nothing occurred to give him a clue to it. Turning his eyes to the window, for the hundredth time, he saw a small cord with something tied on the ends. He crept to it, and found that it was moved gently up and down, showing that it was held above. Waiting until the sentinel had left the corner, C—— secured the cord, untied the knot, the small cord, and found at its end a rope of about half an inch in thickness. He continued to watch and wait, and when the sentinel had passed the upper end was securely fastened. This he tested by pulling with all his strength. It was a good hold to run. The slightest slip or noise would prove fatal.

He took off his boots and hung them from his neck. Taking, then, the opportunity when the enemy was at the end of his beat, C—— commenced his climb. It was difficult, but not impossible, and in a few moments C—— was on the roof, and in front of Jenny. He pressed her hand, but neither spoke.

C—— drew up the rope and untied the knot which secured it. Jenny led the way to the stable, and then down a flight of stairs to the door in the rear of the house, which she opened with the utmost caution. She placed her finger on his lips, and pointed him gently out.

C—— delayed only to raise her hand to his lips, and once again found himself free.

He crept cautiously to the fence. Making a circuit, he reached the meadow, and after groping about for some time he finally approached his steed, and soon was in the saddle, and rode rapidly.

C—— patted him, and then walked on. Brown Bill followed at a little distance.

C—— soon came to the road leading to the Potomac, and had walked nearly a mile when he saw the smouldering fire of a picket. To pass the chain of sentinels was impossible in the night, and for his horse to do so as well, was the only hope of escape.

C—— crept up to the side of the road, and advanced stealthily, his horse following along the road.

"Who goes there?" challenged the picket.

No answer, but Brown Bill approached the fire.

"It's a lone horse," exclaimed the picket. "Come here, Kennedy and Cook, and help me to catch him."

Into three men approached the horse, but whenever one of them raised his hand to seize his mane, the cunning animal turned his heels towards them, and kept them at a respectful distance which prevented them from securing him. C—— could observe the men, and that their interest increased as the number of the pursuers to the horse became more and more evident. By watching the chance when the backs of all the men were turned, C—— placed his left hand in his mouth, and he crossed the line. Having gone about two hundred yards, he blew on his boots, and placing his little finger in his mouth, he made a short shrill whistle.

"What's that?" said the picket.

"I don't know," answered his companion, "but the horse seems to understand it."

Now Brown Bill, making a plunge in the air, dashed down the road at a speed which so astonished the men that for a few moments they watched him in silence. But recovering his presence of mind the picket discharged his carbine, and at once six cavalry men started to their feet.

"Down the road," shouted the sentinel.

The men mounted, and galloped in the direction indicated. But their chase was useless, for ——had thrown himself on the back of Brown Bill, and was flying along the road at a speed which defied the fleetest of their horses.

We had a good laugh at C—— when he came into camp covered with mud and riding his horse without saddle or bridle. He looked very like a crazy man, and a stranger would not have supposed that dirty-faced soldier, with torn coat, was one of the most elegant and accomplished officers in service.

"What has become of my men?" inquired C——.

"They have not yet returned."

Many days passed before any of them made their appearance, and they were supposed captured; but they all did come back, and their escapes were so interesting, that their adventures will be reserved for future bivouacs.

THE NEW OPERA.

IT is too much of an event in metropolitan life, not only so affecting the fashionable, but also the Democratic music-loving masses, the appearance of a really new opera, to pass without something more than a cursory notice.

On the night of October, the 24th, there was produced at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Mr. Max Maretzek, the new opera, by the brothers Ricci, of "Crispino e la Comare," or the "Cobbler and the Fairy," in four acts, entitled

The plot is slight, and runs in this way. A cobbler named Crispino, has a young and pretty wife, and is very poor and in debt. His landlord entertains a passion for the wife, who scorns him. The landlord, in revenge, threatens to turn them into the street. The cobbler, in despair, is about to commit suicide, but is got out of the notion by a fairy, who gives him money, and also confers upon him the power to cure others. This spoils the cobbler, who, by making some wondrous cures, and getting too liberally paid for them, thinks himself somebody and not only ill-treats his wife, but snubs the fairy who has been the cause of his good fortune. Then comes the usual reverse of all that will bear being heard again and again, and always with a relish.

Of the prominent artistes, we can only say that Rovere has upheld the reputation he has borne for years, as one of the first buffos in the world, while Bellini comes in nearly on a second level. Miss Laura Kellogg, as Annetta, Crispino's wife, has added greatly to the laurels she has already gained, in the several parts she has assigned to the most difficult, and a well got up, on good paper, can be had for $1 50, $3 and $4, according to the style of binding.

NOVEL ELECTRICAL DISCOVERY.—A fresh experiment in Electrical research, has been made at the small watering place of Fecamp. One of the Professors, M. Bourbouze, had formed leisure for the arrangement of an apparatus by which an incessant current is produced, and the instrument is made supply, so as to form an effectual motive-power capable, according to the statements, of ringing bells to any extent of continuance. The process is extremely simple. A certain number of cork is set afloat on a body, over its surface is spread a zinc plate, while between the cork and the zinc is placed a piece of cloth. A wire conducts the fluid, test free by this juxtaposition of materials, to the opposite extremity, to be there available as an impelling power for purposes which may yet suggest themselves.

YOUNG FOLKS, an Illustrated Magazine for boys and girls published by Tickner & Fields, for Boston, has reached us in the earliest number of the day in serial literature. Number 11 has just reached us. This is the issue of a pleasant and very much pleasant reading, not only for boys and girls, but for children of larger growth.

AN ELEGANT AND FASHION.—One of the most popular establishments in Paris, situat d on the Boulevard des Italiens, and known as Tortoni, has just disappeared. It was a shop opened by a pastry cook named Tortoni, in the year 1720, with a capital of $10,000 a year by selling exclusively a paste cake called "gateau." M. Richemont sold his establishment and was succeeded by others, who each in his turn realized a handsome fortune. The consumption of ices in the course of the several years that six women were occupied from nine in the morning until midnight, during the season, is almost beyond calculation. Every evening the boulevard was crowded with persons waiting their turn to be served, and sometimes it was found to be necessary to place policemen on the boulevard to maintain order. The shop, however, the chosen of the elite, and the shop was deserted. It is now closed, after an existence of 45 years.

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHER, Philadelphia, have just published The Lover's Trials; or, the Days before the Wedding. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. It is, perhaps, following out an old story to say anything as to the merits of the work of the writer we believe, but we regard this as being one of her best, if not quite the best. The style of the narrative is easy and natural, nothing, it is enough to say that it comes from Peterson.

A HUNGARIAN DICK TURPIN.—ROZZA Lander, the Dick Turpin of Hungary, passed through Vienna, a few days ago. Rozza, who was a very warm patriot, is on his way from Kufstein, in the Tyrol, to the fortress of Theresienstadt, in Bohemia, where he has to remain five years and a half. Originally he was sentenced to imprisonment for life, but the punishment was a few days ago commuted at the request of the Hungarian Chancellor. Rozza, who is fifty-four years of age, was sent to Kufstein about nine years ago.

IT has been remarked in Marseilles, as elsewhere, that since the appearance of cholera, rats have entirely disappeared.

EXECUTION OF THE CHIEF OF THE ASSASSINS OF THE ENGLISH OFFICERS AT YOKOHAMA, JAPAN.

EXECUTION OF MURDERERS IN JAPAN.

Our readers will remember that, some months since, several English officers were brutally murdered at Zeddo, and the demand of the British government for the assassins. The last scene in the tragedy has just been performed, the execution at Yokohama of the principal assassin. As the scene was of more than common interest, we have illustrated it.

Soon after daylight, the assassin, bound in a sitting posture upon the back of a horse, was taken from his prison, and, guarded by a detachment of police, was conveyed through the principal streets of Yokohama, preceded by criers haranguing the populace and relating his crime, and by bearers with huge placards, on which it and his sentence was written, as well as by the executioners.

At ten o'clock they reached the place of execution at the principal gate, where the executioner, with one blow of the sabre, whipped off his head, which, in accordance with the sentence, remains exposed at the place of execution.

A MYSTERIOUS CASE.

There lives on the outskirts of the town of Otranto, a very worthy man, who unites the various trades of blacksmith, carpenter, bricklayer and store-keeper, in great perfection. He has a numerous family of children, and a large progeny of pigs. The children were made to work as soon as they could walk, but the little pigs were better treated, and had only to work their way through Indian corn and butter-milk from day to day as little pigs ought to do. I should have told you that the name of this general tradesman and and artificer was Humphrey Perkins. And he was a clinker; for from morning till night there was nothing but clink, clink, clink, to be heard throughout his dwelling.

His house has as many apartments in it as a royal palace. Some of these are closed till they are wanted for the exercise of some particular branch of his business; others are open at all times. Besides one wing of the building is a range of piggeries; and here did Mrs. Perkins, the wife of the honest jack-of-all-trades, who was wofully, as she termed it, fond of pigs, luxuriate in the prospect of her farrow of 13 to the dozen. Night and morn did Mrs. Perkins count her 13 pigs; but on one fatal morning the number was reduced to 12. The sty was searched; every crack and cranny investigated; all the outbuildings were examined; and even the very woods round the dwelling were threaded in the hopes of finding the lost pig, but in vain—the pig was gone.

The next morning the 12 pigs were reduced to 11, and Mrs. Perkins' consternation was indescribable. The idea of "gone astray" was scouted; and, rather than suspect the honesty of her neighbors, the good woman was charitable enough to think that the little porkling might have squeezed his way through the palings of his dormitory. So Mr. Perkins placed an extra stake between each of them.

The following morning the number was reduced to 10. Mrs. Perkins counted the pigs again and again. Yes, there were but 10; how could it be? Everything now gave way to horrid suspicion, and it was determined to keep watch, and catch the thief. So Humphrey, the husband, much against his will, consented to sit up the following night to guard the piggery. It was a very cold, dark, squally night, and he sat himself down snugly behind the water-butt, where he had thrown some straw, to keep his midnight watch.

Midnight came, and with it a sharp north-wester, which made Humphrey keep close to the whisky bottle. The straw, too, began to grow, to his thinking, mighty comfortable. The solitary grunt of the old sow had ceased, and the wind lulled, and the stars shone out placidly; so that, what with the silence, and the starlight, and the calmness of the hour, and the brandy, Humphrey Perkins fell fast asleep.

The sun awoke this patient watchman; and so Humphrey got up from his straw. The old pig began to grunt, and the young ones to squeak. Mrs. Perkins' voice was heard coming downstairs:

"Well, my love, what is the news? Have you caught the thief?"

"Not at all," said the good worthy man. "The quietest night I have spent for a long time. Depend upon it no mortal hand has had to do with the pigs."

"Eight, nine!—Eight, nine!" exclaimed Mrs. Perkins; "why, what have you done with the other pig? I can but make nine now; yesterday there were 10.

"Count them again," said her spouse.

"I have counted them; do you think I cannot count? I tell you there are but nine; and I declare it is my dear little dolly that is gone."

And here the poor women wept as if she had lost her youngest child instead of the doll pig, which is the name usually given to the pet of the farrow.

The next night another pig was missing. There were but eight on the morrow. Every method was taken to discover the thief. The pigs were at last removed when they had been reduced to six, to a lock-up house. For awhile they were safe. But one morning the six were by some unaccountable means reduced to five.

Again the whole house were in consternation. Watch was kept by Mrs. Perkins and all the family, but nothing was seen or heard. A couple of weeks passed, and at last the remainder of the pigs were removed to their old quarters. On that very night a pig disappeared.

Mrs. Perkins now thought that the whole was a supernatural visitation, and determined no longer to lament. She considered it as a just judgment upon her for her overweening partiality to them.

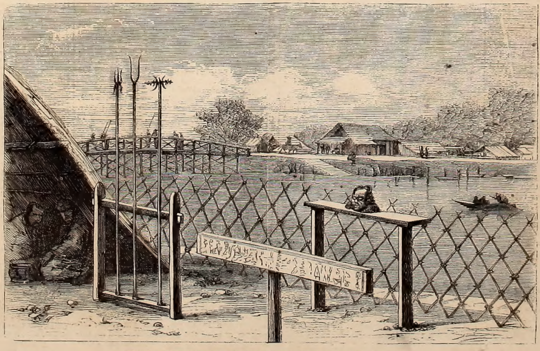
"It is true," said she to herself, "I deserve it all; I loved them better than my own children; and often have I put in the pig-tub what I might have given to the poo ."

The fatal day at last arrived when this patient lady, thus humiliated, ventured to look into the sty; and there stood one as disconsolate as herself, but not half so patient—the reft mother of her progeny, all alone!

Mrs. Perkins went to bed sorrowful. She lay for some hours pondering over her terrible losses, when she was aroused by a loud, unearthly roar; then a noise, as if the house was shaken from its foundation.

Humphrey jumped out of bed, and seizing a thick stick, which lay in the corner, away he rushed, with a light in his hand, to the scene of confusion, his wife closely following him. He opened the door, and there, jammed in between the transverse bars of the sty, stood upon his haunches an enormous black bear, whose eyes reflected the light most hideously. Mrs. Perkins shrieked, but Humphrey rushed on. The overgrown, fat, and jammed-up wretch could not defend himself. Blow after blow fell on his devoted head, until the beast lay prostrate.

A clue was now obtained as to the fate of the porkers. Bruin had, undoubtedly, taken them one by one in the most clandestine manner.



Yes, it was true; one by one had Bruin made himself master of the pigs. He came for the mother of the brood, but she was not so easily misled. The sequel is easily guessed. The bear's skin paid the value of the pigs, and the grease was worth something.

"And now," said Mr. Perkins, "let me advise you, my dear, when you kill another pig, as you did just before these losses occurred, never to fry the chitlings when the wind lies towards the forest, or with the door open."

"As true as I am a woman," said the dame, "I do believe that it was the scent of those fryings that brought this ferocious monster to my poor pigs. I should like to have had some revenge on him."

"You shall have as fine a ham out of his carcase as was ever made from a real Berkshire. If you do not know what bear hams are, I do."

And so saying, Mr. Perkins dragged Bruin out of his cramped position, and in a few minutes was performing the butcher upon him. In less than an hour he was hung up by the heels, and turned out in as neat a style as any sheep or calf in Washington Market.

PLACE OF EXECUTION AT THE PRINCIPAL GATE OF YOKOHAMA, JAPAN.

THE GREAT FIRE IN THE DISMAL SWAMP.

This almost fabulous and romantic spot has been and is now the scene of a terrible conflagration, the flames not having been extinguished at the latest advices. An eye-witness writes us:

"Nothing can exceed the magnificence of the scene. For miles the impenetrable forest, for human feet, is in flames, and from its depths rush every description of animals and reptiles that have for so long inhabited the fastnesses undisturbed until now. The roar of the fire can be heard for miles, and the rapidity with which it flies along the undergrowth, or from tree to tree sets at defiance frequently the attempts of the animals to escape. At one time will be seen emerging from the wood bears, panthers and various smaller beasts, panting with fatigue and scorched, while almost beside them crawls, swiftly, the deadly rattlesnake and copperhead, while overhead, with shrill cries, birds of prey, and otherwise, with burnt feathers and wings, soar heavily on, or occasionally drop in the fierce furnace beneath them.

"The Dismal Swamp has in its dreary recesses hundreds of negroes, who in the days of slavery fled thither to escape their task masters, and in many cases have never again appeared among white men. How many of these poor wretches have been consumed it is impossible to say, but it cannot be supposed that they have gone unscathed.

"When the flames will be stopped is something that can only be guessed at. Nothing less than heavy rains, long continued, can be the means of its extinguishment, and even that is doubtful. The amount of animal life and the destruction of timber is beyond computation, and the inhabitants dwelling upon the edges of the swamp have their hands full in fighting off the fire from their houses and barns, and in destroying the animals tha issue from the fire."

Wanted to be a Commodore.—Capt. Fox tells a ludicrous story of a fellow who applied at the Navy Department early in 1861 for a position. He represented himself as being an admiral in the Turkish navy, and for a time he deceived almost everybody. Nothing less than a commodore's command would suit him; but the captain was suspicious and preferred to investigate. The man was going far towards making out a case of persecution against the Navy Department, when some lucky accident disclosed the facts of his career, and showed him to have ornamented a European chain-gang.

A BOY'S ADVENTURE

With an Eagle.

On the west of Windermere, in Cumberland, England, is the tremendous pass of Borrowdale; and amid the mountains leading to this pass is a small village. Near it the river Derwent pursues its rapid course, leaping from rock to rock. Close to the entrance of the gorge is a detached mountain, called Castle Crag, which obtained its name from a fortress that once stood on its summit; and at its foot is the romantic village of Grange, situated among the woods and meadows which skirt the borders of Derwent lake.

In the village of Grange there lives a worthy yeoman, or small farmer of the district, named Perruddock. He has two sons (twin brothers), Robert and Richard, both daring boys, who, from living among the mountains, are as healthy and vigorous as the wildest of the mountain races.

Now, it so happened that Robert was sent with his sheep on the mountains, taking for his companion, as was usual, his dog Jock. Robert set off, and proceeded through a wood which entangled a rocky promontory, stretching out into a narrow pass of the lake; but, leaving the grassy margins and scattered copse which bordered the water, he threaded the Dragon Pass, as it was called, and soon all around him became one scene of mountains, which hemmed him in, rising with awful and precipitous fronts. While Robert was surveying this scenery, with rather a spectacular than a traveler's eye, he sighed with regret at not being able to see the spring of even a grouse or a rabbit, or to hear the shrill cry of the buzzard. But at last he thought he beheld, as a far speck veering in the wind, the tremulous wing of an eagle, and rejoiced within himself that something approached that might, at least, relieve the monotony of the hours he had to spend till the evening.

"Ay," said the boy, "if I could only get a shot at you, my friend, I think it would go hard with me if I did not bring you down."

The eagle now came nearer, and, with a circuitous flight, but still keeping at a great height, spread her strong wing round and round the peak upon which our hero stood.

"You are afraid to come lower," said the boy, elevating his gun, which he never traveled without.

To this the eagle seemed to reply by uttering a loud and wild scream; at which the dog Jock raised his ears and eyes, and gave a sharp and peevish bark.

At last Robert fired; but by the time the smoke cleared away, he observed the bird soaring high in the air, with something in its claws. The boy looked again.

"It is too true," said he; "the bird has stolen my dinner."

And so it had; for on the spot below, where Robert had first rested, he had left the bag, containing bread and meat enough for a couple of meals; and the loss was, in such a place, a very serious evil: to replenish it was impossible.

"But you shall not have my dinner, though," said the boy, "if that is where you are going."

The eagle had passed over to Castle Crag, and settled herself among the ruins of the keep. Robert searched in vain for some track or avenue by which he might enter the ruins, which the eagle had made her eyrie; but he searched in vain. The snow still lay in the clefts and crannies of the rock, and it was, at the height at which the boy now was (being nearly 3,000 feet), exceedingly cold. But his hunger increased, and with it his determination to regain, if possible, some portion of his food; and, if not able to do so, to have some satisfaction on the thief. Robert put as much of the snow on one side as he could, and crawling on his hands and knees, soon found himself in a low arched passage or vault. The passage now took one turn, then another, till at last it terminated in a rude flight of stairs cut out of the solid rock. These he ascended (and they were numerously till he reached the inside of the keep of Craig Castle. He looked up, and the walls seemed as if they would fall in upon him; and the wind, roaring without, gave a deep and hollow sound above. While he was looking upward he heard a rustle and flutter, at the same time a heavy stone fell down below, which, had it fallen upon him, would inevitably have killed him.

The eagle was alarmed, yet seemed to scream defiance to the young intruder, who, clambering over one hill of rubbish and then another, found his way at last finally stopped by a high wall. To scale this wall was now the great difficulty. By means of his gun, which he placed in one of the loopholes, as a means of support, after many unsuccessful attempts, at last gained the summit. But, alas! it was but the summit of a wall; while, on one side was the whole depth of the upper part of the mountain, and on the other the deep abyss of the keep. Robert, however, saw that it led to the very spot where he believed the old eagle to be feasting on his dinner; and, creeping on his hands and knees, he at last gained the further extremity of it, and entered a narrow window in a corner tower.

Robert felt assured that he was at last in the immediate vicinity of the eagle's nest, and was overjoyed at the success of his enterprise. He proceeded, therefore, silently; and, having entered the lower window already mentioned, he found himself on a narrow staircase, or rather flight of stone steps, which led to the top of the turret.

With great effort he obtained a footing among these, and found himself within a few yards of the top. But still he neither saw nor heard of his old enemy the eagle: and he began to think that all his labor was in vain, and that the bird had taken her flight while he had been combating with the difficulties of the ascent. Determined, however, to ascertain for a fact whether such was or was not the case, he still continued to clamber over the broken stones, till he could reach the verge of the top of the turret with his hand. But just as he laid hold of the stones, and was about to raise himself higher, a loud scream startled him, the stones came tumbling about his head and ears, and he felt the fierce pounce of the eagle's talons upon his fingers.

He made a desperate effort, and drew himself up to the top of the tower, placing one leg over a jutting stone, so as to secure himself from falling. He had scarcely time to do this before the eagle made a bolder flutter, and, with a slight wheel in the air, attacked the unfortunate boy with extraordinary fury. Robert was now, however, firmly seated, and, taking his gun in his hand, began to buffet the gigantic bird as bravely as his little remaining strength would permit.

The eagle now drew off, and dashed down upon Robert with a tremendous plunge; but he evaded the shock by stooping his head, at the same time he dealt the bird a terrible back stroke, which sent it reeling down the interior of the keep.

In consequence of this rencontre many of the stones became dislodged; and as the eagle was partly disabled by the blow she had received, Robert looked about him, and there, in the corner of the turret, was the eagle's nest, with two young ones, in their callow down, screaming for food. There, too, was Robert's dinner-bag, safely tied and bound-which the eagle had been endeavoring to pick to pieces, but the tough canvas of which it was composed had made the task a tedious one.

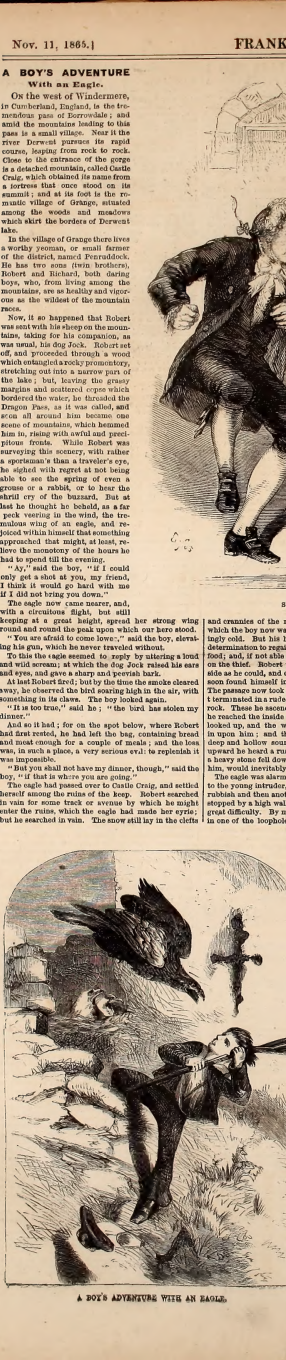
The courageous boy now thought he should be sure of his dinner, and was preparing to cock his gun, when the eagle, having recovered herself, again came to the attack. Spreading her wide wing, she made a short circle in the air, and pounced down upon the boy's head, tearing his bonnet from his brow, and inflicting a desperate wound on his forehead. But Robert now leveled his gun and fired. His shot took partial effect; the eagle reeled and fluttered downwards. Robert now drew nigh to the nest, and, having seized his bag, was about to carry off the young ones as his trophy, but the parent bird had recovered herself, and again attacked him with redoubled fury. He still defended himself as well as he was able, dealing the bird many a stout blow, and, in all probability, would have succeeded in driving her off, but, to his consternation, he beheld, like a speck in the air, another eagle approaching in the direction of the place.

"It is the male eagle," thought he, "and I shall now be killed and eaten."

But he still stood on the defensive, and, as often as the eagle attacked him, succeeded in striking a blow and keeping her in some degree at bay. The male eagle was, however, now at hand, and made a furious swoop towards the scene of combat, and with the force of his body, progressing at the rate of twenty, perhaps forty, miles an hour, made his tremendous pounce upon poor Robert, who, stunned with the blow, tumbled head-over-heels down the ruins he had previously climbed.

All that night Robert's father sat anxiously watching for the return of his son. The evening hour came at which he usually returned, but no Robert; the sun went down behind the mountains, and the stars began to blink, but no lowing of the cattle or well-known voice of the dog fell upon the anxious father's ear. The moon arose, but silence still reigned; and, like Jacob on the loss of Joseph, the poor old man began to think some ill had befallen his son.

Being a cripple, he could not go after him, and he feared to send his brother. There were no neighbors near, and it was almost useless to travel over the mountains to them at that hour of the night. The poor old father, therefore, sat in the deepest misery, wringing his hands, and watching from his window, and listening to every sound or footstep.



Richard, when he saw his father in such distress of mind, determined to go up the mountains and seek his brother. He apprehended that he must have fallen from some of the mountain heights; and, after wringing from his father an unwilling leave, he took a tall staff in his hand and rapidly ascended towards the place at which his brother ought to have been found.

From mountain to mountain Richard roamed and called, and the moon was going slowly down, and dark clouds were rising in the west. The moon now became obscured, and he could scarcely see before him; yet he still kept his way onwards till he had reached the top of another elevation.

The wind blew fitfully in gusts, and he thought he heard distant thunder. He listened and shouted, however between the pauses of the blast. At last, as in answer to his shout, he thought he heard the faint bark of the dog. Richard sprang forward, full of joy, but at the moment he did so a sudden flash of lightning showed him that he was within three paces of the extreme verge of a perpendicular rock 500 feet deep, and, before he recovered himself from his terror, the thunder burst with a fearful crash overhead, and echoed from rock to rock from a multitude of tongues. He avoided the precipice which the friendly lightning had revealed to him, and, descending by its side, endeavored to direct his course in the direction of the dog, which at intervals still continued his barking.

Forward he went, with new vigor, in the supposed direction of the dog, without any guide but his own sagacity. A flash of lightning at last, however, revealed Castle Crag and its walls immediately above him, towering amid the clouds, which had partly surrounded its base; and he would have felt some confidence had he not, at this moment, received an unknown blow from behind, which nearly stunned him. Before he had recovered himself from this stroke, he felt his cap forcibly torn from his head, not by a gust of wind, but by some invisible hand.

He plucked his broad clasp knife from his pocket, determined, if again molested, to use it manfully. In a few seconds he received another severe blow, and at the same moment made a quick, front-handed plunge in the direction from which the attack came. It pierced some soft body, and he heard a tremulous sound, and a rustling among the rocks. The boy now kept his course onwards, expecting every moment to be again assailed. Nor was his expectation without cause; for he had not accupied more than one hundred feet, creeping his way in the darkness, when, suddenly, he felt his bare crown crig-ined by sharp and piercing claws, which went to the very bone. He tried to disengage himself, and to shake off the unearthly gripe, but to no purpose. He made a plunge forward with all his remaining strength, then, overcome by fatigue and the most intense terror, he fell backwards insensible.

SCENE FROM THE NEW OPERA OF "CRISPINO E LA COMARE."

A BOY'S ADVENTURE WITH AN EAGLE.

A MYSTERIOUS CASE.

The storm of that night had passed away when Richard opened his eyes and beheld his brother Robert kneeling by his side, endeavoring to staunch the blood which was streaming from his temples. There, too, was the faithful dog; and as soon as he could rise and look around him, he saw on two fallen enemies who had so furiously beset him in the darkness—the two eagles—both dead and stiff. The corrective plunge of his good clasp-knife had indeed done the poor boy valiant service.

And now the two brothers kissed each other, and the delighted dog waged his tail for joy, and barked, and frisked, and capered, at the delight of returning home.

"But," said Robert to his brother, "I will not go now without my dinner."

And so, without further words, he again mounted towards the eagle's nest, on the top of the keep, and, from knowing the way, was soon at the fated place. There lay his dinner and the eagle's dinner, cold and shivering; the two eagles, now without a parent to provide for them, on a parapet of the keep, dead and deserted.

"I will be your father," said Robert; "I will bring you up. Come along with me."

So saying, he gathered the half-fledged birds within his frock, and singing his bag round his neck, quickly descended to his brother.

Richard had now been idle. Delighted with the success of his valor and prowess, he had already walked to the spot where the two eagles lay, and commenced the spoil of their bodies to his own, by tying them neck and heels together, and swinging them over his shoulders had received his brother with a loud hurrah.

Solid Silver, $2.

I will send the Regulation Badge for either Corps or Division of the Army (Cloth Silver), with your Name, Regiment and Company handsomely engraved thereon, on the receipt of $1 50; or a Small Gold Badge, beautifully engraved and enamel, for $2. Agents wanted everywhere, to whom especial inducements are offered.

COSMOPOLITAN

JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION.

Great Gold Jewelry Sale.

☞ ALL JEWELRY GOLD. Read advertisement on page 128. Certificates 23 cents; Circulars free. CALKINS & CO., 358 and 360 Broadway, New York.

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALSAM will immediately relieve Colds, Coughs, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle. 524-572

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Blind and Bleeding Piles. It promotes instant relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure.

For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle. 524-572

$30,000,000 LOAN

OF THE

Republic of Mexico.

TWENTY YEAR COUPON BONDS, IN SUMS OF

$50, $100, $500 and $1,000.

Interest Payable semi-annually in the City of New York.

PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYABLE

IN GOLD.

TEN MILLION DOLLARS in BONDS to be sold at SIXTY CENTS on the DOLLAR in U. S. Currency. The interest thus equaling TWELVE PER CENT. IN GOLD, and TWENTY PER CENT. IN U. S. CURRENCY, at present rate of premium on Gold.

THE PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST ALREADY PROVIDED.

The most desirable investment ever offered.

Subscriptions received and full particulars communicated by

JOHN J. CISCO & SON, BANKERS, 59 WALL ST., CORNER OF NASSAU, NEW YORK.

And by

J. N. TIFFT, Financial Agents of the Republic of Mexico, No. 2 Wall Street, New York.

Subscriptions also received by Banks and Bankers generally throughout the United States. 529

Important Publications for the Year.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED ALMANACS.

NEARLY READY.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

This most valuable work contains as much useful information as an octavo volume, and is indispensable to every household. In addition to the reading matter it is embellished with upwards of 30 beautiful illustrations, by our best Comic and American Artists, engraved in the high-st style of art. It also contains a splendid lithographic portrait of President Andrew Johnson, besides four beautiful pictures printed on plate paper, and altogether it comprises a great variety of subjects in art, science, national history, incidents, scenery, adventure, botany, &c.

Price 50 Cents.

Frank Leslie's Lady's Illustrated Almanac for 1866.

This beautiful and useful companion for the ladies supplies a greater quantity and diversity of reading matter than has ever been presented to them. It is indeed the Lady's Illustrated Almanac, published, and contains over 50 exquisite engravings of great variety, all handsomely colored. The reading matter is a complete Lady's Manual, and is adapted for all classes. It is also embellished with a most admirable and correct lithographic portrait of Mrs. Gen. Grant, as well as four large engravings printed on plate paper.

Price 50 Cents.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Comic Almanac for 1866.

This amusing Almanac, the only one of the kind published in America, contains humorous illustrations by Newman, Bobier, McLenan, John Leech, Howard, Carroll, Zolnic, Stephens, Grant, Keene, Crosses, &c., besides comic literature, jokes and astronomical knowledge made easy, &c.

Price 15 Cents.

A copy of either one of the above Almanacs will be given to every annual subscriber to FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE, or FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER.

AGENTS WANTED!

$10 A Day Easy Made $10

By selling Engravings, Card Photographs, and Stationery Packets.

Send Stamp for Catalogue, Terms, &c.

HASKINS & CO., 35 Beekman street, N. Y.

GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION

BY THE

NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION,

733 BROADWAY, N. Y.

12 Elegant Rosewood Pianos, worth from	$250	to $300
12 Melodeons, Rosewood Cases	125	to 225
150 Music Boxes	15	to 45
150 Silver Revolving Patent Casters	15	to 40
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets	15	to 30
150 Sets Silver Tea and Table Spoons	15	to 30
100 Gold Hunting-case Watches	75	to 150
150 Diamond Rings	50	to 200
200 Gold Watches	60	to 100
300 Ladies' Gold Watches	60	to 85
500 Silver Watches	30	to 50

Diamond Pins, Gold Bracelets, Cork, Florentine Mosaic, &c. Full Sets Enamel Jasper Sets, Gold Pens, with Gold and Silver Extension Holders, Sleeve Buttons, Sets of Studs, Neck Chains, Vest Chains, Plain and Chased Gold Rings, Gold Thimbles, Lockets, Silver Baskets and Castors, and a large assortment of every description, of the best make and latest styles, valued at

$500,000

To be Sold for One Dollar Each without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

Distribution is made in the following manner:

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these, containing the Certificate or order for some Article, worth at least One Dollar or Five, will be delivered to you when or sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, on receipt of One Dollar. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it draws, and the option of paying ONE DOLLAR FOR THE HUNDRED DOLLARS, and can then send ONE DOLLAR and receive the Article named, or choose any other one Article on our List of the same value.

☞ NO HUMBUG. Purchasers purchase gratis value, Parties dealing with us may depend on having prompt returns, and the article ordered to be immediately sent to any address by return mail or express. Entire satisfaction guaranteed in all cases. Six Certificates for $1; thirteen for $2.

AGENTS WANTED. Send a stamp for a Circular. All letters should be addressed

T. BENTON & CO., Box 5567, P. O., New York.

PARLOR ORGANS.

THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL, and the only one of the 11 great DEANS of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE, over all competitors, for the best instrument.

"A Gold Medal was awarded to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Cabinet Organ on exhibition—a most just testimonial. The award for the second best instrument was made to James H. Pelton, exhibitor and agent of the Poloubon organ; and the bluest award was given to Mason & Hamlin.—Watson's Art Journal.

"I can speak of them in the highest terms."

G. W. MORGAN.

"The finest Instruments of the class I ever saw."

CHAS. GROBE.

"The best Instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"Europe has produced no finer advance of any other instrument of a similar kind." CHAS. FRADEL.

Illustrated Catalogues sent free.

CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO.,

No. 97 East 23d Street, N. Y. 529-69

MUSIC OMNIBUS.

No. 3, contains 1,000 Pieces of Music for the FLUTE, VIOLIN, CLARIONET, or FIFE. Price $1 25 cents. Mailed post-paid.

VIOLINS,

Including Bow, Strings, Boxing, &c., sent by express to all parts of the United States, British Provinces and West Indies, on receipt of the following prices:

GERMAN, red, brown, tyrol, $2 50, $3, $4.

MITTENWALD, Amati model, $3, $4, $5, $11.

FRENCH, blocked and lined, $5, $8, $10, $12, $15.

ITALIAN, model of Amati, $10, $15, $20.

OLD MASTERS, very fine tone, $30, $40, $50, $75 to $200.

All orders, large or small, promptly attended to.

FREDERICK BLUME,

tf 208 Bowery, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM,

IMPROVED

$5 "SEWING MACHINE!" $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF

PRACTICAL UTILITY AND

EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1863; Improvement patented June 9, 1863. A reliable and FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; a practical Machine in operation, uses the smallest number, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch, is simple and regular and reversible by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, makes 16 to 18 Sets to each complete Stitch. Will Gather, Hem, Baffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadth, &c., &c.; requires no Change of Stitch—is not liable to get out of order, and will last a LIFETIME; being original it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is not a small Pocket Machine though it will hand sew the work like others advertised, but works on a Table, and is the most perfect and reliable of all Regular Machines.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch all the tale of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is a perfectly noiseless machine."—N. Y. Tribune.

"It is simple and durable."—N. Y. Independent.

With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

Address all orders to

FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE CO.,

Office, 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

ARCANA WATCH.

An elegant, durable and reliable as the finest gold watch Gents' size, Hunting case, Lever. $25. Ladies' Hunting case, Lever. Six for $125. ARCANA WATCH CO., 62 Fulton Street, N. Y. P. O. Box, 5,614. 528-31

DR. FELIX GOURAUD'S

Italian Medicated Soap,

it is well known, cures Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Salt Rheum, Barber's Itch, Chaps, Chafes, Tender Flesh etc., beside being the very best abusive compound ever invented. GOURAUD'S POUDRE SUBTILE removes hair from low foreheads, upper lip, or any part of the body safer and quicker than any Depilatory POUDRE, for pole tips and cheeks. LILY WHITE for flushed, red and heated face. Found at DR. GOURAUD'S old established depot, 453 Broadway.

The purity and efficacy of the above preparations have been endorsed by tens of thousands, who have used them the past twenty-five years.

AGENTS—Callender, Philadelphia; Bates, Goodwin & Co., Boston; Johnston, Holloway & Cowan, Pittsburgh; Wood, Richmond, Va.; and Druggists generally.

$6 ELEGANT $8 WATCH.

Fine Imported Watches for the Retail Trade at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES. Beautiful Hunting Silver Watch, small size, EXCELLENT TIME-KEEPER, with Chain, complete, for Gentleman, $20 per Case of Six. Sample one, free by mail, for $6.

ELEGANT Gold Plated Engraved Double Case Watch, Fine Time-keeper, Gold Locket, Chain, Key, &c., to cord, $42 per Case of Six. Sample, free by mail, for $8.

FINE DOUBLE HUNTING-CASE Gold Plated Watches, Jewelled, with Independent Seconds, Regulator, Case of Six, $60. Sample, by mail, $12.

SUPERIOR Complete Hunting Watches, Magic Cases, Jewelled, &c., per Case of Six, $60. Sample, $12.

SUPERIOR Silver English Watch, Full Jewelled, Superior, per Case of Six, $90. Sample, $20.

EXCELLENT Gents' Watches, Gents Silver Cases, Large Jewels, Fancy Styles, per Case of Six, $104. Sample, $20.

IMPERIAL WATCH, with Thermometer, Compass, Calendar, Alphabet and Time, Love and Jewelled, Complete, a Storm, Heat and Time indicator, imitation of $200 Gold Watch, per case of Six, $120. Sample, $25.

Gold and Silver Watches of every description. Catalogues mailed free. Goods delivered all guaranteed. Address orders

CAVELLY BROTHERS, Importers,

162 Nassau St., N. Y. Established 1855.

ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE.

Terms: $2 50 a year; 3 copies for $6; 5 copies, and one to the getter-up of club, $10. Single numbers for sale by news agents throughout the United States. Two volumes a year, beginning in January and July. Address

T. S. ARTHUR & CO.,

527-23 323 Walnut st., Philadelphia, Pa.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent post paid on receipt of $1. Photographs of Secession Generals, 25 cents; 50 Photographs of Statesmen and Generals for $1 cents; 100 Photographs of Female Beauties, 25 cents; 100 photographs of Actors for 25 cents. Address

527-31 C. SEYMOUR, Box 48, Holland, N. Y.

Something New and Rich sent on receipt of 25 cents and a red stamp. Address Box 61, Seneca Falls.

CANVASSERS WANTED—To take orders for VICTOR'S GREAT WORK OF THE REBELLION, containing the Life of the President, Cabinet, Members of Congress, Governors, Generals, Engineers, Naval Officers, &c., &c., &c., universally. This work still is the CONCEDED STANDARD. All who have engaged in the different Fields of the War (even the authors themselves), acknowledge the superiority of VICTOR'S. Also, to obtain orders for VICTOR'S HISTORY OF AMERICAN CONSPIRACIES from 1760 to 1865 (the only work of the kind published), and the illustrated edition of the Incidents and Anecdotes of the War, and for portraits of Generals, &c. These works are all engaged in by hundreds and are very rapidly, by canvassers only. Liberal terms and exclusive territory given. Send for circulars. Address VICTOR & HOYT, Publishers, No. 13 Spruce Street, N. Y. 527-tf

Horrors of Rebel Prisons.

All Soldiers, Relatives of Soldiers, and persons wanting a New, Beautiful, and Illustrated History of all the Rebel Prisons, should immediately send their name for a list of 24 Splendid Sketches, which, by a novel arrangement, are given up with the sheet, 24 by 36 inches, accompanied by a book; the whole being a complete pictorial history of Andersonville, Libby, Belle Isle, Salisbury and Stockades. Price, single copy, from $2 to $3 each. Those wishing to canvass for agency will send a copy upon sending $1 by mail. Address

"HOPKINS & CO., Publishers, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

CHEVALIER'S LIFE FOR THE HAIR.

Will restore Gray Hair to its ORIGINAL COLOR; strengthens and preserves the growth of the whiskers or hair; stops its falling out in three days; keeps the head clean, cool and healthy; can be used freely; contains nothing injurious.

THE BEST HAIR DRESSING EVER OFFERED TO THE PUBLIC.

It is recommended and used by the first medical authority.

Sold at the Drug Stores, and at my Office, 1,123 Broadway, New York.

I assure all persons the above preparation will do all that is claimed for it.

SARAH A. CHEVALIER, M. D.

FUN! Send your address to Drawer 5,970, Chicago, Ill., and receive by return mail something that will please you. ☞It costs you nothing.

Fortune! Fortune!!

Full instructions by which a person can master the Art of Ventriloquism in a few hours's practice, and make a world of fun and a fortune. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address

FRANKLIN HOUSE,

526-9 Calhoun, Illinois.

$25 A Day.

Agents wanted to sell a new and wonderful SEWING MACHINE, the only cheap one licensed. Address

SHAW & CLARK,

521-33 Biddeford, Maine.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

Have you used them? Give them a Trial.

PATENT FASTENERS. Will fasten Boots, Shoes, Gaiters, Corsets, &c., without tying. Send 25 cents for a pair. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, N. Y.

tf

AGENTS! AGENTS! AGENTS!

Fancy Goods and Yankee Notion Dealers.

A saleable and profitable article. Send 25 cents for sample and circular. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York.

tf

Now Ready, the great American

COMIC PAPER,

FRANK LESLIE'S

BUDGET OF FUN!

For December—being No. 93.

This unrivaled publication is an imparial illustrated history, humorous and satirical, of the currents of the times, for Ancient American and European Artists. The present number contains a splendid Double-Page cut of the great Hindoo American Idol, and his revolving—also, a most striking picture of Death writing his name upon the doors of our households. Among the other illustrations are the Revolt of the Managers; Andy Johnson Sifting the Wheat from the Chaff; The Old Hypocrite, Johnny Bull, and the Fenians; and numerous other humorous engravings.

In addition to these artistic embellishments, the Literature is of the most varied description. It contains the only complete edition of Charles Dickens's new story:

"How they tanned the Colonel;" besides numerous other admirable Romances, Sketches, Short Tales, Bon-mots, Western Stories, Anecdotes, Burlesque Poetry, &c.

FRANK LESLIE,

537 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Nothing can be more Wonderful than the operation of the RED JACKET BITTERS in OBSTINATE cases of CONSTIPATION, for it is a mild and genial cathartic as well as a tonic and corrective.

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS

A full size Album holding 50 pictures sent free by post for $1.

An Album holding 100 pictures, $3.

Albums from 20 cents and upwards sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

C. HUGHES,

Album Manufacturer.

162 CENTRE STREET, N. Y.

Cartes de Visite for Gentlemen.

Sample and Catalogue sent free. New Books and Sporting Goods Catalogue free. Address tf WILLIAM MANGHES, 638 Broadway, N. Y.

$100 A MONTH

Clear of expenses. An agent wanted to represent our firm in each township in the United States and the Canadas. For particulars inclose stamp.

STEPHENS & CO., 229 Broadway, N. Y.

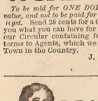
Every Man his own Printer.

CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $10, $16, $23 and $30. Price of an Office, with Press, $15, $20, $30, $46 and $71. Send for a Circular to the LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 23 Water street, Boston.

tf

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO RECEIVE GOOD JEWELLERY AT LOW PRICES.



100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELLERY, GOLD PENS, BRACELETS, LOCKETS, RINGS, GENTS' PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, ETC.,

Worth $50,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get your Certificate returned, with full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every Regiment and Town in the Country.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

BEAUTY!

AUBURN, GOLDEN, FLAXEN AND SILKEN CURLS

produced by the use of

PROF. DE BREUS'

FRISER LE CHEVAUX.

One application warranted to curl the most straight and refractory hair of either sex into wavy ringlets or heavy massive curls. Has been used by the fashionables of Paris and London with the most gratifying results. Does no injury to the hair. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Circulars and testimonials mailed free. Address

BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

AGENTS !!!

$10 Per day made selling the Sketches entitled the "SOUTHERN PRISONS OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS, and Scenes from Life in PRISONERS OF WAR," with key of 56 pages. It is decidedly the best ornamental, historical work that has ever been printed to the public, and will be purchased by everybody. Copies sent free to agents on receipt of price. Call on or address with stamp, HOPKINS & CO., 74 Bleecker street, New York.

The Great Money-Making Article. Everybody needs it. Agents or soliciters can make $10 a day. Sample sent to applicants, post free by mail, for 25 cents. Address
000 E. H. MARTIN, Hinsdale, N. H.

A GIFT FOR YOU

AT THE PHILADELPHIA GIFT BOOK PUBLISHING HOUSE.

The Eleventh Year of the Enterprise.

NEW BOOKS AND NEW GIFTS.

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK.

A new and choice Book just issued, of over 50 pages of Books in every department of Literature, with full instructions for forming Clubs, &c.

The best place in the world to buy books is at the "EVANS ORIGINAL GOOD SALE."

Catalogues sent free on receipt of red stamp. Address
G. G. EVANS,
516-28 639 Chesnut street, Phila.

"Psychomancy."—How either sex may fascinate and gain the love, confidence, affection and good will of any person they choose, instantly. This simple mental requirement all can possess, securing certain success in love, marriage, etc., free by mail, for 25 cents, together with a guide to the unmarried of both sexes—an interesting, useful book. Just issued. Third edition; over 100,000 copies already sold. Address if T. WILLIAM & CO., Publishers, Philadelphia.

Something New.

For Agents and Dealers to sell, 20 Novel and Useful Articles; profits large. Send stamp for circular.
S. W. RICE & CO.,
if 83 Nassau street, N. Y.

WONDERFULLY STRANGE!

MADAME M. H. PERREGAULT,

Who has astonished the scientific classes of Paris and London, and is now permanently located herself at Albany, N. Y. Madame Perregault, by the aid of her wonderful instrument, known as the Biometer, guarantees to produce a life-like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, describe the date of marriage, leading traits of character, occupation, etc. This is no humbug, as thousands of testimonials can assert. She will send, when desired, a written guarantee that the picture is what it purports to be. By stating age, height, complexion, color of eyes and hair, and inclosing 50 cents, and stamped envelope, addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail. Address
Madame M. H. PERREGAULT,
524-36 P. O. Drawer 295, Albany, N. Y.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Scrofula or morbid deposits in the lungs, joints and tissues. These medicines have rendered this disease a less formidable scourge than formerly. It has been demonstrably proved that in Scrofulous affections they have effected unequivocal cures. Sold everywhere.

Before spending your money foolishly for Ointments, Depilatories, Enamels, Powders, &c., send for new Book of RECEIPTS; 40 pages, with Catalogue free. Address BLACKIE & CO., 71 Nassau street, N. Y.
if

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINES.

Highest Premium Gold Medal,

Fair American Institute, 1865.

The best in the World. They have the Reversible Feed Motion. They have a perfect Self-Adjusting Stitch-Tension. They make four separate and distinct Stitches on one and the same machine. They have many advantages over all others.

FLORENCE SEWING MACHINE CO.,
533-35 505 Broadway, New York.

GEORGE L. CANNON'S
AIR WARMING & VENTILATING APPARATUS,
FOR KITCHEN RANGES, &c.
614 BROADWAY, BETWEEN BLEECKER & HOUSTON STS.
NEW YORK.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin, imparting a delicate tint, and whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, etc., without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. 1,000 different kinds. Send stamp for a Catalogue 000 VICTOR DELAPLANE, 93 Nassau St., N. Y.

Stereoscopic Pictures and Cartes de VISITE, latest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BOSS, 17 Ann St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,
501 BROADWAY, N. Y.

In addition to our main business of PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS, we have a large assortment of Stereoscopes and Stereoscopic Views.
Of these we publish a catalogue containing
VIEWS OF THE WAR,
Obtained at great expense, and forming a complete PHOTOGRAPHIC HISTORY OF OUR GREAT ETHNIC CONTEST

Bull Run,	Dutch Gap,
Yorktown,	Fortress Rosecrans,
Gettysburgh,	Hanover Junction,
Fair Oaks,	Lookout Mountain,
Savage Station,	Chickahominy,
Fredericksburgh,	City Point,
Falls Church,	Nashville,
Richmond,	Petersburgh,
Deep Bottom,	Mule Shoe,
Monitors,	Chattanooga,
Fort Morgan,	Atlanta,
Charleston,	Mobile,
Florida,	Strawberry Plains,
	East Tennessee.

American and Foreign Cities and Landscapes, Groups, Statuary, &c., &c., &c., forming a collection unsurpassed in extent and artistic excellence. Our Catalogue will be sent to any address on receipt of stamp.

Photographic Albums.

We were led to introduce those into the United States and we warn dealers immense quantities in great variety, ranging in price from $1 to $100 each. All E. & H. T. ANTHONY'S Albums have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any other.

They are sold by Booksellers and Stationers.

THE ALBUMS ARE MADE TO ORDER,

The Trade will find our Albums the most Saleable they can buy.

Card Photographs,

Our Catalogue now embraces over FIVE THOUSAND different subjects in the various departments of Art, (made of Kossuth and American Art, viz.: Albert 450 Statuary,
Beauties, 100 Groups,
100 Gog 75 Children,
Art Studies, 75 Navy Officers,
Art Studies, 125 Soldiers,
Art Studies, 150 Celebrated Women.
1500 Copies of Works of Art.

Including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statuary, Groups, Children, Navy and Army Officers. An order for One Dozen Pictures from our Catalogue, will be filled on receipt of $1.00, and sent by mail, post free.

Photographers and others ordering goods C. O. D., will please remit twenty-five cents additional to pay the express charges.

if The prices and quality of our goods cannot fail to satisfy.

C. M. DUNN & CO.'S

GREAT GIFT SALE

OF THE

NEW YORK AND PROVIDENCE

Jewelers' Association.

Capital..... $1,000,000.

Depot, 558 Broadway.

An immense stock of Pianos, Watches, Jewelry, and Fancy Goods, all to be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you see what you will receive.

CERTIFICATES, naming each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents; five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; Sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then if it is your prize to pay the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, sewing Machine, or any Set of Jewelry on our list, for $1; and in no case can they get less than One Dollar's worth, as there are no blanks. Agents wanted. Address if C. M. DUNN & CO., 558 Broadway, N. Y.

THE TRIAL QUARTER of the Leading and Largest Circulating Agricultural, Literary and Family Weekly in the Continent—MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER—is having a great run, the Publisher receiving hundreds of orders for it daily, yet there is room for you, reader. The 13 numbers of this quarter (Oct. to Jan.) sent, in Trial, for only 50 cents. Full price, $3 a year.
Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

SHEEP AND WOOL are great and paying institutions. Anyone who wishes to know all about the breeding, management and diseases of the former, and how best and cheapest to produce the latter, get and read RANDALL'S PRACTICAL SHEPHERD, the best and latest work on American Sheep Husbandry. Large 12mo.—454 pages, illustrated. Price $3—sent postpaid.
528 Address D. D. T. MOORE, Rochester, N. Y.

Matrimony.—Why every man should marry Why every woman should marry. All may marry, who know. Read the Illustrated Marriage Guide and Medical Adviser, by Wm. A. ALCOTT, Secretary Pocket Sewing Machine Company, 17 Wall street, New York. if

Do You Want Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches?

MY ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face, without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address on receipt of cash or order.
R. G. GRAHAM, 169 Nassau St., N. Y.

Superfluous Hair Removed

From all parts of the body, in six minutes, without injury to the skin, by "UPHAM'S DEPILATORY PASTE." Mailed to any address for $1 35, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 528-37

Freckles, Tan and Pimples

REMOVED AT ONCE, BY THE USE OF "UPHAM'S FRECKLE, TAN AND PIMPLE BANISHER." Mailed to any address for 75 cents, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Philadelphia. 528-37

Asthma Cured.

Relief Guaranteed in Ten Minutes,

and a permanent cure effected by the use of "UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE." Sent to any part of the country standing yield at once to its influence. Price $2. Sent postpaid to any address, by S. C. UPHAM, 25 South Eighth street, Phila. Circulars sent free. 525-37

A CURIOSITY!!

Free to All. A Rare Treat.

Gentlemen, do not fail to send your address, and receive a GREAT PAPER, replete with the choicest literature. Sent Gratis. CHARLES E. MACKEY,
267 Broadway, New York.

$90 A Month.

Agents wanted for six entirely new articles, just out. Address O. T. GAREY, City Building, Biddeford, Maine. 521-32

$1. WHISKERS. $1.

if For One Dollar I will send, sealed and postpaid, the recipe for a Liquid, which, rightly perfumed, which I warrant to force a heavy growth of hair upon the smoothest face, in six weeks, or upon the palm in eight weeks, without stain or injury to the skin. Entire satisfaction or money refunded. Descriptive Circulars mailed free. Address
P. O. Box 216. F. L. SHULTZ, Lansingburgh, N. Y.
525-37

Consecology, or the Secrets of Success. How to make a Happy Marriage, Win the Love of those you choose, the Matrimonial Agent, St. Roch, Guide to Beauty, Psychologic Enigmas, Mesmerism Made Easy, How to Make Prefich Brandy, Jamaica Rum Liquor coloring, and over 40 other useful recipes, either of which will enable a person to make a fortune. All in search of a legitimate business should read this book. Sent by mail for 25 cents.
if EVANS & CO.,
Box 1,215, Philadelphia.

Photograph Cards for Gentlemen.—Sample, 25 cents; French Transparent Cards (52 views), $1 25 per box; $10 per dozen; Imported Stereoscopic Back Playing Cards, $1 50 per pack. All by mail on receipt of price.
if FORWARDING AGENCY, 58 Liberty street, N. Y.

A New and Valuable Book Just Published. Every female should have a copy to avoid suffering, trouble, expense and imposition. Sent by return mail on receipt of price, $1. Address J. C. MILTON & CO., Publishers, 208 Broadway, N. Y.
527-8

Royal Havana Lottery.

Official Drawing of October 10, 1865.

No. 7445	.....	$100,000
No. 19364	"	50,000
No. 13691	"	20,000
No. 10705	"	10,000
No. 13706	"	5,000
No. 9217	"	5,000

Being the six capital prizes.

Official Circular, Information furnished. Highest rates paid for doubloons and all kinds of gold and silver.

TAYLOR & CO., Bankers, 16 Wall st., N. Y.

WHISKERS

AND

MOUSTACHES

Forced to grow upon the smoothest face in from three to five weeks by using

DR. SEVIGNE'S

RESTAURATEUR CAPILLAIRE.

The most wonderful discovery in modern science, acting upon the Beard and Hair in an almost miraculous manner. Prepared by the sole of Paris and London with the most flattering success.

The stain is perfectly transparent, and if registered, and if entire satisfaction is not given in every instance, the money will be cheerfully refunded. Price by mail, sealed and postpaid, $1. Descriptive circulars and testimonials sent free. Address
BERGER, SHULTZ & CO., Chemists,
P. O. Box 216, P. O. Drawer 31, Troy, N. Y.,
516-28 Sole Agents for the United States.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Fortress Monroe, Harper's Ferry, Newbern, Port Royal, and all other places, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 65 Broadway. Money charged low rates. 0000

Pimples, Moth, Freckles, Sunburn, Ringworm and Tetter vanish magically by the application of DR. GRAFF'S CELEBRATED Flower Extract, warranted. Price $1. For sale only by Dr. DE GRAFF, Medical Hall, Albany, N. Y. Sent by mail. 523-28

COMIC CARD PHOTOS.

Of the latest and best subjects. Agents wanted in every town. Send 10 cents for sample and catalogue to H. RIVINGTON & CO., No. 660 Broadway, New York.

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a fullest set of whiskers, or money refunded. Sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Stereoscopic Views and Cartes de Visite. Largest importations. Also, New Books and Sporting Articles. Send for Circular.
000 PIERRE BOSS, 17 Ann St., N. Y.

Art of Enameling.—The beautiful art of enameling the skin, imparting a delicate tint, and whitening, beautifying and preserving the complexion, making it soft, fair, smooth and transparent. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, etc., without injury to the skin. Warranted. Sent by mail for 50 cents. Address HUNT & CO., Perfumers, 133 South Seventh st., Philadelphia.

To Beautify the Complexion,

USE SHULTS' WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL.

The "Enamel" will remove the worst cases of Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Moth Patches, or Sunburn. In from four to six days it whitens the skin permanently, and imparts a freshness and transparency to the complexion which is unequaled. Safe and without injury to the skin. No toilet is complete without it. Price, by mail, sealed and postpaid, 50 cents and $1.
Address C. F. SHULTS,
524-35 283 Fulton street, Troy, N. Y.

1,000,000 Purchasers Wanted.
Articles to suit everybody. Catalogue sent free. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York. 522-31

Only 60 Cents.

The Art of Painting Photographs in Water Colors. Fourth edition, also full set of Pencils and Brushes. Mailed free for 60 cents. Address
CHAFFEE & WILLIS.
No. 157 Broadway, New York.

Love! Love!—The secret how to gain undying love of the fair sex. Sent by mail for 5 cents. Address
525-9 J. F. JAGGERS, Calhoun, Ill.

Tin Type and Ferrotype Albums.—For holding 36 pictures, $1.50; 40 pictures, $1.25. Sent postpaid. TRADE PRICE-LIST sent on receipt of 25 cents. W. C. WEMYSS, 575 Broadway, New York.

The Great New England Remedy!

Dr. J. W. Poland's

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of six-ten years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues. The White Pine Compound cures

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diptheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints, Diabetes, Difficulty of Voiding Urine, Bleeding from the Kidney and Bladder, Gravel, and other Complaints.

For Piles and Scurvy it will be found very valuable. Give it a trial if you would realize the value of a good and tried medicine. It is pleasant, safe and sure. Sold by Druggists and Dealers in Medicine generally.

GEO. W. SWEET, M. D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass.
Burnham & Van Riper, Chicago, Ill.; John D. Park, Cincinnati, Ohio, General Agents for the West; Fetre F. Romero, Havana, agent for Cuba.

THE GREATEST NOVELTY OF THE AGE.

THE POCKET SEWING MACHINE,

Specially adapted for Quilting, Embroidering and Braiding.

Easily used—being held in the hand, and traverses the material to be quilted or embroidered; works with great rapidity and gives entire satisfaction. Follows any design stamped on the cloth. Sent by mail, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Plain Sized Machine, $7; Heavy Silver Plated Machine, $8. State Rights for sale. Address A. S. GILCHRIST, Secretary Pocket Sewing Machine Company, 17 Wall street, New York. if

Clergymen, Teachers, The Press,

Unite in saying that the new juvenile magazine

Our Young Folks

Is the best magazine for the young ever published in America. It is filled with attractive illustrations, and its articles, in prose and poetry, are by the best writers for children in the country.

It is sold at the low price of $2 a year. Each number contains 64 pages, beautifully printed. A liberal discount to clubs. Send 20 cents for specimen copy and circular to the Publishers, TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

o

AGENTS WANTED

To canvass for our new, beautifully illustrated, and thrillingly interesting volume of army experience, CAMP FIRE, AND COTTON FIELD, by THOMAS W. KNOX, Herald correspondent. Full of startling incidents, stirring Anecdotes, Ingenious Stratagems, Life in Camp and Bivouac; together with ample and reliable directions to those who design engaging in Cotton culture at the South. Send for circular.

tfo BELLCOCK & CO., 19 Beekman street, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

Returned Soldiers, and everybody with a small capital, can make $20 per day selling our great, new, and wonderful extra large size, fine quality Stationery Packages. Every dollar invested more than doubled. Splendid Gold and Silver Watches presented free to all who act as our agents. Smart Men wanted in every village and town to solicit orders. Country rights free, sales unusual, demand increasing, everybody buys them. Send for our new circulars, containing extra premium inducements. Address

o M. D. GILBERT & CO., Stationers,
102 Nassau street, New York.

DON'T FAIL TO NOTICE

B. T. HAYWARD'S

o ADVERTISEMENT ON PAGE 126.

SMOLANDER'S

COMPOUND FLUID EXTRACT OF

BUCKU,

Cures diseases of the STOMACH, and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, DROPSY, &c. Price One Dollar. Sold by D. BARNES & Co., and F. C. WELLS & Co., New York. BUILEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., General Agents

520-35o

THE DAYS OF BRASS JEWELRY ARE OVER.

THE COSMOPOLITAN

Jewelers' Association.

Capital, $2,500,000.

Great One Price Gold Sale.

SELL NO BRASS OR SO-CALLED PLATED JEWELRY.

WARRANT ALL

JEWELRY GOLD, OR NO SALE!

Let it be distinctly understood that this is emphatically a GOLD SALE, by an association of manufacturers, on a one price average system, and that not a single article of brass or plated jewelry is included in the whole immense stock.

250,000

Pianos, Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings, Setts of Rich Silver-ware, Fine Gold Jewelry, Photograph Albums, &c.,

WORTH $2,500,000.

All to be sold for two dollars each, an average price of one-fifth the usual cost, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

INSURING $10 WORTH FOR $2, THE FROLIC.

☞ We guarantee to send any customer in exchange for the least article they may get for $2, a splendid Diably Chased or Engraved Silver Butter Dish, or Cutter, fine plate, valued at $10, or a Beautiful 50 Picture Morocco Photograph Album, valued at $6, and you have the possibility of getting a

Fine Watch or Piano.

Send 25 cents for the Golden Envelope, containing valuable receipts and songs, and one of the sealed Certificates, which we will mixed and taken out regardless of choice, will be sent, which will inform you what you can get for $2, from a Butter Dish or Castor, worth $10, to a Watch or a Grand Piano, worth $1,000. Also will be sent our circular, containing list of articles and full particulars. Address as to agents, to whom great inducements are offered. Five envelopes sent for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5. Address

CALKINS & CO., Managers,
85 and 86 Broadway, N. Y.

Or if nearer you, 26 South Fourth st., St. Louis, Mo.; or 85 and 86 Dearborn st., Chicago, Ill.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE,

Magnifying 500 times, mailed to any address for 50 cts Terms of dealers' powers for $1. Address

0000 F. B. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer

has proved itself to be the most perfect preparation for the hair ever offered to the public.

It is a vegetable compound, and contains no injurious properties whatever.

IT WILL RESTORE GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR.

It will keep the hair from falling out.

It cleanses the scalp and makes the hair soft, lustrous and silken.

It is a splendid hair dressing.

No person, old or young, should fail to use it.

IT IS RECOMMENDED AND USED BY THE FIRST MEDICAL AUTHORITY.

☞ Ask for Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, and take no other.

R. P. HALL & CO.,
Nashua, N. H., Proprietors.

For sale by all druggists.

DEMAS, BARNES & CO., Wholesale Agents. o

Allen's Lung Balsam is composed of Medicines which have a specific action upon the morbid secretions of the Lungs, which causes the matter to be thrown off by expectoration, when the inflammation will be relieved and the cough soon subdued.

o For sale by Druggists in Family Medicine generally.

CHEAP—VERY.

A. J. OFFERS SOME DECIDED BARGAINS.

Newsdealers, Booksellers,

Newspaper Readers and Book Readers, Are informed that

The American News Co.

OF NEW YORK,

Is ready to supply at the earliest moment, and on the very lowest terms,

Newspapers, Daily and Weekly, Magazines, Books, Dime Novels, Cheap Publications, School Books, Envelopes, Pens, Writing Papers,

And everything wanted by a Newsdealer or Bookseller. PRINTED TRADE LISTS describing the nature of the News business, how to do it, names of Papers and Magazines, with their prices, &c., will be sent FREE to all who ask for them.

Address THE AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY,
119 and 121 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Successors to Sinclair Tousey and H. Dexter, Hamilton & Co. o

UNION ADAMS,

HOSIER, GLOVER,

AND

SHIRT MAKER,

No. 637 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK CITY.

THE LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING EMPORIUM

OF

THOMAS AND MOIRISETT,

No. 341 Broadway,

SUPPLIES EVERY ARTICLE LADY, CHILD, or INFANT REQUIRES, in the furnishing of their TOILET or WARDROBE. 625-26o

CALENBERG & VAUPEL'S PIANOFORTES.

99 & 101 Bleecker Street, Second Block West of Broadway. Warranted for Six Years.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. They are not a whisky drink.—Independent to Guests.

H. T. HELMBOLD, Druggist, 594 Broadway, New York, Agent. 520-38o

ITCH! SALT ITCH! RHEUM!

Cured by Beide's Crimson Ointment. Price, 35 cents. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-35o

GOLD PENS.—The best Pen for the leastmoney is the JOHNSON PEN, warranted for one year, 11 carats fine; also every variety of Gold Pens and Pencils. Pens Repointed on receipt of 50 cents. Pens sent by mail. Send for circular. E. S. JOHNSON, Manufactory and Office, No. 15 Maiden lane. 519-51o

Shults' Curlique, for curling the Hair. Price by mail, 50 cents. Warranted. Address

o C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Derby's Sure Cure for Piles.

Price 75 cents per box. BURLEIGH & ROGERS, Boston, Mass., Sole Agents. 520-35o

For a Fortune

Address HARRIS & CO., Boston, Mass. 521-35o

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 50 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Tea, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $10 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty is in which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From report of SOLON ROBINSON, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:

"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, as we almost level position and suitable condition for planting farming, that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

$1,000,000 Worth

OF

Watches, Jewelry, and Silver-ware,

To be disposed of at ONE DOLLAR each without regard to value, not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive:

100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches.....each $125
100 Silver Watches.....each $20 to 35
10,000 Gold Pens and Silver Case.....each $ 5 to 8

And a large assortment of Jewelry and Silver-ware. The method of disposing of these goods at ONE DOLLAR each is as follows:

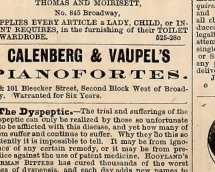
Certificates naming each article and its value are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of 25 cents—5 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5.

Agents wanted to whom we offer special terms and premiums. Address

A. H. ROWEN & CO.,

o No. 56 Beekman st., P. O. Box 4270, N. Y.

"A Scientific Wonder."



EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 20th 1865.)

An EXACT and RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A decidedly unique and wonderful novelty. Correctly constructed on the most approved SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, and surrounded to DENOTE SOLAR TIME, with absolute certainty and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Time-keeper of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. Never runs down; and can never be too fast or too slow. Corrects in all climates. It is a most remarkable article. Introduced into this country from Europe, where it is also legally protected by Royal Letters Patent. All attempts to imitate are an imposition. Price for a single one, with plain or fancy White Dials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. Safe delivery guaranteed. All orders must be addressed to

J. W. DELAMBRE & CO., Sole Proprietors,
o 204 and 206 Broadway, N. Y.

Sold by all Druggists and Perfumers.

STEINWAY & SONS,

Manufacturers of

Grand, Square and Upright Pianos,

Warerooms, No. 1 & 73 East 14th St.,

Between Union Square and Irving Place,

NEW YORK. tfo

Without Spectacles, Doctor or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free, on receipt of 10 cents. Address E. B. FOOTE, M. D., 0000 1,130 Broadway, New York.

Buy Me and Try Me.—Only 5 cents (five cents). J. G. BELIN, 83 Nassau street, N. Y. 16o

All wanting Farms.

Improved farming settlements, mild and healthful climate, 50 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Tea, twenty and fifty acre tracts at from $10 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty is in which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

$7 ARMY WATCH. $10

A BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVED GOLD-PLATED WATCH, Double Case, Lever Cap, Small Size, White Enamelled Dial, Cut Hands, "English Movements," and Correct Timekeepers, with an accurate "Minuteher Cap," indicating the Day of the Week, Month, &c., in back case. A single one sent free, by mail, to any part of the country, in neat case, worth a Dollar. Vest Chain, for only $1.

A best SILVER WATCH, same as above, with the Minuteher Cap&c., specially adapted to the ARMY. Sent free by mail, to any part of the country, for only $7.

English and American LEVERS from $25 up. Good Watches of all descriptions.

Address CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., Sole Importers,
o 38 and 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Make Your Own Soap!

With B. T. BABBIT'S Pure Concentrated Potash, or Ready Soap Maker, you can double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other saponifier or ley in market. Put up in cans of two pounds, two pounds, three pounds, six pounds, and twelve pounds, with full directions for making soft Soap in Barking Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 16 gallons of Soft Soap. No lime is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest in the market. B. T. BABBIT, 64, 66, 66, 67, 68, 70, 72, and 74 Washington street, N. Y. 526-40o

$20 G. & S. Crystal D. P. $20

$1,000 a year can be realized gilding and silvering our new Crystal Door Plate. Agents wanted. Stock, Tools and Instructions cost $20. L. L. TODD & CO., 39 Nassau street, New York.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR,

519-51o

The National Park Bank

of New York.

Capital.....$3,000,000 | Surplus.....$1,200,000

This Bank will issue Certificates of Deposit, bearing interest, on favorable terms.

J. L. WORTH, Cashier.

New York, August 21, 1865. 519-51o

25 RARE RECEIPTS

Containing many Secrets and much valuable information never before made public, including over 100 Receipts now in exclusive use by the celebrated Metropolitan Hotel of this city. Price 20 cents; mailed, postage free. Address HUTCHINSON & CO., Publishers, 606 Broadway, N. Y. tfo

CLOCK'S

Hair Restorer Restores Gray Hair.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer makes hair grow on Bald Heads.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Stops Hair from Falling Out.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer Prevents Headache.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer is elegantly Perfumed.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer is all that can be claimed as a dressing.
CLOCK'S
Hair Restorer possesses all the merit claimed for it.
A single trial convinces that no other article of its value, if, after a thorough trial of two bottles it does not give perfect satisfaction, the money will be refunded.
Sold everywhere at $1 per bottle.
Six bottles for $5.
DR. F. B. CLOCK,
Proprietor,
Manchester, N. H.
H. T. HELMBOLD,
Drug and Chemical Warehouse,
No. 594 Broadway.
526-38o General Agent, New York City.

GROVER & BAKER'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

Elastic Stitch and Lock Stitch

SEWING MACHINES,

495 BROADWAY, N. Y. or

WHEELER & WILSON'S

HIGHEST PREMIUM

LOCK STITCH

SEWING MACHINES,

625 Broadway, New York. o

Army Corps Badge Pins and Rings, of 16 carat gold, richly enamelled. BRYANT & BENTLEY, Manufacturing Jewelers, 13 Maiden Lane, N. Y. o

IVORY AND PEARL.

Sleeve Buttons, $1, $2 and $3. Ivory and Pearl Jewelry, $1, $2 and $3 per set. Ivory and Pearl Pocket Books, $1 50 to $6 each. Wholesale and retail. WILLIAM M. WELAND, Importer and Manufacturer, 571 Broadway, opposite Metropolitan Hotel. o

Boots--Boots--Boots.

RICHMOND is now prepared to manufacture to measure a superior article of Boots, Shoes, Gaiters and Slippers of every variety, for Ladies, Gents, Misses, Boys, and Children. At an immense stock of ready-made goods on hand, all at reasonable prices.

o C. C. RICHMOND, No. 150 Fulton St., N. Y.

JOY TO THE WORLD.—The introduction of Perry Davis's Pain Killer to this suffering humanity of this age, has relieved more pain and caused more real joy than any other article that can be named. The apothecary finds it first among the medicines called for, and the wholesale druggist considers it a leading article of his trade. The Grocer is ready to cheerfully commend it, and the physician can speak alike in its favor; and its reputation as a medicine of great merit is fully and permanently established. o

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1861, by Frank Leslie, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York

No. 529—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 18, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. $2 00 Six Months.

Policy of the President.

The meeting of the next Congress, in the first week of December, is an event to which all men look forward with unprecedented interest, and which will signalize a period in our history as marked, perhaps, as that of the attack on Sumter, or the surrender of Lee. Upon the action of that Congress will rest, in great part, the decision of the question whether we have fought a great war in vain, and having destroyed the name of slavery, we have let its dark and sinister spirit survive, clothed with power, as substantial as before, to oppress, to plot, and again rebel. It remains to be seen if that Congress can be deceived or suborned, so as to permit the repeal of the ordinance of secession—by which action the right of secession is most distinctly chained—and the acceptance of the fact of the abolition of slavery as the act of the general Government—by which the right to re-establish it, under State authority is reserved—whether Congress will accept these reluctant and temporary concessions as a sufficient atonement for the past, and a sufficient guarantee for the future, and admit the insurgent States to all their original power and influence in the nation. We have, for our own part, no doubt that Congress will meet as fully and squarely the issues presented to it, as did our soldiers in the field, and with equal success. If the rebellious States have supposed, for an instant, that they could abuse the leniency, liberality and generosity of President Johnson, and, under the shelter of his name and influence, ride over Congress back into the Union, and the enjoyments of all its advantages and honors, retaining still the essential features of the system which was "the direful cause of all our woes," they will find themselves grievously disappointed. There is a lion in their path, which President Johnson could not remove, even if he were so disposed, and that lion is the loyal Congress of the United States. President Johnson has not affected to know what will be its action, within its own province—action with which, as he told the Virginians, he could not interfere, even if he would.

Happily the President's policy, as lately developed, seems to be exactly in accord of that which the country expects Congress to pursue, and which it is certain to adopt. The past few weeks have shown, through Mr. Johnson's own speeches and dispatches, and through those sanctioned by his authority, four most important things:

1. No rebel State can hope to rehabilitate itself, unless it accepts President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, as an absolute abolition of slavery within its borders, and unless it makes that abolition a constitutional ordinance.

2. No rebel State can come back, or be represented in Congress, which does not adopt the Constitutional Amendment, abolishing slavery and prohibiting it in the United States and its territories for ever.

3. No insurrectionary State can hope to be recognized as a member of the Union which does not entirely repudiate all debts and obligations contracted in the effort to destroy that Union.

4. No rebel State can be understood as having abolished slavery, which denies civil rights to the negro, or refuses to admit him the right to hold and convey property, sue and be sued, and to testify in the courts.

Non-compliance with these conditions, according to the avowed policy of the President, will be equivalent to exclusion from the Union, and will justify a continued military occupation of the incorrigible States. These conditions will be equally insisted on by Congress, which, in addition, will insist that every man claiming a seat in the House of Representatives, or in the Senate, shall take the "test oath," and swear that he has never voluntarily aided or abetted the rebellion.

On the question of negro suffrage the President has declared himself, distinctly, in favor of giving the right to vote to every black man who fought in the armies of the United States, to every one who can read and write, and has a tangible property interest. The question of suffrage, however, having always been one of so exclusive State regulation, and one futhermore on which opinions may, with good cause, gravely differ, the President does not insist on the extension of the vote to the negro as a condition precedent to the reorganization and rehabilitation of the refractory States. He, however, is not insensible to the grievous wrong that would result to the white people of the North and West, if we were to continue the system of representation now existing, whereby the white men of the South would be able to send thirty-three representatives to Congress, on the basis of a negro population having no voice in their election. He has, therefore, declared himself in favor of amending the Constitution, so that representation shall be based only on the number of voters. This would make a man's vote equal in all the States, and not as now, give a "mean white" in South Carolina two-and-a-half times the political power enjoyed by the votor in New York or Ohio.

FEARFUL EXPLOSION IN FRONT OF THE WYOMING HOTEL, GREENWICH STREET, NEW YORK, ON SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5.

The intelligent, reflecting, prudent, far-seeing men of the South, whatever their antecedents, must perceive that the late war has been a revolution, and that the majority of the nation having, first by the peaceful and lawful agency of the ballot, and afterwards by the stern arbitrament of war, asserted their principles, defined their policy, and declared with terrible emphasis their purpose, will not stop half-way in their work of regenerating the Republic. They will not "hold their word of promise to the ear, and break it to their hope." The results of the late terrible war must be tangible and permanent, and what those results will and must be, has been declared by no "Northern fanatic," but by a man of the South, born there, reared there, and by the South elevated to every dignity which he ever enjoyed, except that of President of the United States.

The nation shall be sufficiently consolidated, "centralized" if you will, to give it, not the constructive, but the permanent right and power to live, to suppress insurrection, and repel aggresion. This is no longer a loose aggregation of States, but a Nationality, a People, with policy and purposes of its own, and it will accept no doctrine, admit no principle, suffer no act of omission or commission, to interfere with or invalidate the great object which its founders had in view, and to which the development of events, and the duties it has assumed towards humanity, have called it.

Men of the South! Let five years, in many respects sad and fearful years, show to the world that, albeit through fire and blood, we have been able, during this infinitesmal space on the dial of time, to gain an advance in ideas, in national education, in righteous achievement, such as no nation before us has achieved, through weary toil and struggling, in the course of centuries. That we have leaped over the sluggish cycles, landed at a bound on the milennial shores, and in a manner as striking as irreversable, established the principles of Republicanism and the endurance of Free Institutions.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 18, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

NOTICE—We have no traveling agents. All persons representing themselves to be such are impostors.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

To secure the return of contributions that may not be accepted for publication, stamps sufficient to pay the return postage must be enclosed.

All manuscripts should bear the author's name and address in full.

Manuscripts should be written on one side of the lea only.

It is best for writers to preserve copies of their articles, especially when short, and thereby spare trouble and expense.

Contributions for the return of which stamps are not enclosed, will be destroyed if not accepted.

A Place for the Schoolmaster.

IN the State of Tennessee there are 83,000 adults (whites) who can neither read nor write, and 300,000 white children for whose education there are no adequate facilities. The present white population of Tennessee is about 830,000; so that one person in 10 is absolutely illiterate. When to these are added the thousands of blacks, just released from slavery, whom the masters kept in ignorance, the aggregate shows that something ought to be done to enlighten this dark corner of the republic. Can we expect that the Union can be comprehended, cherished, and sustained as it ought to be, by a State thus sunk in ignorance? What a commentary do these statistics afford on the old oligarchical system of the South! If slavery needed a stigma more horrible than another, to brand it with the execration of mankind, it is afforded in the ignorance and wretchedness which it entailed, not on the black man alone, but on the white man. The teachers of Tennessee are in convention, endeavoring to devise ways and means to extend education in the State. They earnestly urge the people to consent to a tax of a million of dollars per annum to place the schools on a proper footing. Tennessee could make no better investment of the money. It was out of the 83,000 illiterate adults that the Tennessee contingent in the rebel army was mainly supplied.

THE total debt of the United States, on the 1st of November, was $2,740,854,756, being a decrease of $16,834,812 since the 1st of August, or at the rate of $101,008,872 a year. The amount of legal tender notes outstanding Nov. 1st, was $633,709,581, being a reduction of $44,500,000 during the month of October.

ALL doubts as to the purposes of the President regarding the reorganization of the Southern States, are being gradually dispelled by his authoritative declarations. As regards the debts incurred by the rebel authorities he writes as follows to the Provisional Governor of Georgia, under date of Oct. 28th:

"The people of Georgia should not hesitate one single moment in repudiating every single dollar of debt created for the purpose of aiding the rebellion against the Government of the United States. It will not do to levy and collect taxes from a State and people that are loyal and in the Union to pay a debt that was created to aid in taking them out and subverting the Constitution of the United States. I do not believe the great mass of the people of the State of Georgia, when left uninfluenced, will ever submit to the payment of a debt which was the main cause of bringing on their past and present suffering, the result of the rebellion. Those who invested their capital in the creation of this debt must meet their fate, and take it as one of the inevitable results of the rebellion, though it may seem hard to them. It should at once be made known, at home and abroad, that no debt contracted for the purpose of dissolving the Union can or ever will be paid by taxes levied on the people for such purpose."

As regards the proposed Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery, Mr. Seward addresses Governor Marvin, of Florida, as follows, under date of Nov. 1:

"Your letter of Oct. 7 was received and submitted to the President. He is gratified with the favorable progress towards reorganization in Florida, and directs me to say that he regards the ratification by the Legislature of the Congessional Amendment of the Constitution of the United States as indispensable to a successful restoration of the true loyal relations between Florida and the other States, and equally indispensable to the return of peace and harmony throughout the Republic."

As regards negro suffrage the President declares, if he were in Tennessee, where the question has been broached:

"I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually; first, those who have served in the army; those who could read and write, and perhaps a property qualification for others, say $200 or $250."

On the subject of making the number of qualified voters in the several states the basis of representation, he says:

"Many years ago I moved in the Legislature that the apportionment of representatives to Congress, in Tennessee, should be by qualified voters. The apportionment is now fixed until 1872; before that time we might change the basis of representation from population to qualified voters, North, as well as South, and in due course of time, the States, without regard to color, might extend the elective franchise to all who possessed certain mental, moral, or such other qualifications, as might be determined by an enlightened public judgment."

We have elsewhere commented on these and other features in the policy of the President, and adduce here the authority for what we have there said.

A BOOK has recently been published in London, entitled, "Men of the Times," which epitomizes the history of a man whom the American nation delights to honor, not less for his services in the field, than for his boldly avowed and honestly entertained conviction that "America is for Americans, and sacred to Republican institutions." We mean:

"Sheridan, Philip Henry, General in the United States Army, was born in the State of Ohio, in 1831. He was educated at West Point, and was admitted into the Military Academy in 1848, where he graduated in 1853. Entering the United States artillery, he saw some service in Texas, where he showed great ability and energy. In 1855 we find him serving as lieutenant in Oregon, and in the same year he sailed for San Francisco, in command of an escort to the expedition for surveying the proposed branch of the Pacific Railway between San Francisco and the Columbia river. This work done, he continued in command of a body of troops among the India tribes, until 1861, when he was promoted to the rank of captain, and on the breaking out of the civil war was appointed Quartermaster of the army organizing in South-western Missouri. In 1862 he became Chief Quartermaster of the Western Department, and subsequently Colonel of the 2d Michigan Volunteer cavalry, in which capacity he cut the railroads south of Corinth. In June of that year he defeated two separate forces of cavalry at Baldwin and Guntown, and in the following month gained fresh laurels at Boonesville, for which he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General, when he took the command of the third division of the army of Ohio. Here he distinguished himself by the defence of Louisville, and on the 30th of Dec. following, in the engagement on the banks of Stone river, for which he was promoted to be Major-General. He was subsequently engaged at Chickamauga, where he had his horse killed under him. In April, 1864, he was appointed to the command of the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac, and in the following May he defeated the Southern forces under Stuart, at Meadow Bridge, on the Chickahominy. In June he set out on a cavalry expedition into the heart of the rebel country, where he repulsed his opponents, and entirely defeated Early in several engagements in the Shenandoah valley. He was subsequently appointed to the chief command of the cavalry, which branch of the Federal forces, under his able and energetic direction, acquired an efficiency, and gained a reputation that it had never borne before. After the capture of Staunton, he pressed on to Columbia, laying waste the country in every direction. On the 30th of March, 1865, he gained the battle of the Five Forks, compelled the rebels to evacuate Petersburg and Richmond, and finally defeated Lee near Amelia Court House, who surrendered on the 9th of April."

PHILADELPHIA is the chief manufacturing city of the country. The amount of national revenue accruing from the city for 1864 was $12,530,000, of which $6,765,000 was derived from taxes on manufactures. It is impossible to calculate exactly the value of the manufactures represented by these figures, as some of the duties are specific and others ad valorem. It is estimated, however, that four per cent. is the average duty on manufactured articles, so that the tax of $6,765,961 48 represents a gross value of manufactures of $169,149,112. It may be considered, therefore, that during one year the city of Philadelphia manufactured nearly one hundred and seventy millions of dollars worth of goods.

A MEMBER of the British Association, at its late meeting, ventured on the assertion that the negro "had never shown ingenuity enough to invent letters, symbolic and phonetic," a Mr. Innes comes forward, in the Athenæum, to certify that, if not the inventors of letters, the negroes were certainly the inventors of a system of telegraphy more perfect than any in existence before the era of Morse—telegraphy, not by a system of signals, as was practiced in Europe up to the introduction of the electric telegraph, and was next to useless at night, and entirely so in a fog, but of sounds capable of carrying information at any time. Mr. Innes says:

"I beg leave to hand you a drawing of the 'Elliembic,' or African telegraph, an instrument which has been in existence from time immemorial to the oldest inhabitant in the Cameroons country, on the west coast of Africa. By the sounds produced on striking this instrument, the natives carry on conversation with great rapidity, and at several miles distance. I have one of the instruments now in my possession, which I brought home with me on my last visit to Africa, in 1860. The sounds are made to produce a perfect and distinct language, as intelligible to the natives as that uttered by the human voice, and which I had the means of testing on several occasions. The instrument is in universal practice about the Cameroons; and up in the interior, in the Abo and Budi countries, a part of central Africa not yet visited by Europeans. In visiting this part of Africa, in 1859, my coming was generally announced beforehand to the different villages by the 'Elliembic.' I questioned some of the oldest inhabitants as to the inventor; but none of them could tell me further than that theysupposed 'it must have been some of their great-grandfathers.' This 'Elliembic,' therefore (which is a most ingenious invention), must have been in existence in Africa before telegraphs were dreamt of in England. I may also state that I keep up a regular correspondence with natives on the coast, and their letters will bear comparison with many British correspondents."

MR. RUSKIN, in his late volume entitled Sesame and Lilies, declares Englishmen to be "a money-making mob," which is satisfied with "concentrating its soul on pence." This is the perfect echo, on English soil, of Napoleon's famous description of England as "a nation of shopkeepers."

THE increase of our population since 1790 (the date of our first census), has been so regular that a prominent statistician several years ago constructed a table of estimates, which have been verified by the facts thus far, and may be confidently assumed for the future, provided the national condition remains undisturbed. According to this the four remaining censuses of this century will give the following results in round numbers: In 1870, 41,000,000; in 1880, 55,000,000; in 1890, 73,000,000; and in 1900, 99,000,000. Any one, therefore, now living, who lives 40 years longer ought to see this country occupied by more than 100,000,000 of people, enjoying the blessings of civil liberty. But should that be the case, there are those now living who will see the population of the United States rising above 200,000,000.

THE London Quarterly Review said in January last: "The North is fighting for a very ancient and vulgar object of war—for that which Russia has secured in Poland—for that which Austria clings to in Venetia—that which Napoleon sought in Spain, and for no victory of a 'higher civilization!'" Query: With the wonderful facility of adaptation characteristic of the London press, what will it say in January, 1866?

BEAUREGARD, a creole gentleman, lately, we believe, in the Southern service, and who has bragged more and done less than any of his colaborers in crime, has written to a contemporary to dissuade it from publishing an article on Jeff Davis' "mismanagement of our national affairs." Is the swarthy little general still under the impression that the "Southern Confederacy" lives?

WE are pleased to see that Watson's Weekly Art Journal has been enlarged, and promises to become a permanent "Record of Events in the World of Music, Art and Literature." The tone of our weekly press sympathises with the more lofty tone of society created by the war, and such works as Watson's Journal will henceforth meet with a higher appreciation.

THE new King of Wurtemburg appears to be mad with the pride of caste. He recently ordered all citizen owners of opera boxes opposite his own seat to give them up, as he would have only nobles sit face to face with him, and on the 15th ult. he published a new code for salutes. All officers in the theatre when his Majesty enters are to rise together, and again when the Queen follows him. The guards are to turn out in good time when the king passes, or the commandant will be held responsible, and lest the soldiers should excuse themselves by saying they did not recognize the king, "exact photographs" of his Majesty are to be hung up in all barrack-rooms, at the cost of the regiment. The vanity and meanness of German royalty are combined in that last clause in perfection, but the insult to the Wurtemburgers is not yet complete. To prevent all mistakes the soldiery are to salute every closed carriage, full or empty, and order absolutely identical in principle with that of Gesler, said to have produced the revolt of Switzerland from Austria. Unfortunately the Wurtemburgers are not Swiss, and will simply regard their king as a trifle too much of a martinet.

THE London Spectator, which has been our consistent friend throughout the war, says of President Johnson:

"He is acting a disgraceful part. It was not only as easy for him to insist on the enactment of full protection for the civil rights of the negroes before restoring political power to the States, as to insist on the nominal abolition of slavery, but the one act was a mockery without the other. Unless the Republicans bestir themselves the vile Democratic principles which evidently poison the President's mind will restore the Southern society on its old basis, and all the glory of the war be obliterated by the victory of the caste principle which caused it."

The Spectator will find that its fears and predictions are equally unfounded. No State can get back into the Union and the full enjoyment of its political power, which does not give the negro what the Spaniards call "egualidad ante la Ley,' or equality before the law. It was on this issue that a revolution was once made in Spain, and the United States cannot afford to be behind Spain, in its recognition of "human rights."

SPANGLER, the scene shifter in Ford's theatre, who was sentenced to imprisonment in the Dry Tortugas, for complicity with Booth, in the murder of President Lincoln, has written a letter, which has found its way into print, in which he protests his innocence, and says of Booth, quaintly:

"He asked me to see to his horses, which I did; he said that he would make me a hansom present, which he did, six years on the Island of Dry Tortugas."

TOWN GOSSIP.

LAST week we commenced with the cholera, and this week we have more cause to do so, from the very unpleasant fact that a ship, the steamer Atalanta, has just arrived at this port, from London, with 552 emigrant passengers on board, and about 50 cases of cholera, from which 19 have died on the passage, and the balance, now on board, have been transferred to the hospital ship, Florence Nightingale, now lying in the lower bay.

This is bringing the matter strictly home to us, and without rushing into a panic, it behooves us to look about and set our houses in order. We can easily avert the fearful scenes of 1832 and 1849 if we choose, but it can only be done by cleanliness and temperance.

In the case of the Atalanta, she cleared with a good bill of health, but the theory is recognized that she took on board at Havre, where she stopped, the passengers—Germans—that bred the pestilence. There is no doubt that these hundreds of poor people had been lying some time at Havre awaiting the ship, and that they came on board, from that filthy city, dirty and ill fed. On the second day out the first case occurred, and from that time the surgeon on board was powerless to control the dread disease. It was alone among the steerage passengers, the cabin passengers not having been attacked, and at the first alarm resisting the scourge by endeavoring to promote the sanitary state of the ship as well as to keep up the gaiety of the cabins, literally laughing and singing in the face of death. No communication with the steamer is allowed, and all on board will be kept at the hospital ship until all chance of infection is gone.

It may be interesting to all, to show how far the ravages of this disease have gone in all its visitations to us. These are the statistics for New York City:

In 1832 there were 3513 deaths; in 1834 there were 971 deaths; in 1849 there were 5071 deaths; in 1862 there were 374 deaths; in 1851 there were 2509 deaths; all other years 137 deaths. Total 12,775.

The week just passed has brought with it one of those holy days that seem each year to be flitting out from the sympathies of the people. We mean All Hallow Eve, a festival that is still kept in some parts of the world with all the honors, but which with us fact-loving Yankees is fast becoming an obsolete idea, though there are still a few youths and maidens who gather upon the last night in October to roast chesnuts, drop lead, snap apples, eat salt cake, and walk around the block with their mouths full of water. But even with the fading away of the reality, the memory of the happy hours we have enjoyed in the days gone by in keeping All Hallow Ee'n will dwell with us forever. To those who are disposed to study up the olden way of keeping the festival we refer them to Burns' poem of "Hallowe'en." Whoever is born on this day are supposed to have the faculty of seeing ghosts, and will have great good luck. In the church it is kept as a fast day, and is the vigil of all saints.

One of the events about to come off in a few days is the Aerial wedding, a little festival got up by Professor Lowe. The parties to the novel match who are seeking notoriety by getting high are announced as Professor (?) Boynton, of Syracuse, and a Miss Jenkins—we do think we have heard that name before—late of St. Louis. A sister of the bride and a daughter of the groom are to be bridesmaids, and a Philadelphia clergyman is to officiate. The only question is, will the marriage be legal, seeing that it neither occurs on the earth or on the sea.

On the 15th of this month there will sail from this port the steamer Continental, with 700 women on board for Washington Territory. The steamer was loaded by the Government, and the supposable case is that the young ladies will all be married off by signal from the shore as soon as the steamer gets in sight of land, seeing that there are at this time some thousands of anxious bachelors looking longingly for their arrival.

The records of our law makers show some strange things, but we think nothing stranger, in a financial point of view, than that of a bill presented against the city during the past week. It was for mending old Harlem Bridge by a Mr. Chandler, who sends it in this way: To 46 days' work, at $3 per day, $138; one oak plank, $1 50; repairing wrench, $1 37. Total, $140 87. Strange to say, the committee to whom it was referred refused to pay it, declaring that they could not see how 46 days' work could be put on one oak plank, so many gallons of sack to a halfpenny's worth of bread. We thought the treasury paid anything, no matter what, and we can only put one construction on the matter, which is that Mr. Chandler was not in the ring.

The leading topic of the week, next to the cholera, is the emeute at the theatres, or, in other words, the strike of the musicians. These gentlemen, who are so essential to the proper amusing of the public and the success of the managers, have chosen to strike, exactly in the middle of a theatrical season, for an advance of 30 per cent. upon their pay; or, having made a contract to receive $14 per week for their services, they suddenly, through what is styled "The Musical Union," demand $20, or, in detached engagements, $7 per night, with boned turkey and champagne, free, gratis, for nothing. Pianists as well as fiddlers are counted in this union, and the consequence, that those who dance must expect to pay the piper, and pay him well.

Now, we are not of those who would undervalue any man's services, but we fail to see the justice of this strike. Firstly, we will not recognize the fact of a mere mechanical musician, who can only read the works of the master, being an artiste. We may as well declare the reader of a great poem on a par with the writer. When the musician arises to the dignity of an interpretation of great music, that adds new grace and beauty to the original, we can recognize the artiste, and only then. One capable of this would not sit many weeks in a theatrical orchestra, holding anything short of a first position, and would find no necessity to belong to a musical union to enforce a recognition of his claims.

Another point in this strike is, that the real time employed by these musicians is little more than two hours per day, rehearsals in the morning, in full orchestra, seldom occurring. For this two hours they charge $3 33, while the whole of the rest of their day is unoccupied, and, unless they are too lazy to work, they can teach, and, by so doing, or by playing in a military band, more than double their income. Added to this, they enforce the privilege of sending a substitute to the theatre upon any evening they may have a more profitable call. All this, counted up, gives these fiddlers and horn-blowers actually more of an income than is realized by most of the intellectual professions of New York—the actors on the very stage they fiddle for, the writers for the press, who are gentlemen, and the artists, who labor a day's work to produce the scenic effects, are not as well off as these striking fiddlers.

The managers have resisted this strike upon principle, and have gone even so far as to dispense with orchestras, and substitute pianos, without exciting the displeasure of the public. They are determined, hereafter, to have nothing whatever to do with any member of the Musical Union, and we opine that this body will have found, before many days, that they have put their foot in it. Max Maretzek, some time ago, outgeneraled a similar combination among the chorus, by sending to Europe and engaging a new set, and the associated managers have now done the same. There is, therefore, as the case now stands, but one resource for the musicians—a square back down from their strike, or a permanent dismissal, and an overcrowding of their labor market.

The chief theatrical sensation of the week has been the appearance of John Brougham at the Winter Garden, in his own comedy of "Playing with Fire." There is no disputing the popularity of Mr. Brougham, and if it was not shown in his reception at Winter Garden, then no genuine enthusiasm ever was. It was some time before he dould proceed, from the applause that greeted his entree; and all through the piece it was resumed, until the climax was capped by one of these speeches which he only knows how to make, and which we can only characterize as the best specimen of a good bad speech we ever heard.

At this house they are using the magnificent military brass band from Governor's Island as an orchestra, with wonderful effect.

At Niblo's, the Ravels are having a success that bids fair to shut away everything else for the season; and with these pleasant little preludes with Mr. and Mrs. Gomersal, who are better than good, the entertainment is the most palatable just now offered.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Three hundred and sixty-one thousand, four hundred and five dollars and ninety cents is due to the Government from the defaulting postmasters of the Southern States, which they retained when the rebellion broke out. They are now being called on for this amount.

—— The War Department has decided, with the approval of Gen. Grant, not to restore the property of ex-Gov. Henry A. Wise, of Virginia.

—— A story, illustrating the cost of amateur farming, is told of a retired merchant, who had a farm on Long Island, with all the modern inventions, and fancy stock of all kinds. After showing a friend over the premises one day, he invited him into the house. "——," said he, "you have seen the best farm in the State; now sit down and rest and take something. I have milk and champagne. Take your choice—they cost the same."

—— The city and county of New York are taxed $19,500,000. This is equivalent to the whole property valuation of some respectable large cities. Add the national tax to the civic, and a New Yorker may well boast of as heavy financial burdens as are borne by the citizen or subject of any monarchical state. Where rascality has been reduced to a science, as in New York, civic taxation is synonymous with systematic plunder.

—— The sales of postage stamps and stamped envelopes at the post office in New York city, for the year ending Sept. 30, amounts to $1,465,032, an increase of $260,800 over the previous year.

—— The Norfolk Roanoke House folks, a few days since, hearing of the whereabouts of a guest who had decamped without going through the usual formality of paying his bill, sent him a note: "Mr. ——, Dear sir—Will you send the amount of your bill, and oblige," etc. To which the delinquent made answer: "The amount is $80 62. Yours respectfully."

—— Dr. Joseph Emerson Worcester, the well-known American lexicographer, died Oct. 27, at his residence in Cambridge, Mass., aged 81 years. Dr. Worcester was a native of Bedford, N. H., where he was born, Aug. 24, 1784. He graduated at Yale College in 1811. His first effort in the field of English lexicography, was "Johnson's English Dictionary, as improved by Todd, and Abridged by Chalmers, with Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary combined," which appeared in 1827. In 1828 he edited, at the request of the publisher of Webster's Dictionary, an abridgment of that work. In the following years several dictionaries were published by him in succession, until he gave to the public, in 1860, his chief work, "A Dictionary of the English Language," the ripe fruit of more than 30 years of lexicographical studies.

—— There were 20,000 persons weighed on the scales at the Boston Mechanics' Fair. The average weight of men was 141½ pounds; average weight of women was 124½. The largest man weighed 293 pounds; the largest women weighed 274½.

—— The 15th of November—first anniversary of the day on which Sherman began his march to the sea—will be celebrated in Chicago, by a Union Convention of officers from the army which accompanied him. Gen. John A. Logan is to pronounce an oration on the occasion.

—— Thirteen divorces have been granted by the Supreme Court in this district, between the 26th and 29th of Oct., all of them on the ground of adultery. In seven of the cases the wives were complainants; in the remaining six the husbands appeared as plaintiffs, and obtained the decrees against their wives.

—— A girl, nearly white, visited the headquarters of Gen. Brisbin, at Lexington, Ky., a few days ago, and claimed military protection from her aunt, a white woman, who claimed her as a slave, and demanded that the girl should either pay four hundred dollars for her freedom, or return again to bondage. The girl is the daughter of the lady's brother, and has lived with her aunt, Mrs. X., for 16 years. The girl, whose name we will call Sally, thinking she had worked long enough for Aunt X. without pay, came to the city, obtaining a pass from Gen. B., and has since continued to live with her husband, who is a hard working, thrifty, black man, and provides his Sally with a good house, and a comfortable living. The aunt claimed Sally under the Mayor's proclamation, as a negro slave, and sought to return her to servitude. When the case came up before Gen. B., he decided that it was improper for relations to hold each other in bondage, and therefore advised Aunt X. to go in peace. She departed.

—— A young man at Cohoes, N. Y., named Fairbanks, robbed his mother of $300 in money and a $2,200 check, on Tuesday. He asked his mother to lend him 25 cents, and she took out her portmonnie in order to comply with his request, when he snatched the purse from her hand with the remark, "This is what I want." He then ran off, and has not been heard of since.

—— A baby about four weeks old was found on a door step in Waterport, Conn., on Tuesday evening. The following directions were found in the cradle: "Give him cow's milk, one-half water, and a teaspoonful of brandy to one gill of food." With him was a lot of handsome clothing, a bottle of brandy, some medicine and a pail of sugar.

—— While workmen were engaged, a few days since, in removing the ruins of the late coal oil fire in Philadelphia, quite an excitement was created by the discovery of the fact that a large quantity of oil had settled in puddles in the cellars of the buildings. Thousands of people flocked to the scene, with tubs, pails and barrels to gather up the oil. One person disposed of what he had gathered during the day for fifty dollars.

—— At the competitive declamation at Harvard College, a few days since, the first prize was won by a student who lost his arm while serving as captain in the rebel army, and the second by a young negro, the first undergraduate of that race who has been admitted nto that University.

—— A judge in Albany has just condemned a burglar to 15 years' imprisonment in State Prison, and gave warning that, in view of the intolerable frequency of that crime, the severest penalty of the law—20 years' imprisonment—would be impartially meted out to all similar cases hereafter brought before him.

—— The teachers of freedmen in Mississippi, many of whom were sent out by Northern societies, are reported as leaving their schools, upon the withdrawal of the troops—deeming it unsafe to remain behind.

—— A gentleman was robbed of a magnificent diamond pin, valued at about $6,600, while riding in a Philadelphia horse-car a few days since.

—— A colored man named Charles Syphax, having a considerable quantity of white blood in his veins, is a man of intelligence and excellent character, and is messenger to Secretary Harlan. It also happens that this colored man is a half-brother to Mrs. General Robert E. Lee, and grandson of George Washington Parke Curtis, who was a stepson of George Washington! That is quite a pedigree, is it not? There are seven other men of the same parentage, all brothers; two of whom have been employés of the Interior Department for a number of years. It is also asserted as a well-known fact, that Mrs. General Lee has, in all, some forty half-brothers and sisters of the same sort in and around Washington. So says a correspondent of an Indiana paper.

—— For some time past a gang of thieves have infested Nashville, Tenn., robbing and murdering citizens, and their lurking places could not be discovered. The startling fact was, however, brought to light, on Friday, that there were five different caves beneath the city occupied by thieves and counterfeiters. The caves are of immense dimensions, and guards are now stationed at the different entrances. It is commonly reported that a lake, covering over five acres, and very deep, is directly under the city.

—— A correspondent of the Jacksonville Herald, writing from Clay County, Florida, says: Many of the Democrats of that county have come out in favor of negro suffrage, in order to get ahead of the Republicans and secure the colored vote.

—— General Barnum, the Union candidate for State Prison Inspector of New York, wears a rope in the hole which a rebel bullet made through his body, big enough and strong enough to hang a rebel.

—— Colonel Joseph Howland, the Union candidate for State Treasurer of New York, gave $20,000 to fit his regiment for the war, and never received a cent for his three years' services.

—— Between Cairo and Vicksburg, one hundred and one islands have no name, but are numbered. No 10 is now treeless, and almost desolate. About a quarter of a mile of the upper part, where the fortifications were, has been carried away by floods.

—— A few weeks ago a gentleman in Petersburg, employed for the purpose by the military authorities, canvassed the city to ascertain the number of houses struck by Federal shells during the recent siege. His investigations developed the fact that there were over 800 houses struck by whole shells, besides large numbers which received rude touches from fragments of the same. The gas house in the eastern portion of the city is the building which received visits from the largest number of these ponderous missiles, sixty-five of which struck the establishment.

—— Michael Gillis, an insane Irishman at Manchester, N. H., created an excitement on Sunday by stationing himself near the Catholic church, armed with three muskets and several knives, and provided with a lot of ammunition and bread, and raving about the wrongs of Ireland. In the endeavor to secure him he made a bayonet charge on Father Herbert, a priest, and stabbed Assistant Marshal Prescott in the side, inflicting an ugly wound.

—— A party of young men on Monday evening last, while digging for roots some miles North of Vincennes, Indiana, discovered an old leather sack containing $7,000 in gold and $300 in silver. It is supposed to have been concealed there by an old man named Jones, who was sentenced to the Penitentiary some forty-two years ago for robbery.

—— In Greenwood Cemetery there have been up to this date 144,400 interments, averaging for the last few years about 7,000 per annum.

—— The Pension Bureau reports that the whole amount of army pensions paid during the year ending June 30, 1865, was $8,319,672; of navy pennions $205,480. Total for the year, $8,525,152. The number of widows and orphans of soldiers on the pension rolls is 24,716; of sailors, 266.

—— A novel fashion in stockings is announced. It is to wear one stocking of one color and one of another color. Paris has sent forth this ridiculous device.

—— Rats walking over a bell wire lately kept one of Albany's first families awake for a week of nights. They thought it was "spirits."

—— Henry B. Dawson, editor of a new edition of the Federalist, has brought two actions for libel against John Jay. The offensive language is contained in two newspaper letters, in which Mr. Jay reviewed Dawson's introduction to the Federalist. The damages are laid at $60,000.

Foreign.—An eccentric landlord died lately in Stratford, England. He made all his tenants conform to these rules: 1st. There must be no children; 2d. The tenant must not smoke; 3d. Nor keep birds; 4th. Nor exhibit flowers in pots or otherwise in any of either of the windows of the house; 5th. If a bachelor, or widow, or spinster, he or she shall not enter into matrimony during his or her tenancy.

ACTOR AND ORCHESTRA IN ONE.

GREAT ECONOMICAL COMBINATION, NECESSITATED BY THE STRIKE OF THE MUSICIANS OF THE N. Y. THEATRES.

—— An American was teaching English to a German, and on being asked if there were no irregular verbs in English, replied by giving one solitary example. It was, "I go, thou wentest, he departed; we made tracks, you cut sticks, they skedaddled."

—— The cholera sometimes rages in the winter season. In 1830 it raged fearfully at St. Petersburg, Russia, during the whole winter. Cleanliness is one of the best preventives of the disease, and ought to be observed with scrupulous care by local authorities and private persons.

—— In consequence of official orders to that effect, all the French railways will be compelled to adopt appliances for instantaneous communication between every part of the train at the end of the present year.

—— There are 84 religious orders in Italy, of which 80 are possessed of property, and four are composed of begging friars or nuns. The 80 orders are spread over 1,724 religious houses, valued at 40,000,000 francs; the remaining four occupy 658 buildings. The monasteries are 1,506 in number, and contain 15,494 clerical and 4,466 lay members; a total of 19,960. The convents, in number 876, contain 25,869 occupants, of whom 18,198 are professed nuns, and 7,671 lay sisters. Of the total of 45,829 friars and nuns, there are about 20,000 who beg.

—— A short time ago, died at Madgeburg, Capt. Calow, of the Royal Fusileers (Prussian), of a wound received in a duel. It was only after each of the duelists had fired 14 balls that the captain, being shot in the breast, fell. It had been agreed beforehand that one of them, at least, should not quit the field alive. The name of his adversary is Major Von Schack, of the Pomeranian Grenadiers.

—— The subjoined form of prayer has been drawn up by the Primate of England, and is now in use in the Episcopal Churches at Lambeth and Addington. It is anticipated that an Order in Council will be issued immediately, authorizing the use throughout England and Wales: "O Lord God Almighty, whose are the cattle on a thousand hills, and in whose hand is the breath of every living thing, look down, we pray Thee, in compassion upon us, Thy servants, whom Thou hast visited with a grievous murrain among our herds and flocks. We acknowledge our transgressions, which worthily deserve Thy chastisement, and our sin is ever before us; and, in humble penitence, we come to seek Thy aid. In the midst of judgment, do Thou, O Lord, remember mercy; stay, we pray Thee, this plague, by Thy word of power, and save that provision which Thou hast, in Thy goodness, granted for our sustenance. Defend us, also, gracious Lord, from the pestilence with which many foreign lands have been smitten; keep it, we beseech Thee, far away from our borders, and shield our homes from its ravages. So shall we ever offer unto Thee the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, for these, Thy acts of providence over us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

—— The anniversary of the triumphant entry of the Emperor Iturbide into the city of Mexico, on September 30, 1821, was celebrated with great pomp in that capital, and a monument was dedicated to Morelos, the Mexican patriot in the war of independence, on the same day. One to perpetuate the memory of Iturbide is about to be placed in the cathedral.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION IN GREENWICH STREET.

One of the most sensational occurrences that has agitated New York for a long time, and which bids fair to lead to some rather singular revelations, occurred on Sunday, the 5th November, at about 11 o'clock in the morning, at the Wyoming Hotel, Greenwich street, N. Y.

Two months since, a German, by the name of Leers, took rooms at this hotel, and on his departure left in the office a small box, which remained there undisturbed until Sunday morning, when a gentleman observed a dark liquid running from the box, and smoke following it. The alarm was immediately given, and John Grogan, the porter of the establishment, took up the box and carried it to the sidewalk. No sooner had he set it down than it exploded with a tremendous report, that shook the whole lower part of the city, and was heard for several miles.

The effect was terrific. Twenty-two persons were injured, many of them seriously, the whole front of the house, and the neighboring houses, made a wreck, and the windows broken for several blocks around. The hole made by the explosion in the pavement was four feet in depth, and not a vestige of the box or its contents was to be found.

As soon as the first terror had subsided, inquiries were commenced after Leens, and in the course of the day he was arrested and examined. His story is, that the box contained chemical oils, which were given to him in Hamburg, in August last, to bring to this country for sale; that on removing from the Wyoming Hotel, he forgot it, and did not remember it until he was arrested. He was held in custody for further examination.

There is something mysterious in the whole affair Firstly, what was in the box to cause such a force? and, secondly, that the man should have, as he says, forgotten it when he took away his other baggage. The probability is that the box contained some explosive acids, and that the friction or force of throwing them on the pavement caused the ignition.

SEWING MACHINES.

We are having a great many inquiries for Sewing Machines from various parts of the country, and as we cannot conveniently reply to them all by mail, we have thought it proper to state our opinion in regard to them in this public manner. We have used Wilson's patent, manufactured by the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, No. 625 Broadway, and we can say in regard to it, that it is without a rival. It is simple, not easily put out of order when in proper hands, and in point of effectiveness and finish, no other machine stands ahead of it. This famous Sewing Machine is highly appreciated the world over. We state this much in regard to the excellent machine upon our own responsibility.

This Company have made and sold during the last three months, about 10,000 machines, and are now producing and selling 150 per day. They vary in price from $50 to $100, and the highest priced ones sell best. In their business there is over $1,000,000 invested, and they keep 900 men regularly employed manufacturing machines. The system pursued is the same as that adopted in the manufacture of arms; every piece is made to a gauge, and consequently the parts of any machine may be transposed with those of another machine of the same size; or, should an accident occur, the broken part can be immediately replaced on application at the office.

There is not an establishment in this country where stitching of any kind is required, in which the Sewing Machine is not employed, and there are few private families in which it is not an acknowledged article of furniture. This Company has just won the highest premium at the International Fair, Dublin, exhibiting its 200,000th machine, beautifully ornamented with the American coat of arms.—Scientific American.

HISTORY OF PLAGUES.

It was in 1665 that the great plague devastated London. It appeared in Europe 45 times during the 17th century, but it only raged violently in England three or four times during that period. About the time of the plague a disease prevailed called the "plague of the intestines," similar to the Indian cholera. In 1829 the plague broke out in the Russian army in Bulgaria, and cholera soon afterwards appeared in the Russian southern provinces. During the Crimean war there was a malignant fever, similar to the plague, in Odessa, and the cholera broke out at the same time in the Russian army. The recent plague in St. Petersburg came from the north of the Himalayas, and passed through Tartary and Siberia to European Russia, the same route which the plague followed in 1333, when it destroyed a fourth of the population of Europe and three-fourths of that of England. It is singular that while the plague was passing through Russia, recently, the cholera broke out in Arabia, passed through Egypt, on to Constantinople, Jerusalem, Malta and Tuscany, and even reached Marseilles and Paris. In 1832, 1834, 1849 and 1854 the cholera visited the United States. From 1849 to 1852 a particular epidemic prevailed in Europe and America. Since 1854 the prevailing diseases in America have been in the lungs, throat, and nasal passages, and influenza, pneumonia and consumption have been destructive. During 1856 and 1857 diphtheria was fatal. From 1661 to 1664 the diseases prevalent in England were ague; from 1664 to 1666, lung affections and the plague; from 1667 to 1669, smallpox and fever; from 1669 to 1672, cholera and dysentery; from 1673 to 1675, measles, cough and catarrh. During the second quarter of the present century there was a tendency in London to diarrh a and diseases of a choleric character, which were more fatal from 1827 to 1831. Diarrhea continued fatal up to 1837. A pestilence follows low levels, made lands, places where sewerage is defective, where population is crowded, as in tenant-houses; where debauchery prevails, as in brothels and liquor-houses; and where various exhalations arise. An epidemic is fearful, because its movements seem to be almost incomprehensible. Its mystery constitutes its terribleness. For a time it supersedes other diseases, or somehow combines with them, complicating their symptoms, and after it has apparently disappeared, its peculiar influence often remains, till a new cycle begins, and some other disease takes the lead. The plague and the cholera, at those periods of their destructiveness when their character was most unequivocally exhibited, it has been observed, generally terminated the existence of their victims often without the accompaniment of pain. Few perished, except those who had by age, exposure, fear, or in some other manner, lowered the tone of their vitality, and then the hand of death touched them gently.

Extraordinary Scene in a Church.—A most extraordinary scene recently occurred in a church in Bridgewater, England, arising from a dispute between the pastor and the congregation in regard to the placing of candlesticks on the communion table, the introduction of which articles the people conceived to savor too much of Puseyism. The church-wardens finally appealed to the bishop of the diocese to have the objectionable candlesticks put out of sight, and, after investigation, he ordered the incumbent to immediately remove them, and at the same time express regret for having acted contrary to the wishes of his congregation. Accordingly, on the following Sunday there was a crowded congregation, assembled to listen to the "regrets" of the offending divine, and among them a reporter from one of the local papers prepared to chronicle the proceedings. The reverend gentleman espied the reporter, with his book in hand, upon which he said, in a loud tone of voice:

"I shall refuse to proceed with my sermon till that person puts away his writing materials. I will not submit to such a desecration of God's house."

The reporter remained as before, and the reverend gentleman then abruptly closed his book, pronounced the benediction, and sent the congregation away without the sermon. In the afternoon the reporter was again present, and the service proceeded as in the morning, until the clergyman ascended the pulpit, and looking towards the reporter, he said:

"Before I commence my sermon, I must again request that person to put away his writing materials. If he will not do so, I must call upon the church-wardens to take them from him; and if they will not do so, I must call upon the congregation to take them from his hands."

A rough-looking fellow, a boatman, who was in a pew at some distance, rose with angry looks, and gesticulating fiercely, said:

"If the churchwardens won't do their duty, somebody must."

He seemed disposed to carry his idea of duty to a practical conclusion, when the clergyman, seeing he had gone too far, motioned to his muscular ally to sit down, and he did so. The reverend gentleman then said:

"It will be impossible for me to go on with my sermon after the deliberate insult which has been perpetrated. It was my desire to have welcomed back to their seats in the house of God the churchwardens; but they have cast a deliberate insult upon me, for I have full evidence that that miserable individual (the reporter) is here at their instigation, and by that proceeding they have placed themselves beyond all sympathy."

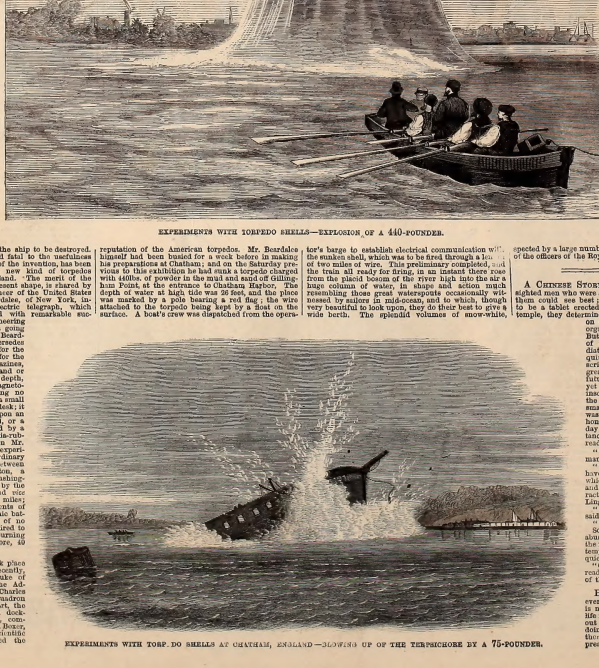
The congregation then left the church.

London spreads over more than 720 square miles, contains 2,600 miles of streets, has 360,000 houses, a population of 3,000,000, and an assessed annual rental of over $300,000,000.

EXPERIMENTS With the American Torpedo-Shells at Chatham, England.

THE first use of submarine explosive shells for the destruction of hostile ships of war is attributed by the Americans to Mr. David Bushnell, of Connecticut, who, about 1777, contrived a machine in which he operator, with air enough to breathe for half an hour, could dive under the bottom of an enemy's vessel, and fasten to it a box of powder, which was afterwards to be fired by means of a gunlock and a long cord. This machine, which took its name from its shape resembling the American turtle or torpedo, was tried without success against the British squadron in New York harbor and in the Delaware. Twenty years later Robert Fulton, the author of steam navigation in America, devised a method of applying submarine bomb-shells, which he laid before the British Government. It was discountenanced by our naval authorities, but found some favor with Mr. PITT, who on one occasion witnessed, near Walmer Castle, the blowing up of the brig Dorothea by means of 180-pounder torpedo—that is, a explosive shell, the name being now transferred from the original diving-machine to the immediate instrument of destruction. Fulton's shell was provided with clock-work to set the gunlock in action and fire the powder, after the lapse of a given time. The whole subject, however, seems to have lain in abeyance until the Russian war of 1854, when the channels leading to Cronstadt were defended by sunken magazines of powder, held by buoys at a certain depth beneath the surface; the intended method of ignition, when the enemy's ships passed over, was by the breaking of a small glass tube, containing sulphuric acid, which would then flow down a long flexible tube, containing at its bottom a preparation of chlorate of potash, so as to produce a flame communicating with the magazine. These Russian torpedoes, however, did not prove very efficient, and were harmlessly fished up by our exploring boats.

The late rebellion has occasioned the practical application and modification of these engines of warfare in a great variety of forms. They were extensively used by the military and naval engineers of the South, the most successful example being shown by the destruction of the Tecumseh, at Mobile, in August, 1863. A torpedo diving-boat, with steam-engine and screw-propeller, and with two vanes, like the fins of a fish, to regulate its upward or downward motion, was constructed by them at Charleston, and another at New Orleans; but in these instances the torpedo-shells, as employed by the Southern men were to be thrust forward at the end of a long arm or spar, so as to be placed in direct contact with the bottom or side of the ship to be destroyed. This principle, which seemed fatal to the usefulness and convenient applicability of the invention, has been entirely superseded by the new kind of torpedos exhibited at Chatham, England. The merit of this novel combination, in its present shape, is shared by Mr. W. W. Bowley, Chief Engineer of the United States Navy, and Mr. G. W. Beardslee, of New York, inventor of the magneto-electric telegraph, which had already been employed with success for military and engineering purposes on land. Without going into a description of Mr. Beardslee's invention, which supersedes the galvanic battery as well for the transmission of messages as for the explosion of mines or magazines, at any distance, either on land or under water, and sunk at any depth, it may be stated that the magneto-electric apparatus, requiring no acids or plates, is carried in a small box, as portable as a writing-desk; it may be worked very easily upon an open telegraph wire on land, or a wire in the water, insulated by a coating of vulcanized india-rubber. In August, 1864, when Mr. Beardslee's apparatus was experimentally applied to the ordinary line of telegraph wire between New York and Washington, a charge of gunpowder at Washington was fired in an instant by the operators at New York, and vice versa, at a distance of 240 miles; whereas in former experiments of this sort with Grove's galvanic battery, the combined power of no less than 150 pairs was required to ignite powder by means of burning a platinum wire, at Baltimore, 40 miles from Washington.



The exhibition which took place in the River Medway, recently, in the presence of the Duke of Somerset, First Lord of the Admiralty; Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Talbot, commanding the squadron at the Nore; Captain Stewart, the superintendent of Chatham dockyard; Sir Robert Walpole, commander of the garrison; Col. Boxer, and other professional or scientific gentlemen, fully maintained the reputation of the American torpedos. Mr. Beardslee himself had been busied for a week before in making his preparations at Chatham; and on the Saturday previous to this exhibition he had sunk a torpedo charged with 1400lbs. of powder, at the mouth of Gillingham Point, at the entrance to Chatham Harbor. The depth of water at high tide was 36 feet, and the place was marked by a pole bearing a red flag; the wire attached to the torpedo was kept by a boat on the surface. A boat's crew was dispatched from the operator's barge to establish electrical communication with the sunken shell, which was to be fired through a length of two miles of wire. This preliminary completed, and the train all ready for firing, in an instant there rose from the placid bosom of the river high into the air a huge column of water, in shape and action much resembling those great waterspouts occasionally witnessed by sailors in mid-ocean, and to which, though very beautiful to look upon, they do their best to give a wide berth. The splendid volumes of snow-white, feathery spray soared quickly to a height of little less than 300 ft., and then fell gently again in exquisitely graceful curves into the vortex whence they had risen, leaving no trace of themselves behind, save a slowly-expanding circle of bubbling, foaming water, the muddy, yeasty aspect of which showed that the river had been stirred to its lowest depths.

The explosion of the next torpedo—also a 440-pounder, but suspended two feet below the surface—produced effects but slightly differing from those just described.

Preparations were now made for destroying the Terpsichore, 18-gun sailing-brigsie, which had been placed at the disposal of Mr. Beardslee by the Admiralty in order to put the destructive powers of the torpedo to the most practical test. Although a torpedo charged with only 50lbs. of powder would, according to Mr. Beardslee's statement, be more than sufficient to destroy a vessel of the size of the Terpsichore, he had proposed, with a view of obtaining the fullest possible effects, to use a full charge of 440lbs. in the torpedo sufficient, it may be remarked, to destroy the largest vessel in the British navy. It was, however, considered, that as themselves a force brought to bear on so comparatively small an object would be attended with results not contemplated; and accordingly a couple of 75-lb. torpedos were taken, in the small boat, close alongside the Terpsichore, and then sunk, being just let down from the side of the boat. As the tide was running very strong but one of the two torpedos lodged at its proper place, so as to have the ship within reach of the explosion; the other, being carried aside as much as 10 feet or 12 feet, could have no material effect. The boat with Mr. Beardslee and his men drew off a short distance; then, after a momentary pause, came the stifled report of both the torpedos at once, and the Terpsichore suddenly rose at her bows 10 feet or 12 feet into the air and heeled over on her starboard side, while great masses of water burst up through her decks, her whole frame being convulsed and heaving as with agony, till she began to settle down forwards. In another moment her stern stood up at an acute angle, and her bow sank deeper and deeper. No 4 foremast, however, of her timbers was seen to be detached from the rest of her hull, not a splinter had been shot up into the air or had fallen off into the water, and she appeared to be going down bodily. The mischief she had received would seem to be a broken back; for she still continued to go down by the head, until, in about five minutes from her first movement, she lay fast aground in the Medway mud on an even keel, with the tide, now at three-quarters ebb, up to within a few inches of her portholes. There was not then enough water entirely to cover her. Even had the explosion not sunk her, the tremendous shock she sustained would have rendered her useless, while steam-ides of the ehock may be formed from the circumstance of the whole of the iron knees on the port side, which carry the upper deck-beams, being wrenched and broken off. The frigate has been inspected by a large number of persons, including several of the officers of the Royal Engineers.

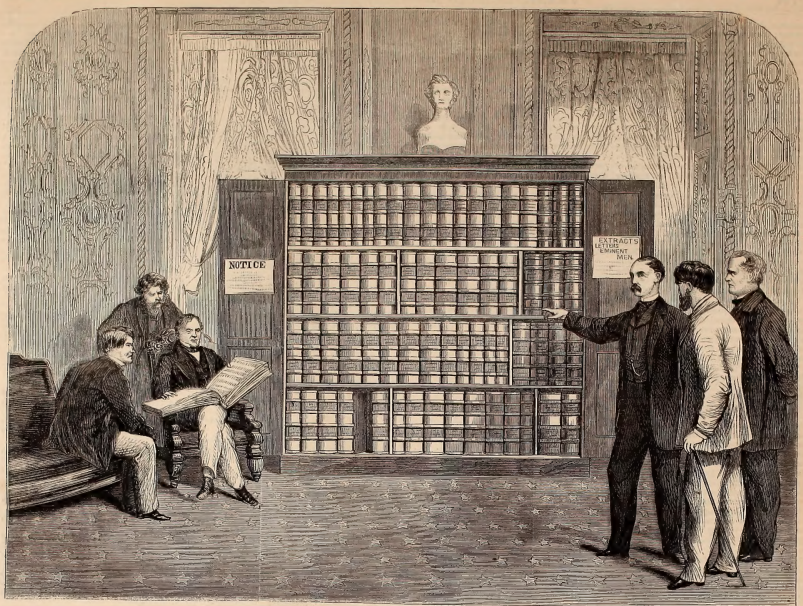
EXPERIMENTS WITH TORPEDO SHELLS—EXPLOSION OF A 440-POUNDER.

EXPERIMENTS WITH TORP..DO SHELLS AT CHATHAM, ENGLAND—BLOWING UP OF THE TERPSICHORE BY A 75-POUNDER.

A CHINESE STORY.—There were two short-sighted men who were disputing as to which of them could see best; and as they heard there was to be a tablet erected at the gate of a neighboring temple, they determined they would visit it together on a given day, and put the visual organs of each other to the test. But each desiring to take advantage of the other, Ching went immediately to the temple, and looking quite close to the tablet saw an inscription with the words, "To the great man of the past and the future." Chang also went, trying yet closer, and in addition to the inscription "To the great man of the past and the future," read from smaller characters, "This tablet was raised by the family of Ling in honor of the great man." On the day appointed, standing at a distance from which neither could read, Ching exclaimed:

"The inscription is, 'To the great man of the past and the future.'"

"True," said Chang, "but you have left out part of the inscription which I can read, but you cannot, and which is written in small characters: 'Erected by the family of Ling in honor of the great man.'"



"There is no such inscription," said Ching.

"There is," said Chang.

So they waxed wroth, and after abusing one another, agreed to refer the matter to the high priest of the temple. He heard their story, and quickly said:

"Gentlemen, there is no tablet to read; it was taken into the interior of the temple yesterday."

HERE is the pithiest sermon ever preached:—Our ingress in life is naked and bare; our progress in life is trouble and care; our egress out of it we know not where; but doing well here, we shall do well there: I could not tell more by preaching a year.

MR. THOMAS S. TOWNSEND'S RECORD OF THE REBELLION, AT THE UNION LEAGUE ROOMS, UNION SQUARE, N. Y.

A REBEL FLAG OF TRUCE.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

"Let us bury our dead:
Since we may not of vantage or victory prate,
And our army, so grand in the onslaught of late,
All crippled, has shrunk to its trenches instead—
For the carnage was great:
Let us bury our dead.

"Let us bury our dead.
Oh, we thought to surprise you, as, panting and flushed,
From our works to assault you we valiantly rushed;
But you fought like the gods, till we faltered and fled;
And the earth, how it blushed!
Let us bury our dead."

So we bury our dead—
From the field, from the range and the crash of the gun,
From the kisses of love, from the face of the sun,
Oh, the silence they keep while we dig their last bed!
Lay them in, one by one—
So we bury our dead.

Fast we bury our dead;
All too scanty the time, let us work as we may:
For the foe burns for strife, and our ranks are at bay—
O'er the graves we are digging what legions will tread,
Swift and eager to slay,
Though we bury our dead.

See, we bury our dead!
Oh, they fought as the young and the dauntless will fight,
Who fancy their war is a war for the right.
Right or wrong, it was precious this blood they have shed,
Surely God will requite—
And we bury our dead.

Yes, we bury our dead:
If they erred as they fought, will He charge them with blame,
When their hearts beat aright, and the truth was their aim?
Nay, never in vain has such offering bled—
North or South, 'tis the same—
Fast we bury our dead.

Thus we bury our dead.
Oh, ye men of the North, with your banner that waves
Far and wide o'er our South land, made rugged with graves,
Are ye verily right that so well ye have sped?
Were we wronging our slaves?
Well—we bury our dead!

Ah, we bury our dead:
And, granting you all you have claimed on the whole,
Are we spoiled of our birthright and stricken in soul,
To be spurned at Heaven's court, when its records are read?
Nay, expound not the scroll
Till we bury our dead!

Haste and bury our dead!
No time for revolving of right or of wrong;
We must ventage our souls with the rest of the throng,
And our God must be Judge, as he sits overhead,
Of the weak and the strong,
While we bury our dead.

THE PARTING.

Now peace to our dead!
Fair grow the sweet blossoms of Spring where they lie.
Hark! the musketry roars and the rifles reply;
Oh, the fight will be close and the carnage be dread!
To the ranks let us hie—
Who have peace but the dead?

THE DEATH OF ALFRED.

MARK RICHARDSON;

OR,

The Patriot's Trials.

A Legend of the Revolution.

BY L. A. WILMERE.

CHAPTER I.

THE first scene of our narrative opens with the view of a sandy highway, passing through a dark pine forest, in the State of South Carolina. The date of the story refers to that period in American history when the British had obtained possession of Charleston, and hoped that they would soon be able to secure the general submission of the State. It was a misty morning in October; the wind scarcely agitated the tops of the tall pines and faintly murmured among the thin foliage. As the country was sparsely settled, there were no signs of a human habitation—not even a fence—and, indeed, no object—except the faintly traced road—to show that man had hitherto visited the spot. A solitary horseman, seemingly as melancholy as the aspect of nature to that desolate place, proceeded slowly along the road—the horse appearing to choose his own pace—for, either in profound thought or deep dejection of spirits, the rider sat in the saddle with his head declined, and the reins hanging loosely about the neck of the quadruped.

And there was little in the appearance of this equestrian which could make an observer (had one been present), suspect that he labored under habitual low spirits. He was young, in the full enjoyment of easy health (as his countenance indicated), and his equipments were such as to make it very unlikely that penury had any share in the production of his disquietude. His figure and countenance, moreover, were such as would not lead one to suspect that he had been foiled in an affair of love. What then was the source of this young man's uneasiness? That is the problem which this narrative is intended to solve.

But neither horseman appears within the scope of vision. He is traveling the same way, but at a much more rapid pace. His manner is by no means dejected, but his dress does not accord with him of a strong suspicion of poverty, and his figure and countenance make it very probable that he would have been crowned in love, for there was not much in either which could be supposed to "take" well with the ladies. [This new traveler was a thin, small man, at least five-and-forty years old, with a long sallow visage, where even the expression of good-humor seemed to be cut of place; for a lean, spare, unhealthy-looking person is generally expected to wear a cheerful aspect. The coat worn by this traveler was, of course, gray cloth; the material was rather unsightly, but workmanship (to use a Scotch form of compliment), was "not bad." The garment fitted well, probably closer than the wearer's skin, for that is by far the most usual consequence, conscious, was most likely, loose enough. The beast which he bestrode was scarcely more respectable in appearance than the traveler himself, as he was a gaunt, bony, angular, ill-shaped steed, with that peculiar wildness of expression in the eyes, that strong vivacity, which semi-starvation imparts to most animals, and sometimes to the human species.

But, to have done with descriptions, which are often as tiresome to the writer as they are vexatious and tantalizing to the reader, the second horseman has overtaken the first, and a dialogue begins:

"A good morning to you, fellow-traveler," said the person last described. "I should have missed your company, if that fine house of yours had been put to his speed. But I am glad that no urgency of business on your part has prevented me from overtaking you—for society on this dreary road is almost a luxury."

"Sir, I thank you," said the other, somewhat drily, but slightly turning his head in the glance of the last speaker. "You remind me that my business is urgent, and I fear it will be necessary for me to travel faster, even if I should be compelled to forego the pleasure of your company, the offer of which I most gratefully acknowledge."

"Well, really," remarked the gray-coated traveler (who, as the reader will perceive hereafter, was not easily repulsed), "I judged from your pensive air that a companion might be desirable, if only for the purpose of conversation. Perhaps an older man than yourself might be able to help you with his experience—if there is anything in your present circumstances to make the suggestions of a friendly advisor acceptable."

There was something in the tone and substance of this speech which appealed to the sympathy and confidence of the younger traveler. He made a more accurate survey of his companion's countenance, and, after a short pause, said:

"You seem to have some perception of my embarrassments. The truth is, I have been debating in my own mind whether I may not honorably avoid a task which I cannot conscientiously perform."

"Do you imagine," said the older traveler, "that honor and conscience can oppose each other? that the former can require you to do what the latter tells you ought not to be done?"

"Nay—but having undertaken (not voluntarily to be sure), to perform a certain business, would I not be a breach of good faith—would it not be absolute treachery—to fail in the performance?"

"But will the person who has charged you with the commission were himself a traitor—"

"That must not be said to me," answered the young man somewhat fiercely.

The other smiled as the youth continued:

"Yet your suggestion is doubtless well meant, and, as loath as I am to confess it, it may be an approximation to the truth."

"Then you cannot be bound in honor or conscience to comply with his requisition."

"You seem to be an honorable and judicious person," said the youth, "and I would gladly have your opinion; but if, instead of a stranger with whom I have had scarcely a ten minutes' conversation, you were an old and tried friend, it would hardly be right to intrust you with the embarrassing—the distressing—circumstances of my present situation. You may judge, however, in what extremity I stand when I assure you that, although my errand is hostile to the rebels, as they are called—I would rejoice to be intercepted and taken prisoner by them—yea, to be put to death, rather than execute this mission."

"You say well, sir, and I am happy to meet your wishes. You may be gratified sooner than you expect. Behold in me an officer of the patriot army, and, after the confession you have made, it becomes my duty to take you in charge. Consider yourself my prisoner."

"Stay, sir," replied the youth—surprised but, seemingly, not disconcerted or intimidated—"I have expressed my willingness to be captured, but it seems that my motives have not been well understood. If I am to be treated as an enemy it would be unmanly and base on my part to make a a quiet submission. You must conquer me before I yield myself a prisoner."

A momentary glow on the countenance of the officer menaced an angry reply, but he soon recovered his former composure and calmness, and answered with much deliberation and composure:

"Be assured, young man, that if I thought it necessary to use compulsion, I possess the means to make you perfectly tractable, but the words you lately uttered, make me hope that force will not be required to restrain you from a traitorous enterprise."

"That is all very true, sir, but for my own satisfaction, I would wish it to appear that there is some necessity for yielding."

"And so there is, sir," answered the American officer.

"What! to a single man? You are no match for me in physical strength, and I am as well armed, perhaps, as yourself."

"You may deceive yourself in both of these particulars. In a personal contest I have proved myself too much for a stronger man than you, and I am armed far better than you can be."

"How sir?"

"In the omnipotence of a just cause. But, that you may be assured that I am not better prepared for every emergency, know that I am thoroughly acquainted with the object of your journey; and know, further, that before you expressed a willingness to be captured, I had resolved to capture you at all hazards."

"And pray, sir, what is, or rather, what was, the object of my journey?"

"To convey intelligence to the enemy that a rebel force—as you may call it—was gathering in your neighborhood."

"And who, do you imagine, sent me with such a message?"

"Your father, sir; the loyal Mark Richardson, a zealous friend of King George."

"Well, sir, I find that you are prepared to estimate some of the difficulties of my case, and yet you know not all."

"I have understood for some time, Mr. Richardson, that you were loyal with a few country as well as to your father. I have reason to think that were it not for a stronger influence than filial affection, you would, ere this time, have arrayed yourself under the banner of the King, by which are the divinity you worship; I have seen that mortal beauty which is more the object of your adoration than liberty."

"You mistake, sir. I love Letitia as much as woman can be loved, and I know that to attach myself to your cause, is to abandon her. She, my betrothed, may leave me when I avow my disaffection to what she has been taught to consider the cause of law, justice, and virtue; she will look upon me as an outlaw, a bandit, a man disgraced, a wretch to be execrated, a criminal lost beyond the hope of redemption. Sir, sir, I have seen a more zealous royalist than mine; he would sacrifice his child with his own hand, rather than see her wedded to a rebel. Let your own heart proclaim me; I shall be driven from my home. My kindred will abhor me. All that can make life supportable will be taken from me. Yet, at the moment you overtook me, I had resolved to strike for liberty and my country."

"Your pardon, sir," said the officer, with emotion, "if this is too much. I cannot urge you to make such a sacrifice. As for your present undertaking, it is defended by no necessity. You cannot proceed farther than where yonder stream crosses the road. We have had timely intelligence of this movement, and have taken measures to disappoint those who are its objects. Your father will not be subjected to the indignity of capture by a single man, for not less than thirty armed soldiers will intercept you at the point I have designated. You are now within the range of their muskets, and I beg that you will suffer me to advance first, lest your suspicion should be such as your present occupation, rather than your feelings and principles, may be thought to deserve."

Richardson bowed, and, after spurring his horse to its best speed, proceeded towards the rivulet which had been pointed out as the place of ambuscade; and when the former came to the same spot, he was confronted by several men, who presented their guns and ordered him to surrender. It would have been madness to attempt flight. His disposition been ever so strong; so, with a smile of resignation or satisfaction, he dismounted and was led by the person who had been in charge of the stream, to an opening in the wood, where a party of sturdy yeomen, each provided with a gun, rifle, bowhorn, and other military equipments, were collected.

This little troop was not very warlike in its appearance, but its members, from the dress of the men consisted in its raggedness, and that peculiarity was common to both officers and privates. Some were sitting or lying asleep on the turf, others were cooking, some were furbishing their arms, some were casting bullets, and some were mending, or attempting to mend, their clothes, and this last-mentioned occupation seemed to be the most arduous of them all. The raiment of the poor fellows was in a most woeful and desperate condition.

Richardson's late companion came forward to greet him, which he did with much cordiality, and having welcomed him to what he facetiously called the "camp," he led him aside beyond the hearing of the men, and addressed him as follows:

"Mr. Richardson, I have gone through the formality of making you a prisoner. I now release you on parole, requiring of you merely to promise that you will not again attempt to convey information of our movements to the enemy. You must return to your family, at least for the present. Consider your position well; take a week for reflection; weigh in your mind all the consequences of the step you have professed your willingness to take, and if you find that your resolution holds its force, we will cheerfully receive you as a companion in our hardships and dangers, and a sharer in the glorious prize which we hope to obtain by them."

CHAPTER II.

MARK RICHARDSON, the father of the young man who has been recommended to the kind attention of our readers, was a wealthy landholder, residing a few miles from Charleston. Although a native of the soil, he was altogether in the British interest—in fact, a thorough-paced "tory." His wife and daughter, the latter a very amiable young lady of twenty, were strongly infected with the same principles, and the only son was as yet unsuspected of an hostility to the royal cause.

Early in the afternoon of the day with which this narrative commences, old Mr. Richardson entertained several guests, namely: a neighbor of his—Mr. Carville and his daughter, the incomparable Letitia, to whom some reference has already been made in the narrative. There was some excitement in the neighborhood, the residents of which, especially those of the wealthier classes, were almost all of the tory stamp; for it was understood—as the reader may have gathered from some part of the preceding narrative—that a patriot force was in the vicinity. This force, brought in small parties from Carolina to their spring people, for several reasons: they knew that the "rebels" were daring in the highest degree, that they were much exasperated against the royalists, and that the party which was now in their midst, was commanded by that bold and active partisan, Marion—a man whose name was as terrific to the souls of these tories as the name of Cœur de Lion was to the usurping Moslems.

The persons convened at the house of Mr. Richardson were engaged in earnest and anxious conversation, the dictates of partial rage had already been experienced by some of their neighbors; barns and dwellings had been burned—not by the party under General Marion, however—and the fears of the mischievous to the champions of liberty had been put to death—a fate, which, in numerous cases, they had richly deserved.

In that region, the tories who were in arms for the king, often committed such atrocities on the patriots against the king as put the barbarities of the English themselves completely into the shade. Of course these recreant Americans expected to be harshly treated in their turn, should the patriots ever succeed in the full means of retaliation. Mr. Richardson, therefore, and his friend, Mr. Carville, together with their families, were in a painful state of anxiety, not knowing what moment they might be visited by the exasperated soldiers of freedom.

Old Richardson himself had, by luxurious diet and easy and indolent habits of life, accumulated such a mass of flesh, that he felt himself equally unprepared for combat or for flight. Besides, his corpulent figure—to say nothing of its unwieldiness—was so remarkable, that he was known as the "fat tory" for fifty miles round, and as the surprise, upon the figure of an elephant or a hippopotamus, would have answered his purpose—should he strive to evade pursuit in that way.

For several days he had not ventured out of his house, being apprehensive that some patriot bullet might find its way into his body, which, indeed, he had a sort of fear might exceed the most inexperienced marksman could scarcely have failed to hit. His neighbor, Mr. Carville—though a gentleman of much more confidence in battle or celerity in retreat, remembered, with the compunction of fear, if not with that of remorse, that he had taken part with British provisions and rendered them other essential services, which were doubtless remembered to his disadvantage by his Whig countrymen.

The two arrogant, yet unmanned men, Richardson and Carville that, until the danger was over, Carville and his daughter Letitia—the only surviving members of his family—should, with their servant, should take up their residence in Richardson's house, the object being to concentrate their means of defence. As the two gentlemen had mutually pledged themselves to stand by each other in a case of extremity; and, as Richardson could not have been suspected of any overt acts to the dwelling of Carville, Richardson's home was made a fortification, and the adherents of both these worthies were called to the same place. The windows were boarded up on the outside, and the doors were secured with every imaginable fastening—arms and ammunition were provided, and the premises were assailed for a long siege. While these defensive preparations were in progress, Richardson dispatched his son (as the reader remembers) to the headquarters of Colonel Tarleton, to procure aid, and to notify the British commander that a rebel force was gathered in that neighborhood.

It was now time that young Richardson should return, and his arrival was anxiously expected at the house of his father and Carville. His approach, at last, was observed through the loop-holes which had been left for the purpose of observation, and which, for fear of suspicion when occasion required; and, soon after, he entered the room where the two families were convened.

"Well, my son," cried old Richardson, "have you seen the colonel? Will he be here soon? or what does he advise us to do?"

"I have not seen him, sir," said Alfred, in answer to those three questions.

"Not seen him!" The old fellow's countenance looked as blank as it was possible for such a round, fat face to look. But, perceiving that Alfred was about to explain the cause of his failure, he threw himself back in his seat with a grunt of dissatisfaction, and waited for the disclosure.

"I have been taken prisoner by the patriots under command of General Marion, and liberated on the assurance that I would not attempt to convey intelligence to the royal troops."

"Patriots! — General Marion! — whew!" exclaimed the old tory, indignantly. "Why do you persist in calling the rebels patriots? and why is the title of general profaned on that skulking ruffian, Marion? But, Alfred, I have recorded a letter which will delight you, I am sure; it encloses a lieutenant's commission for you in his majesty's service. You can come on your commission as soon as you please, and now there is a fine chance to display your courage in defence of your friends."

To the amazement of every one present, Alfred showed no signs of joy at this announcement. He stood silent for a few moments, and then made answer:

"I cannot accept this commission, sir, because I have no wish to be a soldier in the royal army."

Old Richardson made a convulsive attempt to start to his feet, but the ponderosity of his fleshy tabernacle kept him confined to a sitting posture, almost as effectually as if he had been screwed to his chair.

"How, sir!" cried he. "Do I understand you to say that you have no wish to enter the service of his gracious majesty, King George?"

"That is my meaning, sir," answered Alfred.

"Did I think it possible that you were a coward I roared old Richardson. "I'll be sworn that you are no son of mine. Get you gone from my presence!"

"I am not a coward!" said Alfred, with a glowing cheek and a flashing eye, "but I have conscientious scruples which will prevent me from fighting under the royal standard."

"Scruples, you poltroon! But, no matter. I will go myself. I will serve my royal master in my own person, and I thought I had a son, but no matter. Give me my boots, Pompey. Off with you, you craven-hearted varlet, and let me see your cowardly face no more in my house."

"What upon earth ?" cried Alfred's mother, whom the noise of her husband's exclamations had aroused from the room. "Where do you think of going, Mr. Richardson ?"

"Ah, madam! here's a fine piece of work," cried the irritated senior. "I'le that my son, Mrs. Richardson ?"

"What do you mean, sir?" answered the lady, very indignantly.

"Oh, no offence, madam. He's a coward—that's all. He refuses to fight for his king. He refuses a commission in the flying artillery, and honor compels me to turn him out of doors."

"You in the flying artillery!" scornfully remarked Mrs. Richardson. "Are you beside yourself? Send your letter be able to crawl before you think of flying."

In the meanwhile, Pompey, the colored servant, had arrived with a pair of boots, which, some years previous, might have been worn by his master, but it was ludicrous enough to compare their dimensions with the present dilated condition of Mr. Richardson's feet and legs. However, the resolute old fellow seized one of the boots, and, with Pompey's assistance, succeeded in getting his five toes into the top of it; but, all his tugging, and Pompey's pushing, could effect no more; and, after several severe struggles, which seemed to be in earnest, Mr. Richardson was compelled to abandon the enterprize. The strapp gave way with a snap, and the old man fell back in his chair, panting for breath. Mrs. Richardson stood watching the experiment with a sarcastic smile, ordered Pompey to take the boots away, and when order was restored to have spoken:

"Really, Mr. Richardson, the growth of your intellect does not seem to keep pace with the enlargement of your body. You think of joining the army, I fear, but, pray, what is the cause of all this commotion ?"

Her lord scowled at her, but made no answer, and turning to Mr. Carville, as if expecting him to give the desired information.

"I must confess, madam," remarked Carville, "that I am as much surprised as you believe that he is serious. To refuse a commission in his majesty's service at such a time as this! It is a most unaccountable conduct."

"He has no flesh or blood of mine," growled old Richardson.

"You may spare him a little of your flesh, and not feel the loss of it," said Mrs. Richardson.

"I have resolved," said Alfred, firmly, "to give my reasons for my conduct to my father, mother, Mr Carville and Letitia, I consider that each of you is entitled to the explanation I am about to make. I have weighed all consequences, and have counted the pain I may give you—I have sorrowed to think of the change of feeling towards me which this disclosure may produce, but I consider that in my part would be base, were it possible. Know, then, at once, that my affections are with the patriot cause. I love my countries, and cannot draw my country harassed by foreigners without desiring to strike a blow in her behalf. I have this day enlisted in the service of liberty, and I have the authority of General Marion for saying that if you, father, and Mr. Carville, will no longer take any part with the British, you will be protected in person and property."

A dead silence prevailed in the room for some minutes. Alfred's declaration fairly stupified the whole party, and the father and the mother looked sat staring at the youth, as if they had recognized him as a visible appearance of the arch enemy. Mrs. Richardson was inexpressibly shocked and dismayed, and Letitia, with clasped hands, and a countenance full of fear and agony, awaited the issue of this most unexpected scene. Carville first broke the silence:

"After the declaration you have made, sir, I propose it is necessary to tell you in plain language with my family is out of the question."

"Call in the servants and have the villain secured," cried old Richardson. "As I hope for bliss, he shall this night be dead-livered up to Colonel Tarleton, with a request from me to make an example of him. I will have no traitor in my family."

"Sir," said Alfred, "it is not my intention to remain here; and your servants know me too well to attempt to bar my way when I wish to go. I take my leave of you all, hoping the time may come when your own conscience and mine will appear to you in a different light."

"Stop him! Knock him down, Carville! Make sure of him, dead or alive!" cried Richardson.

But Carville evidently did not relish this undertaking. He rose to his feet, however, but meeting the determined look of Alfred's eye, he sunk back, and the young man left the room without molestation. Who shall describe or imagine the bitterness of that moment to the exile from home, kindred, the object of his love, from all that could be consolatory to the soul of man, except the hope of liberty and the proud consciousness of fulfilling a sacred duty? Here was all the comfort that remained to Alfred in this dark hour of adversity, but he felt himself well sustained!

Before he had proceeded many paces from the outer door of the dwelling, he heard himself called, and, on turning, beheld his mother and Letitia making eloquent gestures to him, as if to entreat him to return. He hesitated, they advanced towards him, and he met them half-way.

"My son," said Mrs. Richardson, the tears streaming down her venerable cheeks, "have I ever given you such mortal offence that you should seek to murder me in my old age?"

"No, my dear mother," answered Alfred, deeply affected, "you have been the kindest and best of parents. I murder you! As heaven is my judge, I would die this moment to save you from the slightest annoyance."

"Then go back with us, and let this sad affair be arranged by receiving yourself to your father. Now that the first burst of anger is over, he is overwhelmed with grief, and will forgive everything."

"Mother," answered Alfred, "I have done nothing of which I should repent. I have not committed a fault, and of course I have no forgiveness to ask."

"Oh, Alfred, under what infatuation do you labor? Is rebellion no fault? Do you speak treason and purpose to commit it, and yet say that there is no room for repentance? Do you contribute the lives, and perhaps hasten the death of your parents, and easily find a justification for your acts? And you break the heart of this poor girl, your betrothed wife, to gratify a romantic and guilty phantasy? Will you make yourself the tool and instrument of these heathen men, who have brought all the horrors of war to our doors, and who are, at this very moment, panting for the blood of their friends? Will you abandon those who love you to follow in the footsteps of that cruel, blood-stained monster, whom you call General Washington?"

"Oh, mother, how little do you know of that man," answered Alfred, "and how much you wrong him. It is by his influence that I am not now a bloody corpse. I was detected, this morning, in an act which, by the laws of war, would have justified him in putting me to death. They who were to be my executioners were posted on the road, a short distance before me, and my death would have been quite certain, had not that good man, being advised of my approach, met me on the way, made me acquainted with my danger, and preserved me thus."

"Ah, my son, your life was saved in vain, if you persist in the resolution to join yourself to these rebels. Your life is as much lost to us as if you were dead; the difference is that we may more be deprived of the consolation which we might have felt, had you perished this morning—the consolation of believing that you died worthy of our love. But I cannot believe that you, my son, who never disobeyed a command of mine, will now be deaf to my prayers. You will go back with us?"

"For my sake, dear Alfred ?" said Letitia, laying a trembling hand on his arm.

"Would I attempt me to do that which would make me despise myself through life?" said Alfred. "Could you prevail on me to act falsely towards my country, assure yourselves that I would not live to hear the merited scorn of all good men, and the reproaches of my own conscience."

"You have deceived me, Alfred—cruelly deceived me," said Letitia. "You professed to love me."

"May heaven visit me with its severest judgments if I deceived you in that point. Nothing of earth do I love better, except——"

"Except?"

"My country."

At this moment, while each of the ladies held an arm of the young patriot, and were using all their powers of persuasion to induce him to return to his home, to be happy in the affections of his family and of his affianced bride, the sound of horsemen suddenly appeared in sight. They were the British dragoons, and, as they drew near, the leader was recognized as Captain Carville, by his apprehensions now seized on the minds of Mrs. Richardson and Letitia; they saw the peril in which Alfred stood if his intentions should become known to the severe and ferocious English officer. Both ladies, therefore, besought the son and lover to depart instantly, if he could not make up his mind to go back with them. But there was something in the idea of a precipitate withdrawal which the high-spirited young man could not brook. He, therefore, kept his place until Tarleton and his followers rode up and politely saluted them.

"Mr. Richardson," said he to Alfred, "we hoped to have had you among us before this time. You have received your commission, I suppose?"

"My father has received it," answered Alfred, in a tone almost as supercilious as that of the commander himself.

Tarleton was surprised at the cool and haughty deportment of the youth, so little was he accustomed to meet with such behavior from those with whom he conversed, for the uncertain and tyrannical disposition of the man made him an object of general terror. Mrs. Richardson perceived, from the haughty glance of Tarleton, that a storm was about to burst forth, and the manner of Alfred, his look of proud defiance, was calculated to invite that storm rather than appease it; she, therefore, called off Colonel Tarleton's attention by giving him an account of the hostile movements of the "rebels" in the neighborhood.

The colonel dismounted, threw his bridle to an attendant, and, offering each of the ladies an arm, proceeded with the utmost gallantry towards the house, while Alfred, who saw that the servants of the ladies took back with countenances full of sorrow; but even this little mute appeal was lost on the steadfast soul of the youthful patriot. He turned away in deep distress of mind, it is true (and who shall blame him for feeling like a man while he acted like a hero?), and in a few moments he was tracing on foot the same road which he had traveled that morning on horseback, but in a very different mode of travel being aptly figurative of his reverse of fortune. And what a reverse was that to have happened within twenty hours! In the forenoon of that day he was heir apparent of a princely estate, he was the cherished object of parental affection, and his future was irradiated by the bright beams of successful love. In the next day forth loaded with a father's curse, disowned, destitute of worldly wealth, stigmatized as infamous by his own relatives, and, what was still, to his last Letitia, and with that forfeiture alone he had remembered every hope of earthly happiness. Yet Alfred Richardson was not subdued by misfortune, and never for one moment did he regret the election he had made. He who was not sufficiently selfish to weigh his own private interests with the public welfare, and the consciousness of the vast sacrifices he made inspired him with the feelings and determination of a martyr.

As he walked with a firm step along the sandy road, towards the patriot's place of rendezvous, and where he had proceeded about two miles, he heard the galloping of horses was heard behind him. He then discovered that six or eight British troopers were coming after him at full speed. The supposee could not be mistaken; Tarleton had been made acquainted with his delinquency, and these men had been sent in pursuit. Possibly, by hesitating himself to the woods, which, on account of their density, were impracticable for horsemen, he might have escaped; but he was too brave, and retreat was perhaps the last expedient which he would have occurred to him. He determined to stand his ground, and scarcely had he time to draw his pistols when the troopers were surrounded by the Englishmen, who, with broadsword in hand, claimed him as their prisoner. At this crisis a piece of flame burst from the thick foliage on the side of the road, and Tarleton fell on the Britons fell. In the next moment twenty or thirty "rebels" were at work underwood, and the remaining royalists wheeled round with the hope of escaping, but not one of them was so fortunate. They were all brought to the ground by the American musket balls. General Marion, to whose vigilance Alfred owed his rescue, came forward and gave the youth his hand.

"The die is cast," said Alfred. "I am already denounced as a traitor to the royal cause; and, but for your timely assistance, I might now be died a traitor's death. Let me have a musket, General Marion, and command my services as you please."

THE RICH AND POOR OF NEW YORK.

THE pictures on our middle pages tell their own story more eloquently than words. They are two living transcripts from the moving panorama of the day.

The people of the country can hardly realize the marked distinction in classes that exists in the town. In the country the poor man receives with the rich on an equal basis in most cases, only except those where the one party has made money rapidly in trade, or by some means by which the other has not succeeded or overthrown. But in the city, the classes are so distinctly severed that the one party, as it were, in different worlds.

No city in the world offers such opportunities for rich, than New York, or less to the poor. The rich can gratify all the pleasures and luxuries which mankind can afford; every luxury, every privacy in their enjoyment, and every style of society to enjoy them with. Its streets are admirably laid out, and kept clean and brilliant in the world, and its salons, both private and public, conducted more elegantly than in any other city where. The stores display the most costly goods, and it is a proverb in Europe among the importers, that the most expensive, and the most beautiful merchandise shall come to this country. How far the extravagancies of New York are the result of our millionaires, can only be realized by actual contact with their splendors.

In their homes—do not let us be understood as meaning the fashionable houses alone—we enjoy all the approximations. It is not the only drain upon the proprietor-families that he supports a magnificent house upon Fifth Avenue or Madison Square, with a host of servants outside matters connected with it, such as carriages and horses for every day, for his wife, a pony chaise or miss, the just budding daughter, that they may appear well in the Park, to say nothing of saddle horses for the heir of the house, and a drag for the boys. Now he must be weather through the summer, and appear at Newport and Saratoga. Then there is the opera and the theatre, unless, as one New Yorker recently made answer to us, he chooses to build a theatre of his own. There are balls, dinners, and evening parties in the season; dinner parties, with from ten to a hundred covers, given at home, at Delmonico's, the Maison Dorée, and elsewhere; and last, though not least, there is shopping at Stewart's, Lord & Taylor's, Legrain's, and such other occasional places, where really a lady could not expect to get anything to wear short of a morning's bill of two or three thousand dollars. All money may be the root of all evil, but it is a mighty pleasant commodity for the New York market.

On the other hand, for the poor man who wishes to hide his poverty, New York is one of the best of places. There, he may dwell in a house next door which he has his dinner or not, not care whether he wears broadcloth or fustian.

The poor of New York go on in their regular routine; the working poor by rising before daylight and toiling until the lamps are lit; the loafing poor by sleeping as long as they please in out-of-the-way places, at all sorts of hours, and rising to support lamp-posts at the corners of streets, or keep seats in drinking shops from growing cold.

Oh! the unwritten history of the poor. Who shall tell the bitterness of their lot? Who shall trace their pleasure, how many more have the poor. How many thousands are there in our lanes and alleys, who have never in all their lives been a day's journey to ago, know what it is to have as much money in their possession as a rich person spends in a day's pleasure—who have never known a comfortable meal, or bed for every day, and how many thousands who rise morning after morning by rote, and knowing where the food that is to keep them that day from starvation is to come from. Stone walls!

There are families crowding in back yards and in cellars, where they are bringing up children and living in the utmost misery. The head of the house goes away, perhaps to labor, or perhaps to forage about town for what he can pick up, honestly or dishonestly, and the family are left to their own devices, drinking slop, or in a low dance house. The wife, having performed her untrendy duties of feeding the hogs—the children are left to feed themselves as best they can—sallies forth, possibly to wash or scrub for some wealthier neighbor, or, perhaps, engages in the same occupation as her husband, perhaps with a bag and hook to rake garbage from the gutters, or dive deep into the mysterious depths of ash-barrels, to sort with one or more other members of the family on a street corner, and await the charity of passers-by. The better grown members of the family distribute themselves over various localities in the shape of beggars, bootblacks, crossing-sweepers, hawkers of matches, shades, and dog-collars, hurdy-gurdy and fiddle operators, or any other of the inferior ways by which they may gather a few shillings.

And then there comes another class of the poor of New York, the strangers, who, arriving, begin upon a precarious living by precarious and ill-paid labor. The poor seamstress, who puts together shirts at six cents each, and finds that she can only command workings for half-a-dollar a day, looking forward to some day when by economy or overworking nerves they may escape from their bondage. And then comes the laborer, who, upon his dollar and a half per diem, supports a family of a wife and six or seven children, with perhaps an aged mother, until some day there comes sickness, and he can no longer pay rent. Then comes the landlord, and in a single moment he ejects him and his few wretched sticks from the place he has been wont to call home, and which he has toiled for the laws that will not permit him to sell them!

And so goes the rich and poor of New York. One class in splendor and luxury, the other reaping its individual cases, where it lands the debris either under the municipal charities of Greenwood, or in the half-dug hole, unmarked, of Potter's Field.

GHOSTS IN THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

IN the United States we often hear of a haunted house; but in the Ionian Islands there is a prevailing belief among the lower orders that every house is visited by an Ombra della Casa (spectre of the house), which appears to no more than one. They have many curious ideas concerning these ombre, which never appear to foreigners—a peculiarity the native says they could not account for. The belief is very credulous as to the belief of the people in these stories, but could upon them no attempts to impose upon and deceive us. We, however, have so many similar cases from independent sources, that we could not but come to the conclusion that there is a wide-spread belief in the existence of these spectres. The following are fair samples, and exhibit a curious phase in the superstitions of the Ionian mind. The first was related by a servant in our family, who declared she was an eyewitness of the circumstances. A Greek lady, in whose service she was at the time, occupied the attic floor of a house, had only been a few days in a house to which she and her family had removed from the country, and where her child. It was about 10 o'clock at night. The lady was seated nursing her infant, and the servant near her at work. The door was open, and the lamp burning. They were suddenly startled by a loud knocking at the door, and, in a moment, strange, thrums entered, dressed like Albanians, and accompanied by a man. One of them seized the infant and dashed it upon the floor, injuring it so that the child did not utter a cry, and the servant thought it was dead. The lady was too frightened to do anything but scream. The servant ran down stairs, and the other servants were too much alarmed to come. One of the female ombre picked up the child, and all the three ombre and the man here that were there on the fire to boil, and when the latter brought them in the woman seized the vessel, and thrown it upon the child. The child died. The Greeks make much use of earthenware vessels for culinary purposes, and not of metal saucepans. The strange visitants then vanished. The servant declared that those who see them have no mind to acknowledge it, or to give any information as to what they have done to them, as they appear to live in the same house; the belief being that the ombre will do them harm upon those who so. The husband came home and found his wife in a state of frenzy, and quite from fright and the loss of her child. He naturally inquired as to the cause. The child was found to be cold and dead. "Nothing, nothing!" But feeling convinced that something had occurred, he searched the house, and found in the house upon the next occasion of his absence. A few days afterwards, the child's body was there, the ombre paid them another visit at the same hour, and in the same manner. They attacked her, threw her down, and gave her a black eye; stopped her mouth, that she might not scream; but as soon as she could not remain longer in the place. The husband slept in the house, but did not remain sleep any longer, whatever might be the fear of the ombre, seeing that they sometimes left their sweetmeats behind. The husband would not place any faith in his wife's statements, and thought her mad. However, the ombre did not forget her having told upon them, for the following evening they so ill-treated her that she would not remain any longer in the house. They went to another part of the town, and the servant, thinking they were now clear of the dreaded ombre, returned, and went with them to their new abode. Her first night of the change the servant and her mistress were sitting together, when they walked a woman, by her dress of Albanian peasant. She went round the room, examining and admiring the furniture, and ever and anon she would shout, saying of one thing after another:

"Ah, that's very pretty; I should like that very much."

She then went to the lady, saying:

"How do you do, my dear? Is that your baby? Do not be frightened, I will not hurt you."

She also repeated her visit every evening, and, upon one occasion, took up a book and began to read. Upon a subsequent visit she addressed the lady, saying:

"I think you are afraid of me;" to which the former replied:

"Oh, no."

"Then," she then said:

"But I believe that girl is," which was the fact, for she was in a paroxysm of fear during the whole visit.

This lady was remarkably unfortunate in respect to the way in which she furnished her house, as it was made their appearance. Those who believe in these things say that this is attributed much to the visitations, and we are assured that few would recognize in the following anecdote an individual, a former Sultan of the place. Concerning the ombre that frequented the flat or floor of the house, the writer was engaged in Corfu, it is stated that while the house was building, one of the workmen had fallen from about five or six feet, and was killed on the spot. He was amazed and terrified to see an Albanian sitting on the floor, smoking a pipe. The man went away, and kept the matter to himself. An unfortunate boy, of about 12 years, who had seen the ombre, went and told about it. Upon the next opportunity, the strange visitor stood him, and threatening him from a great height, either out of the window or down the stairs, killed him. Upon an occasion, in Zante, one of my children was seized with an hysterical fit at night. The cause of the attack he must have seen the ombre of the house, a black man in chains. From the last two facts it is quite clear that these superstitions arise from ignorant people ascribing to supernatural causes the ordinary occidents of life, but the most singular part is their positive assertion that they see these phantoms, and that they will not allow themselves to the foreigners, except, perhaps, to children.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

IN the obituary column of the New York Times is a notice of the death of a lady, which says of her:

"Her superiors were few:
Her equals none."

This remarkable woman died of jaundice, and was "universally lamented."

A NEWSPAPER recently informed the public that the hands of Mr. Jones's machine shop had struck. Struck indeed! on the next day denying it, as they had not struck a stroke for a week.

"COME TIL America, Pat!" writes a son of the Emerald Isle to his friend in Ireland; "'tis a fine country to get a living in. All ye have to do is to get a good comfortable well established boss, and buy till the top of a three story building, and the man at the door will do the rest."

PETERSON, the comedian, lent a brother actor two shillings, and when he made a demand for the same, the borrower replied, "Peter, I owe you nothing."

"Hang it! I'll pay you to-day in some shape or other."

Peterson good-humoredly replied:

"Then I shall remain indebted to you, Tom, let it be as like two shillings as you can."

THE last invention of India rubber in Paris, is a fair imitation of the female—hair, teeth, and a perfect imitation of flesh and blood, and (as they say of good comedy) will withstand the severest test. These "made to palpitate" are sold at a high figure.

A MAN in London, by suit at law, recovered one hundred pounds from a druggist who prescribed that his wife should take a dose of laudanum, and administered hydrate. The man fell sick, sued and recovered as above.

COLERIDGE was acknowledged to be a bad driver. One day, riding through the streets he was accosted by a would-be wit:

"I say, do you know what happened to Balaam?"

"Yes," said Coleridge, "I know all about it.

"The same as happened to me. An ass spoke to him."

"You do wrong to fish on Sunday," said a clergyman to a lad he saw so doing.

"Indeed, sir," replied the boy, "it can't be much harm, for I ain't colored nothing."

DONIZETTI, when was at a party, when the Turk guns announced the birth of a prince.

"What they do powder these babies!" exclaimed Jerrold.

CURRAN, on one occasion, was employed on behalf of a man in a case of assault. The plaintiff had called the defendant some ugly names, and thrashed him. The defendant had taken the law into his own hands, and had given the plaintiff a sound beating, to the great terror of any palliating circumstances. The plaintiff had been struck by the defendant. The evidence having been given, the defendant had no right to strike and to take the law in his own hands.

"Mr. Curran," said the Judge, "if a man met you in the street, and struck you a wounded blow in the face, what would you do?"

"Why, my lord, I do?" said Curran. "Bedad, I'd knock him down as flat as a pancake!"

It was almost unnecessary to say that the plaintiff lost his case.

THE WRONG END.—The Northern Railroad of the north of Ireland, which runs from Belfast to Ballymena, is rather a slow affair, having to stop every few miles for passengers, and then to take up an old lady with her bandbox, or to put down some fellow who has been drinking at the last station. The bits and cock sparrows. The passengers grumble a little, but they know that it is all one to the engine-driver bound to respect. The other day, when the conductor was going round to the tickets, he found a tipsy barrow fast asleep, so he handed over the requisite paper.

"See here, young man, ain't you made a mistake?"

"Mistake!" said the lad, "I've never been nowhere."

"I think you here," said the other. "You've got the ticket with the wrong end. If you want to keep the cows from ketchin us, you'd better put it on behind."

A YOUNG fellow was taking a sleigh-ride with a pretty girl, when he met a Methodist minister who was accustomed to ask for "pay" from every hitch and knot at short notice. He stopped him, and asked humbly:

"Can you tie a knot for me?"

"Why, I suppose I can," said he; "I guess so; when do you want it done?"

"Well, sir," was the reply; "is it lawful though, here in the highway?"

"Why, yes," said the minister, "I see no harm in the church itself."

"Well, sir, I want a knot tied in my horse's tail to keep it out of the snow!" shouted the wicked wag, as he started off, fearing lest the minister, in his profane wrath, should tail him grace.

A COLORED preacher arose and announced from his text:

"In de fust plat ob Clover, and two hundred and nine-and-ninety others."

"Hold up, doctor!" shouted one of his hearers; "you've got us de wrong book—you mean de plat ob Timothy, I s'pose?"

The preacher hesitated with a very profound look, and said:

"Well, I must cave in dis time, though I knowed dat de text was somewhere among de grasses."

"MARY, is your master at home?"

"I don't believe it."

"I don't believe it."

"Well, then, he'll come down and tell you so himself. Perhaps you'll believe him."

THE RICH OF NEW YORK—HOW THEY LIVE.

THE POOR OF NEW YORK—HOW THEY STAY.

BREAKERS.

BY MILTON J. ROGERS.

Break the waves, O Time!
On this wounded heart of mine
Break, break, break!
May its sorrows all be thine.

Break, break, break!
And leave not a spot untried;
Thou canst not find the secret place
Where the golden mem'ries hide.

Thou art old, and yet so strong,
No mortal can withstand
The sweep of thy mighty arm,
Nor the touch of thy rusty hand.

I know thou wilt grapple my bones
As they lie in the silent grave;
But the soul—it belongs to God,
And He has promised to save.

Then storm against this heart,
'Tis ever a breaker of thine,
The things of earth are yours:
Eternal life is mine.

Yes, break, break, break!
Twill but wear the scars away—
But fit this heart for a happier home,
And the joys of a brighter day.

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXI.—HEROISM—OF A KIND.

We have seen how the peddler (alias Bob the Ostler), clung, in spite of his timidity of character and sneaking ways of action, to the burglars, under the dominant idea of resisting their attempt to "swindle" him out of what he considered a "fair" share of their plunder, and how he had managed to keep them from what was likely to prove the lion's share of the booty. And how he clung to his hiding-place in the blackberry bushes, while Sleuth and the groom and the horse were all in the greatest danger. Bob saw only the entire success of his scheme, and the necessity for confronting the action. Therefore, no matter how frightened Sleuth looked as he rose from the ground—no matter how Gibbs cursed and swore—no matter that the horse would most likely begin kicking, and be ruined for life, Bob surveyed the whole scene with heroic patience of soul, now that his man, Sleuth, was in no personal danger; and he quietly laughed to himself, as he said:

"How'll they get out of the mess, I wonder?"

Sleuth did at last decide the question, by venturing up to Gibbs, and giving his help, just where Gibbs directed; and at last the gig was brought back nearly to the place of the accident, not only because one wheel was there lying, but because Gibbs was determined to know how such a "queer" thing had happened.

We wish we could describe look as he reached the spot, and saw the treacherous nature of the hole which had done them so much damage, but after receiving the fullest satisfaction, he turned and looked up to Sleuth.

"See that, sir? Pretty game, ain't it?"

"Yes; what shall we do?"

Gibb's only reply was, "Look out, sir." He then looked suspiciously round to the trees and bushes on both sides of the road to which to certain movements visible among the bushes, showing the way taken in his retreat and flight by the hidden robber, who was, as they supposed, the character of the man who had done them this ugly trick, and who had been hiding among the foliage.

"I've winged him, sir," said Gibbs, exultingly.

"Yes, I think so," answered Sleuth.

Gibbs, after his victory, began to reload, saying to Sleuth:

"Capital thing, sir, allus to have a spare shot; no saying what may be done with it."

Gibbs looked at Sleuth as he said this, in a manner that made the latter flush and grow pale again.

"You don't know much about these things, sir, I suppose?" asked Gibbs, as he withdrew the ramrod from the barrel.

"Never handled a pistol or a gun, in all my life till—that night," said Sleuth, in reply.

"O course, sir; that's why you missed the robber, when you'd so much need to it 'im."

"Probably," said Sleuth.

"And did you reload then, sir?"

"No," said Sleuth, alarmed at his own agitation. "I'd be very sorry to learn you how to load and 'it your man," said Gibbs.

"Thank you; but at present, our business is to consider what's to be done."

"Very true, sir. I bin thinkin'. I often thinks best when I talks."

"Most people do, I fancy," said Sleuth, trying hard to smile.

"Ah! but I mean thinkin' about one thing whiles I talk about another."

"What do you propose?"

"Why, sir, that you take the horse and ride back to the inn; it's under two miles—"

"I can't ride," interposed Sleuth.

"Not for once?" asked Gibbs, insinuatingly.

"Not—not that horse," said Sleuth.

"Worry well, sir; then you stop with the gig."

"No, no! the robber may come back—if—if he is a robber."

"Give him this, sir," said Gibbs, holding out the pistol, with its butt end foremost.

Sleuth took the weapon, and though he didn't like the prospect, he saw there was nothing better to be done.

"Make haste, Gibbs!"

"I will, sir. And excuse the liberty, but don't be nervous, and fire in a 'urry, if you're attacked; wait till you can be sure to 'it—that's all, sir."

Gibbs went off, and Sleuth prepared himself for his solitary half hour, or hour, by walking to and fro at the tail of the gig.

How intently he listened! But a few minutes had elapsed when the blackberry-bushes opened, and a man came forward, with his head tied round with a red and yellow cotton handkerchief, and he faces the others.

Sleuth raises the pistol, but sees that the man, however terrible looking, is unarmed.

"Compliments of the season to you, Mister Sleuth," are his first words.

"You know me," he said.

"Ay, well as I know this," said the man, pointing to his ear, which had been cut by the bullet. "Tears I was a Red-Head," said Sleuth.

"No; you told him!"

"I didn't do anything of the sort.

"What's his name?"

"Gibbs."

"That'll do; I'll remember Mister Gibbs.

"But we (slang)—we (slang)—" began Sleuth.

"Thought what—that I was a footpad?"

"Y—yes."

"And how do you know I ain't?"

"If you are, look here," said Sleuth, showing his pistol.

The man laughed. Then he asked:

"You know me?"

"No."

"Didn't I tell you I'd made an appointment?"

"And you call this making an appointment, do you?" asked Sleuth.

"It isn't it bin well kept on both sides?" was the reply.

"When you are Bob the Ostler, but——"

"The man as talked to you in your bedroom a week ago."

"And, I suppose, the man who lamed the horse, and made this hole."

"Who's been a-spin-give way afore you came here?" asked the man in reply.

"Oh! you did that too?"

The man nodded, and Sleuth looked at him—turned away—and there was a pause and moments of silence on both sides.

"Hush!" suddenly whispered the man, listening.

"It's Gibbs returning."

"Gibbs!" repeated the man, with intense scorn. "Ain't you got hears, Mr. Sleuth? This one comes t'other way. There's two—stop! there's three. No, two—two."

"How vexatious, if we are interrupted!" exclaimed Sleuth.

"Don't you mind that. When I makes an appointment, I'm not the man to break it up afore I finish. You won't be able to open your eyes without a scene, so, you stop with will, or do what you like, till I have settled everythink; take your davit of that, Mr. Sleuth."

Sleuth's only reply is—

"Let's keep out of sight till the people pass."

They withdrew together into the bushes, and there, to Sleuth's wonder, he saw, coming along the road, Anthony and Clarissa.

"Confound it!" exclaimed Sleuth; "they will know the gig."

"Can't be helped, sir?" asked Bob, with lively interest. "Not the heir, surely, to all the alderman's wealth?"

"Yes; that—the present heir," assented Sleuth.

"What a meeting! I must have a look at him. Don't be afeared, Mister Sleuth; he shan't see us—least-ways not me."

Sleuth, now, kept very ugly—keep your head down, can't you?" muttered Sleuth, and then, with the approach of Anthony and the doctor's daughter, whom Sleuth thought had never looked so charming before.

CHAPTER XXXII.—HOW ANTHONY AND CLARISSA TAKE CARE OF THE OLD.

THEY were riding slowly, Anthony looking not in the best of tempers, Clarissa, either perfectly unconscious of the fact, or showing a gay, obstinate indifference concerning it.

It was the first time that Anthony had seen his fair neighbor since that morning when he had been sent into her room to tell her about Mr. Macguire's dangerous and somewhat sudden operation. All the first day he had stayed at home expecting the return of John Harris's casket, and feeling a gratification that it did not come. When the second day passed without any different result, he took it as a sure sign that Clarissa was waiting for it if he would not call and extract her still to keep it.

On the third day—the doctor came to ask Anthony to go for a ride with himself and Clarissa. Although his companions were both in excellent spirits, the ride threatened to be a very uninteresting one to Anthony, till the doctor recollected he ought to go to see a friend living on the Rimboldon Road. Owing to a long feud that had existed between this friend and Alderman Maude, the doctor could not very well have introduced Anthony to him; so, with many apologies, he requested him to ride on with Clarissa.

Anthony maintained a grim silence, half expecting that she might offer him some excuse about the casket. But Clarissa seemed to have forgotten it, and given herself up to the enjoyment of the evening. But he was determined not to be won to amiability by her evident desire for peace between them.

It was not long before Anthony's storm burst.

After repeated efforts to draw him from his ill-temper, Clarissa said:

"Mr. Maude, I am afraid we have persuaded you to accompany us this evening against your will?"

"If so," continued she, "why not go back now?"

"I am sorry, Miss Pompess, that—"

"Excuse me, Mr. Maude, but you have nothing to the world to apologize for. We ought to apologize to you."

"May I ask why?"

"For dragging you into our country recreations, forgetting how humdrum and clodishly they must seem to you."

"Miss Pompess!"

"Will you please go back, and leave me to join my father?"

"If you insist upon my doing so, of course, I have no choice; but, unless it comes to that, I shall stay till your father comes, however disagreeable my society may appear to you—I know it cannot be equal to that of a certain other gentleman, but—"

"I do not understand you," she said, haughtily.

"At the same time," he went on, "I must confess that, in this case, I think the gentleman's politeness to the lady might have given way a little to charity for the unhappy being against whom her raillery was directed."

Clarissa, at first, looked surprised and bewildered; then a pained look came on her face, which she tried to conceal by stooping and patting her horse's neck.

It was at this moment that they saw the gig. Anthony recognized it immediately, and viewed its broken and deserted state with blank astonishment.

"What in the world can have become of Dick?" he exclaimed.

"Your cousin was not alone, I hope?" said Clarissa.

"No—at least, Gibbs went to fetch him."

"Had we not better wait near, and watch it till he returns?" asked Clarissa.

The question excited a comment from an unmannerly person.

"Here's a pretty go!" remarked Bob to Sleuth, and in a voice so loud that the latter really began to fear he wanted to attract Anthony's attention. Fear always gave Sleuth courage, and fear now gave him more than courage—audacity.

"Bob," said he, whispering, "if you speak another word, I'll shoot you. I've caught the rogue, and then you may guess what'll follow."

Bob muttered something, but then became silent.

"I don't think it ought to be left like this," said Anthony, after a pause: "but, still, I don't like to interrupt you. Perhaps you would like me to go back with you as far as the Warren?"

"Thank you, you are very kind," answered Clarissa, "but I do not remember wish to go to the Warren. And more than that, Mr. Maude, I do not care to be accused of having treated a friend and neighbor so disgracefully, without demanding more explanation than you have chosen to give me, and an opportunity of offering explanation myself."

"You can only offer one excuse, Miss Pompess—that you thought me further off than I was."

"Before you take that excuse, we must please see what there is to excuse," said Clarissa.

Anthony, who had dismounted, and was examining the gig, merely bowed, and remained standing where he was, and for a minute or so both were silent. Clarissa shaded her eyes with her hand, and looked out of the side of the road as if hoping to see some cool spot, but there was none.

Anthony saw her look, and said:

"It is insufferably hot here. Will you dismount, and come under the trees?"

"How about the horses?" asked Clarissa.

"I can tie them," was the answer.

"Very well," said Clarissa; "fasten your own first."

But Anthony disobeyed, and came to assist her.

"Fasten your own first, please," repeated Clarissa.

He turned away, jerking Nell's bridle with no very gentle hand, and, by the time he had secured her to the tree, Clarissa stood beside him. While he fastened her rein, she stepped up to the little weedy bank, and walked slowly on into the wood.

"Well," said she, turning suddenly, "and pray, what may be this crime of which Mr. Robertson and myself stand convicted?"

"Or, rather," said Anthony, "what starting absurdity of mine could have endangered the soundness of Mr. Robertson's lungs? And you, too? I see the very recollection of it makes you smile."

"It does, indeed," answered Clarissa. "I understand it all now. You heard us laughing when other people, when you left us. Well, do you know, I cannot deny that you were the cause of our mirth."

"I thank you—it was easy for me to perceive that, considering I had but that instant left you."

"Well, and now let me tell you what it was, and you will see, if any one is to blame, it is your Mrs. Milton, whom I am sure you wouldn't believe harshly to on any account whatever. You must know she often goes to take tea with Mrs. Crose, Mr. Robertson's housekeeper. She went a few nights ago, and told her in strict confidence some doings of yours. Mrs. Crose, also in strict confidence, told Mr. Robertson, and Mr. Robertson told me. Can you not now guess what it was about?"

Anthony told her "No," and told himself he'd be hanged if he could.

"Well," said Clarissa, "it was about that poor little Esau and his washing; and—yes, I must confess—it all came out about your false alarm concerning the mare and the chase after the pony in the paddock, and all. But are you very much vexed that I know about it? I assure you that, when I think of the whole story, I do not feel only mirth. I have little patience with those people who, when a man does an act of kindness and generosity, shrug their shoulders, and wait in silence to see whether the object of his kindness turns out good or bad, and then, according to the result, proclaim that man wise and deep-seeing, or a fool. For my own part, I can rejoice over a good action, and say, 'that is good—that is noble!' without waiting to found my verdict on its result. If the good deed brings immediate gain to the doer, I am glad with him; but if he loses by it, I only say to myself, his losses have ennobled the deed; it is not what we gain, but what we lose by goodness that on earth makes us generous divine. But I declare I am positively preaching!"

"What a saint I should have been," said Anthony, "if I had always had such a preacher!"

"I doubt it," said Clarissa, laughing. "But tell me, are you satisfied about your supposed insult?"

"Satisfied, yes, and ready to own myself a most consummate——"

"Dunce, hush!" cried Clarissa, accepting his outstretched hand. "And now, are we friends again?"

"Not yet—not just yet," said Anthony, bending over her hand, and pressing his lips to the glove. "Your explanations, Clarissa, are so much to my satisfaction, that I would fain listen to them a little longer."

"But that I really have no more to offer," interposed Clarissa, laughingly, and trying to draw away her hand.

But Anthony held it resolutely.

"You have. You have to tell me what it was in my casket you wouldn't let me see."

"Indeed!" I was not aware of that," said Clarissa, coldly, and drawing back.

"You are—you must be aware of it. You made it a point of honor with me that I should not look into it, and I had power to do so; and now it ought to be a point of honor with you to satisfy my curiosity."

"But I don't see what right you have to be curious."

"But I am, madly curious."

"If," said Clarissa, "I had intended to show you what was in the casket, I was, I should not have humiliated myself by asking you, as a favor, not to look at it."

"Humiliated yourself!"

"Yes, I can assure you I felt it a humiliation to have to beg and pray for what ought to have been forced on me without asking."

"Why, then, did you do it? Would your humiliation have been greater if I had seen what you were trying to conceal?"

"Hadn't we better change the subject, Mr. Maude?" asked Clarissa, with a certain gravity of manner, and severity of tone.

"Take care, Clarissa!"

"Of what, if you please?"

"Of what your thoughts force upon me.'

"I force upon you! Excuse me, Mr. Maude, but I decline being made guilty of your thoughts."

"But you can not see, Clarissa, when you speak of humiliation, how infinitely it must occur to me that there is but one thing could cause you humiliation; and how, if you have nothing to hide, even pure eyes, I must feel it can only be as the angels, perhaps, may sometimes sin; that you have found in your heart a little, it may be very little, much, and that, from charity, for one so unworthy of it as myself? And poor Harris's casket contained some little token of this. Clarissa," he said, turning her face fair, "have I been utterly wrong in this hope? Tell me the truth, but with a little mercy!"

"Mr. Maude," she said, suppressing, under an icy tone, the passion that made her cheek burn and tried to find vent in her voice, "before I answer you, I must put the sense of what you have just said into plain words. In plain English, then, you ask me—Am I in love with you?"

Clarissa——

"You ask me this—you, whose name, till you came here, I scarcely ever heard without its being coupled with some disgraceful epithet—you to question myself, I am weary of all else, I will marry a lady of family and fortune. You think of marrying, and settling down into a respectable country gentleman. But does Mr. Anthony Maude trouble himself with wooing? Oh, no! Why should he, when he fancies that the lady who, for want of a better, might be willing to be dying for love of him?"

"Clarissa, is this just?"

"Well, Mr. Maude, I have considered your question, and I will not let an answer it plainly. Am I in love with you? No! Is that clear? Easy—No!"

She was leaning against the tree, trembling all over, bending her riding-whip, trying to make the ends meet, till it broke; and Anthony, staring at the noise, and hearing, as she flung the pieces on the ground, hid her face in her hands, and burst into tears.

Clarissa leaned against the tree with her face buried in her hands, and Anthony stood near her, struggling in silence against the shame with which she had covered him.

A rustling noise near made Clarissa start, but the sound was only caused by a ragged little band of forge gatherers. The first of the party of the smallest could not resist making a dead stand before Clarissa, and remained there, gazing at her with big, sleepy eyes, which increased, as she gazed, so much, that she felt it necessary to lift her little, fat finger, and put it in her mouth. But to do this, the child let go her pinafore, and all her little hoard of sticks fell to the ground. At the sound she withdrew her eyes from Clarissa's face, and then, looking again on her ridiculous load, she slowly carried a fist to each eye, and began to roar lustily.

Anthony, just before whom she had placed herself, frightened her into silence again suddenly, by stooping to pick up the sticks, just as Clarissa also came to her assistance.

Clarissa, kneeling down on the moss, held up the dirty pinafore, while Anthony put the sticks in. Two or three times they thought the task finished, but were warned, by the little one's eyes gazing obstinately on the ground, that some morsels of her evening's labors yet remained there. At last, however, when not a vestige of a twig was to be seen within a square yard of where they stood, the little damsel gathered up her pinafore, together with a sixpence Clarissa gave her, and, shouting, with the full power of her lungs, "Jer-ony! Jer-ony!" disappeared.

They both stood looking after her with a sort of gratitude. Her little accident had been a blessing to them, for it had broken through the most painful embarrassment that either had ever known. When the little faggot-gatherer was fairly out of sight, he said:

"What do you wish me to do? Shall I go on with you, or will you go alone?"

Clarissa bowed, as if accepting the last proposition, and followed him slowly as he went out of the wood.

It was much lighter in the road, and Clarissa, glancing at Anthony's face as he stood holding her horse, saw that it was pale, but almost calm.

When he had assisted her to mount, he said:

"One moment, if you please, Miss Pompess."

She looked down and waited for Anthony to speak:

"What I now wish to say, Miss Pompess, I do not think I should say if I were certain there was any kind of—of engagement between yourself and Mr. Robertson—in fact, I'm sure I should not say it."

She remained perfectly still; and, in a voice more natural, Anthony went on:

"My doubt on this matter, and the doubts caused by my own unworthiness, have hitherto kept me silent, and made me watch for and catch at little straws of hope, which I thought I saw, but which I now know never existed. I thought it was a hope I saw in this foolish business of poor Harris's box. I caught at it wildly, for I wounded you too deeply to be forgiven; and you—you answered me in words which, perhaps, I can never forgive. But I feel I have no right now to leave you without telling you it was no mere conceit—no assurance—that made me speak to you as I did; but doubt—doubt that fancied it saw a little flickering ray of light, and that, like a great blind moth, rushed at it, and put it out for ever."

Clarissa turned her head, haughtily erect still, a little on one side.

"One minute," said Anthony, thinking her movement one of impatience. "I will not have you feel, when I have so hurt your pride, that I have been too tender of my own. I will not so spare myself the pain of confessing, what is a bitter thing to confess in utter hopelessness, as I now confess it—I love you. The reverence which my dead mother never received from me I have given you; the tenderness which I have never had a sister to bestow on, I have felt for you; the first passionate love of my life has been—is for you. Worse gambler than I ever was before, I have risked my all on one throw, and—lost!"

At this moment they both heard the doctor's horse approaching. Anthony, hardly knowing what he was doing, went and unfastened the mare, and mounted. Once more, as he passed her, he caught Clarissa's reins, and said:

"Tell the doctor I was obliged to go on for help about the gig—anything; I can't see him just now. And, one word: you shall not be troubled by this sort of thing again. To remove all risk of it, I will give up for a few years what you call the life of a respectable country gentleman. I have some cousins, who reside in India, but who happen just now to be in England, who have condescended to write to me since I have been rich, and ask me to enter their regiment. I have not answered their letters yet, but now I shall do so gratefully. So good-bye, Miss Pompess. Clarissa, good-bye, for the last time."

And he was gone.

As the doctor came nearer, Clarissa rode to meet him. Then the doctor turned round with her, and soon Anthony saw nothing but a cloud of dust. When he could no longer hear their horses' feet, he followed slowly along the same road.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—NEGOTIATIONS.

"Is it bisness now?" said the man.

"If you please."

"Suppose you wouldn't mind letting me hold the pistol while we talk?"

"Thank you—it isn't heavy."

The man laughed—a good, long, loud laugh—and said:

"Double-barreled, ain't it?"

"Yes."

"Both barrels loaded?"

There was a pause—one, though, of almost imperceptible duration—before Sleuth replied:

"No; one was fired, you know."

"Why didn't Mr. Gibbs reload?"

"Because he saw you, as he thought, run quite away through the bushes."

"All right. Fire off t'other barrel, and then I, too, will fire away in my fashion."

"Surely you needn't be afraid of me. I—I don't like to be without this little protection, in case of real robbers."

"Lord love you! I'll stay with you, if you like, now—and to-morrow—and for evermore. I shan't perceed, Mister Sleuth, till that ere barker is disposed of."

"Very well," said Sleuth. "But as I may as well have some fun for my money, let's see what sort of a marksman I am. What shall I hit?"

"That ere post sticking out above the rail," said the man, as if with a certain interest in the question of Sleuth's skill.

Sleuth fired, and was so wide of the mark that the man grinned, and said:

"I was half in a mind, Mister Sleuth, to say you might have a shy at me. I a'most wish I had 'offered.'"

Sleuth laughed in turn, and looked a little confused.

"So you bin at Leeds, sir, they say?" began the man.

"Yes. But hadn't you better make haste with your own business? I am beginning to feel chilly."

"Chilly! Get into the gig, Mr. Sleuth, and I'll wrap you up warm and cozy—to be sure I will."

"There, Mr. Sleuth; now you get in, and, as the song says, 'pull your old cloak about you,' and you'll be as comfortable as the days are long, particklerly when you hears what I've got to say."

Sleuth obeyed, though not at all blind to the fact that now he could not run if he wanted, while cunning Master Bob could go off when he pleased.

"And so you've bin to Leeds. Might a humble fellow like me ax what for?"

"To seek a man of the name of Stonor."

"Stonor! How may you spell that ere word?"

"S-t-o-n-o-r," condescendingly explained Sleuth.

"Hem! You didn't find him, perhaps."

"No."

"Shouldn't wonder but you wouldn't. If I were ever to fall in with him—onlikely things do happen in life, Mister Sleuth—what shall I tell him you wanted on him?"

"Well, Bob, if you will persist in knowing other people's business, when, I must confess, it would be wiser for you, in my opinion——"

"Quite right there, Mr. Sleuth—in your opinion: stick to that!" said Bob, significantly.

"If you must know, I wanted to discover if a child of his was alive."

"Boy or gal?"

"Don't know. The alderman's letter didn't tell us that."

"Oh, it's the dead alderman as wants the live child, is it?"

"Yes, this fellow Stonor was the alderman's groom, and he married the alderman's daughter."

"Never! You don't tell me that, Mister Sleuth?"

"Yes, I do; and the alderman swore never to forgive her, or the blackguard who had behaved so treacherously."

"Blackguard! Yes, Mister Sleuth. Lord love you! I could listen to you all day. 'Blackguard!' Please go on."

"Well, he mightn't be a blackguard after all, for aught I know about him personally."

"Blackguard for the present, we'll say," says the man.

"I tell you, I know nothing about him but what the alderman told me, and what my cousin Anthony says."

"Oh, he must be a blackguard if so many honorable gentlemen—gentlemen—all says it. Well, Mr. Sleuth, but the old fellow repented, I suppose, and left his property since March 22—yes, as I says again, Mr. Sleuth, though you does look so hard at me—that the old fellow, I suppose, left his property, since March 22, to that ere grandson——"

"Grandson?"

"Grandson or granddaughter, or what you like."

"No," said Sleuth, "he hasn't done anything of the kind."

"All right. What then, Mister Sleuth?"

"Why, he's left his grandchild, if there be one, to the particular care of his heir."

"But no dockements, no lawyers meddlings in black and white?"

"No. All is—I mean, all was—left by will to my cousin Anthony, some years since."

"August 2, 1811?"

"Yes."

"And what do you think of that bisness, Mister Sleuth?"

"You didn't make an appointment, Bob—in this fashion, too—in order to ask me——"

"Sich a question as that? Not ezackly. I ain't a fool, Mr. Sleuth. I ain't a born fool. You laugh, Mr. Sleuth. I know your meaning—you think I'm a born rogue!"

"Pray, Bob, don't put your own ideas on to me."

"I shouldn't be a bit offended if you said so, Mister Sleuth; not a bit. I should only add it to the bill."

"Bill—what bill?" asked the wondering Sleuth.

"Is it bisness now?" demanded Bob; "or d'ye want me to make another appintment?—a deal stronger one, I'll promise you."

"All right, Bob; we'll go at it now in a minute. Gibbs is yonder, coming back. Quick! don't let him see you!"

"It ud be more nateral if you were to say that to Mister Gibbs," sulkily said Bob.

He obeyed, however, Sleuth's warning to remain concealed, while that gentleman himself advanced into the road.

"Can't get a wehicle of any kind, for love or money," said Gibbs, as he took off his hat, and wiped his bald head.

"Never mind," said Sleuth to Gibbs, "go on home. I'm heartily tired of waiting here—not a soul nigh."

Here a sneeze from the adjoining coppice attracted the attention of both Sleuth and Gibbs—though, while the latter thought it a suspicious circumstance, the former didn't; for he had seen, he said, an old woman gathering sticks there a quarter of an hour ago, but thought she had gone away.

When Gibbs had departed, Sleuth said, quite angrily to the grinning Bob:

"It may be a good joke to you Master Bob——"

"Lord love you, Mr. Sleuth! I couldn't help it. I was so tickled wi' what you said, that I was hobligated to laugh or sneeze."

"Are you ready for business!" asked Sleuth.

"Ax pardon, Mister Sleuth, but friends always take a hinterest, you know, in one another's persitions—and we are friends for a bit, anyhow—leastwise it wouldn't suit you to be my enemy!"

"Of course not," assented Sleuth.

"Werry good. Then don't mind how I gets to work—so long as work it is. You ain't comfortable, are you, now, Mister Sleuth, at home?"

"Comfortable!" asked Sleuth, in astonishment.

"I mean you ain't got no money o' your own. You're as poor as a rat, and you eats the bread of dependence. Ain't it so?"

If Sleuth had replied honestly, he would have said, "Curse your impudence, Bob; do mind your own affairs." But as that wouldn't do just at present, he merely smiled a faint smile, and said:

"Well, supposing all that?"

"Supposing all that, I say it's a werry unpleasant position for any young man, any young gemman of spirit to occupy, and I don't like it."

"You're very kind," said Sleuth, with a somewhat stranger smile than before.

"Werry good!" observed Bob, "werry good. Persition right, what remains? Why, carackter!"

"Character! My character, Bob?"

"Sure-ly, Mr. Sleuth. Who's else? You wouldn't disperse my carackter, I hope?—I, who came here like some blessed hangel in a fairy tale to say——"

"Ay, that's it, Bob," observed Sleuth. "Come to the point, there's a good fellow."

"Mr. Sleuth, look to your innards, and answer me this: Are you a man with a grateful soul?"

"Try me!"

"Well, then, if I were to say to you, Mister Sleuth, I have pitied your miserable condition from the very bottom of my soul, and I've come to say, young man, look up! A friend's waiting on you just round the corner. Ah, such a friend! Guess what's he's got for you?"

"How can I guess?"

"Did you ever hear of Fortune's wheel? Well, how would you like to sit astride on her topmost spoke?"

"I should like it very well, if——"

"But mind, that ere benevolent individual at present round the corner, wants to go up too, and he's got his footing! Ay, that he has, hard and fast. He's not to be shook off, nor perswaded off. He's on the bottom spoke, and he's got his hands on the next spoke above; and now, Mister Sleuth, he's only waiting for you to give the word, and up we go, both on us together, merry as griggs."

"Do you mean that—that if, through any good turn you can turn me, I were to become a rich man!——"

"That's it! dash along! Mister Sleuth knows what's what, I see, after all."

"In that case, do you mean we're to be together—friends—and——"

"I forces my friendship on no man," said Bob, loftily. "Maybe we shall be friends and loving pals—maybe we shan't. You have your views, I has mine."

"I honor your good sense, Bob. I fancy we should be best apart."

"All right, Mister Sleuth; is it a bargain, then?—share and share alike?"

"You mean——" hesitated Sleuth, in absolute disbelief that he could have rightly understood Bob's demands.

"I mean," said Bob, lifting his right leg up, in order the more decisively to make it descend with a good foot-stamp on the ground, "that if I comes as a hangel, to take you up in my harms and carry you out of this nonsense and wretchedness, and make a man of you—a respectable gemmen—I ain't a going to require you to flop down on your blessed knees and begin a worshippin' on me. No, I merely waves my hand, and says, Don't mention it. Tip up half the old fellow's blunt, and blow the benevolent."

Sleuth looked at Bob, and Bob received his look with a wink of inexpressible knowingness, that made even Sleuth shrink from the abominable ugliness and wretchedness of the other's face.

"But what is it you have got to show me that can justify all this talk?"

"Ain't got nothink to show."

"No?"

"No."

"And you expect me to believe you, and to make terms with you, in entire ignorance of the thing you've got to sell?"

"No, Mr. Sleuth, not ezactly. Bob isn't a fool. Did you ever hear on a certain dockement, a little dockement, but with werry big sense in it?"

"Do you mean—mean a codicil to my uncle's existing will?"

"Did you ever see it, Mister Sleuth?"

Sleuth hesitated to acknowledge he had seen it.

"Yes," he replied; "I did see it on the night of the robbery; so you see that can't be the document you speak of."

"Why not?" demanded Bob.

"Because, then, you must have got it from the robbers who took it from the safe."

"Well?" fiercely demanded Bob.

"No, I shan't say any more."

"That's yer game, is it! 'Twon't do, Mister Sleuth. I ain't frightened. Come—it's the last time of asking—is it share and share alike!"

"Do you know how much property the alderman left?"

"No."

Sleuth was glad to hear this. Bob continued:

"Do you know, Mister Sleuth?"

"I think about thirty-six or thirty-seven thousand pounds; but I won't be sure to a few hundreds."

"Mister Sleuth, I do like you! Mister Sleuth, I do admire you! Eigh, deary me! if only my mother had taught me how to do it with such a smooth, blessed baby-hinnocent face, I wouldn't ha' been here now. I ax pardon, but would you mind telling me how you manages to do it so well?"

"To do what so well?" asks Sleuth, sullenly, and yet fearfully.

"To lie, you beggar! to lie! to lie! to lie! There! I do know, Mister Sleuth. That pretty young woman let it out to me that the halderman left a hundred and seventy thousand pounds."

This was altogether unpleasant, exceedingly unpleasant. Sleuth, however, bore up gallantly against hard words, for wasn't he defending his own future property?

"Harkye, Bob," he plucked up courage at last to say. "Do you really mean that you expect to receive, for bringing me this codicil, half of the whole of the alderman's property? Do you propose to charge me for my own document eighty-five thousand pounds?"

"That's the ticket."

"Bob, you joke."

"Do I?"

"I am sure you do. Now, harkye, Bob. I know what you are thinking of. You think if I won't give you what you want, you can go to my cousin Anthony, and that he will. Now, I will speak to you as a true friend. Anthony is just that sort of person who, the moment he found out what you really wanted—and he'd play with you till he did know, till he had wormed everything out of you, but then he'd clap you in prison, say the codicil was forged, and transport you for trying to get money on false pretences, while I should be no better off."

Bob only whistled, to show his utter contempt for Sleuth's speech.

"You must acknowledge, Bob, that he might try on that kind of game."

"He might," assented Bob. "Pigs might fly."

"What would you do then?"

"Come back to you, Mister Sleuth.

"And of course, you'd have to come down in price after such a failure."

"Possible. It's just possible, but not likely."

"What if I could not then negotiate with you at all?"

"Why, Mister Sleuth?"

"Because I should be afraid, after you had gone to Anthony. Don't you see?"

"No."

"No. You don't see that, if you offer it to Anthony, you do it knowing he can only want it to destroy it, and that both he and you would be in danger of the law; and, therefore, if Anthony refused to meddle with it, and then found I had got it, he would, of course, denounce it as a forgery, and point to what you had done to him as evidence of your character."

Bob listened to this in a silence that evidently grew deeper and deeper.

"I don't want to drive a hard bargain," he said, after some expression of his contempt for Sleuth's reasoning, which Sleuth understood, and therefore let pass without comment. "If half's too much, what do you say to a third?"

"Really Bob, we are wasting time."

"Well, I didn't mean to be such a spoony; but as you say, time's going. Very well, let's shake hands on it. I'll take a fourth—there!"

"You'll take nearly forty thousand pounds, Bob?" asked Sleuth, in a tone that aggravated the ostler, and he jumped to his feet. "Bob, we shall have to part, I can see, without coming to any useful end. Is that wise? Don't you mean, Bob, to talk to me like a man of sense?"

"Shut up, Mister Sleuth! and when you do reopen your jaws, make me an offer."

"I will, Bob—a magnificent one. I'll give you enough to make a gentleman of you——"

"The figger?" interposed Bob, tired of Sleuth's eloquence.

"Five thousand pounds!"

"Say twenty, and I'm your man."

"No."

"Then no to you; and I'll try my luck with Mr. Anthony. Hulloa! who's that?" Bob pointed to a gentleman riding leisurely along the road.

"That's Mr. Macguire a friend of Mr. Anthony Maude. He's a magistrate."

"A beak, eh? We may as well make ourselves scarce till he's gone by."

"Do, Bob, if you see it necessary. I don't."

Bob looked at Sleuth, who didn't seem to notice the look, and Bob had no longer time to delay his purpose of seeking a moment or two of concealment. Sharply, however, he watched for the meeting of Mr. Macguire and Mr. Sleuth. Of course, Bob was too far off to hear what they said. But he saw them look directly to the spot where he was, and presently Mr. Macguire went off at a trot, but stopped when he had gone a few yards, and said:

"He can't escape. My keepers are all about. I'll soon be back."

Sleuth had spoken not of Bob, but of a strange dog in the plantation worrying the game; but Bob naturally concluded the worst, just as cunning Mr. Sleuth had intended. He rushed forth, almost before the magistrate was out of sight, and found Sleuth prepared for him, looking flustered, and with visible tremor affecting his limbs, but still able to say, as he drew courage from the fact that he was able to give a satisfactory explanation:

"Now, Bob, we must bring all this to an end, or you'll be caught."

"Worse for you, Mister Sleuth."

"I am no enemy of yours, Bob."

"O' course not."

"I'll give you ten thousand pounds within one week after I recover the alderman's property, if I do recover it through the paper you say you can put into my hands. Stop! don't be in a hurry to answer. Ten thousand pounds, Bob, isn't a bad day's work for you."

"No, Mister Sleuth, nor a hundred and sixty thousand pounds for you."

"But that, you see, is mine properly.

"Twenty's the word. Couldn't afford to take a sixpence less. Fact is, Mr. Sleuth, I'd be ashamed to go back to London, and say I took twenty thousand pounds for a paper as is as good as a banknote for a hundred and seventy thousand pounds. Good mornin', Mr. Sleuth."

So saying, Bob got up, and began to walk away. Sleuth saw him go, and for a few seconds made no attempt to call him back.

Bob's back was towards him. The pistol, with one loaded barrel, was got out—was ready in his (Sleuth's) hand. Why not fire? Here, at least, he needed no justification, so his soul whispered to him.

Ah! but what if he missed? That must be thought of. He must step after him.

Time and Bob are both slipping away. He calls out:

"Bob!"

Bob walks on, not even condescending to look back.

Ha! That will just do.

"Bob!" he again cries, and in a palpably beseeching tone of voice, while his feet, scarcely lifted from the ground, glide along with amazing speed and softness.

Bob continues his walk, and nearer and nearer he hears the soft steps and the pleading voice.

"Bob, do stop to hear what I've got to say."

Bob slackened his own steps at this, but still did not turn round. His victim was coming closer and closer, and would, of course, when he did turn, fall into his arms, and as Bob put it to himself, agree to anythink! Only he (Bob) mustn't seem to give in too soon.

Bob laughs as he hears the steps now so close, and the quick breathing; but suddenly he hears something else, and in an instant Bob is falling flat to the ground, and a pistol-shot is whizzing harmlessly by over his falling body.

Bob's ears were quick, in spite of the wound to one of them, and he had heard the click of the pistol as Sleuth cocked it at the last moment.

Before Sleuth could well realize to himself the consequences of his failure, he found himself face to face with the infuriate ostler, who pressed upon him, knife in hand.

Back, back, back, Sleuth retreated, fighting with the butt end of the pistol, and doing his best to keep Bob at bay. But Bob gave him no time to turn. The knife flashing, and the gleam of Bob's devilish eyes, were all Sleuth saw.

Back, back, back still he was driven. And still Sleuth kept the ruffian at arm's length, and still over a space of some fifty yards, he managed to retreat swiftly without a fall.

But getting unawares towards one side of the road, he presently had behind him a little mud heap, which, in lapse of time, had become covered with wild flowers. Bob saw, and pressed on with new violence. The heap is reached, and in a couple of seconds Sleuth has fallen over it, rolled to one side, and now he feels Bob's hand at his throat, Bob's knee on his breast.

"You varmint! you treacherous, bloody-minded varmint! You wanted me, didn't you!"

"Mercy!" gasped Sleuth.

SKETCHES OF MISSIONARY LIFE.

BABY'S NEST.

MISSIONARY SKETCHES.

THERE can be nothing more interesting to the people in general than some record of the thousands of self-denying men and women who, actuated by the most benevolent motives, leave homes of comfort, sometimes of luxury, and, for the sake of doing good, journey to far distant lands, careless of climate or fatigue. These records, as they come home to Europe or to the society that sent them forth, teem with the grave, the gay, the lively, and the severe. They tell of the gradual wearing of savages into the nature of civilization, and of the many small romances that go to make up mission life, and give the salt to the otherwise unpalatable dish.

We have given, from sketches, some of these; and from the letters the details:

The Rev. Mr. Hunter writes from Rupert's Land: "One day, while visiting at the hut of an Indian woman, a wretched place, made up from a few pine branches, and open on all sides, with a fire burning in the centre, I saw a small bundle, or rather bag, composed of rabbit skins, lying upon the floor, which, to my utter astonishment, seemed endowed with motion. I took it up and drew the strings that held the mouth of the bag, and out popped a little hand, followed by a tiny head, with which, as I snatched at it, and it slipped away, seemed fully the size of a rabbit. I started up in bed to see not less than a hundred of these charming visitants running in all directions over my bed and room, and me at all sheathed at my shoulings and blows, desisting from their antics only a moment to attend to them. I rose, and provided myself with a heavy horsewhip, in the use of which I spent my night."

THE ORPHAN OF JUGGERNAUT.

Dr. Smith, Bishop of Victoria, writes on child-selling in China: "I was walking in the neighborhood of Shanghai, with Mr. Hobson, when I was accosted by a man and woman, the man with baskets a-top on each side of him, in each of which was a child, while another rested in the woman's arms. The children were their own, and they were offering them for sale. They asked for the choice two of the 10*l.* $4, or about 11½ cents per pound. The mother accosted perfectly unmoved while the father haggled over the answer to my question as to whether she was aware she was selling her child again, when they were once sold. 'Yes!' They cared very little for the cause, but the practice is no common that it can only be ascribed to the direst poverty, ignorance, and realize a few dollars in so doing."

The next is a letter, dated at Calcutta, related by Mrs. Sandys. The little one was a girl, brought from Bhagulpore by Mr. Sandys for five rupees ($2 50), who placed her in the mission, where the child is now found shows an average share of intelligence that she is to be educated as a missionary, and, when old enough, to return to Bhagulpore to teach.

At Dinapore, India, a large mission school is supported, at the head of which is Mrs. Hinderer, the wife of a missionary. She thus relates a touching and beautiful incident: "On the 6th of October, a real treat was given us by the arrival of a box of presents from home. It was such a marvelous thing that the children were well nigh delight, and perfectly unconvertible, while I was scarcely any better. They shouted and sang in their own way, expressing their thanks. One said: 'Oh, Ags gets book from her father and mother, sisters and brothers, far away! Oh, it is good!' And then they crept up to the box, running away, and clapping their hands with delight."

The Rev. Mr. Crowther, a native missionary at Abbeokuta, in the Zomba country, Africa, who, joined with great intelligence, is highly educated, having received it in England, gives a little anecdote of his friend, the King of Ketu, illustrating that great monarch's fondness for the toilet: "I heard that the King of Ketu was willing to receive missionaries, and as I had some time before gained his favor by sending him a present of a pair of red cloth slippers, I thought it would be well for me to go and see his majesty. I had in my possession a gay patchwork quilt, which I immediately had made into a long robe or cloak, and with a gay yarn cap, sent to England by a lady, I took up as a present to his royalty. Had I brought the clothes to him, I could not have pleased better. His majesty donned the robe and cap, putting it immediately on his back, and with the air of a more than monarch strolled backward and forward with dignified pace, looking very proud and danced in delight. After this, you may be assured, I had everything my own way."

The Missionary Token gives this account of the Sierra Leone school: "Among the various African tribes that at Charlotte, the liberated African girls, is not the least interesting, since, perhaps, understand what is meant by 'liberated Africans.' They are rescued from the native of Africa, who have been liberated by the captains of the cruisers on the coast, from slave vessels. On the occasion, during the year 1859, a cruiser brought to Sierra Leone a captured slaver, which had 460 slaves on board, who were landed in the most wretched condition. Even about Sierra Leone the trade is carried on by canoes, which creep down the rivers at night.

"During the last autumn, within a few weeks, three such canoes were captured, having on board, in all, 155 slaves, mostly children, and some of very tender age. One case of barbarous cruelty will serve to show the brutality which is inseparably connected with this inhuman traffic. There was among the slaves a mother with an infant at her breast. The child began to cry, to the annoyance of the owner of the mother, who was afraid that thereby attention might be called to the canoe. The inhuman monster coolly took the infant from its mother, and cast it into the sea!

"When the poor captured slaves are brought into the colony to be liberated, or set free, there are many thousands of miles from their native land, and, without any chance of reaching the adults usually find some of their own race to whom they can attach themselves.

"The matron, who sleeps with these elder girls (fifty-eight in number), relates that she never before in her life had seen such a thing; the children that night were kneeling around their beds calling on their Saviour for mercy and grace. Not only on the Saturday evenings, but on other evenings, but often do soft voices of singing and supplication from some part of the house, show how deeply the hearts of their teachers, and the blessed effects are seen in the daily conduct of the girls."

CHILD-SELLING IN CHINA.

The following account of some new comers is from the pen of Mrs. Clements, the English lady in charge of the school, who also makes honorable mention of Bro Mansey, the most prominent figure in our picture:

"We received, in May and June, new children, together eighteen, all liberated Africans, who, in consequence of the late war with the Limnehs were made slaves, but caught and rescued. Some were accompanied by their poor mothers, who wished to see that their children were placed, and who parted from them, not without hard struggles and tears. Many touching scenes of mothers' love have we witnessed, which impressed on us most forcibly the misery of this people, and our bounden duty towards the dear children so providentially brought under our care.

"Our girls received the new comers with shouts of joy, suffocating them almost with their embracings, and very willingly shared with them all they had. They also took good care of the little ones, so that they soon were at home and happy here, and gave altogether much less trouble than one might expect. Our good 'Big Mammy,' as the matron of the young children (who has been now eight years with us), is called, especially deserves my thankful acknowledgment for all that she, under like, does for the infants."

In the year 1858, a Brahmin family in North India, who had never heard the glad tidings of the Prince of Peace, set out on a pilgrimage to the temple of Juggernaut. Although they were heathen, they knew and felt they had committed sin; they wished to atone for it, and thought they could do so by taking a long and wearisome journey. The family consisted of the Pundit, his wife, and their little girl, only a few months old, and two or three servants. They had gone as far as Balasore, 150 miles from the temple, when the wife was taken ill. From that time the father disappeared and was never seen more.

With great difficulty the mother dragged herself as far as the door of a house, where she hoped to find help, but was disappointed. A short time after a missionary passing by, found her lying on the ground, under the shade of a tree, with her sleeping infant clinging to her. He was a long way from the mission station, which made it difficult to obtain help, but he walk some miles before he could procure a cup of milk for her. After three days from the discovery, the mother died, and "the story of the cross," which, for the first time in her life, she had heard from the lips of a stranger, was tenderly cared for her body, found an entrance into her heart; and that little one was taken by the mother's hand to the Lamb of God to take away her sins!

The kind missionary took care of the little girl, until she was old enough to become an assistant teacher in the Female Orphan Institution of the mission, She is now the happy and useful wife of the Rev. Behari Lal Sing, of Calcutta. About two years ago that worthy clergyman was in England, and at a public meeting on behalf of the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East, consulted his own interesting speech by asking British Christians to pray for his beloved wife, "That she may be a burning and a shining light amongst her benighted sisters, and have wisdom and grace to train up her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

THE KING OF KETU AND THE PATCHWORK ROBE.

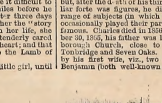
THE LATE MR. J. F. HERRING.

EVERY class of painting may be said to have its "representative man;" and as regards racehorse and purely farmyard subjects, Mr. Herring was unrivaled. Stubbs, Marshall, Gilpin, and Sartorius were not so accurate in their colour, and coarser in their coloring; and Morland's scenes were on a much smaller scale, and more good cabin pictures than first-rate studies.

Mr. Herring was born in Surrey, England, A.D. 1795, and was of America-Dutch extraction. He was bred to his father's profession, that of a fancy-stock studies. In the course of his trasic journeys for the house, he learnt from a groom to ride, became a first-rate horseman, and taught himself drawing, by stealth in his bed-room, after the family were gone to bed, with his brother for companion. Before long, he had achieved a horse and cart in oils. Their father of course found out the secret, but, with a wise forbearance, encouraged his self-instructed him, and he consented, with some reluctance, that his son should have lessons. John proved, after one attendence, to know more than his master, and the latter had the grace to confess it.

An early marriage, favoring his father's absence in Holland, and the dread of "a scene" on his return, caused him to have his home and seek his fortune in Doncaster, where he arrived about race time, in 1814. William was the St. Leger horse of the year; and Catton, Tramp and Attendors were other races during the week. He tried hard to reproduce the St. Leger race, but his powers were not yet ripe, he failed. Another chance opened up as he strolled along the town, and, finding a painter making a dreadful mess of a white horse on a coach panel, he did it for him, and so delighted the proprietors that they made him their crest-painter in ordinary.

A Coach and Horses, and divers other inn signs, soon began to crop up all over Doncaster, and his name rose in the district. Still, he had not quite enough to do; and with his old love of driving burning within him, and feeling highly enough, that, as "the painter coachman," he would be well known, he accepted office, and drove a coach or mail on the north road between York and Doncaster. He descended from the box, he has received many commissions for coaching pictures, which realized from 30 guineas, and he had also commenced, with Fuho da Puta, that series of St. Leger victories which placed him in fame. For thirty-three years he painted all the leading and winning horses of the Doncaster Cup. These formed, with the "Stable Scenes," part of that "Herring Gallery," which Mr. Ackermann, of the Strand, Fores to Mr. Bristow, and of which the start for Orlando's Derby and the quarrel for the Oaks included four racing scenes, the last he ever gave to the world, and, in his regard formed a fitting and suitable finish.



Still he was not content to stand on them alone, and "The Grand Meal," in the Vernon Gallery, his "Heroes of the Sea," and "Members of the Temperance Society," "Feeding," "Refreshment," "Interior of an English Homestead," and others, were only a few portion of the general works which the painter's art has made familiar in all lands. His "Materials," "Hunting Scenes" (in which the men and hounds were not equal to the horses), and "St. Giles and St. James" were also very popular; and whether it was a horse, or rabbits, or a brood of young ducks, the British Institution, to the very last, hardly ever opened without something from his hand. Many of his best works were exhibited in Suffolk street, Strand; but, like Haydon, he had a strong anti-Royal Academy feeling.

He did not leave many pictures behind him, but among them are a large "Horse Fair," and "Cattle Fair," and "The Forge." He worked a little till within four days of his death, and a horse's head was the last thing he touched.

TROUBLESOME REDFELLOWS.

daughters (one of whom is married to Mr. Harrison Weir, the excellent wood-draughtsman), survive him.

OPENING A BOX OF PRESENTS AT IBADAN.

We are not apt to think that one of the great causes of the sadness of autumn is its silence—the absence of the birds. It is like the wilderness, whose characteristic is also silence—the absence of man; a much deeper silence, reaching way back to the creation. Night, also, has its silence. But the greatest silence is that of the grave.

Our sweetest experiences of affection and love are meant to be suggestions of that realm which is the home of the heart.

A FRENCH editor has given the following sensible description of the effect of an advertisement: The first time a man sees an advertisement he takes no notice of it; the second time he looks at the name; the third time he looks at the price; the fourth time he reads it; the fifth time he speaks of it to his wife; and the sixth time he buys.

We can learn to read and write, but we cannot learn raillery; that must be a particular gift of nature; and to tell the truth, I esteem him happy who does not wish to acquire it. The character of sarcasm is dangerous; although this quality makes those laugh whom it does not wound, it nevertheless, never procures esteem.

THE LITTLE ORPHAN BROUGHT TO MRS. RANDIS.

PASSAGE OF THE FIRST BOAT THROUGH THE SUEZ CANAL.

TOWNSEND'S RECORD OF THE REBELLION.

ONE of the most remarkable literary efforts the world has ever produced, is now offered to the inspection of the public at the rooms of the Loyal League Club.

It is a complete history and record of the rebellion from the election of Mr. Lincoln in 1860, to this date, by Mr. Thomas S. Townsend, of this city.

At the time of its commencement, when the first agitation was occurring, Mr. Townsend conceived the idea of making a chronicle of every event bearing upon the great struggle that was approaching. To do this, he not only went to all the journals of the day, and gathered from them a relation of events, but sought matter from public speakers, and written documents while the passing matter was fresh in the public mind. In doing this, he has rightly judged that he would get everything worth procuring. These extracts have been pasted in a series of large books, resembling ledgers, each containing 600 pages, the series to the close of Mr. Lincoln's first term making 24 volumes. No party feeling enters into its pages, and no favoritism is shown. He has accomplished his work so far by nine hours work per day for five years.

The preparation of these 52 volumes of printed matter has been, however, the least laborious portion of the work. To find any particular item in them would be almost impossible without complete tablets of contents to the whole; in fact, as difficult as to search out a particular entry in as many day-books in a merchant's counting-house. To prepare for a perfect arrangement of the contents it was necessary to go through a system of journalization. For instance: it was requisite to enter the reports or descriptions of a battle under different headings, such as the action of a particular regiment or brigade, individual valor calling forth special notice, trophies of victory, &c. All these had to be entered into a journal from which, like a commercial record, they could be carried to their respective accounts in what the merchant calls his ledger, but which Mr. Townsend designates his "Encyclopædia of the Rebellion." Each volume of the "Record" requires a folio journal of 600 pages to comprise an epitome of its contents. When the separate items, however, are pasted from the journals into the "Encyclopædia," the furnace have performed their duty and are cast aside, being of no further use. The magnitude of the labor will be understood when we state that towards the preparation of the references more than 30,000 folio pages of writing have been undertaken in these journal or waste-books, which are removed when their entries are systematically transferred to the various entries in the "Encyclopædia."

We now come to the Encyclopædia of the War, comprised in 15 volumes, or 17,000 pages. The entries refer to everything that is found in the printed volumes, amongst which we may name: Generals, regiments, soldiers who have distinguished themselves, battles and skirmishes, brutal and destructive acts, blockade and capture, privateers and captures, sale or destruction of captures, political prisoners, living heroes, illustrious dead, war department, Federal and Confederate governmental orders, Federal and Confederate naval matters, legal matters, clerical documents, historical references, missing soldiers; with speeches, letters, reports, messages, correspondence, biographies, poems, proceedings of Congress and State Legislatures. There is also a "Tablet of Fame," in which is comprised the name of every soldier who has been honorably mentioned in official reports or otherwise, and in which no less than 6,000 names are entered for the first two years, all that is at present posted up.

The index, the key to the whole, is comprised in one volume, and gives the reference to the "Encyclopædia."

The Record in its present state is bound and lettered, in 52 volumes. If the columns of print were connected they would foot up to 45 miles in length, and the actual outlay for paper, &c., to make it, has been nearly $2,000.

It is important that this work should be secured for the public use, and we trust some steps will be taken to that end.

MEDAL PRESENTED TO CAPT. THOMAS STETSON, OF THE SHIP MERCURY.

CAPT. STETSON,

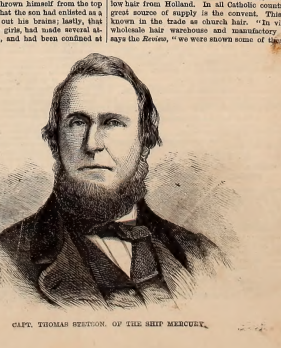
Of the United States Ship Mercury.

We have the pleasure to introduce to the readers of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER a most striking portrait of Capt. Stetson, of the U. S. ship Mercury, who lately rescued the passengers of the ill-fated vessel William Nelson, wrecked on the 21st of June. We give also an exact representation of the gold medal presented to Capt. Stetson by the proprietors and subscribers of the Parisian journal Le Temps. It was struck at the French Mint, and is a beautiful specimen of their workmanship. Capt. Stetson is distinguished for his humanity, having several times, by his daring and judicious exertions, saved unfortunate voyagers from a watery grave. For one of these services, some years ago, Capt. Stetson received a magnificent chronometer from the Queen of England, for rescuing the passengers of the English ship Persia, burned on the high seas.

A STRANGE FAMILY.—A few days back the police found the corpses of three young girls who had terminated their existence with charcoal in one of the old houses of the Rue Beautrillis, Paris. It appeared that the family to which they belonged, had a monomania for suicide; that the father, in consequence of commercial misfortunes, had thrown himself from the top tower of the St. Jacques; that the son had enlisted as a soldier, and then blown out his brains; lastly, that Eugenie, one of the three girls, had made several attempts to commit suicide, and had been confined at Charenton. It was only a fortnight ago, that her mother, thinking her entirely cured, withdrew her from the asylum and took her home. Eugenie being left alone with her two sisters, took the opportunity of converting them to her own ideas of life and death, the consequence of which was that they went out, bought charcoal, and then re-entered the room. The mother, on returning home, found her three daughters dead, in a kneeling posture, and all attired in their best dresses.

A CORRESPONDENT, writing from Clearfield, Pa., tells a very doubtful story about an organized band, who intend to resist the bounty tax in that State. "It is nothing," he says, "to see from 60 to 100 men drilling in the woods, and they are all armed with fipenoors and 16 shooters, navies and sabres. It is their intention to burn the buildings of all those who had anything to do with laying on the bounty tax." He says further that he knows of "two powder mills in the woods in this county, and they are going to carry the thing on a big scale." The first thing they intend doing is to "capture Petersburg and get the artillery there."

THE total annual product of coffee in the world is set down in a recent circular at an average of 672,000,000 pounds, or about 300,000 tons. Half of this is produced in Brazil. About 55,000 tons come from Java and Sumatra; 30,000 tons from Ceylon; 25,000 tons from St. Domingo, and the remainder from a variety of other countries, or islands in or near the torrid zone.



PUNCH says that a Yankee baby will crawl out of his cradle, take a survey of it, invent an improvement, and apply for a patent before he is six months old.

FALSE HAIR—HOW AND WHERE IT IS PROCURED.

A WRITER in the London Review gives an account of the sources of supply of the false hair for which the artificial curls and "waterfalls" of the prevailing fashion create a market. The stock comes chiefly from Germany, Holland, Brittany, Spain, Italy, and the Catholic convents. The peasant girls of Brittany cover the head with a picturesque white cap, which wholly hides the hair; hence the sale of the article has been openly carried on. Spain and the north of Italy also furnish considerable contributions to the collections of jet black locks. The main crops of the golden hair, now so much prized, come from Germany, and the yellow hair from Holland. In all Catholic countries one great source of supply is the convent. This hair is known in the trade as church hair. "In visiting a wholesale hair warehouse and manufactory lately, says the Review, "we were shown some of these veils.

THE LATE J. F. HEERING, ANIMAL PAINTER.

CAPT. THOMAS STETSON, OF THE SHIP MERCURY.

THE FIRST BOAT

Through the Suez Canal.

THE French press is making great glorification over the opening of the Suez Canal, and the passage of the first boat through its entire length, a fact that was accomplished on the 15th of August last.

